The home of the Minis family in Savannah. Just before the war, Abraham Minis, who was named for his great-grandfather, one of the first settlers of Savannah, was a leading merchant, insurance agent and cotton factor, and an alderman in Savannah. He served as acting mayor in 1860. The Minis family had known Robert E. Lee since his service as an army engineer in the 1830s. “The family of Isaac Minis,” Douglass Southall Freeman wrote in R. E. Lee, “gave him cordial welcome, made the more delightful by the presence of two daughters, Sarah and Philipa.” Lee gave Sarah pen-and-ink drawings of an alligator and a terrapin he had made on Cockspur Island when he was building Fort Pulaksi. The Minises were happy to entertain Lee again when he arrived in Savannah to arrange for its defense early in the war. (Author’s collection. Photograph by Michael Levkoff.)

The majority of Savannah’s Jewish population, like Charleston’s, was native-born. Mark Greenberg estimates that 57.4 percent was born in the South. But those born in Germany accounted for 32.5 percent. Many, like the Lippmans, came from Bavaria. Joseph Lippman, born in Reichmandorf, came to America in 1837, married Babette Eckman in Philadelphia, and moved to Savannah in 1842. He helped organize a German military company and was a leader in the local secession assembly.[55]

An 1856 wedding photograph of Mr. and Mrs. Louis Haiman of Columbus, Georgia. (From the collection of Louis Schmier, Valdosta, Georgia.)

Some families stayed on during the war. Some who left, returned. Rebecca Solomons recalled the funerals of both Gen. Francis Bartow after Bull Run and the young Habersham brothers killed within an hour on the same day in the Battle of Atlanta. Mrs. Solomons took “such delicacies as could be had” to the sick soldiers at the Wayside Home, a Confederate hospital. The Solomons women wore calico and homespun dresses rather than the fine silk dresses Mrs. Solomons had brought back from New York just before the war began. Mr. Solomons traveled to Wilmington to purchase goods from blockade-runners and brought back “pieces of dress goods and shoes of all sizes so that the whole family, aunts and cousins, were dressed alike.” Rebecca also recalled an exchange of prisoners “and everyone went out to the Park Extension and carried food to the men, so many sick and hungry.” The officers were welcomed into private homes, including the home of the Solomonses. Rebecca’s cousins Julius and Jacob Clarence were stationed nearby, as was her uncle Joseph M. Solomons for a time.[56]

Jewish Savannahians saw many of their own fight and die for the Confederacy. Mrs. Solomon Cohen lived to see thirty-two of her descendants enlist in the armed forces of the Confederacy. One of them was Col. Abraham C. Myers, the quartermaster general.[57] Gratz Cohen, the only son of Solomon Cohen, was killed at the Battle of Bentonville and was buried at Laurel Grove Cemetery in Savannah.[58]

There were approximately forty Jewish families in Augusta, Georgia, during the war and a small community in Columbus. Jewish Georgians were involved in the war effort and in all manner of trade. Louis and Elias Haiman had emigrated from Prussia and settled in Columbus in the 1830s. Their father owned a hardware store and, when war was declared, the Haimans began manufacturing swords. Soon, they purchased the Muscogee Ironworks. Elias traveled to Europe to buy more raw material when supplies ran out. Eventually, the Haimans produced saddles, bayonets, tin cups, and mess articles.[59] Simon Rothschild, who began as a peddler, manufactured army uniforms in Columbus. He supplied 4, 000 uniforms to the Confederate army and 1,500 to the Georgia militia.[60] Henry Solomon of Augusta wrote his to brother in June 1864 that blockade-running "has been successful lately. Nine vessels arrived in one week. Business has been very dull here since November. Merchants are almost bare of goods. Very few have made or making expenses since Christmas. Confederate money buys very little of anything." Solomon blamed the economic problems on the government. "Our financial affairs," he told his brother, "are ruinously managed." He then suggested "a Yid or good merchant in the Treasury Bureau."[61] But Solomon was still optimistic that the war could be won. "'Uncle Bob,' as General Lee is called," he wrote, "becomes a greater General every day. He has the entire confidence of the people." Solomon was proud of Beauregard's "severe whipping" of Benjamin F. Butler during the Bermuda Hundred Campaign and hoped that General Johnston could stop General Sherman's march. Nevertheless Solomon believed the South "will be macholu [bankrupt] for many years."[62]

S. COHEN,
DEALER IN SLAVES,
WHITE HALL STREET,
ATLANTA, GA.

$2800 00 augusta ~~Atlanta~~ Ga. October 16 1863

Received of George Heard Esq. twenty Eight Hundred Dollars, being in full for the purchase of One Negro Slave named Giles about 17 years old the right and title of said Slave I warrant and defend against the claims of all persons whatsoever, and likewise warrant him sound and healthy. As witness my hand and seal.

Solomon Cohen

“S. Cohen, Dealer in Slaves, White Hall Street, Atlanta, Ga.” This title or invoice for the sale of “one Negro Slave” was signed by Solomon Cohen on October 16, 1863, in Augusta, Georgia. (Courtesy of Paul Blatner, Savannah, Georgia. Photograph by Michael Levkoff.)

The small Augusta Jewish community suffered grievous losses. At least four Jewish men from the city were killed. In April 1862, when Lt. J. Julius Jacobus, a promising young attorney, was killed at Shiloh, the Richmond County Bar placed in its minutes a lengthy resolution praising Jacobus’s “fine character, popular manners, energy and fine intellectual endowments.” The resolution praised “his useful and exemplary life and glorious death.” The members resolved “that we will all wear the usual badges of mourning for thirty days.” The court adjourned for two days.[63]

Canal Street, New Orleans, in the Civil War era. This street was home to many Jewish businesses. (Courtesy of the Louisiana State Museum.)

As the war progressed and the blockade tightened, the Jewish citizens of New Orleans felt the impact of shortages and the anxiety of war. “New Orleanians,” Chester G. Hearn wrote, “felt the squeeze on their accustomed freedom, as well as on their wallets and stomachs, and with each passing month they wondered when something would be done to drive off the Union blockade."[64] Rising prices and scarcity of money greatly affected the German immigrants. This was true of the Jews as well. "Yet, the business of the city," John Nau concluded, "was going in its normal way, to judge from the surface."[65] "Things are daily increasing in price," Clara Solomon wrote in her diary. "Soap which formerly was 20 cts. a bar, is now $1.00! Coffee $1. per pound, and Ma has notified us we must soon say 'good bye' to it. She tried the experiment of mixing it with rye, but we were dissatisfied with it… What are we coming to? The Blockade must be raised." Clara wondered how, if the war continued and the young men went off to fight, "can we have any beaus!"[66]

But these inconveniences did not dampen her enthusiasm for the cause. "Today one year ago," Clara wrote on November 6, 1861, "Abe Lincoln was elected President of the United States. How many changes since then have transpired. How much has been accomplished." Some things did not change. Clara and her family continued to "promenade" up Canal Street after synagogue services on Carondelet Street on Saturday, and shop and have lunch at Blineau's restaurant. On Saturday, November 16, 1861, Clara and her friends and family were among the thousands of New Orleanians who watched a "grand review" of the local troops. Clara was impressed with the number of soldiers—more than ten thousand, she recalled—to "keep the invader" from the soil of Louisiana. And she was proud to see her "noble Cousin" Samuel Myers of Company F, 4th Louisiana "at the head of his command, and screaming at the height of his voice, 'Forward March'!! It was a splendid turnout. How I would like to see them all 'pitch' into the Yankees and give them a sound thrashing." Many citizens visited Camp Benjamin, named for Judah P. Benjamin, and enjoyed picnicking there.[67]

New Orleans's four congregations—Gates of Mercy, the old German synagogue on Rampart Street in the French Quarter; Dispersed of Judah, the Portuguese or Sephardic synagogue on Carondelet; Gates of Prayer, the new German synagogue in Lafayette City; and Temime Derech, the Polish congregation on Carondelet Street farther uptown—continued to hold services and minister to the needs of New Orleans Jewry during the war. The rabbis of the Crescent City all supported the Confederate cause. Even the Reverend Dr. Bernard Illowy, who later cooperated with the occupation army, said in the sixth anniversary address of the Association for the Relief of Jewish Widows and Orphans: "Liberty, fraternity and equality are the precious acquisitions of this day, and the fundamental principles of our glorious Confederacy, under whose banner every one will find protection," be they a Polander, Bavarian, Frenchman, or Hungarian.[68]

The war also brought death and grief to New Orleans Jewry. J. B. Joseph, a friend of Clara Solomon, was killed at Shiloh. A native of South Carolina, he had moved to New Orleans with his family six years earlier. Rabbi Gutheim “spoke quite pathetically of the deaths of our two members, & all shed the pitying tear,” Clara wrote in her diary. “My feelings were more touched,” she continued, “seeing Mr. J. [Joseph], an old man, shedding such tears of bitterness, so completely bowed down with grief.” Lt. Joseph Calhoun Levy of the 3d Louisiana, Eugene Henry Levy’s brother, was also killed in action at Shiloh. Clara noted in her diary that “his grief-stricken parents are inconsolable.”[69]

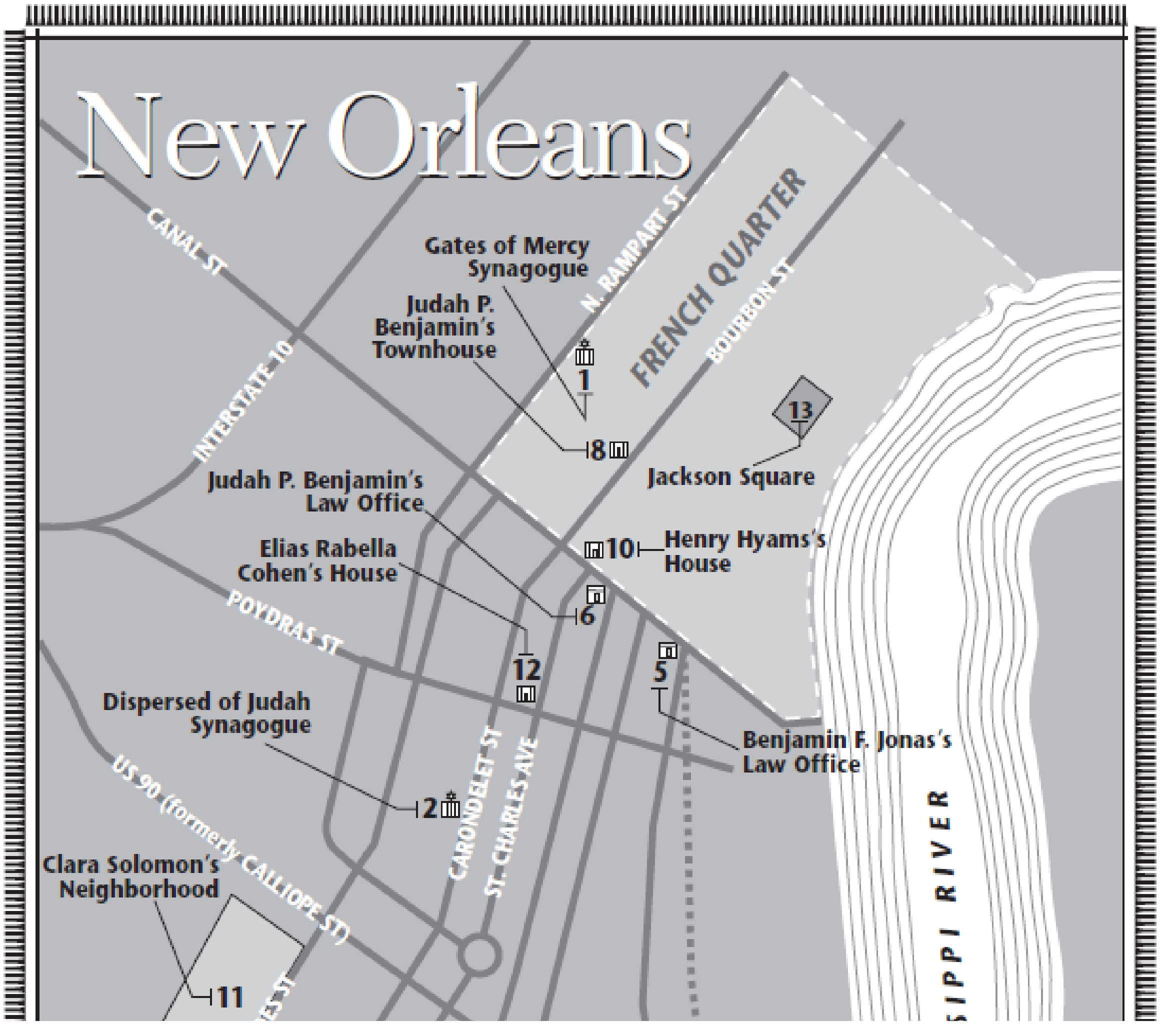
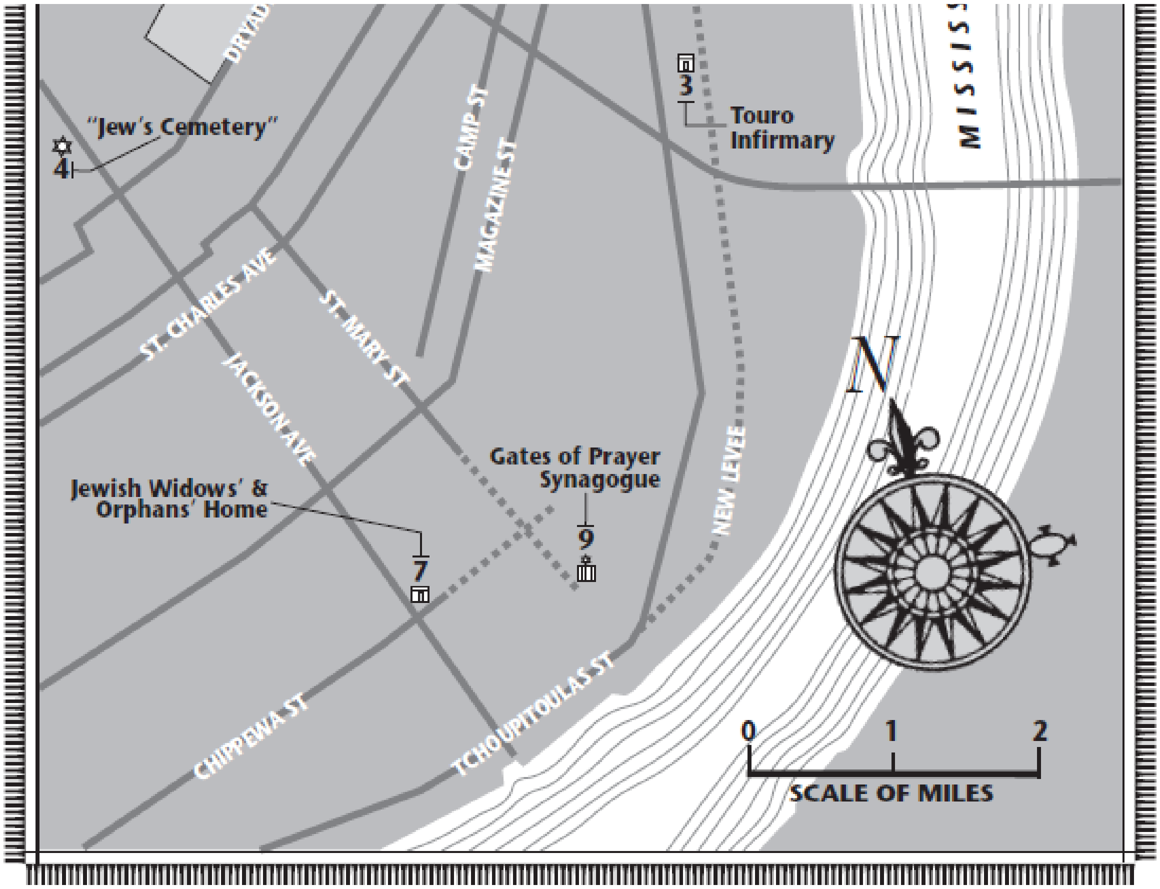
The Solomon family suffered along with their friends and relatives. Clara grieved in her diary for the loss of Gen. Albert Sidney Johnston, who was also killed at Shiloh. Many went to view the funeral procession for General Johnston, which passed through Clara’s neighborhood, but Clara could not bring herself to attend. “As the sound of the sad music & muffled drums fell upon my ear, prayers for the future happiness of the great patriot, he who had died for us, ascended to the throne of the Most High.”[70] But she could not avoid grief over the deaths of young Levy and Joseph, members of her congregation. Shiloh was the bloodiest day in American history to that date. It was the first great carnage of the war, “the devil’s own day,” according to General Sherman. But the death and destruction would be far surpassed as the war continued.[71]



New Orleans
CANAL ST
INTERSTATE 10
Gates of Mercy Synagogue
N. RAMPART ST
FRENCH QUARTER
BOURBON ST
Judah P. Benjamin's Townhouse
1
13
8
Jackson Square
Judah P. Benjamin's Law Office
Elias Rabella Cohen's House
10
Henry Hyams's House
6
POYDRAS ST
12
5
Dispersed of Judah Synagogue
Benjamin F. Jonas's Law Office
2
US 90 (formerly CALLIOPE ST)
CARONDELET ST
ST. CHARLES AVE
SIPPI RIVER
Clara Solomon's Neighborhood
11



DRYAD
"Jew's Cemetery"
4
3
Touro Infirmary
MISSIS
CAMP ST MAGAZINE ST
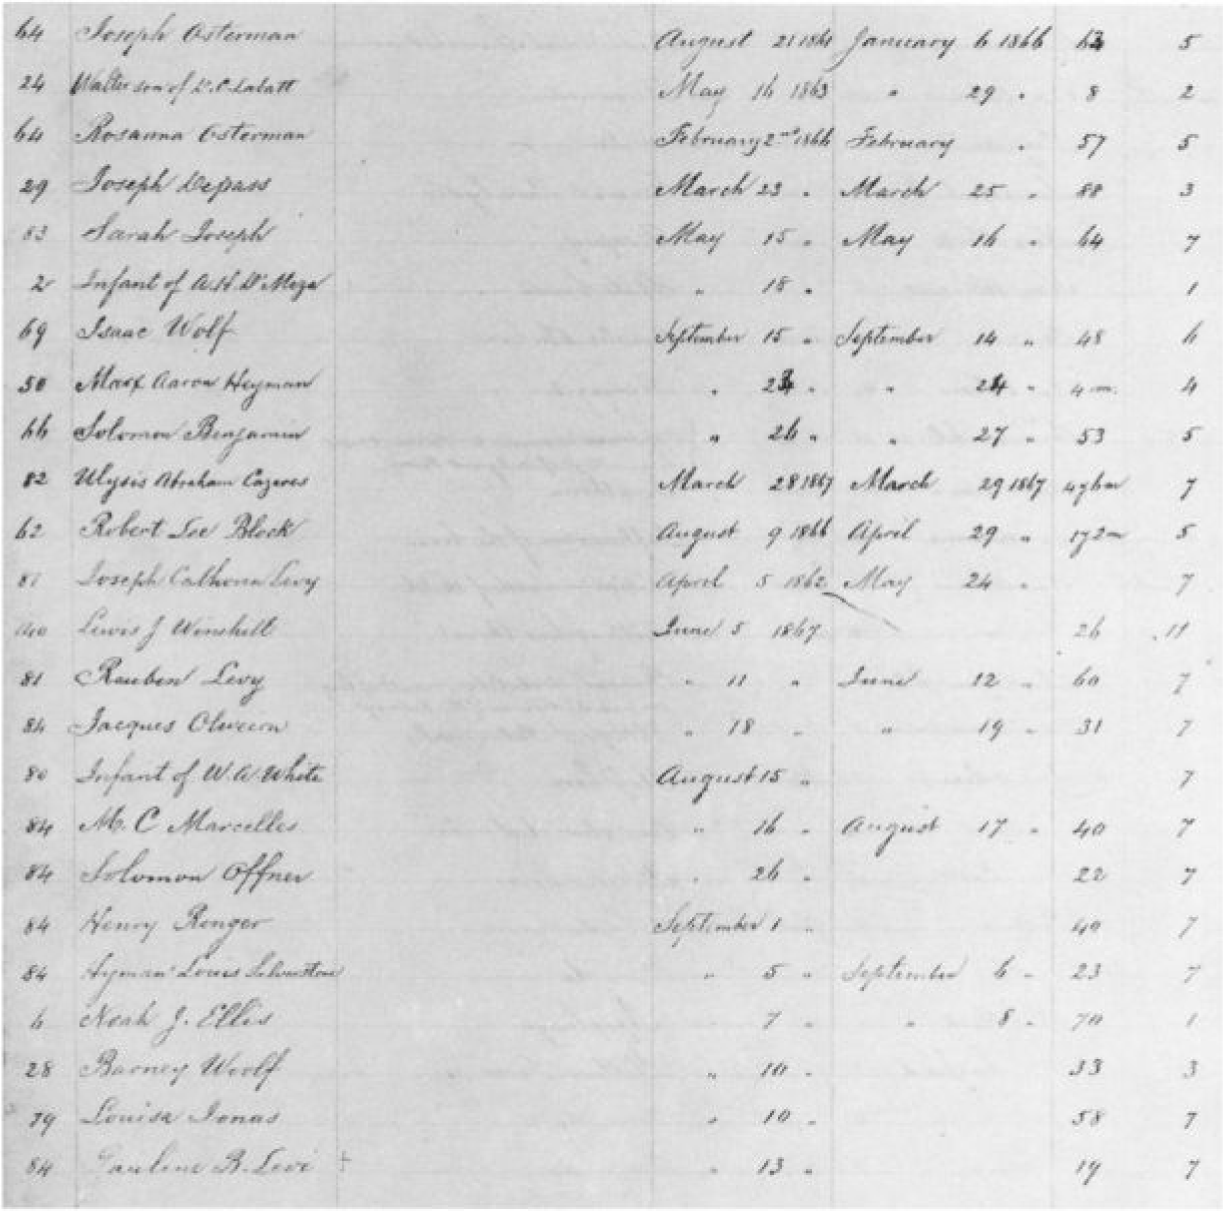
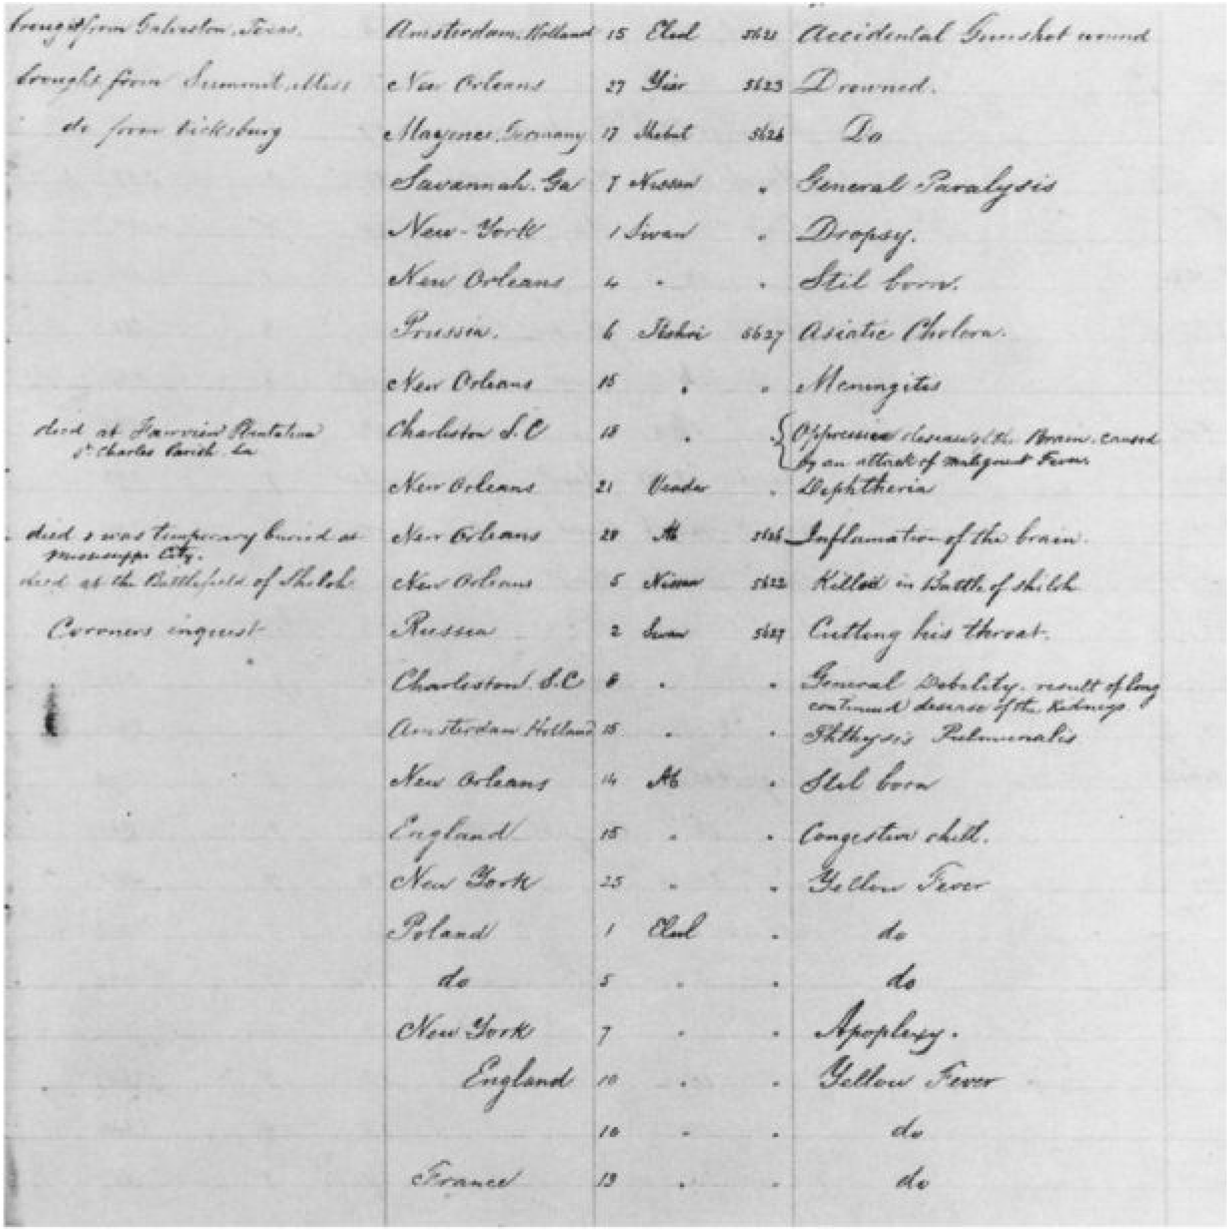
ST. CHARLES AVE
ST. MARY ST
JACKSON AVE
Gates of Prayer Synagogue
9
Jewish Widows' & Orphans' Home
7
NEW LEVEE
N
CHIPPEWA ST
TCHOUPITOULAS ST
0
1
2
SCALE OF MILES

Map of New Orleans showing key Jewish Confederate sites. (Courtesy of Tim Belshaw.)



64	Joseph Osterman		August 21 1864	January 6 1866	62	5
24	Walter son of D. C. Labatt		May 16 1863	„ 29 „	8	2
64	Rosanna Osterman		February 2nd 1866	February „	57	5
29	Joseph Depass		March 23 „	March 25 „	58	3
83	Sarah Joseph		May 15 „	May 16 „	64	7
2	Infant of A. H. DeMeza		„ 18 „			1
69	Isaac Wolf		September 15 „	September 16 „	48	6
58	Marx Aaron Heyman		„ 23 „	„ 24 „	4 m.	4
66	Solomon Benjamin		„ 26 „	„ 27 „	53	5
82	Ulysis Abraham Cazares		March 28 1867	March 29 1867	4y6m	7
62	Robert Lee Block		August 9 1866	April 29 „	1y2m	5
87	Joseph Calhoun Levy		April 5 1862	May 24 „		7
140	Lewis J. Winchell		June 5 1867		26	.11
81	Reuben Levy		„ 11 „	June 12 „	60	7
84	Jacques Olivera		„ 18 „	„ 19 „	31	7
80	Infant of W. A. White		August 15 „			7
84	M. C. Marcelles		„ 16 „	August 17 „	40	7
84	Solomon Offner		„ 26 „		22	7
84	Henry Ronger		September 1 „		40	7
84	Hyman Louis Silverston		„ 5 „	September 6 „	23	7
6	Noah J. Ellis		7 „	„ 8 „	70	1
28	Barney Wolf		„ 10 „		33	3
79	Louisa Jonas		„ 10 „		58	7
84	Pauline B. Levi +		„ 13 „		19	7



brought from Galveston, Texas.	Amsterdam, Holland	15	Elul	5621	Accidental Gunshot wound brought from Summit, Miss	New Orleans	27	Tisri	5623	Drowned.
do from Vicksburg	Mayence, Germany	17	Shebat	5624	Do
	Savannah, Ga	7	Nissan	.	General Paralysis
	New-York	1	Sivan	.	Dropsy.
	New Orleans	4	.	.	Stil born.
	Prussia.	6	Tebet	5627	Asiatic Cholera.
	New Orleans	15	.	.	Meningitis
died at Fairview Plantation St Charles Parish La	Charleston S.C	18	.		Oppression of the Brain, caused by an attack of malignant Fever
	New Orleans	21	Veadar	.	Diphtheria
died & was temporary buried at Mississippi City.	New Orleans	28	Ab	5626	Inflamation of the brain.
died at the Battlefield of Shiloh	New Orleans	5	Nissan	5622	Killed in Battle of Shiloh
Coroners inquest	Russia	2	Iyar	5627	Cutting his throat.
	Charleston, S.C	8	.	.	General Debility, result of long continued disease of the Kidneys
	Amsterdam Holland	15	.	.	Phthysis Pulmonalis
	New Orleans	14	Ab	.	Stil born
	England	15	.	.	Congestive chill.
	New York	25	.	.	Yellow Fever
	Poland	1	Elul	.	do
	do	5	.	.	do
	New York	7	.	.	Apoplexy.
	England	10	.	.	Yellow Fever
		10	.	.	do
	France	13	.	.	do

Dispersed of Judah death record book. This New Orleans synagogue record book shows Joseph Calhoun Levy's death on April 5, 1862. He was interred on May 27, 1862, in Row 7, Grave 295. The Death Record Book, now at Tulane University, shows that Levy "died at the Battlefield of Shiloh" on "5 Nissan 5622"—that is, the fifth day of the month of "Nissan" in the Jewish year 5622. (Courtesy of Tulane University, Manuscript Department.)

The reality of the war came home to the Jews of New Orleans by the spring of 1862. "To think of soldiers, real soldiers camping in our squares, the places devoted to the gatherings of our children," Clara wrote. "Tents, real tents scattered around. Who, a few years back, would have imagined such a thing." And at the end of March, Clara wrote: "Our city is now a camp, up town and down town." New Orleans Jewry celebrated what must have been an ironic and meaningful Passover in March of 1862. Many Jewish men were in arms and away defending their country. Jewish families, like all New Orleans families, were fearful about the future and nervous about a possible Union invasion. Mrs. Solomon and many Jewish families ordered their matzo from a Mr. Da Silva, the sexton at the Dispersed of Judah synagogue. "Pasaic [Hebrew for Passover, now spelled "Pesach"] is fast approaching," Clara wrote, "and … our butter, our precious butter is almost gone, gone, gone." Shortages caused by the blockade even ruined the Passover matzo. Bread was impossible to buy. Bakers quit baking; the cost of flour had become prohibitive. "Our 'motzoes' are so miserably sour that I don't think I have eaten a whole one," Clara wrote. "But for form sake we must have them." The Solomons cleaned their home thoroughly, as was the Orthodox custom, to rid the house of leavened bread. By April 1862, it began to dawn on the people of New Orleans that the city could fall to the Union army and navy. A friend of the Solomon family advised Mrs. Solomon to put away provisions for some months, as, Clara wrote, "it is possible that N. O. will soon be in the hands of the cussed Yankees." Clara considered this possibility with alarm: "What a miserable state of existence to be governed by Yankee devils. Oh! God! It is too terrible to contemplate."[72]

Emma Solomon (1824–1913). Solomon Solomon's wife and Clara Solomon's mother, Emma Solomon was born in Charleston. She and her husband were likely married at Beth Elohim and moved to New Orleans.

They had six daughters: Alice, Clara, Fanny, Rosa, Sallie, and Josie. (Courtesy of Alice Dale Cohan, Great Neck, New York.)

The terrible event arrived when New Orleans fell to Comdr. David G. Farragut's fleet on April 24, 1862. In a bold attack, Farragut sent a large fleet past fortified positions at the mouth of the Mississippi and conquered the South's largest and richest city. Clara Solomon called it "the most daring naval exploit ever attempted." Philip Sartorious, a young Jewish merchant from rural Louisiana, was in New Orleans when it fell. The scene was "almost indescribable," he later recalled. Bales of cotton were cut open and set on fire. Gunboats were on fire, and "hoodlums threw balls and shells overboard." The streets were packed with people fleeing. Sartorious and his friends were lucky enough to get a ride on a railroad platform car headed inland. The Jewish community reacted as other New Orleans citizens did—with shock, anger, disbelief, and disdain. Clara wrote, "a gloom has settled o'er my spirit, a gloom envelopes our dearly-beloved city. My breaking heart but aches the more…. Oh! never have I experienced such emotions…. Oh! never shall I forget the 25th of Apr. 1862."[73]

Rabbi James Gutheim was the spiritual leader of Dispersed of Judah Synagogue of New Orleans. When the Crescent City was captured, he refused to swear allegiance to Gen. Benjamin Butler's occupation regime and left the city for Montgomery, Alabama. (Courtesy of the Jacob Rader Marcus Center, American Jewish Archives, Cincinnati, Ohio.)

Israel I. Jones of Mobile. Jones was born in London in 1810. He and his wife, Eliza, settled in Mobile in 1838. A successful merchant, Jones served as alderman and mayor pro tern. He was the president of the Mobile Musical Association and president of Gates of Heaven from 1844 to 1876. He lost a son in the Civil War. His daughter, Emilie, married Rabbi James K. Gutheim. (Portrait by Nicola Marschall. Courtesy of the Gates of Heaven Archives and Robert J. Zietz of Mobile.)

Many Jews, particularly the old Sephardic and German families, left the city. One New Orleans Jew wrote that “almost the entire Jewish population daily leave, and two-thirds of the Portuguese Congregation with their Rabbi [James K. Gutheim] have already departed.” Gutheim was married in December 1858 to Emilie Jones of Mobile. Her father was I. I. Jones, the prominent merchant and leader of the Jewish community of Mobile. When New Orleans fell to the Union forces, Gutheim, his wife, and his son left for Alabama. On May 8, he wrote to his friend, Rabbi Isaac Leeser of Philadelphia: “Day after tomorrow I shall leave N[ew] O[rleans] by order of the military authorities. All those who have refused to take the oath of allegiance to the Dictator of Washington are ordered beyond the lines—that is, into Dixie. I am of that number. Nearly the whole of my congregation are similarly situated. We can now realize what a [deportation] means. Nothing but my wearing apparel and provisions for ten days are permitted…. I trust to God, to guide my steps. If possible I shall write you from the Confederacy.”[74]

On the Sabbath before Rabbi Gutheim left, the synagogue was crowded, as many people in addition to his own congregation wanted to hear the eloquent rabbi once more. A New Orleanian wrote, “in the place which will know him no longer under the present condition of things…. When about to sail with his banished members and their families from their late home, he offered up a touching prayer to the throne of the Most Merciful, which moved the hearts of his hearers.”[75] Gutheim served as rabbi in Montgomery, Alabama, and Columbus, Georgia, for the duration of the war. He returned to New Orleans in 1865.[76]

Joseph H. Marks was another Confederate who refused to take the oath. Born in New York City but raised in South Carolina, Marks was in the grocery business with his brother, I. N. Marks. He was banished for refusing to take the oath of allegiance and left for Columbia, South Carolina, where he was “burned out by Sherman’s army.” His home in New Orleans was confiscated. After the war, Marks moved to New York City for fifteen years, then returned to New Orleans.[77]

Mary Chesnut related a story in her diary about Edwin Warren Moise’s escape from occupied New Orleans and “How Mr. Moise got his money out of New Orleans.” Moise went to a station with his two small sons. When he arrived, the carriage he expected was not there. He had no money about him because he knew he would be searched. Some friend called out, “I will lend you my horse, but then you will be obliged to leave the children.” This offer was accepted, and as Moise rode off, one of the boys called out, “Papa, here is your tobacco, which you have forgot.” Moise turned back, and his son handed him a roll of tobacco, which he had held openly in his hand all the time. Mr. Moise took it, galloped off, waving his hat to them. In that roll of tobacco was encased $25,000.[78]

Many Jews living under the military rule imposed by the Union army resented the invaders and refused to have anything to do with them. Others probably welcomed the end of hostilities and the end of the blockade, which allowed business to resume. Certainly the older families and the pro-Southern immigrants resented army rule. Clara Solomon was pleased that $2 million in cotton had been burned to keep it from the Yankees, and she agreed with the city authorities' decision to refuse to lower their flag and raise the flag of the United States.[79]

The women of New Orleans resented the invaders and showed it on a daily basis. Many wore black mourning bands, and others wore clothing with the Confederate flag as a pattern. The ladies refused to sit in the same trolley car or church pew with Union soldiers. Jewish women shared this contempt, as evidenced by Eugenia Phillips's arrest and exile and Clara Solomon's strong feelings. Benjamin "Beast" Butler reacted to these insults with his infamous General Order 28, "the Woman Order." Clara could hardly believe what she had heard. "I cannot express to you the indignation this thing awakened…. The cowardly wretches! To notice the insults of ladies!" How could any truly Southern woman come in contact with a Yankee and "allow her countenance to retain its wonted composure." She even made faces at and sarcastic remarks to Union soldiers she encountered. As time went on, the hatred of Butler grew. By late June 1862, Clara wished that "Old Butler" could have as many ropes around his neck as there were "ladies in the city & each have a pull! Or if we could fry him! Or give him many salt things to eat, & have water in sight, & he unable to obtain it!"[80]

Judah Benjamin's sisters Mrs. Levy, Mrs. Kruttschnitt, and Harriet Benjamin were living in New Orleans when the Federal fleet arrived. Pierce Butler wrote in his 1907 biography of Benjamin, "immunity on the part of women known to be related to the hated Confederate Secretary of State could not long be expected under the rule of such heroes as the North bestowed upon New Orleans." One night in the summer of 1862, about nine o'clock, there came a knock on the door of the Levy home. It startled the family. Riley, the black servant ("dining-room man") went to answer it and returned agitated to announce that "there's a Yankee right at the door." Mrs. Levy and Harriet fled, leaving Mrs. Levy's young daughter to face the Federal lieutenant, who told her that he had been sent to warn her family that the house was needed by the military authorities and would be taken possession of in the morning and used as a hospital for General Weitzel's men. "This will do," he said, after inspecting the rooms with a candle while Miss Levy followed, protesting vainly. "If you wish to leave at once," the officer told her, "you may take away such things as you absolutely need; a squad of men will be sent to protect you to-night." The family began packing up at once. Fortunately, when the soldiers came, the men proved to be Germans who had known Mr. Popham, Benjamin's German brother-in-law. By humoring them and plying them with what was left of Judah Benjamin's rare old bourbon and cognac, the Benjamin family prevailed on the Union soldiers to move nearly all of the furniture as well as a cow to the practically empty house of a neighbor.

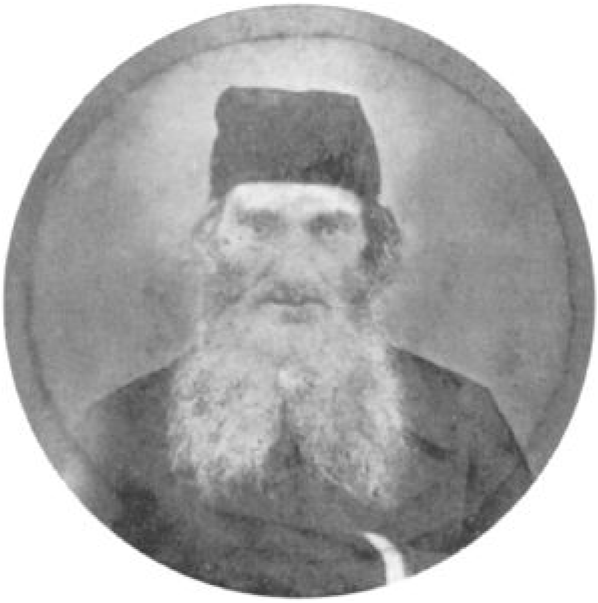
All through the night they worked, packing and moving. In the morning, as Mrs. Levy was sitting on a bundle of the family's belongings on the front porch, another squad of soldiers, with an insolent young officer in command, came to relieve the complaisant guard of the past night. "Madam," said the officer, "are you the sister of the arch rebel, Benjamin?" Mrs. Levy admitted that she was. "Then you are not to remove anything from this house. It is a military necessity." Fortunately, this individual was relieved later in the day by a more reasonable officer, who permitted the Benjamin clan to remove the few remaining things. After a few days of discomfort and uncertainty, they rented two rooms in the French Quarter, where they lived for some weeks. A letter came from Mr. Benjamin advising them to make their way "out into the Confederacy, where we could be in communication with him." Mrs. Levy and her family made their way to LaGrange, Georgia, where they remained for the rest of the war. Benjamin sent them money, "as much as he could spare, and provisions, denying himself, we feared, to promote our comfort," his niece recalled.[81]

Joseph Benjamin, one of Judah P. Benjamin's brothers, served for a time with the 1st Louisiana Cavalry. His military record was uneven. For reasons which are not clear, he and most of the junior officers of Col. J. S. Scott's Calvary Regiment were placed under arrest in May 1862 and later resigned. Arrests as a result of disagreements with a prickly superior officer were not uncommon during the Civil War. Joseph later formed his own cavalry company in December 1863. His company was likely a headquarters escort for Maj. Gen. Richard Taylor. In October 1864, Judah Benjamin wrote that Joseph was "still in the trans-Mississippi, and was unable to accompany Dick Taylor when he crossed to this side, in consequence of his ill health." Joseph Benjamin and his company must have remained as an escort for Taylor's successors in the District of Louisiana.[82]

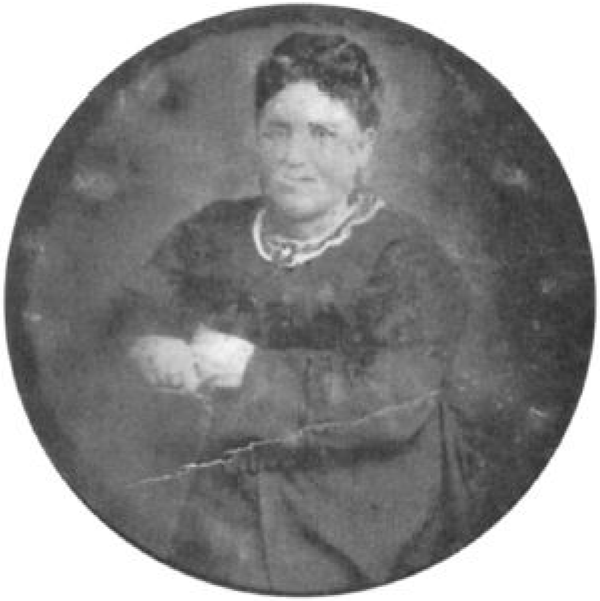
Judah Benjamin's other brother, Solomon Benjamin, was clearly an embarrassment to the secretary of war. When Baton Rouge was captured, Solomon apparently took the oath of allegiance to the Union. At least this is what Gen. Benjamin Butler wrote to the secretary of war in 1862: "I brought before me some of the most violent of the rebels, and after calling their attention to the present state of things, I proposed to them the oath of allegiance, and after consideration over night, two of them, Mr. Benjamin, brother of the Rebel secretary of war, and Byam, mayor of the city, took the oath."[83] Butler later wrote that a Confederate presidential proclamation denouncing Butler "was written by Benjamin, who has an enormous grudge at me for doing a thing which he did not mention to the proclamation, i.e., so thoroughly preaching Unionism to his brother at Baton Rouge in July, that he took the oath of allegiance, declaring himself a Union man."[84] As neither Judah Benjamin nor his many biographers mention Solomon as an adult, it is likely that he was disowned by his illustrious brother, or at least they were estranged. He died shortly after the war. Joseph Benjamin, on the other hand, fled to Mexico after the war and later settled in Spanish Honduras. When asked why he would not return to the country, he is said to have answered: "I wouldn't take the oath of allegiance to the United States."[85]

In the summer of 1862, after the fall of New Orleans, Mrs. Henry Hyams, the lieutenant governor's non-Jewish wife, was walking down the street when she was accosted by Union soldiers. According to the story in the Mobile Register and reprinted in the Charleston Daily Courier, Mrs. Hyams had the misfortune to pass by a number of Union officers sitting in a doorway. One followed her and, blocking her path, told her she had not bowed to him as she passed, as required by Gen. Benjamin "Beast" Butler's infamous order. She attempted to avoid the officer, but he put his arms around her waist and, according to the news reports, "pressed his foul lips upon her face. As the villain released her from his embrace, the Southern lady coolly drew a pistol and shot him through the body, so that he fell dead at her feet." Mrs. Hyams, the story went, was spirited away by a sympathetic Union officer who helped her reach the Southern lines.[86]

Typical of the immigrant Jews of Civil War New Orleans were the Cohen and Goldstein families. Solomon Cohen and his father, Elias Rabella Cohen, emigrated from Russian Poland in the 1840s. Elias had been a rabbi in his Polish village and retained his Old World appearance well into the 1870s. By 1860, Elias was living at the corner of Poydras and St. Charles Streets in New Orleans; Solomon enlisted in March 1862 as a private "for the war." He served in Company B, 28th (Thomas's) Louisiana. In August 1862 he was in the camp hospital. He was wounded at Vicksburg. (Solomon Cohen's family tells the story that while he was wounded at Vicksburg, he was shot while stealing a chicken.)[87]



Elias Cohen, Solomon Cohen's father. Elias emigrated to New Orleans in the late 1840s or early 1850s from Russian Poland. He lived at St. Charles and Poydras and died in 1874 at the age of 100. This photograph was taken circa 1870. (Courtesy of Cecile Levine, New Orleans.)



Fanny Goldstein Cohen, the wife of Solomon Cohen and widow of Jacob Goldstein. An immigrant from Russia, Fanny lived in New Orleans and Mississippi. (Courtesy of Cecile Levine, New Orleans.)

During the war Fanny Goldstein married Jacob Goldstein, a merchant. They lived in Liberty, Mississippi, where Fanny's father had a store. Jacob enlisted and was wounded at Shiloh. Fanny, worried about her husband, determined to bring him medicine and set out for the hospital. According to her daughter's recollection, Jacob Goldstein must have been a prisoner because the whole area was in Union hands. The "buxom and beautiful Fanny" went through Union lines, her daughter recalled, "dressed as a nun, hiding her auburn tresses, and she sewed medicines into the seams of her voluminous skirts."[88] Despite the ministrations of his devoted wife, Jacob died. Fanny took the oath of allegiance in November 1862. When Solomon Cohen, who was described by his descendants as a "scholarly and poetic gentleman" with red hair, was wounded at Vicksburg, he returned to Fanny for care and attention. They were married in 1864.

Ferdinand Goldsmith's story was also typical. He was born in Mobile in 1841. His family moved to New Orleans in 1846 and lived first on Gravier near Canal, then uptown in the 1850s to Nayades (now St. Charles). Ferdinand attended Louisiana College and worked in his father's store, Goldsmith, Haber & Co. He joined the Creole Guards but had been in camp only sixty days when New Orleans was captured. When the Confederate troops left the city, Goldsmith's unit disbanded. Goldsmith then went to Baton Rouge, where he met up with four or five comrades from his regiment, including Morris Abrams and Josh Henriquez. Apparently, the boys decided to go back to New Orleans for a little adventure. Goldsmith got involved in buying and selling sugar, which he stored in his uncle's store on Magazine Street at Poydras, a few blocks from Canal and the Levee. He prospered by shipping sugar to New York City.[89]

George Jonas, a prominent Jewish leader of New Orleans and a member of the large and influential Jonas family. He served as an officer of both the Jewish Orphan's Home and Touro Infirmary. (Courtesy of the Touro Infirmary Archives, New Orleans.)

New Orleans continued to attract Jewish immigrants while the war was in progress and the city was occupied by Federal troops. Jewish settlers came from many directions, including the North. Salomon Marx, for example, was a German immigrant from Mainz who came to New York with his parents and then to New Orleans in 1864. He operated a riverboat company between New Orleans and Shreveport. Salomon soon married eighteen-year-old Clara Marx, who had just arrived from Germany to live with her uncle and aunt, Adolph and Sophie Marx, who had come to Louisiana from France. Their children worked as "drummers," selling goods at the countryside. (Their son, David Marx, was later the well-known rabbi at the Temple in Atlanta.)[90]

The Jewish Orphan's Home continued in operation despite the departure of a number of prominent Jewish leaders, including Reverend Gutheim, who was the home's treasurer, and Joseph Magner, a board member, both of them "having come under the decree of banishment." The home's president, George Jonas, later recalled that "the evil day had come. The effect of the war between the states showed its traces everywhere. But a kind Providence watched over our Home."[91]

New Orleans Jewry, unlike Charleston and Richmond back east, was divided by the war. Rabbi Max Heller summarized the division—which came down to old families versus newer immigrants—as follows:

> One rabbi, the minister of the German congregation, Rev. Dr. Bernard Illowy, is on terms of friendship with Gen. N. P. Banks, the commander of the troops of occupation, and delivers a sermon on Abraham Lincoln (as does Col. P. J. Joachimsen of New York, at the Polish synagogue); the minister of the Portuguese synagogue, Rabbi Gutheim, refusing to take the oath of allegiance, retreats with his family to the privations of "the Confederacy" …
>
> A similar story could be told of the financial sacrifices that were offered. Especially to many of the Portuguese families of New Orleans the collapse of Confederate bond and Confederate money spelled utter ruin, as they had staked their all upon the fortunes of the Confederacy.[92]

The division of New Orleans Jewry in 1861—the old families enthusiastically supporting the cause and some of the more recent immigrants being less committed—continued during the Federal occupation. Eugenia Phillips, a third-generation Southerner, defied General Butler and was banished to Ship Island, while acquaintances of the Solomons such as Jacob Eisner cooperated with the occupying army. "Oh!" Clara wrote, “he is a foreigner [that is, a recent immigrant from Europe] & cannot sympathize with us.”[93]

Mobile, like New Orleans, was blockaded and attacked. In the early years of the war, Jewish civilians pitched in to support the Confederate cause. Three Mobile Jewish musicians, Sigmund and Jacob Schlesinger and Joseph Bloch, all from the German states, contributed to the Confederate cause. Music teachers and composers, Sigmund and Jacob Schlesinger published “Southern Flowers,” dedicated to “the Young Ladies of the Sunny South,” which contained a selection of waltzes, polkas, and other dances. The “Martha Quickstep” was “a spirited march, especially in military quick time, and popular in those days,” according to William Tuckman. Also included was the “Manassas Polka,” written by Sigmund Schlesinger to commemorate the First Confederate Victory at Manassas. Other pieces were the “Camp Moore Polka,” referring to a Confederate military post near New Orleans; “Fort Morgan Gallopade,” in honor of Gen. John Hunt Morgan (the gallopade was a lively round dance popular at the time); and “Harry Macarthy’s Bonnie Blue Flag,” containing variations of this favorite Civil War tune. Joseph Bloch from Bingen on the Rhine came to Mobile in 1848 at the age of twenty-two. Descended from a long line of musicians, Bloch gave guitar lessons and could play almost every orchestral instrument. According to Tuckman, Bloch became a bugler with an artillery unit, blew the bugle at the Battle of Mobile Bay, and published a great amount of Civil War music.[94]

The fine hand of Israel I. Jones was probably behind the Schlesingers’ and Bloch’s coming to Mobile, as he was president of the Mobile Music Association, an organization which provided Mobile with concerts and sophisticated musical entertainment. And Jones’s hand was also behind his daughter Emilie’s and her famous husband, Reverend Gutheim’s, leaving New Orleans. Jones was president of the Mobile congregation, and when the Gutheims arrived in Mobile there was quite a welcome.

In Montgomery, Mayer Lehman traded cotton as best he could and actively supported the Confederacy. In 1864, when reports reached Montgomery that Alabama soldiers were suffering from exposure and hunger at Elmira Prison in New York, the governor asked Lehman to negotiate with the Federal authorities to aid the Alabama prisoners. “He is a business man of established character and one of the best Southern patriots,” the governor wrote Jefferson Davis. “He is a foreigner, but has been here fifteen years and is thoroughly identified with us.” Lehman arrived in Richmond ready to go up North with supplies for his fellow Alabamaians, but General Grant would not allow it. Mayer stayed in Richmond for a month in the dead of winter, aided by a Protestant clergyman, but failed in his mission. The Lehman warehouse in Montgomery was burned as the war drew to a close.[95]

Jacob and Alexander Kohn, who had come from Bavaria in 1848, were now successful shoemakers in Montgomery. They offered their services to the Confederacy, and local tradition holds that Jacob was made the superintendent of the Confederate shoe factory on Tallapoosa Street between Coos and Commerce, which turned out tens of thousands of shoes.[96]

The Moses family of Montgomery traced its roots to Charleston. Isaiah Moses came to Charleston from Germany in 1790. A successful merchant, he eventually became a cotton planter as well. His son, Levy Moses, was not so successful, but he put his son, Alfred Huger Moses (named for the famous South Carolina Unionist, Alfred Huger), through the College of Charleston. Soon the entire Moses family moved to Montgomery, perhaps to escape the wartime conditions in Charleston. This included Alfred's mother and father, brothers Mordecai, Joseph, Judah, and Henry, and sisters Emily, Sarah, Rosannah, and Grace. (There were nine children all together.) Alfred was exempt from military service, as he served as a clerk of court, but Mordecai Moses enlisted in Company E, 46th Alabama, as a private.[97]

On May 16, 1862, Kahl Montgomery dedicated its new synagogue. Rabbi Gutheim came from New Orleans and delivered a "memorable sermon." Thomas Owen wrote in his History of Alabama that the dedication ceremonies were impressive, "constituting the most remarkable event up to that time in the history of Judaism in Montgomery. The congregation on that occasion felt like Solomon at the dedication of the great Temple in Jerusalem."[98] The fall of New Orleans one month later redounded to Montgomery's benefit. Rabbi Gutheim, one of the most beloved rabbis in the South, accepted the position as rabbi at Kahl Montgomery in June 1863. The B'nai Israel Congregation in Columbus, Georgia, also sought Gutheim to minister to their small congregation. He agreed to "ride circuit" and led the services in Columbus every sixth Sabbath.[99] His support for the Confederacy never wavered. He prayed from the pulpit of Kahl Montgomery:

> Regard, O Father, in Thine abundant favor and benevolence, our beloved country, the Confederate States of America. May our young Republic increase in strength, prosperity and renown; … Behold, O God, and judge between us and our enemies, who have forced upon us this unholy and unnatural war—who hurl against us their poisoned arrows steeped in ambition and revenge.
>
> Bless, O Father, our efforts in a cause which we conceive to be just; the defense of our liberties and rights and independence, under just and equitable laws. May harmony of sentiment and purity of motive, unfaltering courage, immovable trust in our leaders, both in national council and in the field, animate all the people of our > beloved Confederate States, so as to be equal to all emergencies—ready for every sacrifice, until our cause be vindicated as the light of day.

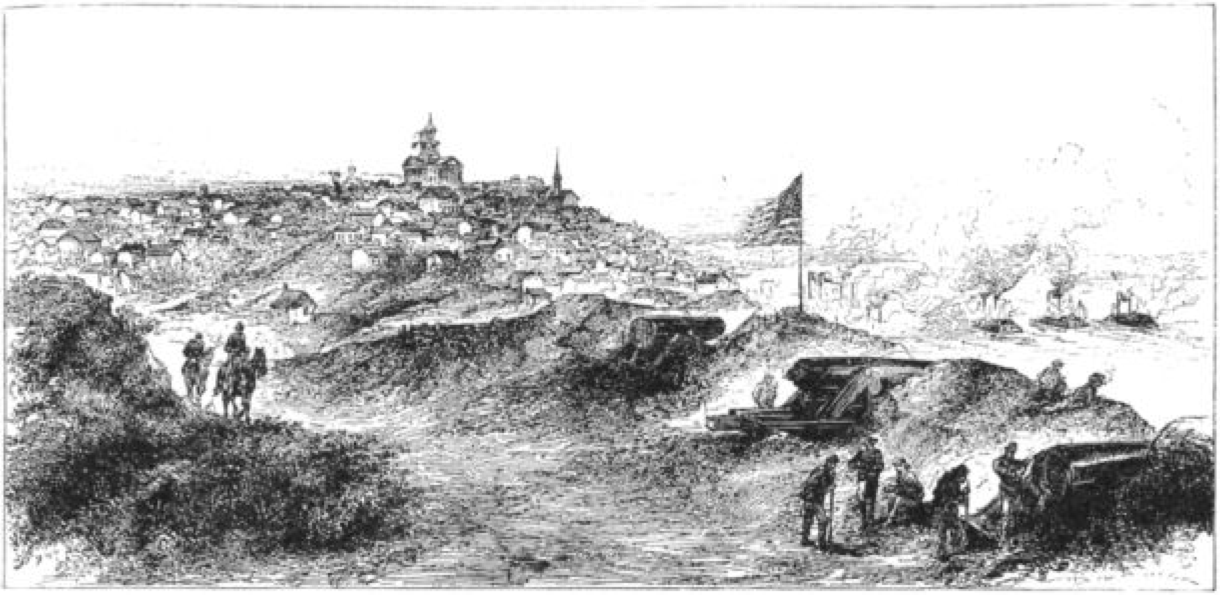
>
> May harmony of sentiment and purity of motive, unfaltering courage, immovable trust in our leaders, both in national council and in the field, animate all the people of our beloved Confederate States, so as to be equal to all emergencies—ready for every sacrifice, until our cause be vindicated as the light of day.
>
> And we pray Thee, O God, to bless and protect the armed hosts that now stand forth in the defense of our sacred cause.[100]

Natchez, Mississippi, was home to a small Jewish community during the war. The Mayers, who met on the ship crossing the Atlantic to New Orleans, were an integral part of Natchez society. Their son, Simon Mayer, and Oscar Levy, a nephew who had recently come to live with the Mayers from Landau, enlisted in a local militia company, the Natchez Light Infantry, in the summer of 1861. When the company was called into ninety days' active service in December, these men went with it to Kentucky. After their active service was over, the two, joined by another cousin, Simon Lehman, enlisted in the Natchez Southrons, which soon became Company B, 10th Mississippi.[101] The Mayers continued to live in wartime Natchez. On September 2, 1862, the Federal gunboat Essex arrived, and the older men, including John Mayer, who had organized a home guard, rallied to defend the town. Believing, erroneously, that the Union army was attacking the town, the home guard fired on the Essex crew when some of the men came ashore for supplies. The gunboat returned fire, and after an hour of shelling and with many houses on fire, the mayor surrendered the town. The sole victim of this assault was Rosalie Beekman, a Jewish girl, aged seven. She was struck by a piece of bursting shell while she and her family fled. She died at the Mayer home on Main Street, where she had been brought for medical attention by her cousin, Miriam Wexler.[102]



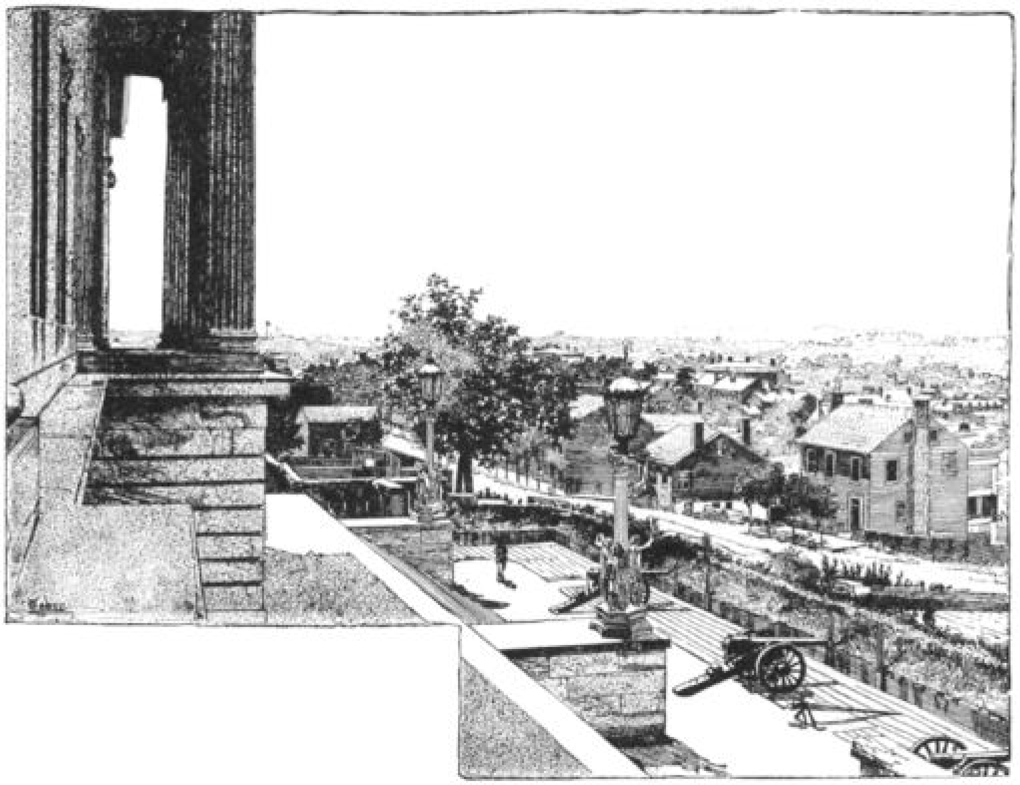
Vicksburg from the North after the surrender. (Battles and Leaders of the Civil War.)

The Mayers, like their neighbors, took the Union military at their word when they threatened to burn Natchez to the ground. John Mayer bought a home in nearby Washington, five miles from Natchez, and moved his family there. The family's household was packed up and moved. The threatened destruction of Natchez did not occur, but Mayer continued to live in town and operate his business while his family lived in Washington.[103]

After the fall of Vicksburg in July 1863, the Union army occupied Natchez. Some of the Jewish families lived resentfully under Federal occupation. Mrs. Mayer and two of the younger daughters, Emma and Carrie, hid much-needed clothing and supplies in their hoop skirts in order to deliver these goods to friends, who would forward the supplies to Confederate soldiers. "With fear and trembling, Emma handed the guard the papers," one of the Mayer girls recalled years later. "Imagine her delight when she noticed that he was trying to read them upside down! 'Any contraband goods?' and all being fair in love and war, they answered 'No.' 'Drive on then and have a nice day with your friends,' was the pleasant rejoinder of the ignorant unsuspecting guard." One of the daughters, Ophelia Mayer, wrote a letter describing the occupying general as "a miserable tyrant," for which offense she was arrested and placed in confinement in the city hall along with twenty other women. The Mayer home was surrounded by guards and no one was permitted to leave the house for three days. The store was closed and the family threatened with confiscation of all its goods.[104]

Simon Mayer, away with his command in Dalton, Georgia, was outraged by his sister's arrest. He was concerned for his family's safety but wrote, "don't let the scoundrels intimidate you. Afraid to come out and meet us on the battlefield like men, they, like brutes, make war upon defenseless woman & children." He urged the Mayer clan to show the invaders that they were "still free and knowing your rights, dare to maintain them." Many people in Natchez had lost hope in the cause, including members of the Mayer family. But Simon urged his brother Henry to join the army "now battling for our rights and independence."[105]

Life in occupied Natchez went on. The Mayer family continued in business. With a son and nephews in the Confederate army and resentful of the occupying army, they nevertheless accepted the situation and hoped for a reversal of Southern fortunes. The occupying Union army brought with it young Jewish men from the North, including Henry Frank and Isaac Lowenburg. Frank and Lowenburg visited John Mayer in his store, and Mayer, the president of Natchez's small Chevra Kadusha (Holy Society) congregation, invited them to attend services during the High Holy Days in the fall of 1863. Isaac Lowenburg was infatuated with Ophelia Mayer, and he was helpful in convincing the Union authorities to dismiss the charges against the family and Ophelia. In January of 1865, Isaac married Ophelia in the Mayer home. Sister Melanie married Henry Frank. In fraternizing with Union soldiers, the Mayer family was a typical Natchez family. The old families of Natchez also fraternized with the enemy during the occupation. "Only people of the highest culture and dignity," Annie Harper of Natchez wrote, "can sustain themselves honorably in such an anomalous position, and Natchez was the place to find such people."[106]



View of Nashville, southwest front of the capitol looking toward the battlefield. (Battles and Leaders of the Civil War.)

As in New Orleans, the Jewish communities of Nashville and Memphis were divided over the war. Neither city had a particularly old Jewish community nor an acculturated or assimilated Jewish elite as did Charleston, Savannah, and Richmond. Both were frontier towns with large immigrant populations, including a substantial number of pro-Union Germans. But when war came, Jewish Tennesseans, like their neighbors, supported the Confederacy. Once Nashville and Memphis were occupied by Union troops, some left, many remained neutral, and a few joined the Union cause.

There were Jews in Nashville as early as 1795, but in 1860 there were 105 heads of household, 42 percent of whom were single men, virtually all of whom were immigrants. Few Nashville Jews were native-born. The demography of Memphis's Jewry was similar. Twenty Jewish volunteers from Nashville had joined the rebel army in May 1861, a month before Tennessee voted to secede. At High Holiday services in September 1861, both Nashville congregations, Mogen David and Ohava Emes, prayed for Jefferson Davis and the success of the Southern cause.[107] The Young Men's Hebrew Benevolent Society and the Ladies Hebrew Benevolent Society donated clothing and raised money. Jewish women in Nashville, like their sisters in Richmond and Savannah, knitted socks and made uniforms for the Confederacy. Jewish boys from Nashville—Solomon Frankland, Herman Ehrenberg, and George Cohen, all of the 30th Tennessee—were captured when Fort Donelson surrendered in 1862. They were sent to a military prison, exchanged, and saw further service. Fedora Frank wrote that "Jewish men from Nashville served in all the Tennessee battles—Shiloh, Stones River (Murfreesboro), Chickamauga and Chattanooga, Franklin, and Nashville." Many served throughout the war. Solomon Frankland was finally released from a Union prisoner of war prison in May 1865. The 2d Lt. Joseph Lepsheets, Company G, 8th Tennessee, who enlisted in May 1861 with his brother Jacob, was killed at the Battle of Franklin on November 30, 1864.[108]

In Memphis, where the immigrant population also predominated, Rabbi Tuska introduced patriotic services, Thanksgiving, and Fast Day. At one Sabbath service at B'nai Israel (Children of Israel), a dozen Jewish Confederates in uniform, led by 2d Lt. Abraham S. Levy and Maurice A. Freeman, marched into the synagogue. "Standing round the scrolls of the law," A. E. Frankland recalled, "they recited the blessing, in chorus … after which they received the ancient priestly benediction from the minister [rabbi] and returned to the camps of their several commanders."[109]

Both Nashville and Memphis were captured early in the war. Nashville was occupied by the Union army from February 1862 to April 1865. The military governor, Andrew

Johnson, detested secessionists. He governed the state of Tennessee with an iron fist; dissent was not tolerated. The pro-Southern Jewish men were in the army or lived in this police state run by the Federal army. Those suspected of pro-Confederate sympathies were hounded, harassed, and arrested. Indeed, when city council members refused to take the loyalty oath, they were arrested for treason.[110] This harassment, of course, included Nashville Jews who remained when the city surrendered. Some fled their homes rather than live under Yankee rule.

Many Tennesseans were involved in smuggling supplies, especially medicine and quinine, to Confederate forces. Union officials saw this as treason and profiteering. Southerners saw it as a patriotic godsend some of the time and as profiteering at other times. Bertha Ochs, for example, was considered a heroine for smuggling quinine. Jacob Bloomstein, who after the war served as president of Ohava Shalom, was arrested in May 1863 as a spy and for smuggling goods through the lines to the Confederate army. He was later released by Governor Johnson. Maier Salzkotter was arrested for smuggling and later divorced his wife, Cecelia, who turned to prostitution while he was in prison. Many other Jewish merchants were arrested for smuggling and illegally selling goods in the area. Some were acting for patriotic reasons, others for profit. Nashville was inundated with refugees, vagrants, and criminals. In 1865 three Jewish stores were looted and a Jewish peddler murdered.[111]

Rabbi Simon Tuska, rabbi of B’nai Israel in Memphis. Although an immigrant himself, Rabbi Tuska supported the Confederate war effort, and, like Max Michelbacher in Richmond, he was an ardent defender of the Jews of his community. (Courtesy of the Jacob Rader Marcus Center, American Jewish Archives, Cincinnati, Ohio.)

The Jewish tradition of firing rabbis, dissenters seceding, and the founding of new congregations did not abate during the war. Memphis Jewry did all three, before and during the war. Unhappy with Jacob J. Peres, B’nai Israel fired him in April 1860. Peres sued the congregation for breach of contract and libel. Peres won his contract case and was awarded his salary. The congregation won the libel case. Simon Tuska was then asked to serve as rabbi in July 1860. Born in Hungary, Tuska was twenty-five years old when he came to Memphis. He was the first American sent to Europe to study at the Jewish Theological Seminary at Breslau. The congregation shifted to Reform, and Tuska became an ardent supporter of the Confederate cause.[112]

Both Nashville and Memphis experienced an influx of Northern Jews during the war years. Jewish soldiers in the Union occupation army had light duty. They could enjoy the town, meet local Jewish people, attend religious services, and become a part of the community. The local people, Jews included, had no choice but to live under military rule. Jewish immigrants who had ties, not only of religion but of national background, language, and customs, felt a natural kinship with Jews like themselves who had settled north of the Mason-Dixon line. In some instances, as in the Mayer family in Natchez, romance blossomed between local girls and Union soldiers. Capt. Adolph Loventhal of the 39th Indiana, Louis Lerman of the 4th Ohio Cavalry, and William Wolfson of the 10th Illinois all settled in Nashville after the war. Southern Jews, for their part, felt a solemn duty to bury fellow Jews—even those killed fighting for the Union army—according to Jewish law. There was, therefore, a significant amount of fraternization between Southern and Northern Jews.[113]

Marcus M. Spiegel, a Jewish Union officer in occupied Memphis. (Courtesy of the Jacob Rader Marcus Center, American Jewish Archives, Cincinnati, Ohio.)

Lt. Col. Marcus M. Spiegel of the 120th Ohio, a German immigrant from a hamlet near Worms on the Rhine River, was stationed in occupied Memphis during Hanukkah in December 1862. "Memphis is a beautyful City," he wrote his wife, "full at present of trading Yehudim, Women and Contrabands [freed slaves]; the Cotton buying attracts many men here and often large fortunes are made in a short time." As he walked along the riverbank, Spiegel saw "a Yehudah and his wife," and, as it was the Sabbath, he decided to have a kosher lunch. Spiegel approached the Jewish couple and said, "Happy Sabbath, dear people," frightening them both. Who was this stranger offering

“Happy Sabbath” while dressed in a Yankee uniform, sword, and spurs? The couple, recognizing a fellow Jew, told Spiegel he could eat a kosher lunch with them or he could go to Mr. Levy’s boardinghouse. When Spiegel arrived at Levy’s, he found thirty very surprised Jewish Tennesseans. He requested a Hanukkah lunch. The proprietor stared at the young officer, and believing he recognized him, asked Spiegel his name. “Dear God,” Levy exclaimed, “a son of Rabbi Mosche of Abenheim, a lieutenant colonel.” It turned out that Spiegel knew a number of the German immigrants who had settled in Memphis, including Levy, who had known his family in the Old Country. Spiegel was later killed in a Confederate ambush on the Red River near Alexandria, Louisiana. His brother Joseph Spiegel founded the Spiegel Catalog Company.[114]

B’nai B’rith, the Jewish fraternal order, flourished in occupied Memphis. By 1865 it had 167 members. The Southern Club, a Jewish social club, changed its name to the Memphis Club to suit the occupying army and held theatrical performances in English and German. Jewish businessmen, mainly shopkeepers, clothiers, grocers, and auctioneers, accommodated themselves to the situation. New arrivals from the North opened more Jewish businesses during the occupation. Many catered to the Union soldiers. M. Simon at 194 Main Street advertised that he “has a large lot of military goods for uniforms including brass buttons.” By 1863 there were fifteen Jewish merchants selling military clothing and a number in the grocery business. Others sold liquor, tobacco, cigars, and cotton. H. Koninsky on Beale Street advertised tents: “Father Abraham of old once pitched his tent on the plains of Mamre, and the children of Abraham have pitched their tents on the hills of Vicksburg.” Still others ran boardinghouses, sold jewelry, and engaged in manufacturing. “The large Jewish element of Memphis was made manifest yesterday,” the Daily Bulletin noted on September 24, 1863, “by the number of closed stores on Main Street. The Day of Atonement was very generally observed by those of Jewish faith.”[115]

Between 1860 and 1864, the Children of Israel congregation retired its debt. It had eighty-seven members in 1863. In 1862 a Polish congregation, Beth El Emeth (House of the True God) was founded and followed the Minhag Polen. Peres, the rabbi who sued Children of Israel, became the rabbi of the Polish congregation, and the service was “strictly Orthodox,” an advertisement noted. (The name, House of the True God, obviously made a statement about Peres’s former more liberal congregation.) Even the Civil War could not stop Memphis Jewry’s own civil war.[116]

The Ochs family was typical, in many respects, of Tennessee’s Jewry. Both Julius and Bertha Ochs had come from Bavaria, Julius from Fürth near Nürnberg, where his family had lived for hundreds of years, and Bertha from Rhenish Bavaria in the Palatinate.[117] Julius was a well-educated young man who spoke seven languages, played the guitar, was an amateur actor, and even composed light operas. He studied at a military academy in Cologne, but when his father died his older brother apprenticed him to a bookbinding firm. Julius rebelled, and in 1845 left for America to seek his fortune. He changed his name from Ochsenhorn to Ochs; settled in Louisville, where his two sisters lived; and became a peddler. When war with Mexico was declared he enlisted and, because of his military education, was made a drill sergeant. After the war he worked in a variety of jobs—as a road salesman for a jewelry company, as a small dry goods store owner, in municipal government, and even as a rabbi—in Mississippi, Kentucky, and Louisiana. He settled briefly in Natchez and ran a small store. An honest, likable, and intellectual man, he sometimes played his guitar at plantation parties.[118]

In Natchez he met Bertha Levy, an attractive and opinionated young lady who had left Bavaria for very different reasons. Bertha had been involved in the liberal politics of the 1848 revolution, and as a student in Heidelberg she had participated in antigovernment demonstrations. Her family feared she might be arrested, so she came to live with her uncle in Natchez.[119] Bertha Levy met Julius Ochs at his store in Natchez in 1851. However, they did not become involved until years later, when they met again at a reception in Nashville, where Bertha's parents had recently arrived from Bavaria. They were married in 1856.[120]

The Ochses lived in Tennessee for a time, but Julius abhorred slavery. "These sights sickened me," he wrote in a memoir for his children. "Once I saw a poor wretch so horribly beaten that tears of pity gushed from my eyes."[121] Julius and Bertha moved to Cincinnati, and Julius went back out on the road as a traveling salesman. He was evidently a failure as a businessman; at times he barely provided for his family. In 1858 Bertha gave birth to Adolph Ochs, the future publisher of the New York Times.

When the Civil War began, Julius joined the Union army and served as a captain. Bertha and her family remained loyal to the South. Her brother served in the Confederate army. In fact, this pro-Southern wife of a Federal officer smuggled quinine across the river from Cincinnati to Kentucky to help the beleaguered Confederates. There is a family story that Bertha pushed her baby carriage, which contained contraband material hidden under one of the little Ochs boys, across the river to the Confederates. Adolph Ochs recalled in later years that "mother gave father a lot of trouble in those days." According to their granddaughter, Bertha's smuggling drugs to the Confederates came to the attention of the Union authorities and a warrant was issued for her arrest. As a loyal Union officer, Julius was able to have the charges dismissed. In 1928, The Confederate Veteran wrote, "for a mother in Israel to defy her husband and an entire army was no mean assertion of militant feminism in those days."[122]

In 1864 Julius and Bertha and their young family moved to Knoxville, which was then occupied by the Union army. Adolph Ochs began his newspaper career as a paperboy in Knoxville. Julius became active in the Knoxville Jewish community and served as unofficial rabbi.[123]

Because Memphis was a large port on the Mississippi River and a center of cotton trading and illegal speculation, and because many Northern Jews flocked to Memphis, Tennessee became the flash point of the most infamous anti-Semitic event of the Civil War. Gen. Ulysses S. Grant issued Order Number 11 expelling all the Jews from the military district. This order, issued by Grant on December 17, 1862, stated: "The Jews, as a class violating every regulation of trade established by the Treasury Department and also department orders, are hereby expelled from the department of Tennessee [which included parts of Tennessee, Mississippi, and Kentucky] within twenty-four hours from the receipt of this order." Post commanders were ordered to see that "all of this class of people" be furnished with passes and made to leave the state. Jews were forced out of Paducah, Kentucky, and Holly Springs and Oxford, Mississippi, and some were imprisoned.[124] A Union colonel told one victim that he was forced to flee because "You are Jews, and are neither a benefit to the Union or Confederacy." The Jews of Paducah protested this "inhuman order" directly to Lincoln, and their leaders met with the president in Washington. Lincoln is said to have asked, "And so the children of Israel were driven from the happy land of Canaan?" Cesar Kaskel of Paducah told Lincoln, "Yes, and that is why we have come unto Father Abraham's bosom, asking protection." Lincoln replied, "And this protection they shall have at once."[125]

Henry Halleck, the Union general in chief, could not have cared less about the Jews. He wired Grant that neither he nor the president had any objection "to your expelling traitors and Jew peddlers." Atty. Gen. Edward Bates told the president he was indifferent to Jewish protests. Lincoln disagreed, stating that "to condemn a class is, to say the least, to wrong the good with the bad," and he countermanded an order which would never have been issued by Robert E. Lee or Jefferson Davis.[126]

Thus, Jewish Southerners faced all of the same perils as their fellow Confederates during the war—the death of loved ones, the collapse of the economy, want, hunger, privation, and the loss of a cause they held dear—and one unique peril their fellow Southerners did not face: anti-Semitism. When the Civil War began, many Southerners had never met a Jew. There were fewer than 25, 000 Jews in the entire South, and the great majority lived in the larger cities. The average Southerner's ideas about Jews were formed by images learned in Gentile churches, or from their contact with Jewish peddlers or storekeepers. For the most part, these images and impressions were positive. Jewish merchants lived in the communities where they conducted business. Their customers knew them. Peddlers were a welcome treat in isolated Southern hamlets, farms, and plantations. They brought goods which were unavailable and they brought news of the outside world. The peddlers were unusual, interesting, and often entertaining. Thus, the image of the Jewish businessman, merchant, and peddler before the war was positive. And, of course, the few highly visible Jewish members of the Southern elite were generally accorded great respect in a hierarchical society which deferred to those of wealth and privilege.

In the first year of the war, when the South was optimistic of victory and food and goods were still available, there were no recorded anti-Semitic incidents in the South. As the war entered its second year, however, the Union blockade, inflation, hoarding, counterfeit money, the limitations on trade, the inability of planters and ordinary farmers to sell cotton and produce, the appearance of more German, foreign, and Jewish traders, and the general disruption of the Southern economy began to have an effect on the Southern people. Goods became scarce. The South was an agricultural country heavily dependent on imports for the necessities of life—clothing, coffee, tea, manufactured goods of all kinds, and, in some parts of the South, even food. Jewish merchants supplied many of these items. And most of these merchants were immigrant German Jews who spoke with a German accent. Of course, there were many merchants who were not Jews. Ironically, many merchants in the South were Christian German immigrants who also spoke with German accents and were indistinguishable from Jewish Germans in the eyes of Southerners.

German immigrants, both Jew and Gentile, were oddities in the antebellum South, and in much of the North as well. It is an irony of history that the first significant outbreak of anti-Semitism in Southern history was directed at German Jews as much because they were Germans as Jews. In many instances the dislike for German immigrants exceeded anti-Jewish discrimination. According to Daniel O'Flaherty, the German immigrants' harsh pronunciation of English, their drinking habits, differences in their observation of the Sabbath, "their heel-clicking reverence for authority, and, above all, their Teutonic industry," earned the enmity of their neighbors. E. Merton Coulter wrote that in Texas, "the Germans … formed nests of Unionism, which gave the Confederate authorities much trouble."[127] Some German Jews tried to distance themselves from their German roots. Lewis Leon, the dry goods clerk from Charlotte, which hardly had a Jewish population in the 1860s, gave Confederate authorities Sheffield, England, as his birthplace. As a prisoner of war at Elmira Prison, he admitted to Union authorities that he was born in Germany.[128]

To many Southerners beset by growing problems of scarcity and deprivation, these foreign-sounding people loomed much larger in their lives than they had before Fort Sumter. In August 1862, a group of disgruntled citizens met at the courthouse in Thomasville, Georgia, to protest against Jewish traders. The Union army was on the Florida Gulf Coast only fifty miles away, and the townspeople knew that Georgia's weak defenses might fail. Col. J. L. Seward, a former Congressman, warned of the military threat and of the danger of rapidly rising prices and scarcity of food and supplies. Necessities like salt, which was essential for preserving meat, were already difficult to obtain, and prices had soared. Ignoring the Union naval blockade, inflation, invasion, and the disruption of transportation caused by the war, the colonel blamed the town's woes on foreign counterfeiters and profiteers who were hoarding goods and "demanding exorbitant and ruinous prices by which the families of soldiers are likely to suffer, and be reduced to intolerable want." These villains were, according to Seward, Thomasville's German Jews conspiring with itinerant Jewish peddlers. The crowd was enraged and could have become an unruly mob but for the cool head of the meeting's chairman, W. G. Ponder, who insisted that any action taken be legal and deliberate.[129]

A committee of five, headed by Seward, drew up resolutions that condemned "German Jews traveling to and fro" in this part of the state who were "putting in circulation spurious Confederate currency" and local German Jews "engaged in extortions in trade, and in seeming complicity with the itinerant German Jews." They charged "that these Jews were 'buying up particular localities, articles of prime necessity, thereby producing a scarcity, and transferring such articles to other localities and demanding exorbitant and ruinous prices.'" The resolutions called on "every good citizen to aid in arresting their evils," and "that no German Jews be allowed to settle among us," that the local German Jews be given ten days to leave "and if they do not leave then, that we assemble and take such steps in the premises as may be deemed advisable." A Committee of Vigilance was created to enforce the resolutions.[130]

The resolutions were published in the Thomasville newspaper, and other Georgia newspapers reprinted them. In September a town meeting in Macon was called to address inflated prices and scarcity of goods. The Macon Journal and Messenger felt that the Thomasville resolutions were "well worthy of attention—and perhaps, of action in other communities." But, as Louis Schmier wrote, Macon was not Thomasville. Whereas Thomasville had few Jewish residents, Macon had had a sizable Jewish community for more than ten years and "the long-standing respectability of its members, acted as mitigating factors. Any lingering accusations were quickly stilled by the willingness of Macon's Jews to stand up and vouch for their peddling brothers." Moreover, no one could question the Macon Jews' devotion to the Confederacy. Their company had so many local Jews that it was nick-named the "Macon Jewish Company."[131]

When the resolutions were reprinted in the Savannah Daily Morning News, the Jews of Savannah were outraged. Some of the Thomasville Jews arrived in Savannah, and the Jewish community called a meeting to protest against the "wholesale slander, persecution and denunciation of a people." Savannah Jews, many of whom were themselves German, issued a resolution condemning the Thomasville resolutions as being "at war with the spirit of the age—the letter of the constitution—and the principles of religion—and can find no parallel except in the barbarism of the Inquisition and the persecution of the Dark Ages." The resolution defended the honor of Southern Jews as honest and faithful and condemned the citizens of Thomas County as "enemies of human liberty and freedom of conscience." The Savannah Jewish committee also took the local newspaper to task for "giving currency to this slander and intolerance," for participating in this "foul wrong," and called on Savannah Jews to boycott the newspaper. The editor of the Daily Morning News defended his having reprinted the story as only presenting a news story, and his failure to condemn the resolution as the result of his lack of knowledge of the facts of the case.[132]

Next, Jewish Confederate soldiers joined the fray. Members of the Tattnall Guards wrote a letter, published in the Savannah Republican, in which they defended the loyalty and patriotism of "the multitude who have already sacrificed the comforts and ease of civil life" and taken their places among "the heroic defenders of the South." The letter concluded in typical loquacious Southern style: "Go review the mighty hosts who are struggling to achieve our independence—recount the regiments, battalions and companies who compose the noble armies of the South—and wherever, throughout the limits of our territory, you find them arrayed, there you will behold the representatives of our sect, standing side by side with the gallant sons of the soil, enduring the privations of the camp, the hardships and toils of the march, and the dangers and perils of the battle field, to win victory for our arms."

Not to be outdone, the Jewish Confederates of the 32d Georgia Volunteers met on September 16 to protest the Thomasville incident. Pvt. Charles Wessolowsky lambasted the residents of Thomasville: “Let us look at the gentlemen from Thomasville who claim nativity to Thomas County,” he proclaimed, “and see if they themselves don’t partake of this extortion. Behold them coming to market, the one with fowls and the other with eggs; ask their price and ‘two dollars for a pair of chickens and seventy cents for a dozen eggs,’ will be the reply.”

Wessolowsky pointed to the blockade, lack of labor, and the dislocation caused by the war as the problem, not the Jews. The Jews were being made scapegoats, he said, because they had far less influence than their well-connected, non-Jewish competitors. He went for the jugular of the real Thomasville extortionists, who will “push the whole of the crime upon the German Jews, including two who were present at the notorious August 1862 meeting, and clear their own skirts asserting their nativity.” Wessolowsky was a charismatic speaker, and at least one soldier “sat awed, thinking for a moment that he had just heard Moses thundering down from the height of Sinai with admonishments to the Gentiles.” The Jews of the 32d denounced the Thomasville resolutions, in true Southern style, as “unbecoming and unworthy of gentlemen.”[133]

In retrospect, nothing much happened at Thomasville. No Jew was harmed or even personally insulted. No one was hurt. No store was ransacked. Indeed, the great majority of the Jews of Thomasville did not leave the town. The incident did not disturb Yates Levy of Savannah. He, too, looked with disdain at the peddling practices of the newly arrived German Jews. “Of course there is nothing new: there has been a battle royal between some blockheads in Thomasville and the German Jews, a struggle between the fools and the knaves, who are not, however, I believe, worse than their neighbors.”[134] According to Mark Greenberg, the Jews stayed, operated their stores, purchased land, participated in social events, and fought in the Confederate army.[135] After the war, in 1866, there were five Jewish-owned dry goods stores in town. Presumably, they were all German Jews who had started out as peddlers in the area. Their being Jewish was certainly no secret. In July 1860 Benjamin F. Hubert had run an advertisement in the local newspaper announcing: “New Goods! New Goods! Cheaper than the Cheapest! Great Excitement at Receiving Better Bargains Than Jews or Gentiles Offer.”[136]

When the war came, three of the seven eligible Jewish men of Thomasville joined the army: Michael Rosenfeld joined the Ochlockonee Light Infantry, Philip Schiff was a corporal in Company A/F (Thomasville Guards), 29th Georgia, and his brother Tomas served in the same unit.[137] Ironically, Tomas was discharged in 1864 when sixty-three Thomasville residents, including two who were present at the August 1862 meeting, petitioned the governor because Tomas’s skills as a tanner were needed at home.[138] Certainly by the standards of nineteenth-century Europe, which were part of the experience of all German Jewish immigrants, the Thomasville incident was not dangerous. The Jews of Thomasville, or at least the local Jews who had roots in the town, did not live in fear and ignored the whole incident.

The Jews of Macon survived the war alongside their Christian neighbors. Life was difficult for the small merchants who had little to sell. There were tense moments during the war when hungry women marched on the town demanding food and goods from local storekeepers. The Macon Jewish community was well aware that a few Jews were engaged in improper activities, and when Reverend Sternheimer, who had resigned his position as hazan, sought to return in June 1864, he was questioned extensively by E. Einstein, the former president of the congregation, about allegations that Sternheimer had been involved in "passing spurious and counterfeit confederate States treasury notes." Einstein asked Sternheimer directly, "upon the honor of a gentleman," whether he had been involved with one Stern and Rosenberg of Columbus, who had been charged with such activities and with whom Sternheimer had boarded. The hazan had heard that Stern and Rosenberg had been arrested, and he immediately returned to Columbus from Mobile to face his accusers rather than flee the country, as he was advised to do by some. No charges were ever brought. Sternheimer cleared his name and returned to Macon to serve the Beth Israel congregation.[139]

Lazarus Straus of Talbotton, Georgia, was not as sanguine as the Jews of Thomasville. When in 1862 the grand jury issued a presentment against "evil and unpatriotic conduct of the representatives of Jewish houses," Straus decided to leave Talbotton.[140] Isidor Straus later recalled that when Jewish merchants, who were engaged in perfectly legitimate business enterprises, were called extortionists, his father immediately let it be known that he would move away from a community which "had cast such a reflection on him, as the only Jew living in their midst." Straus promptly took steps to leave Talbotton, construing the grand jury's action as a personal affront. "Father's action caused such a sensation in the whole county that he was waited upon by every member of the grand jury," Isidor recalled, "also by all the ministers of the different denominations, who assured him that nothing was further from the minds of those who drew the presentment than to reflect on father, and that had anyone had the least suspicion that their action could be construed as they now saw it clearly might be construed, it never would have been permitted to be so worded." The elder Straus was not persuaded. He moved his business and family to Columbus, Georgia. "The loyalty and good will of the people towards him was made manifest to him, as he often stated, by the customers from Talbotton who visited his store in Columbus, not a few of them never having traded with him while in Talbotton, but who became regular clients in Columbus," Isidor later recounted.[141]

Wartime Richmond, the capital of the Confederacy, was packed with soldiers, government and war workers, refugees, prostitutes, vagrants, criminals, and con artists. Goods became scarce. Prices and inflation soared. “Richmond was, by far, the most expensive, corrupt, overcrowded and crime-ridden city in the Confederacy,” Ernest B. Furgurson concluded.[142] A gallon of cane syrup was one dollar in rural Georgia but fifty dollars in Richmond. To make matters worse, foreign traders, peddlers, and merchants, many of whom were German immigrants, had come to Richmond, a fertile field for small businessmen, the scrupulous and unscrupulous alike. “Temptations of profiteering were too strong for the flesh to bear,” Charles P. Roland wrote, “innumerable Southerners ignored the strictures of press and public, the exhortations of the government, and the pangs of conscience and yielded themselves to the seduction of easy gain.” Richmonders, in particular, were sensitive to foreigners who could be, and frequently were, spies for the Union army. And many in Richmond believed that the Union army was made up of German and Irish mercenaries.[143] Richmond was also home to the Confederate Congress, which gave vent to all of the frustrations of the entire South and contained a substantial number of demagogues and bigots, such as Congressman Henry S. Foote of Tennessee.[144]

Foote, bald, small, and of “colicky delivery,” was by far the most obnoxious anti-Semitic Confederate Congressman. He was widely perceived as hotheaded, irresponsible, and foolish, although tenacious as an opponent. He detested Jefferson Davis and attacked Judah Benjamin, whom he called “Judas Iscariot Benjamin,” and Jews in general, in order to strike at the president. In January 1863, in a debate on drafting foreigners, Foote loosed a torrent of criticism against the Jews. He claimed Jews had flooded the Confederacy and controlled nine-tenths of the business, all “by official permission” and the protection of the government, an allusion to Benjamin. If “the present state of things were to continue,” he said, “the end of the war would probably find nearly all the property of the Confederacy in the hands of Jewish Shylocks.” The Jews of Richmond, however, did not fear Foote. “That a man like Foote should habitually denounce the Jews is to be expected,” a Jewish reader wrote the Richmond Sentinel in January 1865. “He denounces everybody and every thing; his mouth is a ‘well-spring’ of slander.”[145] Pvt. Eugene Henry Levy was a spectator of the Confederate Congress in December 1864. He listened “with disgust to the badinage of Foote and other buncome orators.”[146]

Foote was not the only Confederate Congressman to attack the Jews. A few other members expressed anti-Semitic sentiments arising out of scarcity of supplies, inflation, speculating, and profiteering, but no legislation was ever passed directed at Jews, and no action ever undertaken against the Jews. Foote, in fact, had no following and was expelled from the Confederate Congress for fleeing to the North in February 1865.[147]

The Richmond press gave vent to the public's war-weariness and insecurity. One writer to the Richmond Enquirer contended that it was blasphemous for Benjamin to serve as secretary of state.[148] Southern Punch, published in Richmond, mocked Jews and foreigners, calling merchants "Jew and Yankee extortioners," "dirty, greasy Jew peddler," "Shylocks," and the like.[149] Alluding to the well-known fact that Jewish merchants and peddlers cheerfully sold goods to blacks, Southern Punch wrote: "Who are our capitalists at the present time? …. The dirty, greasy Jew peddler, who might be seen with a pack on his back a year or two since, bowing and cringing even to Negro servants, now struts by with the air of a millionaire."[150] The Richmond Examiner printed a letter in December 1862 tided "The Jews' Harvest," complaining about clothing merchants: "Specimens" of the "accursed race … fatten upon the calamities of the very people who are giving them a home," and claiming that Jews "are few indeed in the army, unless as camp followers, where they can follow their natural occupation." In a tirade laced with anti-Semitic clichés, this writer also charged that Jews were not productive citizens: "Did anyone ever see a Jew mechanic, a Jew farmer, or a Jew producer of any kind?" They were, in short, "the extortioners of the world." The editor agreed, describing Jews as disloyal and unpatriotic and denouncing "unkempt Israelites in our marts…. Every auction room is packed with greasy Jews."[151] Many a Richmonder believed the Jews dominated the retail trade, and some resented it. Sallie B. Putnam, a prominent society belle, wrote in her memoir, Richmond During the War, that one could "almost have imagined being in a strange city, from the signs over the doors of the shops … Israel and David, and Moses and Jacobs, and Hyman and Levy, and Guggenheimer and Rosenheimer, and other names innumerable of the Ancient People, were prominent, instead of the old Anglo-Saxon which had designated the most important business firms of Richmond…. The war was a harvest to that class of our population."[152] (In all fairness, Mrs. Putnam concluded that while the Jews were "much abused for extortion," they were "quite equaled" by "our own people," who should have set a better example.[153])

John Beauchamp Jones, a government clerk, an author, and a pathological anti-Semite, was obsessed about Jews and denounced them regularly in the safety of his private diary.[154] "Having no nationality, all wars are harvests for them," he wrote in September, 1861. Jones believed that illicit trade had depleted the country of gold "and placed us at the feet of the Jew extortioners…. These Jews have the adroitness to carry their points. They have injured the cause more than the armies of Lincoln. Well, if we gain our independence, instead of being the vassals of the Yankees, we shall find all our wealth in the hands of the Jews." Neither he nor his private observations had any effect on actual events, but he has been extensively quoted by historians as reflecting the prejudice against Jews in wartime Richmond.[155]

Some Richmonders believed that Jews were afraid and unwilling to fight. Coulter writes that the Jews "were especially charged with evading military service" and that "Jewish traders made desperate efforts to secure passports for the North from Judah P. Benjamin, the Jewish Secretary of State …. It was not unusual for them to pay as high as $10, 000.00 for conveyances and bribery of frontier guards to get across the Potomac."[156] Coulter's own old-fashioned prejudice aside, the fact is that many Southerners had no desire to serve in the army, and "Jewish traders" accounted for an infinitesimal percentage of slackers. Anti-Semitism, exacerbated by fear, want, and desperation, exaggerated the failings of a few Jews. Anti-Semitic stereotypes filled many a Southerner's need to believe that looming defeat was not their fault, but that of foreigners and aliens. Thus, Jews got caught up in a general hysteria against merchants, traders, Yankees, foreigners, and Germans (often mistakenly referred to as "Dutch," a corruption of "Deutsche").

Neither the Jews of Richmond nor their Gentile friends and neighbors allowed the anti-Semitic vilification to go unanswered. The editor of the Richmond Sentinel criticized the "intolerant and illiberal views and prejudices" against the Jews. These allegations, he felt, "in no way [affected] their individual and personal merits and character." The Sentinel responded positively to Jewish pleas for fair play: 'We consider it a duty to hail every good citizen as a brother. We ask him not where he was born or what his faith." The editor of the Richmond Dispatch agreed. While some Jews may have speculated in dry goods, Jews were not among those profiteering in food.[157]

Reverend Michelbacher publicly answered the wave of anti-Jewish invective. In Fredericksburg on May 27, 1863, a Confederate Fast Day, he gave a sermon in which he denied that Israelites were speculators or extortioners. If the Jews were guilty, he would say so, as "I always speak of your faults without fear, favor, or affection." But Jewish merchants did not hoard goods. They sold them quickly. And Jews did not sell flour, meal, wheat, corn, bacon, beer, coal, or wood, the basic commodities of speculation. Besides, if the Jews were hoarding, customers would obviously have bought supplies from honest Gentile traders. Michelbacher argued that the real speculators blamed the Jews in order to take the spotlight off their "moonshine" and evil activities.[158]

On October 18, 1863, Beth Ahabah held a congregational meeting to address the looting of merchants' shops and an incident of a rock being thrown through a synagogue window.[159] The congregation urged the Jews of Richmond to hold a mass meeting to consider raising money for the poor and the causes of the recent looting, as well as "such other matters as may be brought before the meeting to vindicate our character as Jews and good citizens."[160] Beth Shalome opposed this plan. "Beth Shalome replied to the overt pressure in a dignified and haughty manner, adumbrating the distinguished heritage of their Sephardic forebearers," Berman wrote. The quiet voice and fine hand of Gustavus A. Myers was undoubtedly at work behind the scenes when the old synagogue resolved that as citizens of Richmond they would "cheerfully" join in any endeavor to relieve the poor so long as all congregations of all religions did so. And they further resolved: "That while this meeting denounces the unfounded aspersions made against the Israelites of this city, and feels satisfied that the acts of our co-religionists can well bear the test of comparison with those of any other denomination in this community for patriotism, charity, or freedom from selfishness; yet think the best and most dignified course to be adopted, will be to treat them with silent contempt, confident that the enlightened and unprejudiced do not join in this crusade against our people."[161]

In the end, like the incident in Thomasville, the sound and fury in Richmond signified nothing. No Jew was molested, no storekeeper injured. Certainly no harm came to any Richmond Jew from the army of Robert E. Lee, the government of Jefferson Davis, or the state of Virginia, or the City Council of Richmond. It was a lot of bombast from a few demagogues and journalists and a minority of a sorely tried and increasingly frustrated populace. The Sephardic tradition of suffering in silence and working closely with those in authority prevailed over the German notion of protests. There is a local Richmond tradition that Adolphus H. Adler, said to be a colonel in the Confederate army, challenged the editor of the Examiner to a duel.[162] There is no record of the episode, and Adler was not a Confederate officer, but Jewish Richmonders long cherished the idea.

A few Jews may have felt threatened. Some lost faith in the cause. Philip Whitlock's brother took his family and went up North. The most embarrassing incident of the war for the Richmond Jewish community was the decision by Lewis Hyman, a jeweler and treasurer of Beth Shalome, to sell his assets, convert them to gold and precious stones, and leave for the North with his family. In February 1864, Hyman, his wife, and his party were robbed, and all of their possessions were taken while they were passing Confederate pickets. The anti-Semitic Richmond press gave the story a great deal of coverage to the consternation of the great majority of the Jews of Richmond, who remained loyal to the Confederacy to the end. Even men like Philip Whitlock, a Polish Jew who had served in the Richmond Grays and fought in the war, felt by 1862 that "there was no chance as we were getting weak and the other side were getting stronger."[163]

Other cities and towns of the South were not immune from anti-Jewish outbursts during the Civil War. Richmond was the worst, but there is evidence of other scattered incidents, such as raids on Jewish stores in Georgia by wives of soldiers away with the army and private expressions of anti-Semitism. Emma Holmes of Charleston wrote that "silver cannot be procured, as the Jews have bought up all."[164] And others wrote of Jews extorting high prices, speculating in goods, and engaging in passing counterfeit money.[165] A visitor to Charleston reported that one could "meet more Jews in Charleston than … in Jerusalem," there to buy goods brought in by blockade-runners.[166] Later writers romanticized blockade-running and war profiteering. Margaret Mitchell made an international hero out of Rhett Butler, who, after all, engaged in the sale of scarce goods at a very handsome profit. But Emma Holmes complained in August 1862 that when the blockade-runners arrived, the Jews outbid all others and were "setting up a quantity of little shops."[167] In Memphis, Polish Jews were accused of being involved in stealing, and Rabbi Tuska vigorously defended his co-religionists in the press. "The name of the 'Jew' has been so wantonly and unceremoniously dragged into the several reports," he wrote in the Memphis Daily Appeal. Before "the least particle of evidence is obtained … it is at once heralded abroad that Jews 'are to blame.'" 'Why," he asked the editor, "were people identified as Polish Jews when Jews were, like Irish Catholics or German Protestants, citizens of their country and Jewish only in their religious beliefs."[168]

Most Southerners and particularly those in positions of authority and influence were keenly aware of the loyalty of Southern Jews. The Charleston Courier, for example, would have no part in anti-Jewish demagoguery:

> We have said, and shall say, and urge our opinions against extortioners and bloodsuckers and prowling beastly bipeds of prey under whatever guise they come, but we protest earnestly and emphatically against any wholesale denunciation of Germans or Jews, or of German Jews. We have no more and no less opposition to an extortioner who happens to be a German or a Jew, than one who is an Englishman, or a Frenchman, or a Welchman, or a Yankee, and a so-called Christian. If there is such an animal as a Christian extortioner, we hate and abhor it, and would gladly exterminate it. Let the offenders and all who trouble our political Israel, and devour people, be rebuked, denounced, execrated, imprisoned, or expelled, if it can be done, but let us hear of no more abuse of a class as a class.[169]

A Confederate army chaplain wrote the Savannah Daily Morning News in February 1863 to express his opposition to the "many unfair, and, to my mind, very unjust, as well as injudicious flings at this part, no unimportant part, of our fellow citizens."[170] He wrote that there were plenty of Jews in the Confederate army and they were "good, enduring, hard-fighting soldiers" who shared in the danger, privations, battles and marches of all the other soldiers. He even suggested that the Jews of Macon establish the "first Israelite Battalion of the Confederate army. Let them take for the battle flag —'The Lion of the tribe of Judah,' and the God of Moses, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob will fight their battles for them, and tread our enemies beneath His feet."[171]

Gratz Cohen, a Jewish student at the University of Virginia and scion of the prominent Cohen family of Savannah, wrote his father, Solomon Cohen, on January 9, 1864, "It is a mournful fact that in these troubled times when intolerance & prejudice cast their baneful seed throughout the land, which from one quarter of it to another rings with abuse of God's people, that we have done nothing for our religion & are so blind to our own interests." Jewish wealth had been generously given to all manner of charities, Cohen told his father, but the Jews had not looked after their own interests. The newspapers lifted up their "lying tongues against them & no defending voice has been heard…. Why have we no Jewish newspaper to justify us before the world & explain to us our position, to remind Israel that it is not a race of shopkeepers, but a peculiar people set apart by Jehovah for His service & glorification." He suggested the publication of a newspaper in the South devoted to Jewish interests.[172]

Southern Jews were frequently treated worse than other Southerners by the occupying Union army and the Northern press. New Orleans Jewry was subjected to anti-Semitic outbursts from "Beast" Butler. In 1862 he accused New Orleans "army contractors, principally Jews" of making "fortunes by the war."[173] He swore that Jews "deserve to receive at the hands of this government what is due to the Jew Benjamin."[174] All Jews, according to this Massachusetts anti-Semite, were smugglers, and he called Benjamin's brother-in-law "a Jew famed for a bargain." Later in the war, the Jewish Record, a partisan newspaper in New York, reported that Butler had said "he could suck the blood of every Jew, and he will detain every Jew as long as he can." Taking their cue from Butler, Northerners who came to occupied New Orleans in 1862 to run the newspapers singled out the Jews for vitriolic treatment. "The Jews in New Orleans and all the South ought to be exterminated," one Associated Press reporter wrote. "They run the blockade, and are always to be found at the bottom of every new villainy."[175] Not to be outdone, the Chicago Times reported in July 1862, "The Israelites have come down upon the city [of Memphis] like locusts…. Every boat brings in a load of the hooked-nosed fraternity."[176]

Anti-Semitism, like all prejudice, is irrational. Many nineteenth-century Americans and Europeans used the word "Jew" to denote a cheap, corrupt merchant without necessarily believing all Jews were bad. For example, the British colonel, Arthur J. L. Fremantle, in his memoir, Three Months in the Southern States, described Matamores, a town on the border of Texas and Mexico, as "infested with numbers of Jews whose industry spoils the trade of established merchants," and yet this same officer slept in Maj. Raphael J. Moses's tent and described Moses as "a jovial Hebrew."[177]

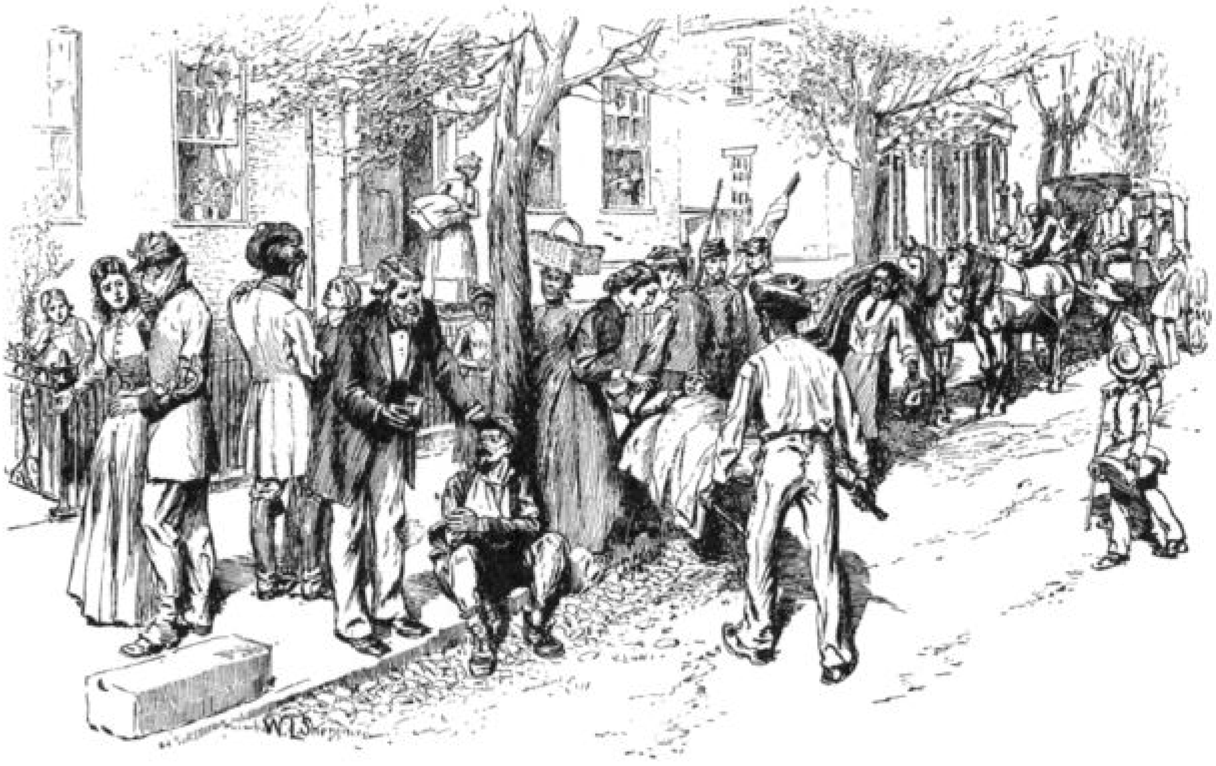
One of the most momentous issues of the Civil War for Northern Jews was the controversy over whether or not Jews could serve as chaplains in the Union army. Prior to the war it was not an issue, but thousands of Jews flocked to the army in 1861, and it therefore became an issue. The Volunteer Bill required that Union chaplains be "regularly ordained minister[s] of some Christian denomination," despite opposition on the floor of the House calling attention to the exclusion of "men … of the Hebrew faith." A controversy arose in the fall of 1861 when a YMCA worker discovered, to his horror, that one Michael Allen, a Jew, was serving as regimental chaplain for men of all faiths with the 5th Pennsylvania Cavalry.[178] Allen was not an ordained rabbi, but he was a student of theology and a competent and well-respected layman. He was forced to resign. This issue, which received widespread publicity in the Northern Jewish and religious press, precipitated a political controversy. The Jewish communities of the North petitioned Congress and the White House until, in July 1862, the law was amended to allow Jews to serve as chaplains.

In contrast to the controversy in the North, the right of Jews to serve as chaplains was never an issue for the Confederacy. Its laws referred to "clergymen," not to specific denominations. While there is no evidence that there ever was an official commissioned Confederate Jewish chaplain, there was never a legal impediment to such service. Two Confederate privates, Uriah Feibelman of Petersburg, Virginia, and B. Nordlinger of Macon, Georgia, apparently officiated as chaplains although not commissioned to do so. Feibelman, who was later ordained, served with the Petersburg Grays, Company C, 12th Virginia. Nordlinger, a bugler with the Macon German Artillery, conducted services for Temple Beth Israel in Macon in 1862.[179] In September 1862, the Confederate Congress debated the Exemption Bill, which excused "every minister of the Gospel" performing such duties from military service. The Richmond Dispatch editorialized against the bill if it did not include "Jewish ministers," and the final version referred to "every minister of religion." Without any debate or controversy, the Confederacy treated rabbis as equals of ministers of the Gospel.[180]

The Jews of the North and the South were bound together by ancient ethnic and religious ties, whether they were recent immigrant or third-generation Americans. Thus, while some of the Protestant churches—notably the Baptists and Methodists—divided into Southern and Northern branches, the Jews did not. Of course, American Jewry had no national religious body to divide and few national organizations of any kind. The Jewish boys in the Union army at times elicited the sympathy of Southern Jews and their hospitality, and at other times did not. As Jews, they were keenly aware of how important it was to these young men, in foreign surroundings, to attend Jewish services and celebrate the Jewish holidays. Lt. Simon S. Brucker of the 39th Illinois attended the High Holy Day services in occupied Norfolk, Virginia, and wrote his parents, “Oh! It made me feel as though I were at home among friends once more.” Except that “All the Yehudin in Norfolk are so embittered against the Northern soldiers. I had several little arguments with some of them and find most of them pretty reasonable excepting the young ladies, they can outargue the smartest statesman in the world according to their own way.” The men treated him courteously. Myer Levy, a Union soldier in another occupied Virginia town, saw a little boy eating matzo during Passover and asked him for a piece. The child ran inside and shouted “Mother! There’s a ‘damnyankee’ Jew outside!” The mother emerged and, to his relief, invited Levy to the family Seder.[181]

For their part, Northern Jews disagreed with Southern Jews about the war, and, indeed, there were battles which pitted Jewish Confederates against Jewish Yankees. At Gettysburg, for example, the Alabama 12th, led by Major Proskauer, may have met the Illinois 82d, commanded by Lt. Col. Edward S. Salomon. But it does not appear that these feelings prevented that natural tendency of Jews of that era to come to the aid of one of their own. When Jewish Confederates were captured, for example, members of the Jewish community did what they could to relieve their suffering. The Jews of Chicago visited Jewish boys held as prisoners at Camp Douglas. Rabbi Wise attempted on a number of occasions to secure the release of Jewish Confederates from Fort Delaware. He asked the readership of his newspaper to send packages of food and published their names so that relatives in the North could assist.[182]

As the war drew to a close, the dispirited Jewish communities of Savannah, Charleston, Columbia, and Richmond reached out to Northern Jewry for desperately needed aid. They wrote appeals to national Jewish journals and newspapers such as the Jewish Messenger, published in New York by Samuel M. Isaacs; the Israelite, published in Cincinnati by Rabbi Wise; and the Occident, published by Rabbi Leeser in Philadelphia. Leeser, who had lived in Richmond as a young man and who had many friends and relatives in the South, was very supportive of Southern Jewry during and after the war. Indeed, upon his death in 1868, Charleston’s Beth Elohim honored him in a memorial resolution: “As Southerners, we grieve over the loss of a bold defender of our rights, a true and consistent friend to constitutional liberty, who, through great personal peril, remained unshaken in our vindication, undismayed by our reverses, unconquered by our defeat.”[183]



View of Richmond streets, the wounded from the Battle of Seven Pines, 1862. (Batties and Leaders of the Civil War.)

In February 1865, the Jews of Savannah wrote to these Jewish periodicals seeking matzo: “Many of the inhabitants, formerly wealthy, are now in extremely straitened circumstances; and besides have entirely lost the means of baking for the ensuing Passover.” Isaacs of the Messenger recalled the generosity of Savannah’s Jewish community in its heyday and asked his readers to lay aside any enmity they might harbor and come to their co-religionists’ aid. The response was overwhelming: three thousand pounds of matzo was sent from New York and two thousand pounds from Philadelphia. There was even a proposal in New York to establish a charitable organization to assist Southern Jewry. “This is no time to look back upon petty differences that may have arisen between communities,” the Jewish Record urged. “Nor can any one now allude to political discussions or angry passions…. Let all of us join in tendering to our brethren a part of that wealth with which the God of Israel has blessed us.[184]

“By the latter part of 1863,” William M. Robinson Jr. wrote, “Richmond in some respects resembled Chicago at the height of its gangster days.” Crime was rampant. The city was full of criminals, shysters, and cheats.[185] Goods were in short supply. Philip Rosenheim wrote his sister Amelia and brother-in-law Isaac Meinnart that “check muslin could not be found at any price.”[186] The population of Richmond began to suffer terribly from poverty, sickness, and war-weariness. Rev. George Jacobs of Beth

Shalome could not support his family on a rabbi’s salary. He engaged in business to earn additional income. In February 1863, the Jacobs’s five-year-old daughter, Martha, died of scarlet fever. To make matters worse, Jacobs officiated at the funerals of six Richmond Jewish soldiers killed in the war, including that of his young brother-in-law, Pvt. Isaac J. Levy. In his funeral address, Jacobs lamented the loss of “a young man cut down in the springtime of existence, one in the plentitude of health and vigor of manhood.” He spoke of faith in adversity and sorrow. “It is good for me that I have been afflicted,” he quoted the words of David, “that I might better learn Thy ways.” The days of darkness must come, Jacobs told the mourners, and “those whose faith is well founded” will be prepared to meet adversity.[187]

Samuel Yates Levy, writing in Savannah in November 1863, prayed for peace, victory, and humility:

And as Thou led’st Thy chosen people forth

From Egypt’s sullen wrath, oh King of Kings!

So smite the armies of the cruel North

And bear us to our hopes “on eagle’s wings.”

But should Thy wisdom still defer the day—

The wish’d for day our freedom shall be won—

Oh grant us the humility to say,

Not human will but Thine, oh Lord, be done.[188]

Henry Timrod, the author of “La Belle Juive,” died in poverty and sickness in 1867. He was later honored, more in death than in life, as the poet laureate of the Confederacy. A bust of Timrod now graces the entrance to Washington Park next to City Hall in Charleston. There for all time Henry Timrod stares at St. Michael’s Church across Broad Street, where in September 1863 he dared not intrude on the Jewish beauty, Rachel Lyons.

CHAPTER 6

★

Two Jewish Confederate Sisters

My only wish was to live and die among them, growing each day better from contact with their gentle, kindly sympathies and heroic hearts.

—Phoebe Pember, A Southern Woman's Story (1879)

To the women of the South I look for approval.

—Eugenia Phillips, on her return from Union imprisonment, 1862

IF IT CAN BE SAID that there were Jewish aristocrats in the Old South, then the Levy sisters exemplified the Southern Jewish elite. Eugenia and Phoebe Levy were born and grew up in Charleston, South Carolina, in its heyday in the early 1800s. T. C. DeLeon described Eugenia as "one of the most picturesque personages in Confederate history … a most potent and popular one in Washington society … she had great goodness of heart, and was ever loyal in her friendships [which] included some of the most notable women." Of Phoebe he wrote: "A belle and early a widow, she made herself loved in the army camps by that good work of her Chimborazo Hospital." Eugenia's 1902 obituary linked the two famous Confederate sisters: "Two more brilliant women than Mrs. Phillips and her sister, Mrs. Pember, of Savannah, who frequently visited her, were not to be found in Washington, and in those days many famous wits and beauties were gathered here." Another recalled the sisters as "the toasts of the day." They were, without a doubt, two of the Confederacy's most interesting women.[1]

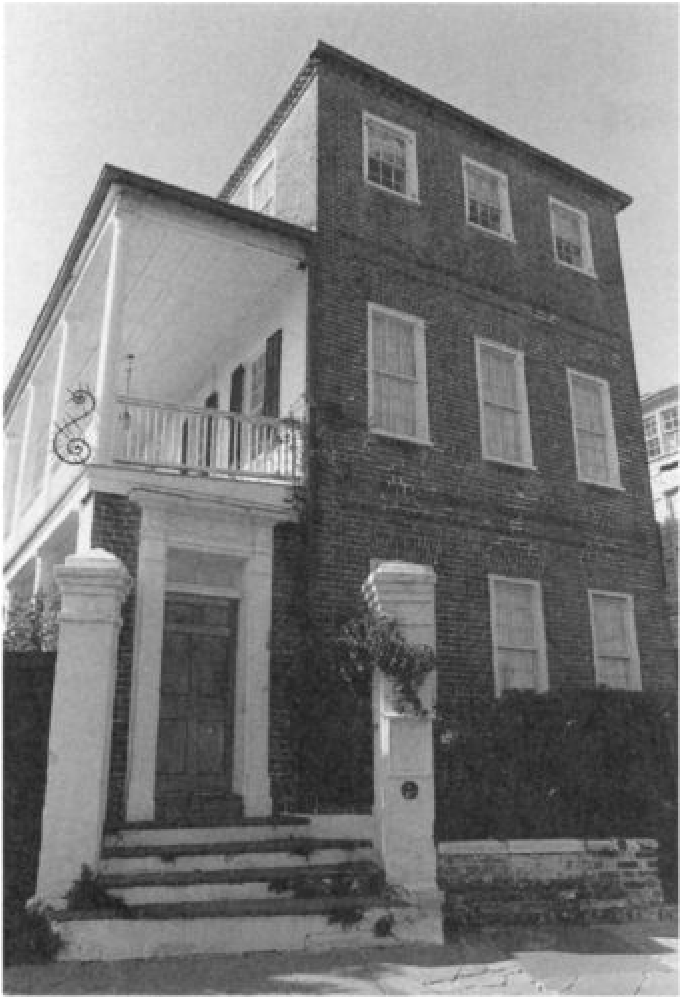
Their parents, Jacob Clavius Levy and Fanny Yates Levy, were educated, cultured, and wealthy Charlestonians. Jacob, a Charleston native, met Fanny on a visit to Liverpool while on a European tour. His foreign bride was, according to Charleston Jewish tradition, the admiration of the whole city. It was said that, at her first appearance in the dress circle of the old Charleston Theatre in Broad Street "the whole house rose in tribute to her matchless beauty." Judging from her portrait painted by Thomas Sully in 1842, Mrs. Levy was indeed a beautiful and sophisticated lady.[2]

Phoebe Yates Pember was born in Charleston in 1823 into a well-to-do Jewish family. Her father, Jacob Clavius Levy, was active in Beth Elohim. She married Thomas Pember, a Gentile, who died prior to the war. A widow and feeling restless, Mrs. Pember left her parents' home in Marietta, Georgia, in December 1862 and went to wartime Richmond to become the first matron of the Chimborazo Hospital. (Courtesy of Civil War Times.)

Jacob Levy was prominent in the business affairs of Charleston. He was a director of the Union Insurance Company, a delegate to the Knoxville Railroad Convention in 1836, a member of the Charleston Chamber of Commerce, and was affiliated with the Union Party in the Nullification crisis. He was a pioneer in the insurance and railroad industries in the 1830s, and he pursued other interests as well. He was a member of the Charleston Library Society and, according to a great-granddaughter, was "quite literary." The soirées he gave were among the events of Charleston's social season.[3]

Levy was also a devout and practicing Jew. His father, Moses Levy, had served as president of Beth Elohim and, in 1838, in his nineties, he had rushed to the synagogue to save the sacred Torah scrolls from loss in a fire. The Jacob Levy family worshiped at Beth Elohim, a short walk from their home on East Bay Street. During a four-year period when there was no regular rabbi at Beth Elohim, he and two other members of the congregation took turns officiating. He served as treasurer of the congregation; wrote one of the hymns used in the consecration of the Temple in 1841; and wrote a book entitled Vindicae Judearum, A History of the Jewish People. “That history,” he held, “has been the moral and religious teaching of the world; it has been the source of the national life of the most remarkable people on the face of the earth.” This book apparently was never published, but Levy did publish a scholarly article on “The Reformed Israelites” in the Southern Quarterly Review in 1844.[4]

Eugenia Phillips was born in Charleston in 1819. A high-spirited woman, she married a successful lawyer, Philip Phillips, who was also active in Beth Elohim as a young man. The couple moved to Mobile, where they had nine children. They moved to Washington when Mr. Phillips was elected to Congress. Mrs. Phillips was arrested twice by Union authorities, first in Washington for spying and then in New Orleans for mocking Union soldiers. Mary Chesnut referred to her and fellow spy Rose Greenhow as "saints and martyrs and patriots." (Author's collection.)



The East Bay Street home of Jacob and Fanny Levy in Charleston. (Author's collection. Photograph taken by Michael Levkoff.)

Jacob and Fanny Levy lived at 301 East Bay Street in a grand mansion built between 1811 and 1816 by his father, Moses Levy, a native of Krakow, Poland. Situated in Ansonborough, the house still stands. Their neighbors were the Gadsdens, the Heywards, and the Laurenses. The Levys soon filled their spacious house with seven children: the eldest was Henrietta (1818); then Eugenia (1819); Martha Sarah (1821);

Phoebe (1823); Samuel Yates (1827); Emma (1832); and Fanny (1840). The children were undoubtedly raised in the Jewish religion and attended services at Beth Elohim. In 1848 the family moved to Savannah, Georgia, where Jacob Levy died in 1875. Fanny lived into her late eighties. Martha never married but was a "gifted and popular woman," according to DeLeon. Henrietta married the prominent Savannah lawyer Octavus Cohen. Emma married Samuel Prioleau Hamilton, whose father was a former governor of South Carolina. Yates Levy became a lawyer, newspaper editor, and accomplished equestrian, serving for a time as an officer in the Savannah Jockey Club.[5]

By all accounts, the youthful Eugenia Levy was the quintessential Southern belle. Given her beauty and background, Eugenia had her choice of suitors. She chose Philip Phillips, a bright, young Jewish Charlestonian from a modest background. She chose well.

Phillips was born in Charleston in 1807, the son of a German Jewish immigrant, Aaron Phillips, and a native-born mother, Caroline Lazarus, whose father had fought in the American Revolution. He studied under Isaac Harby, read law under the tutelage of the eminent Charleston lawyer John Gadsden (formerly the U.S. district attorney) and, at age twenty-two, became a successful lawyer. When he was twenty-one, he served as secretary of the Reformed Society of Israelites. His father, like Eugenia's, served as president of Beth Elohim. When Phillips joined the bar, he relocated to Cheraw, South Carolina, where he rode the circuit, as Abraham Lincoln did about the same time. In the 1830 Nullification crisis, Phillips was a staunch Unionist, a stance he maintained up to and through the Civil War. He was one of four Jewish South Carolinians who attended the Nullification Convention in Columbia, where he distinguished himself as a brave and vigorous defender of the Union. (Phillips and Chapman Levy were Unionists; Philip Cohen and Myer Jacobs favored nullification.)[6]

Many South Carolinians moved west in the 1830s, and Phillips decided to seek his fortune in Mobile, Alabama, where he lived until 1853. In 1836 Phillips returned to Charleston and, on September 7 of that year, married Eugenia Levy, aged sixteen. Phillips was then 29. Eugenia described herself as a "delicate" woman, but, as we shall see, this was hardly the case. She raised nine children, was incarcerated twice for her pro-Southern sympathies, and lived to the age of eighty-three.[7]

Phillips was a successful attorney in Mobile, where, among other clients, he represented the Bank of Mobile and numerous commercial interests. Eugenia's time was devoted to their growing family. During the eighteen years they lived in Mobile, she bore seven children: Clavius, Fanny, Caroline (Lina), Salvadora, Eugene, John Walker and John Randolph. Three more, Emma, William Hallett, and Philip, were born in Washington in the 1850s. The family first resided in the Somerville area in the western suburbs of Mobile and then on Mobile Bay. One house was destroyed by fire, and the family lost nearly every possession. Mrs. Phillips later recalled, “The picture of my two oldest children, Clavius and Fanny, was rescued from the flames by their faithful colored nurse, and now adorns our parlor at Washington.” Active in Mobile society, the Phillipses entertained the Hungarian liberator, Lajos Kossuth, on his visit to their city.[8]

Phillips continued his active interest in politics and published a digest of the decisions of the Alabama Supreme Court. He was elected to the Alabama legislature in 1844, served as chairman of that body’s committee on Federal relations, was reelected in 1852, and served as chairman of the committee on internal improvements. Like Judah Benjamin and David Yulee, he was a proponent of a modern railroad system. Chairman of the Alabama Democratic Party, Phillips was a delegate to the 1852 Democratic Party Convention, where he made a speech in support of Franklin Pierce’s bid for the presidency. He and President Pierce later became close friends.

Philip Phillips, Eugenia Phillips’s husband, was a moderate and opposed secession. The author of the Kansas-Nebraska Act, he was a brilliant lawyer. This photograph shows him as an older man, after the war. (Courtesy of American Jewish Historical Society, Waltham, Mass., and New York City.)

In 1853 Phillips was elected to the U.S. Congress from Alabama. He was intimately involved in the negotiations and debate over the Kansas-Nebraska Act, apparently being the only Southern Representative who understood that the technical language of the Compromise of 1820 barred slavery perpetually in the territories at issue. Phillips, a moderate Democrat, was sought out by Stephen A. Douglas and John C. Breckinridge, who "begged [him] to find the least inflammatory language to accomplish modification of the Missouri Compromise." Phillips was then to clear the wording with the key Southern leaders of the Congress. They met the next day in a smoke-filled room at the Patent Office near the Phillipses' home, where all agreed on Phillips's amendments. Phillips's language, which did not repeal the Compromise of 1820, nevertheless made it "inoperative and void" in Kansas-Nebraska. "Not since the cotton gin," William Freehling has written, "had the Patent Office observed a southern invention so fateful as Phillips' phraseology."[9] It was obvious that Phillips possessed an extraordinary legal mind. His legal ability and his talent for consensus-building earned the instant respect of his colleagues and the Washington legal establishment. By 1860 he was described by Mary Chesnut and others as "a celebrated lawyer."[10]

Phillips decided not to run for reelection to the House but to stay in Washington. His law practice had suffered, and he needed to provide for his family. The family was also now part of the Washington establishment. They were close friends of President and Mrs. Pierce and socialized with them frequently During his days in Congress, Phillips had developed personal relationships with Jefferson Davis, the senator from Mississippi; Edwin M. Stanton, the former attorney general of the United States and future secretary of war under Lincoln; as well as William H. Seward, Lincoln's future secretary of state. Seward, a neighbor, was a frequent visitor in the Phillipses' home and, as Caroline Phillips Myers recalled later, "many were the sharp and witty encounters between my Mother and this distinguished man, who afterwards became her enemy on the ever agitating question of slavery."[11] Mrs. Phillips had many friends, among them Rose O'Neal Greenhow, Washington's most notable hostess, the daughter of a prominent planter family from Maryland and the aunt of Mrs. Stephen A. Douglas. She also appeared to carry on extended flirtations with Joseph Holt, then a member of the cabinet, and Sen. Stephen R. Mallory of Florida.[12]

It is impossible for historians to know about the private lives of people, but Mary Chesnut thought Eugenia Phillips, who was after all a married woman, was more than a flirt. "I wish Mr. Mallory would not tell me so much of his flirtation with Mrs. Phillips," she wrote in her dairy in March 1861. "I do not think it as innocent as he pretends, but it's none of my business." When the Yankees seized Mrs. Phillips's correspondence, "Mallory & Holt may tremble," she wrote, "from what I know of the scandals."[13]

The Phillipses did not forget their Jewish roots. Mr. Phillips led the Jewish delegation to President Buchanan to seek relief for Jews from the American-Swiss Treaty of 1855, and he spoke at the laying of the cornerstone at Temime Derech, a New Orleans synagogue, in 1866.[14] Clara Solomon mentions seeing one of the Phillips daughters, whom she calls "Beauty" (probably Fanny), at Yom Kippur services at the Dispersed of Judah synagogue in September 1861 and two of the Phillips girls at Passover in April 1862. Indeed, it appears that one or both of the Phillips girls attended regularly. Clearly, the Jewish community of New Orleans perceived the Phillipses as Jews.[15]

The three Phillips girls inherited their mother's beauty and graces, "but not … her satiric turn." Fanny, Caroline, and Emma became popular belles and were all considered beauties in a society where plain women were exceptional. When Buchanan became president, the Phillipses visited his daughter Harriet Lane, the president's hostess at the White House. 'We were present," one of the daughters recalled, "at her private entertainment given to the Prince of Wales." Mrs. Clement Clay remembered a musical performance at the White House during the Buchanan presidency. "Among the guests on that occasion," she wrote, "were Miss Phillips of Alabama and her cousin, Miss Cohen of South Carolina, who were brilliant amateur players with a local reputation. They were the daughter and niece, respectively, of Mrs. Eugenia Phillips… At the invitation of Miss Lane, the Misses Phillips and Cohen took their places at the piano and performed a brilliant and intricate duet."[16]

Not since Andrew Jackson arrived in Washington had a change in administrations been so dramatic as in 1860, when Abraham Lincoln replaced James Buchanan. Southerners had held prominent places in the Buchanan cabinet, and Southern senators dominated the Senate. Indeed, Southerners dominated Washington itself in the antebellum era. Ladies like Eugenia Phillips felt that they were the leaders of "polite society" in the nation's capital. With the arrival of the Lincoln administration, however, the residents of Washington realized that the Republican political revolution was a social revolution as well. The city, Mrs. Phillips said, was "disgraced with Lincoln's low soldiery." As the Southern states began to secede and the Southern congressmen withdrew, those Southerners remaining in Washington considered themselves to be citizens of another country and no longer loyal to the old Federal Union. In response to the crises, Eugenia and Rose Greenhow organized a committee to aid Confederate prisoners and took relief packages to the Old Capital Prison.[17] Some of these Southerners began to engage in what can only be described as espionage activities—providing information to the newly established Confederate government about military affairs, troop movements, politicians, and the general activities of the Federal government. Eugenia Phillips engaged in exacdy the same kind of espionage. Strictly speaking, these activities were treasonous, and the Federal government was in no mood for them, even if carried on by witty, attractive, socially prominent Southern belles. Greenhow knew what she was doing in recruiting beautiful women to extract information from gullible officers.[18]

Eugenia and Philip could not have had a greater divergence of opinion on slavery and secession. As in many marriages, the partners differed markedly in their temperament. Philip was a person of calm and moderate disposition, not inclined to radical ideas, a conservative who believed deeply in the status quo and the American legal system. Eugenia, the daughter and friend of Southern aristocrats and an enthusiastic participant in the Southern social scene, was an ardent Southern partisan who was a vociferous supporter of the Southern cause. In this, she was not alone. The entire Levy family—all of the generations—supported the war. Sister Phoebe waxed eloquent on the topic of the patriotism of Southern women. The Levy men enlisted[19]; but Philip thought secession foolhardy and had little use for the institution of slavery. He even attempted to stem the tide of secession.[20]

The Phillipses' political activities were immediately suspect because of Eugenia's vocal public support for the Southern cause, despite Philip's antisecession views. By late July 1861, despondency spread over the North when the defeat at First Manassas, or Bull Run, became known. Southern sympathizers were arrested. The most famous Southern belle to be detained was Eugenia's good friend Rose O'Neal Greenhow. She had provided the Confederates with Gen. Irvin McDowell's plans for the First Manassas campaign using a secret code provided by General Beauregard's staff. She was arrested on August 23, 1861, and on August 24, Eugenia and Philip Phillips were also arrested.[21]

Mr. Phillips's office was upstairs in their house on I Street. While he was working at his desk, a Federal officer entered the house and told Phillips that he was under arrest. Detectives searched the house, and an officer seized Phillips's papers. When the officers were finished, Eugenia and daughters Fanny and Caroline, as well as Eugenia's sister Martha Levy, were imprisoned in two dirty rooms in the attic story of Mrs. Greenhow's residence on Sixteenth Street, where officials could conveniently guard the women together. They had a broken stove, a punch bowl which could be used for a washbasin, and two filthy straw mattresses. It was later dubbed "Fort Greenhow" and "Greenhow Prison."[22]

Eugenia's innocent husband was under house arrest for a week. Mrs. Phillips and her daughters were able to receive letters and baskets of fruit from her husband and occasional visits, but Union authorities placed a guard with a musket at their table to listen to their conversation. "It is but justice to this man [the guard] to say he appeared much ashamed of the ignoble part assigned to him. Our rebel hearts, however, enabled us to rise superior to the devices of our enemies. Our conversation, which was one of the merriest, was conducted in French." She celebrated her twenty-fifth wedding anniversary while imprisoned.[23] But, she was nevertheless unrepentant: "Again I ask myself what is my crime? If an ardent attachment to the land of my birth and expression of deepest sympathy with my relatives and friends in the South constitute treason—then I am indeed a traitor! If hostility towards Black Republicanism, its sentiments and policy—is a crime—I am self-condemned … !"[24]

The Federal authorities could find no evidence with which to charge Eugenia, but they would not release her. Southerners were outraged at the treatment accorded Eugenia Phillips and Rose Greenhow. Mary Chesnut said: "These poor souls are jealously guarded night and day. It is a hideous tale, what they tell of their suffering. Mrs. [Robert E.] Lee punned upon the odd expression, 'Ladies of their age being confined.' These old Washington habituées say Mrs. Greenhow had herself confined and persecuted, that we might trust her the more. She sees we distrust her after all. The Manassas men swear she was our good angel."[25]

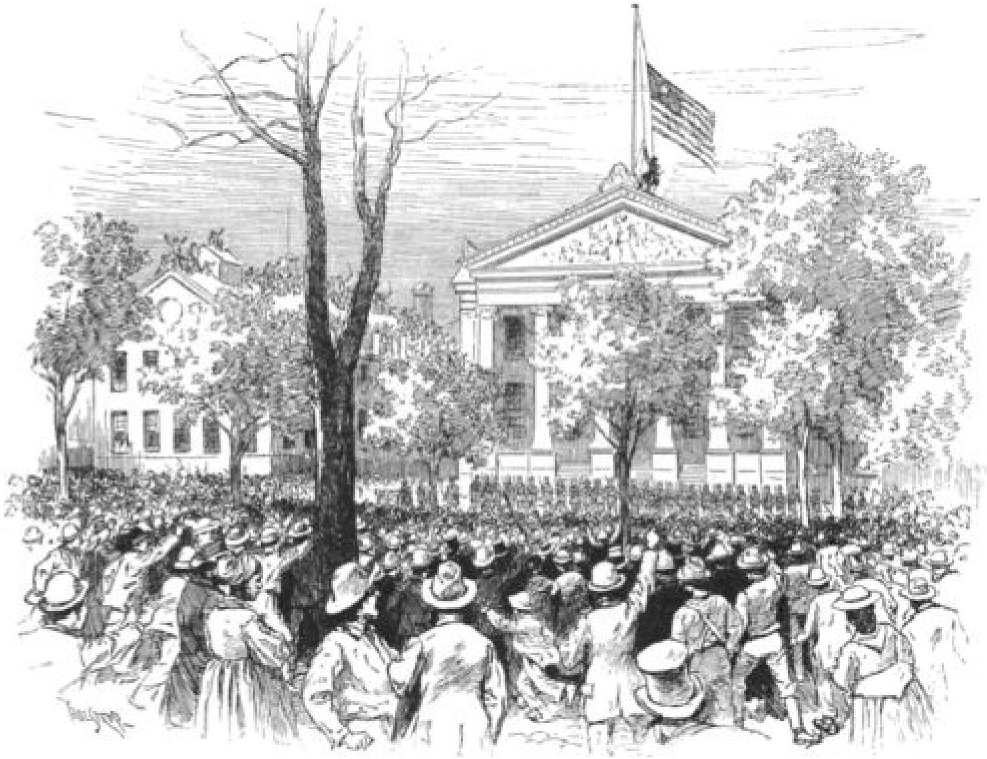
Mrs. Chesnut did blame Greenhow and Phillips, however obliquely, for causing difficulties for all Southern women. Federal authorities now began searching women's hair and clothing for contraband. Bustles, she wrote, are now "suspect…. Not legs but arms are looked for under hoops." Public opinion favored the prisoners. Phillip Clayton thought Mrs. Phillips's children ought not to have been hostages to fortune. "How can a motherly soul with nine children be suspected of mischief?" he wondered. But Mrs. Chesnut recounted, "She is caged up, all the same!"[26]

Philip Phillips's relationships with Edwin Stanton; Reverdy Johnson, the senator from Maryland; and Supreme Court Justice James M. Wayne, formerly mayor of Savannah, proved helpful in the crisis. The Phillips ladies were released on September 18, 1861, after three weeks of imprisonment. The family left Washington as quickly as possible. Each signed a parole agreement pledging not to take disloyal actions against the government. The document, daughter Caroline recalled, was big "with seals formidable enough to shield Federal soldiers from Southern bullets."[27]

By coincidence, the Phillips family happened to meet the secretary of state, Henry Seward, while en route to the train station. They gave him a loud "hurra for Dixie!" They then sailed for Fort Monroe in a fearful storm, which delayed their trip. Trying to decide whether to transfer to a smaller boat, Mr. Phillips consulted with the officer in charge. "But the sight of the Confederate flag was enough to inspire the enthusiastic bosoms of the women with a feeling that knows no fear, and counts no consequence." Mr. Phillips and her daughters jumped into a frail bark and sailed away. Gen. Benjamin Huger sent a steamer to bring the Phillips family ashore. Mr. Phillips caught up with them later. They were received at Norfolk, Virginia, with deep respect and emotion by Confederate officers. The next day they traveled to Richmond.[28]

The story was later widely circulated that Eugenia brought a message in code from Rose Greenhow in a ball of yarn and delivered it to Jefferson Davis.[29] After Mrs. Phillips and her daughters were freed from Greenhow prison, they were sitting at the parlor window when Rose, still a prisoner, was out walking with an officer on each side. She passed by and threw a ball of wool, saying: “You dropped your worsted, Mrs. Phillips, when you left my house.” Rose went on her way, laughing and chatting with her guard. Four days later, although she had been carefully searched at Fortress Monroe, Mrs. Phillips gave Jefferson Davis the cipher letter contained in the ball. “This was,” Caroline Myers recalled later, “the only treasonable act of which our Mother was guilty and of which conscientious Father never knew.”[30]

From Richmond, the Phillipses traveled to Savannah and then decided to relocate to New Orleans. They arrived in the Crescent City in the winter of 1861 only to find that wartime conditions made it impossible for Mr. Phillips to open a law practice. Like others in New Orleans, the Phillipses believed that they were safe from the Yankee invasion. They were lulled into “a charming condition of safety, and our hopes buoyed up by recent victories,” Eugenia recalled, “while all letters from Richmond conveyed hints of our speedy recognition by England, the surface of society seemed unruffled, and we were but little prepared for the bitter fate which was in store.”[31] In April the Union fleet appeared at the mouth of the Mississippi River. Rear Adm. David G. Farragut commanded a fleet of twenty-four vessels, which boasted two hundred guns and mortars and nineteen mortar boats. He captured New Orleans in April, and on May 1 Union Maj. Gen. Benjamin F. “Beast” Butler took command of the city.



The scene at City Hall in New Orleans when the flag was hauled down. (Battles and Leaders of the Civil War.)

Butler immediately began an efficient and extremely controversial military administration of New Orleans. “Beast” Butler was the worst the Union army had to offer. He was nicknamed “Spoons” for thievery of spoons and silverware imputed to him and to his soldiers. Eugenia said Butler became “our master; he, intent on getting our money; we as determined to keep it.” One of his most notorious acts was General Order No. 28, which became known as “The Woman Order.” “As the officers and soldiers of the United States have been subjected to repeated insults from the women (calling themselves ladies) of New Orleans,” this order read, “it is ordered, that hereafter, when any female shall, by word, gesture or movement insult or show contempt for any officer or soldier of the United States, she shall be regarded and held liable to be treated as a woman of the town plying her avocation.” When the mayor of New Orleans, John T. Monroe, protested the order, he was arrested. Prime Minister Palmerston in the British House of Commons said, “An Englishman must blush to think that such an act has been committed by one belonging to the Anglo-Saxon race.”[32]

Butler deliberately chose to humiliate the New Orleans aristocracy. Eugenia claimed to have kept herself as secluded as possible in order to escape any notice from Butler’s henchmen. But on June 29, 1862, she unwisely showed her contempt of the occupying forces. The Phillips home, located next to City Hall, overlooked the funeral procession of Lieutenant DeKay, a Union officer. Eugenia, standing on the balcony, appeared to burst into laughter and cheers at the procession. According to her daughter Caroline, she was only reacting to the news of a Confederate victory.[33] Butler immediately ordered her to appear at his headquarters at the Customs House. Eugenia, active in raising money for the widow of a man executed by Butler for having hauled down the flag from the Federal mint, believed she was being persecuted for her pro-Southern beliefs.

Butler screamed at her, "You are seen laughing and mocking at the remains of a Federal officer." Eugenia replied, "I was in good spirits and felt like laughing." Butler replied, "I do not call you a common woman of the town, but an uncommonly vulgar one, and I sentence you to Ship Island for the War."[34] Mr. Phillips could not reason with the general, who threatened to have her gagged. "After making all allowance for his position as commander," Mr. Phillips recalled years later in his characteristically modest way, "I must now characterize his conduct as coarse and brutal."[35] Butler took some time writing out Mrs. Phillips's sentence. He hoped she would throw herself on his mercy. But begging pardon never occurred to Eugenia. She quietly folded her arms and looked on him contemptuously while he wrote her arrest order.[36] In truth, T. C. DeLeon later recounted, "it was Mrs. Phillips's contempt of the general and her cool sarcasm that caused her imprisonment." "If such women as you and Mrs. Greenhow are let loose, our lives are in jeopardy," General Butier said. When told she would be exiled to an island sixty-five miles from New Orleans, Eugenia retorted, "It has one advantage over the city, Sir; you will not be there."[37] When informed that her new home was also a Yellow Fever station, Eugenia replied, "It is fortunate that neither the fever nor General Butler is contagious!"[38]

Butler's Special Order #150, which he wrote in his own hand, reads as follows:

> Mrs. Phillips, wife of Philip Phillips, having been once imprisoned for her traitorous proclivities and acts at Washington, and released by the clemency of the Government; and having been found training her children to spit upon officers of the United States, for which act of one of those children both her husband and herself apologized and were again forgiven, is now found on the balcony of her house during the passage of the funeral procession of Lieut. De Kay, laughing and mocking at his remains, and upon being inquired of by the commanding general if this fact were so, contemptuously replies—"I was in good spirits that day:"
>
> It is therefore ordered that she be not "regarded and treated as a common woman," of whom no officer or soldier is bound to take notice, but as an uncommon, bad and dangerous woman, stirring up strife and inciting to riot.
>
> And that therefore she be confined at Ship Island, in the State of Mississippi, within the proper limits there, till further orders, and that she be allowed one female servant and no more, if she so choose. That one of the houses for hospital purpose be assigned her as quarters, and a soldier's ration each day be served out to her with the means of cooking the same, and that no verbal or written communication be allowed with her, except through this office, and that she be kept in close confinement until removed to Ship Island.[39]

Ship Island, a former quarantine station, was a mosquito-infested sandbar without amenities of any kind.[40] The summer heat in the Delta could be fatal, and the poor hygiene on the island was well known. Healthy food was hard to obtain, but Butler allowed Mr. Phillips to send some.[41] Had it not been for Phebe, her loyal servant, Eugenia may have died. Her fellow inhabitants of the island were “negroes, soldiers, contractors, sutlers, piddlars, black republicans, sailors and Officers.” She was offended by everything from their manner of dress to their language. The familiarity between whites and blacks made her indignant. She described the soldiers and officers as “a crowd of drunken, low, filthy soldiers and officers.” “I put the officers last as the soldiers were much more respectable. Their conversation, evidently to insult me, was of the basest and foullest character.” She lived at first in a railroad boxcar, then in the former post office. Her letters were inspected by Union soldiers and were dated “From my Palace on the lake of Como.” They were, her daughter recalled, “more for General Butlers edification than loving messages home.”[42]

Eugenia and Phebe subsisted on beans, spoiled beef, and such food as her husband was allowed to send her, drinking saltwater made drinkable by filtering it through sand. “Entire hogshead of ice melting,” she recalled, “but none for the vile Rebels.” There was no place to wash. Eugenia suffered from brain fever, which was undoubtedly nervous exhaustion. She was at times very ill and even delirious. At one point, Phebe’s health also broke down. Every week, General Butier inquired after Mrs. Phillips’s health, hoping she would beg for mercy, a weakness she considered to be a stain on her reputation. Her family and friends wrote her often and sent her packages and books. “Send me some of Dickens’ works,” she wrote. “I don’t care which, as I find something original whenever I read them over.” She wrote copious letters. In one touching letter to her youngest children, Mrs. Phillips wrote, “You must all be satisfied with this and believe that Dear Mother never allows a day to pass without thinking of all her … little ones, and a night to arrive without praying to God to keep you all well and make good, obedient children of you all.”[43]

The civilian population of the South, generally, and New Orleans, in particular, was outraged at Butier’s treatment of Eugenia Phillips. Mary Chesnut wrote: “Mrs. Phillips, another beautiful and clever Jewess, has been put in prison again by Beast Butler, for laughing as a Yankee funeral procession went by.”[44] Newspapers all over the country were filled with particulars of her suffering. Amanda Levy wrote her, “Future historians will vie with each other for the honor of writing your biography.” She reported that loyal citizens of New Orleans made pilgrimages to the Phillips home and that sympathy for her was “widespread and real.” Clara Solomon was infuriated that Mrs. Phillips, "Beauty's Ma," had been mistreated. "This is one of the outrages of But[ler]… and what anyway could a woman's taunts do to them!"[45]

Mrs. Phillips's father, Mr. Levy, referred to Butler as a "Vile beast, imprisoning her body & seeking to destroy her moral character." Her husband concluded years later, "If the imprudence of my wife brought on her these difficulties she endured the consequences of them with a heroic spirit that could not be excelled."[46] William Garrett noted that "her proud Southern spirit never quailed, and she remained firm to the last in the opinions she had expressed." The newspapers at the time were filled with the story and with comments on the harsh proceedings against Mrs. Phillips. She became quite a heroine, Garrett recalled, "and to this day [1872] is remembered with admiration by all generous minds, as one of the first victims which rendered a certain administration in New Orleans immortal for—eccentricity."[47]

How Mrs. Phillips came to be released from Ship Island after three and a half months is not known. Her daughter Caroline Myers believed that Reverdy Johnson, the family friend who came to her aid in Washington, intervened on her behalf while he was in New Orleans investigating Butler for the U.S. government.[48] As she emerged from her prison at the end of September, the Union officer in charge, Lt. Col. Charles Ruff, attempted to make amends. Mrs. Phillips was furious at this belated apology and replied: "Sir, do not imagine that my conduct during my imprisonment had for its guide any other motive than a holy and sacred respect for the cause for which I have suffered. To the women of the South I look for approval, while my own self-respect sustained me thro' all your persecutions. I cannot accept your tardy sympathy. I only hope God will forgive you for all you have done to me."[49]

Eugenia and Phebe arrived in New Orleans early in the morning and reached the Phillips home to find that her family, "true to Yankee cruelty," had been kept in ignorance of her release. "Immediately I was embraced, kissed, cried over, while Mr. Phillips, stunned by the news, not knowing whether I was dead or alive, remained in his room, overwhelmed and alarmed. I rushed upstairs. When he saw me, tears came to his release and the reaction was painful to witness."[50]

After Eugenia had been released by General Butler, her eldest son, Clavius, a Confederate soldier, wrote his mother, "I could not imagine a human being calling himself a man, could resort to so harsh treatment upon a lady. Your heart must gladden with the idea of being once more in the land of safety, where you can express your thought freely without fear of being condemned to prison. If anyone has occasion to entertain eternal enmity to the whole Yankee nation, it is our family, and I hope the time is not far distant when I may have an opportunity to avenge the insults you have undergone."[51]

Mrs. Phillips remained an unreconstructed rebel. After her release, she and her husband were summoned to take the loyalty oath or declare themselves enemies of the United States. They refused to take the oath, preferring to flee from New Orleans to LaGrange, Georgia, where they settled for the duration of the war. They stopped on the way in Mobile, where Eugenia received an ovation from the leaders of society.[52] Once in LaGrange with several other refugee families, they formed "a pleasant social circle which served to wile away the time." The men had their card club, and the ladies, musical parties. Of course, the Phillipses, like all parents with children in time of war, worried about their sons.[53]

Clavius Phillips, Eugenia and Philip's eldest child, enlisted with his cousin Octavus S. Cohen in Gallie's (Savannah Artillery) Company of the 1st (Olmstead's) Georgia on May 31, 1861, as a corporal. He was described as five feet eight inches tall, with blue eyes, brown hair, and a dark complexion. He then served in the Chatham Artillery and was detailed on special service in the Quartermaster Department of Georgia State Service. By September 1862, the twenty-four-year-old Clavius was "occupying his time in the culture of a… pair of Russian whiskers: a kind of cross between a civil and military beard," his Uncle Yates Levy wrote.[54] Clavius served with this artillery unit, now known as Weaton's Battery, near Savannah until July 1863. He had been detailed to the Engineering Department in Savannah in March and by August 1864 was transferred to that department. Clavius was anxious to defend his native city and undoubtedly was involved in the works defending Savannah. In January 1864, Phillips and a comrade sent a letter through military channels to the secretary of war seeking authorization "to raise a Company of heavy artillery" from the men serving in the Georgia State Guards and others whose terms were about to expire. The idea was approved by Maj. Gen. Jeremy F. Gilmer, but nothing came of it. In November 1864, young Phillips was serving as first sergeant of Company E, 2d Regiment Engineer Troops, in the Confederate army. He was promoted to second lieutenant in March 1865 and was paroled with his unit at Chester, South Carolina, on May 5, 1865.[55]

Another son, Eugene Phillips, served as a cadet in the Confederate navy. He was in Richmond at the same time as his aunt Phoebe Pember and was assigned to the Patrick Henry, a training vessel anchored in the James River, fourteen miles from the city, opposite Drewey's Bluff. In Richmond he had the luxury of having his laundry done by his aunt Phoebe. Yet another son, John Walker, while only about fifteen years of age, served in battle.[56]

Eugenia's family moved about during the war. A July 1862 letter from her father, Jacob Clavius Levy, finds Emma and Martha in Greenville, South Carolina; Henrietta and grandson Clavius Phillips in Savannah; Lina Phillips in New Orleans; and the elder Levys in Marietta.[57] Things were not well in Marietta. "The privations and endurance," Mr. Levy wrote, "felt around here made us no exception for we are at present cut off from the means formerly relied on." The letter also relates that the Levys, like many elderly Southerners, left their home in Savannah in the possession of their servants and Clavius, their young grandson, "sleeping there." Henrietta's only son, Octavus Cohen, was serving as an aide to a general and was "under fire on James Island, So.Ca." This was a reference to the Battle of Secessionville on James Island across the Ashley River from Charleston. Jacob and Fanny Levy, it appears, remained firm in their Jewish faith. Jacob's letter closes with this allusion to the Scriptures, "Trusting that the time is not far distant when each may sit under his own fig tree with none to make him afraid."[58]

Mr. Phillips resumed the practice of law. He went to Mobile on one occasion and argued the question of the power of the Confederate government to tax the bonds of the Confederate states before a Confederate judge. (He argued that the Confederate government had no such power and the court agreed with him.)[59] In another case, he represented English owners of three steamers seized by the Confederate government. He successfully argued for their release. During one business trip to Richmond, it was apparent to Phillips that the Confederacy would soon collapse. He recalled, "The treasury was empty, the army worn out, the Confederate commissioners were dispirited. I saw the end approaching with rapidity, as I had long anticipated. I did not therefore, tarry. My journey homeward was embarrassed by the movements of the armies. [Confederate Vice President] Alexander H. Stephens traveled with me, and owing to his ill health, we only journeyed in the daytime.… We finally arrived at Washington, Georgia, where I left Mr. Stephens at the residence of Mr. [Robert A.] Toombs."[60]

Lee surrendered in April 1865. On May 10, 1865, Philip Phillips was at the depot in LaGrange waiting for the train from Atlanta. There he read a reward notice that Federal officials offered $100,000 for the apprehension of Jefferson Davis, Clement Clay, and others on the charge of being accomplices in the assassination of Abraham Lincoln. Phillips, a friend of the Clays, noticed that Mrs. Clay was at the depot at that moment. He immediately took her aside and told her of the accusation. "The distress of this good woman," Phillips recalled, "was painful to behold." Clay was innocent of any wrongdoing, and Phillips advised him to surrender to the appropriate Federal officials. Clay immediately wrote to Gen. James H. Wilson in command at Macon, Georgia, offering to turn himself in. Phillips delivered the letter himself.[61]

The Phillips family had endured a scare as the war was coming to an end. A cavalry force of fewer than three thousand Federal troops attacked West Point, Georgia, on April 16, 1865. They burned the depots, a tannery, a gristmill, and a large quantity of railroad rolling stock and engines, and looted the citizens. The Union troops were held off for about eight hours by a ragtag command of boys, old men, convalescents from the hospital, and citizens who fought from a substantial but little fort constructed about eighteen months before. Among the captives after the battle was the Phillips's son, John, a member of the home guard. The anxious parents were relieved to receive a message from a Union colonel that John was safe but that he could not obtain a parole for ten days. The colonel added that "the boys had displayed the utmost gallantry." After ten days, John reached home, a richer if not wiser youth, the owner of the mule upon which he rode.[62]

"A few days subsequendy," Phillips wrote in his understated way, "we learned the surrender of Lee's Army. This terminated a struggle in which the South lost all but honor. So far as the loss of property in slaves was involved, I regard it as the greatest blessing."[63]

* * *

The war began with a great deal less fanfare for Eugenia's younger sister, Phoebe Yates Pember. A widow, Phoebe had refugeed with her parents, Jacob and Fanny Levy, to Marietta, Georgia. But she was about to embark on the adventure of a lifetime.

In 1856 Phoebe Levy, age thirty-three, married Thomas Pember, a Christian. He was two years her junior. They removed to Boston, Massachusetts. Her letters and memoirs indicate that she was well educated. She likely had private tutors and may have attended a Northern finishing school like other daughters of her social class. Shortly after their marriage, Thomas Pember contracted tuberculosis and the couple moved South. He died in Aiken, South Carolina, in July of 1861 at the age of thirty-six.[64]

At age thirty-eight, Phoebe was unhappy living in Marietta. "You know," she wrote to Eugenia, "how unpleasantly I have been situated at Papa's house…. I see no chance of bettering my position while here." There were obviously some serious divisions in the Levy family, for she also wrote Eugenia that she thanked God "every night for the courage He gave me to leave those who never cared for me and I believe disliked me for the gifts [presumably, her ability to write] He had given me."[65]

One of Phoebe Pember's acquaintances was Mrs. George Randolph (whose husband served as Confederate secretary of war for eight months in 1862), according to Pember, "Foremost among Virginia women." Mrs. Randolph had been active in caring for the sick and wounded in wartime Richmond and convinced Mrs. Pember to come to Richmond and accept a position at the hospital—“rather a startling proposition to a woman used to all the comforts of luxurious life.” She could hardly deny the importuning of such a lady, particularly when told of the need for “a good and determined woman’s rule.” She was appointed as matron of one of the divisions of Chimborazo Hospital in Richmond. The role of women in the medical profession and as nurses was just emerging at the time of the Civil War, and it was novel that a woman of Phoebe Pember’s social standing would be involved in hospital management. Many thought, she wrote, that “such a life would be injurious to the delicacy and refinement of a lady.” She was to become the first female administrator appointed at Chimborazo.[66]

Mrs. Pember arrived in Richmond in December 1862. She came to serve the Confederate cause in which she believed, although not quite as noisily as her fiery older sister, Eugenia. Writing years later about the women of the South, she described herself when she said the women felt “a passion of interest in every man in the gray uniform of the Confederate service; they were doubly anxious to give comfort and assistance to the sick and wounded.” She began her service at Chimborazo Hospital, a sprawling series of buildings on a high hill outside of Richmond. It was to become one of the largest hospitals in the world before the Civil War ended, housing 150 wards and treating a total of 76,000 patients. Needless to say, being a woman she encountered opposition: “one of them had come,” a male surgeon told a friend in a tone of ill-concealed disgust on her first day.[67]

On her arrival in Richmond, she had no place to live and was forced to reside at the hospital. For a time, she lived with her friends the Randolphs, and at the home of her close friends Col. Jeremy F. and Louisa (“Lou”) Gilmer. She also kept a room on Church Hill a while and boarded with the Skinner family for a time. This, of course, necessitated her making arrangements to travel back and forth to the hospital by a horse-drawn “ambulance.”[68]

Chimborazo Hospital, located on Chimborazo Hill some distance from the city. This Confederate hospital, where Phoebe Pember worked, became the largest in the world during the war. (Courtesy of National Archives.)

Pember went to work for the surgeon-in-charge, Dr. James B. McCaw, and had to contend with a bureaucracy consisting of surgeons and doctors, most well-meaning but many corrupt, who knew little medicine; male nurses who were nothing more than convalescing soldiers; stewards, slaves, clerks, commissaries, quartermasters, apothecaries, baggage-masters, wagon-masters, forage-masters, cooks, carpenters, shoemakers, ambulance-drivers; "and many more forgotten hangers-on," including malingerers whom the soldiers called "hospital rats." Medical care was poor by modern standards. The huge hospital could house 8,000 patients. It was self-sufficient in some ways, containing its own dairy, bakery, brewery, ice houses, soap factory, farm, and herd of livestock.[69]

Not knowing exactly what was required of her, and on being told she was to tend to the diet of some six hundred men, her "mind could hardly grope through the darkness that clouded it, as to what were my special duties but one mental spectrum always presented itself—chicken soup." She ordered the chickens and, for the first time in her life, killed the live birds and made the soup, which was a success. "Nature may not have intended me for a Florence Nightingale, but a kitchen proved my worth."[70]

Mrs. Pember went from organizing a proper diet for her patients to trying to control the dispensing of whiskey, the chief painkiller available in wartime Richmond. Confederate law provided that liquor and other luxuries used in hospitals be entrusted to the matrons. (Ladies, presumably, were less likely to drink alcohol and steal luxuries.) When she tried to take over the control of the whiskey barrels, Mrs. Pember was thwarted at every turn by those in authority, including the surgeon-in-charge. At one point, she went around the hospital with a printed copy of the law in her hand and demanded the whiskey. "So, the printed law being at hand for reference, I nailed my colors to the mast, and that evening all the liquor was in my pantry and the key in my pocket." She kept up a running battle trying to prevent the pilferage and stealing of coffee, meats, and foods of all kind in a city where inflation was horrendous and supplies could not be had at times even for those who could afford to pay inflated prices. People begged her for supplies, but she protected "every pound of coffee, every ounce of whisky, bushel of flour or vegetables."[71] "Hers was a will of steel," DeLeon recalled, "under a suave refinement, and her pretty, almost Creole accent covered the power to ring in defi on occasion. The friction of these attributes against bumptiousness, or young authority, made the hospital the field of many 'fusses' and more fun."[72]

The care of the wounded, of course, was her primary responsibility. She immersed herself in the daily routine of caring for wounded and dying men. By January 1863 she wrote Eugenia, "I sometimes wonder if I am the same person who was afraid to look at a dead person, for I have no timidity and hardly any sensibility left." She was involved in all hospital activities, from dressing wounds to writing letters home for the poor and illiterate common soldiers who made up the great bulk of the Chimborazo population. On one occasion, she finished writing a letter for an upcountry Georgian who had a "lean, yellow, attenuated" look with very long hair and fingernails like claws. The soldier turned to her and asked if she were married. "I am not. At least, I am a widow," she replied. "He rose higher in bed," she later recalled. "He pushed away desperately the tangled hay on his brow. A faint color fluttered over the hollow cheek, and stretching out a long piece of bone with a talon attached, he gently touched my arm and with constrained voice whispered mysteriously: 'You wait!' And readers, I am waiting still," she wrote years later.[73]

There was precious little humor in Phoebe Pember's daily life. Scenes of pathos occurred daily, "scenes," she wrote, "that wrung the heart and forced the dew of pity from the eyes; but feeling that enervated the mind and relaxed the body was a sentimental luxury that was not to be indulged in. There was too much work to be done." In her memoir, A Southern Woman's Story, published in 1879, Mrs. Pember relates one especially moving incident about a young Confederate soldier named Fisher.

Mrs. Pember was awakened by a nurse one very cold night in 1863 and told that something was wrong with a favorite patient of hers named Fisher. A doctor was summoned, and she hurried to the scene where the young man—he was about twenty—lay wounded. With a great deal of "hard nursing, good food and plenty of stimulant," he had had a “fair chance for recovery.” A contraption had been rigged up to try and hold the bones of his broken leg together, but he had suffered a severe wound and now it appeared that the sharp edge of a splintered bone had severed his artery. Fisher “had remained,” Mrs. Pember recalled, “through all his trials, stout, fresh, and hearty, interesting in appearance, and so gentlemannered and uncomplaining that we all loved him.” But Fisher was now bleeding, and

> I instantly put my finger on the little orifice and awaited the surgeon. He soon came—took a long look and shook his head. The explanation was easy; the artery was imbedded in the fleshy part of the thigh and could not be taken up. No earthly power could save him. There was no object in detaining Dr. —. He required his time and strength, and long I sat by the boy, unconscious himself that any serious trouble was apprehended. The hardest trial of my duty was laid upon me; the necessity of telling a man in the prime of his life, and fullness of strength that there was no hope for him.
>
> It was done at last, and the verdict received patiently and courageously, some directions given by which his mother would be informed of his death, and then he turned his questioning eyes upon my face. “How long can I live?” “Only as long as I keep my finger upon this artery.” A pause ensued. God alone knew what thoughts hurried through that heart and brain, called so unexpectedly from all earthly hopes and ties. He broke the silence at last. “You can let go—” But I could not. Not if my own life had trembled in the balance. Hot tears rushed to my eyes, a surging sound to my ears, and a deathly coldness to my lips. The pang of obeying him was spared me, and for the first and last time during the trials that surrounded me for four years, I fainted away.[74]

Mrs. Pember does not discuss her religion in A Southern Woman’s Story, but, like most nineteenth-century writers relating their memories of the Civil War or even in routine letters, she makes frequent references to the Bible and to God. In a letter to her sister she wrote: “If as I was told the children of these men [her patients] will ‘rise up and call me blessed’ I shall have many blessings.”[75] This, of course, is a reference, common in Jewish conversation and worship, to Proverbs 31 (“A woman of valour who can find? / For her price is far above rubies,” 31:10-31), an ideal to which Jewish women should aspire. When once she comforted a dying soldier, she knew he would die. “What comfort could I give,” she recalled. “Only silently open the Bible, and read to him without comment the ever-living promises of his Maker. Glimpses too of that abode where the ‘weary are at rest.’”[76] In a letter to her sister Eugenia, however, she relates a conversation she participated in as follows:

> The feelings here against the Yankees exceeds anything I could imagine, particularly among the good Christians. I spent an evening among a particularly pious set. One lady said she had a pile of Yankee bones lying around her pump so that the first glance on evening her eyes would rest upon them. Another begged me to get her a Yankee Skull to keep her toilet trinkets in. All had something of the kind to say—at last I lifted my voice and congratulated myself at being born of a nation, and religion that did not enjoin forgiveness on its enemies, that enjoyed the blessed privilege of praying for an eye for an eye, and a life for a life, and was not one of those for whom Christ died in vain, considering the present state of feelings. I proposed that till the war was over they should all join the Jewish Church, let forgiveness and peace and good will alone and put their trust in the sword of the Lord and Gideon. It was a very agreeable evening, and all was taken in good part. I certainly had the best of the argument, and the gentlemen seconded me ably.[77]

This letter demonstrates that Mrs. Pember considered herself to be Jewish and that her friends saw her as Jewish, although there is no mention in either her published memoir or her Civil War era letters of her attending a synagogue or celebrating Jewish holidays. Of course, given her social position and acculturated background, she may well have felt out of place among the Jewish population of Richmond, most of whom were immigrants or, unlike her family, descended from recent German immigrants. She did not become a Christian. She certainly had no fear of expressing herself on the subject of the differences between Jews and Christians. Her letters show a woman quick to rise to the defense of the Jewish people.[78] In a letter to Lou Gilmer, one of her closest friends, she refers in a light-hearted way to her friend and co-religionist Thomas Cooper DeLeon's discussion of marriage with Miss Truxey Johnson's father. "Papa questioned him on his belief in the Trinity and he not responding reasonably according to Mr. Johnson's belief the old gentleman objected. It will be a new feature introduced in love affairs if the final 'parient' [sic] puts the lover through the catechism."[79]

Mrs. Pember's life in Richmond was not entirely dominated by her hospital duties. She had an active social life outside of Chimborazo. Indeed, her reasons for going to Richmond were to escape some unpleasantness in her family situation in Marietta and to enjoy the hospital with "half a dozen ladies who would be companionable perhaps."[80] (It certainly was not to find a man. She rejected service at another hospital because a male friend, Dr. Foster, was "very pleasant, handsome and intelligent, and as we would be comparatively alone and eat together, that would not do."[81]) Even though it appears that she lived at Chimborazo much of the time, Mrs. Pember had many close female friends in Richmond whom she remembered very affectionately. She not only attended but gave parties at the large hospital grounds. "I had quite a party here," she wrote Eugenia, "some of the prettiest girls in Richmond…. They all came at six o'clock, eat strawberries and ice cream, walked all around the Bluff and at eleven were driven home by their respective cavaliers.” She participated in charades, which was a common form of entertainment.[82]

Mrs. Pember also socialized with Mary Chesnut, who recounts in her diary in January 1864 a charade with Frank Vizetelly, war correspondent for the Illustrated London News, and Mrs. Pember. “Mr. Vizetelly and Mrs. Pember were fun enough for one day. His part is to dandle and stifle the cries of a screaming baby while the strong-minded mother writes and dashes aside sheet after sheet of MSS…. Next day, they were all hoarse. When Mr. Vizetelly had exhausted all known methods of quieting an infant (in vain), his despair was comic. He threw the baby on a chair and sat on it.”[83]

Life in Confederate Richmond had its dismal moments later, but before Gettysburg, in July 1863, Mrs. Pember had no hesitation in inviting her young niece, Fanny Phillips, Eugenia’s daughter, to “come up during the fall and spend a couple of months with me. If she would come as my assistant I could send her a transportation ticket. All the girls here are in the different departments they make a frolic of it.” She even offered to find “a sweetheart for her, though I am not much of a matchmaker.” The beau she had in mind was a nephew of Robert E. Lee’s, one of the well-known Virginia Carters of Shirley Plantation fame.[84]

After Gettysburg, life was not as cheerful. Mrs. Pember related in a September 1863 letter that she went to town to pay a visit, and “a gentleman stopping to hand me out of an awkward ambulance proved to be Gen. Lee. He looked much older and greatly worn.”[85] By the summer of 1864, the situation in Richmond was bleak. Privations had to be endured, Mrs. Pember recalled, “which tried body and soul.” Money was worthless. Theft was rampant. The railroads were cut off so often that the supplies for Chimborazo spoiled. What little food there was had to be carefully rationed: “it was almost ludicrous to see with what painful solicitude Miss G. [Mrs. Pember’s assistant] and myself would count the rolls, or hold a council over the pans of corn-bread.” The staff and the patients were grateful for the simplest fare and the coarsest clothing. Of course, Richmond was also under siege, and day after day, night after night, its residents heard the sounds of cannon, alarm bells, and the firing of arms.[86]

After a major exchange of prisoners, Mrs. Pember found herself comforting Confederates recently held as prisoners. Many had been starved to the point of death. One such prisoner was Richard Hammond Key, grandson of the composer of the “Star Spangled Banner.” He asked Mrs. Pember to bury him in a grave apart from the crowd “in some spot where those who knew and cared for him might find him some day.” The next day, with the enemy in sight of Richmond, Key died. The matron who befriended him had a coffin built, took the body to Hollywood cemetery herself, purchased a lot, and had a clergyman perform the burial service in the pouring rain.[87]

The winter of 1864 saw the beginning of the end of the Confederacy. Troops moved incessantly and rations were scarce. Government departments closed, and rumors abounded. Yet the city's social life was "unusually gay." Mrs. Pember and others realized the end was near. "Wise and thoughtful men disapproved openly of this mad gayety," she recalled. But Southerners always loved a party, and Mrs. Pember wrote, "If Spartan austerity is to win our independence, we are a lost nation." She was a careful observer of the people around her and wrote to her friend Lou Gilmer that people were not behaving very well, as "many young ladies are enjoying single blessedness with the painful accompanyments of married life." She learned in early March that Richmond would be evacuated but was sworn to secrecy. What would she do? Flee with the government and prominent Richmonders or stay at her post?[88]

She decided to stay. "My mind had been very unsettled as to my course of action in view of the impending crash, but my duty prompted me to remain with my sick, on the ground that no general ever deserts his troops." Richmond was evacuated and most, if not all, of Mrs. Pember's friends fled. The Confederate government and the military left, and those who stayed did not know what to expect from the invading Union army. Mrs. Pember stayed at Chimborazo even after all the male nurses went off to join Lee's army and the slave cooks ran away. She watched from the hill, where Chimborazo stood the turmoil and confusion of the evacuation, the fires set by the retreating Confederates, the destruction of bridges and boats, and the crowds of people leaving the old capital. Even many of the sick and lame left rather than face Yankee imprisonment. Before the hospital was taken over by Federal authorities, Mrs. Pember was set upon by some of the former malingerers, the "hospital rats" who tried to steal the whiskey left behind. An armed little matron met them, however. "Wilson," she told one, "you have been in this hospital a long time. Do you think from what you know of me that the whiskey can be taken without my consent?" When told there was now no one to protect her and to move away, Mrs. Pember responded by cocking a small pistol she had hidden in her pocket. That "sharp click, a sound so significant and so different from any other, struck upon his ear, and sent him back amidst his friends, pale and shaken…. 'You had better leave,' I said … 'for if one bullet is lost, there are five more ready, and the room is too small for even a woman to miss six times." The rats left.[89]

Eventually the Union army arrived. Mrs. Pember, although having no official position and liable to arrest or imprisonment, insisted on staying through the transition and caring for those Confederate soldiers who could not escape. Putting on her finest outfit to go meet the Union commander, she demanded to know whether she would be able to use her stores to feed her patients or whether the Yankees intended to "starve their captured sick.” The two former enemies resolved their immediate problem, and the Union officer attempted to make pleasant conversation. He regretted “the present state of scarcity, for he could see in the pale faces and pinched features of the Richmond women, how much they had suffered during the war.” While the officer may not have intended an insult, Mrs. Pember, now sounding more like her older sister, Eugenia, replied, “If my features were pinched, and my face pale, it was not caused by privations under the Confederacy, but the anguish consequent upon our failure.”[90]

Phoebe Pember stayed on at Chimborazo until her sick and wounded soldiers were removed to another hospital, where she went to nurse them. She stayed on there until “all the sick were either convalescent or dead, and at last my vocation was gone.”[91]

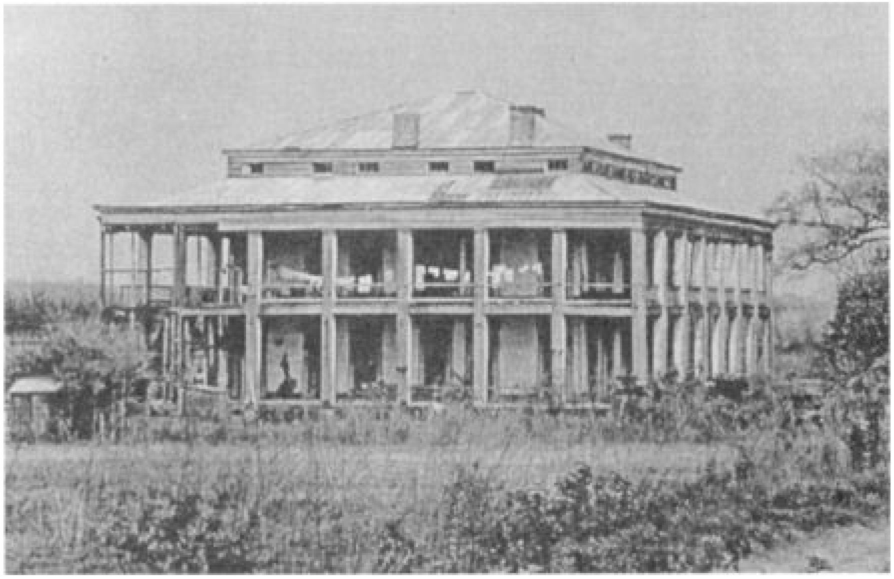
PART 4

In Our Unhappy Land

THE END OF AN ERA

"… future historians … will … attest the patriotism of the soldiers of the Lost Cause, who sacrificed all but honor in its defense, and who sought to preserve that honor alone from the dark wreck and ruin which followed their defeat."

—Senator Benjamin Franklin Jonas, address at the laying of the cornerstone of the monument to the memory of the Confederate dead at Baton Rouge, February 22, 1886



Belle Chasse in dilapidation. (Courtesy ofJacob Rader Marcus Center, American Jewish Archives, Cincinnati, Ohio.)

CHAPTER 7

★

Lead Out the Pageant: Sad and Slow

“ATLANTA HAS FALLEN! & lucky are you that you removed your family when you did,” Maj. Isaac Scherck, an assistant chief commissary on Gen. John Bell Hood’s staff wrote his friend J. L. Meyer in Columbus in September 1864. “Genl Sherman the fiend in human form, issues an order for all Men, Women & Children, White and Black to leave Atlanta.” Scherck was not ready to surrender even though he and his men were living in the woods “like hogs.” Civilization, he thought, was collapsing before his eyes. ‘When enlightened millions of souls [in the South], raised & educated in freedom of speech & action have tamely to submit to such outrages—Liberty is gone indeed.” The Jewish Confederates, like Scherck, fought on.[1] But Jewish Atlantans, many of whom had come to the city from Savannah and Charleston to escape the Union army, were forced from their homes. The David Mayer family, for example, had lived in a cellar covered with cotton bales for three weeks while Sherman’s cannons shelled their city. During his family’s escape from the city, Mayer was forced to leave his wife and children to find a ferry to cross a river. He gave his ten-year-old son a pistol and told him to look out for his mother and sisters.[2] Jewish Georgians long remembered Gen. William Tecumseh Sherman.

Sherman’s famous March to the Sea ended on December 22, 1864, at Savannah. “I beg to present you as a Christmas gift,” the general’s famous telegram to Lincoln read, “the City of Savannah.” The Jews of Savannah, having celebrated a rather ironic Hanukkah—a holiday commemorating a brave band of Jewish warriors’ triumph over an occupying army—with the enemy literally at their gates weeks before, waited for the inevitable. There would be no miracle this time. Fanny Cohen, the twenty-four-year-old daughter of Octavus and Henrietta Cohen, detested the invader. She called them vandals, brutes, and Goths. “If we are conquered,” she wrote in her diary, “I see no reason why we should receive our enemies as our friends and I never shall do it as long as I live.” Her father was very concerned that Fanny’s open hatred of the Yankees would get her in trouble. When she saw a family friend who was a Confederate surgeon left behind with his patients, it “was the first pleasurable moment” she had had. “I had been so surrounded by blue coats that the sight of our gray uniforms made me happy.” She forced herself to be polite to the union officers who called. “I was obliged to receive [Captain Poe] and never was so embarrassed in my life," she wrote. "My hatred for the Army in which he was an officer and my desire to be polite made me almost speechless—the contending feelings were more than I could control."[3]

The Cohens were told that their home on Lafayette Square was being taken by the army for officers' housing. When Mr. Cohen complained that there were ladies in the house and that it would be exceedingly inconvenient for them to move, the response was: "Well! I suppose it will inconvenience you but you know you Rebs will fight and when you are conquered you must submit to what ever will contribute to our comfort." Mr. Cohen was extremely upset at having his family threatened in this fashion. "I have never seen a man so annoyed and unnerved as my Father is," Fanny confided to her diary. Mrs. Cohen was sick, her illness brought on, Fanny supposed, by "worry and excitement." Somehow Cohen convinced the Union authorities to take an empty house across the street with the promise of allowing the army to keep their horses in the Cohen stable. Soon, however, the Cohens were required to house Brig. Gen. William Babcock Hazen, one of Sherman's top lieutenants.[4]

The Octavus Cohen house, Abercorn Street, Savannah. The Cohen house in Lafayette Square was commandeered by the Union Army after Sherman captured the city in December 1864. Fanny Cohen railed against the "vandals" and "Goths" who intruded on the Cohen family. The house was demolished in the twentieth century, and a condominium stands there now. (Courtesy of the Georgia Historical Society, Savannah.)

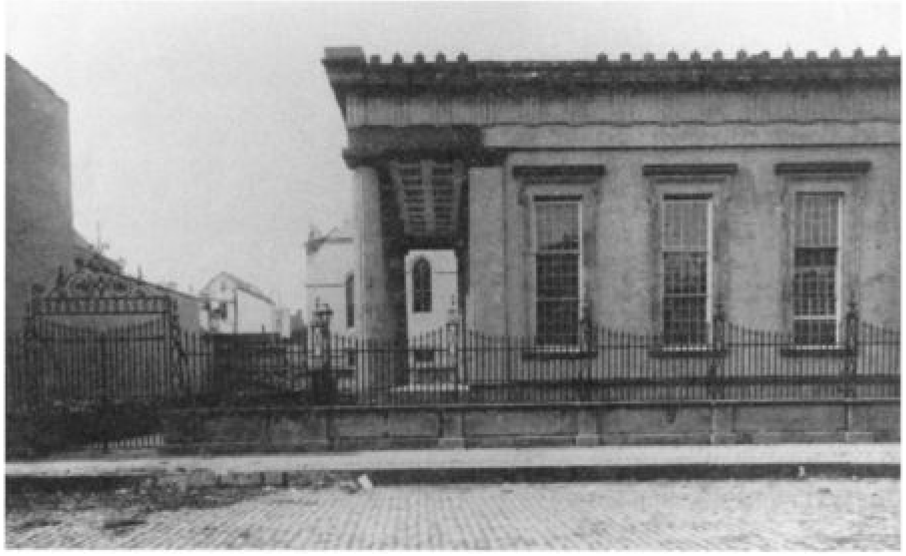
On December 25, Fanny wrote in her diary, “This is the saddest Christmas that I have ever spent and my only pleasure during the day has been in looking forward to spending my next Christmas in the Confederacy.” The whole Levy and Cohen extended family was despondent. Jacob and Fanny Levy, now back in Savannah, were sick and “very much dispirited.” Things had not improved by January 1, when Fanny wrote, “How sad this beginning of the year to us surrounded by our enemies without any prospects of seeing our friends.”[5]

From Savannah, Sherman marched into South Carolina, keeping the Confederates in doubt as to his real objective. “Charleston,” Sherman told Grant, was “now a mere desolated wreck,” and the conqueror of Georgia turned his army inland and headed for Columbia, South Carolina’s capital. “I look upon Columbia as quite as bad as Charleston,” Sherman wrote Maj. Gen. Henry Halleck on December 24, “and I doubt if we shall spare the public buildings there as we did at Milledgeville [Georgia].” Charleston’s supply lines having been cut by Sherman’s army, the Confederate army evacuated the city on February 17, 1865. Charleston surrendered the next day.[6]

Charleston was a defeated city. “A city of ruins, of desolation, of vacant houses, of widowed women, of rotting wharves, of deserted warehouses, of weed-wild gardens, of miles of grass-grown streets, of acres of pitiful and voiceful barrenness—that is Charleston,” Sidney Andrews, a reporter for the Boston Advertiser, wrote. “The splendid houses are all deserted,” another visitor noted, “the glass in the windows broken, the walk dilapidated, the columns toppled over.” The description undoubtedly applied to M. C. Mordecai’s grand mansion on Meeting Street, a few blocks from the Battery, and to the city’s synagogues and many Jewish homes and businesses.[7] Sixteen-year-old Lee Cohen, Isaac Harby’s granddaughter, watched the evacuation of Charleston. Cotton was burned in a public square; rice was set on fire. “As the day wore on,” she recalled, “explosions were heard on every side; the gunboats ‘Charleston’ and ‘Chicora’ were blown up at the wharves; the ‘big gun’ at the corner of South and East Battery was exploded…. Fires started everywhere … the city was helpless and expecting its foe…. It was a terrible, heartbreaking awful night.” Late on the night of the seventeenth, Lee watched the firing of the Palmetto State, a gunboat built with contributions from the ladies of Charleston. “Women who had worked and striven and contributed to its building stood at their windows and viewed the flames,” she later recalled, “and lo! As the last detonation sounded, the smoke arose, and upon the red glare of the heavens, formed a palmetto tree, perfect and fair, that stood out against the sky, then wavered and broke apart as we watched it through our tears.” The next day, she went to Meeting Street near Ann Street to see the last of the Confederate soldiers evacuate Charleston. “Yet, even then,” she recalled, “some laughed and jested, for, God pity us, we were hopeful still, and they were brave, and we could not think that the end had really come.” The New York Herald reported on March 25, 1865, that the “Hebrew congregation of Charleston sustained a heavy loss in the destruction of their splendid organ, the five Books of Moses, and other valuables. It is a noteworthy fact that not an Israelite left with the Yankees.”[8]



K. K. Beth Elohim in 1886. This photograph was taken twenty-one years after the war ended, and following the Charleston earthquake. It is the oldest known photograph of the temple. (Courtesy of K. K. Beth Elohim Archive, Charleston, South Carolina.)

Charlestonians believed that Sherman’s army would destroy Charleston, and they sent their valuables to Columbia for safekeeping. The trustees of Beth Elohim packed up its Torahs, chandelier, and other valuables and sent them to the capital. Now Sherman’s army was in Columbia.[9]

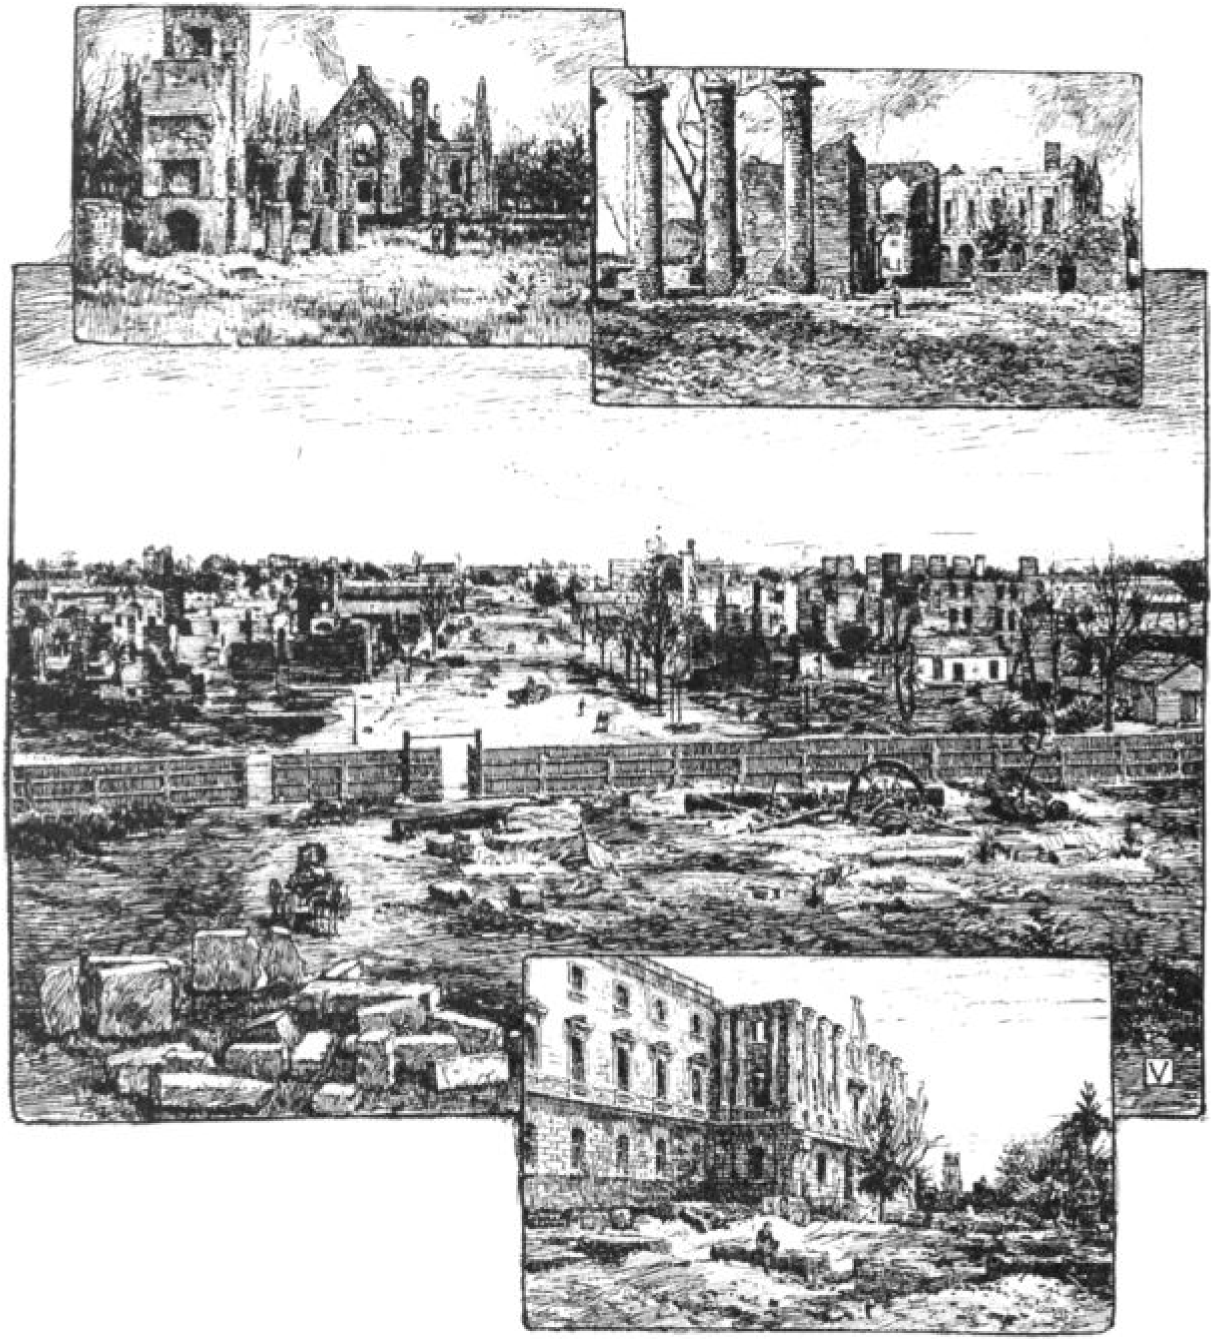
Eleanor Cohen was twenty-six years old when Sherman’s troops arrived in Columbia. The daughter of Dr. Philip Melvin Cohen and Cordelia Moise Cohen, Eleanor could trace her ancestry back to the founders of the Moise clan in South Carolina, Abraham and Sarah Moise, who escaped from Haiti (Santo Domingo) in 1791 in the midst of the slave insurrection. Seventy-five years later, in 1865, another Moise found herself in the middle of the collapse of the old regime and the end of another slave society.

Small, dark-complexioned, pretty, with black eyes and “a grand figure,” Eleanor also described herself as quick-tempered and intelligent. She was to have been married in April, but her intended, Benjamin Mendes Seixas, was forced to leave Columbia on February 7 and had not returned when the city was shelled by Union troops. “Oh! God, can I ever forget that day," Eleanor wrote in her diary, "Can time with Lethean draughts ever efface from my memory the deep sorrow, the humiliation, the agony of knowing we were to be under the Yankees, that our beloved flag was to be pulled down and the U.S.A. flag wave over the city." Eleanor recorded in her diary the Union army's arrival in Columbia, "the bands playing The Star Spangled Banner,' and the shouts of the soldiers filled the air."[10]

Eleanor H. Cohen grew up in Charleston, the daughter of Dr. P. Melvin Cohen, a dentist. She and her family moved to Columbia during the war. The Cohens were living in Columbia when it was burned by Sherman's troops. (Courtesy of the Jacob Rader Marcus Center, American Jewish Archives, Cincinnati, Ohio.)

Columbia was badly damaged by both the Union troops and the retreating Confederate army. Main Street, according to Eleanor, "was a fearful sight." The stores were looted; lawless mobs roamed the streets. Then the fires started. The Cohens gathered in a room at the top of their home and watched as the fires grew. The flames were "leaping and dancing assisted by the wind … and the air was filled with torpedoes, shells, hand grenades and all the most cruel instruments of evil doers." The Cohens did not think the fire would reach them, but they were mistaken. Soon the burning inferno reached their neighborhood and they fled, taking only a change of clothes and leaving behind all of their possessions, the “letters of loved absent ones, pictures of our precious relations, tokens and souvenirs of childhood.”[11]

The destruction, angry mobs, and drunken Union soldiers that fearful night were terrifying to all who lived through it. Philip S. Jacobs was at home when three soldiers came into his home and demanded his watch. “They put a bayonet before my breast and pulled the watch and chain from my body.” Union soldiers also invaded the home of Moses Winstock on Assembly Street while the family was in the midst of their Sabbath dinner. They invited the soldiers to join them and learned, after dessert, that the soldiers planned to loot and torch their home! The Winstocks fled and were separated in the confusion. It took Moses Winstock three days to find his family.[12] Mordecai DeLeon’s library was, Edwin DeLeon recalled years later, “one of the holocausts offered up to the Union at the burning of Columbia.”[13] Rabbi Henry S. Jacobs, who like many Charlestonians who had come to Columbia to escape Sherman, found he had come to the wrong place. All of his possessions were destroyed in the fire. He and his family were “driven forth from our home to a park in the suburbs, where wrapped in blankets we passed Friday night [February 17], and nearly the whole [Sabbath]…. I lost everything in the world—clothing, furniture, books, manuscripts, provisions, even my canonicals and [prayer shawls]—every-thing except hope and confidence in our Heavenly Father.”[14]



Columbia, South Carolina, after being burned by Sherman's army, the retreating Confederate army, and others. (Battles and Leaders of the Civil War.)

The streets were crowded with Union soldiers, freed slaves, and fleeing Columbians. Eleanor Cohen recalled being taunted by the invaders with jeers: "How do you like secesh now?" and "curses too fearful to be entered in my book." The flames did not abate. Instead, they seemed to Eleanor "to encircle us like a belt and the heat was so great that our faces were scorched and blackened by smoke!" The Cohens went to the country with barely enough food for one day, but the drunken soldiers and the lawless conditions there convinced Dr. Cohen to return to the burned city. Back in town, the Cohens, like their fellow townspeople, wandered about homeless, without food or change of clothing. “In one night,” Eleanor wrote, “we were brought from comparative wealth and luxury to abject poverty.” Advised to go to the state asylum on Bull Street, the Cohens joined hundreds of other families there. Everyone was shocked and in a desperate condition. Old men and young women were weighted down with bundles. There was no water. The Cohens stayed five days without a bed to lie on and little to eat. “I never imagined,” Eleanor recalled, “I should be so near actual starvation.”[15] The day after the fire, Rabbi Jacobs rushed to the synagogue on Assembly Street, where he had stored the Torahs and other treasures from Charleston. He found the building burned to the ground. He rummaged through the debris only to find the remnant of a Torah and a single Torah bell, which he sent to Charleston “as Sacred Relics.”[16]

The Jews of Columbia, like all Southerners, were bitterly resentful of the occupying Union troops. “No words of mine,” Eleanor concluded, “can give any idea of the brutality of the ruffians; they swore, they cursed, plundered and committed every excess … oh my God, teach me to bear my burden.”[17] The Cohens next stayed at Eleanor’s uncle’s house, which had survived the fire. By March 7 the family was “comfortably fixed,” with twenty-three family members. Eleanor was doing nearly all of the housekeeping and waiting anxiously for word of her fiancé.

Moses Henry Nathan lost his home and took up residence in an abandoned school. He asked to “beg a great favor” of an associate “to let me have some meat, grist, and potatoes,” as “we are almost at the point of starvation here.” Jacob C. Lyons, the president of the gas company and a successful merchant, lost all he had, his home at Marion and Gervais destroyed.[18]

Despite their massive losses, Columbia Jewry rose to the occasion. On the Monday morning after the fire, local citizens met at the home of Elizabeth Lyons, Mayor Henry Lyons’s widow, as her property (the block bounded by Lady, Bull, Gervais, and Pickens) had escaped destruction. Lyons’s building housed the local relief effort, and Jewish leaders led the effort to bring in food and supplies. Moses Cohen Mordecai, the former state senator, came to Columbia to serve as its food administrator. Augusta, Georgia’s Jewish community, sent provisions and funds. The Daily Phoenix lauded “the handsome conduct of the Israelites of Columbia…. No people could have been more active in their efforts to assist the sufferers during the fire.”[19]

The Southern nation began to dissolve. Casualties were high in Lee’s army. Survivors deserted. The end was near. But some young Jewish Southerners did not give up. Marx Cohen Jr. of Charleston, whose grandfather had been a Polish immigrant but whose father was a successful landowner, enlisted in the cavalry early in the war. By 1864 he was apparently impatient to join the fray in Virginia, so he enlisted in an artillery company, Hart's battery, which served in Hampton's cavalry brigade. (The fieldpieces were drawn by six horses and the artillerist rode on his own mount, thereby increasing the speed of the unit.) Hart's battery had attracted a number of Jewish Charlestonians, and, at one time, five Cohens served in the company.

Young Cohen was a true Southerner. In March 1865, when words were exchanged with one Thomas R. Chew, one of the soldiers challenged the other to a duel. At daybreak, the two young Confederate soldiers fired at each other in the last duel in the Confederacy. Because their seconds had placed blanks in the pistols, neither duelist was hurt. As soon as the men returned to camp, they heard the bugle sound, rushed to their horses, and rode into battle, the Battle of Bentonville, March 19, 1865. Tragically, both Chew and Cohen were killed by artillery fire in this, the last major battle of the Civil War.[20]

Richmond's government was now in a state of desperation. There is circumstantial evidence that in the early months of 1865, Jefferson Davis and Judah Benjamin were involved in desperate plans to blow up the White House and kidnap Lincoln and other high-ranking Federal officials. William A. Tidwell, the author of Come Retribution and April '65, contends that Davis and Benjamin decided in the early spring of 1865 to send a team of undercover operators to Washington and that it was financed by Secret Service gold drawn on the Treasury as late as April 1, 1865. John H. Surratt, one of John Wilkes Booth's lieutenants, whose mother, Mary Surratt, was later executed for her role in the assassination, had been a courier for Benjamin. Benjamin had sent Surratt on a mission to Canada two weeks before the assassination and had given him two hundred dollars in gold to defray his expenses. (Surratt later testified that neither Davis nor Benjamin had any knowledge of Booth's plans to kill Lincoln.) Surratt left Richmond on April 1, 1865, the day before its evacuation, with dispatches from Benjamin to be delivered to Brig. Gen. Edwin G. Lee in Montreal. Lee had replaced Jacob Thompson and Clement C. Clay as the head of the Canadian operation.[21]

In Tidwell's view, Booth was not a lunatic, but rather was a responsible undercover agent recruited by the Confederate secret service as a part of the kidnapping plot. The plot failed in March. The Confederate government, including its spymaster, Judah Benjamin, fled Richmond on April 2, leaving Booth and his undercover team with no direction. Lee surrendered. The assassination of the president on April 14 and attempts to assassinate other high Federal officials were not approved by Davis or Benjamin, or even known by them. Booth only concocted his scheme a few days or perhaps even hours before the commission of the crimes. The assassination and attempted assassinations were Booth's idea alone, but consistent, Booth erroneously thought, with his mission to disable the Union leadership. There is no direct evidence linking either

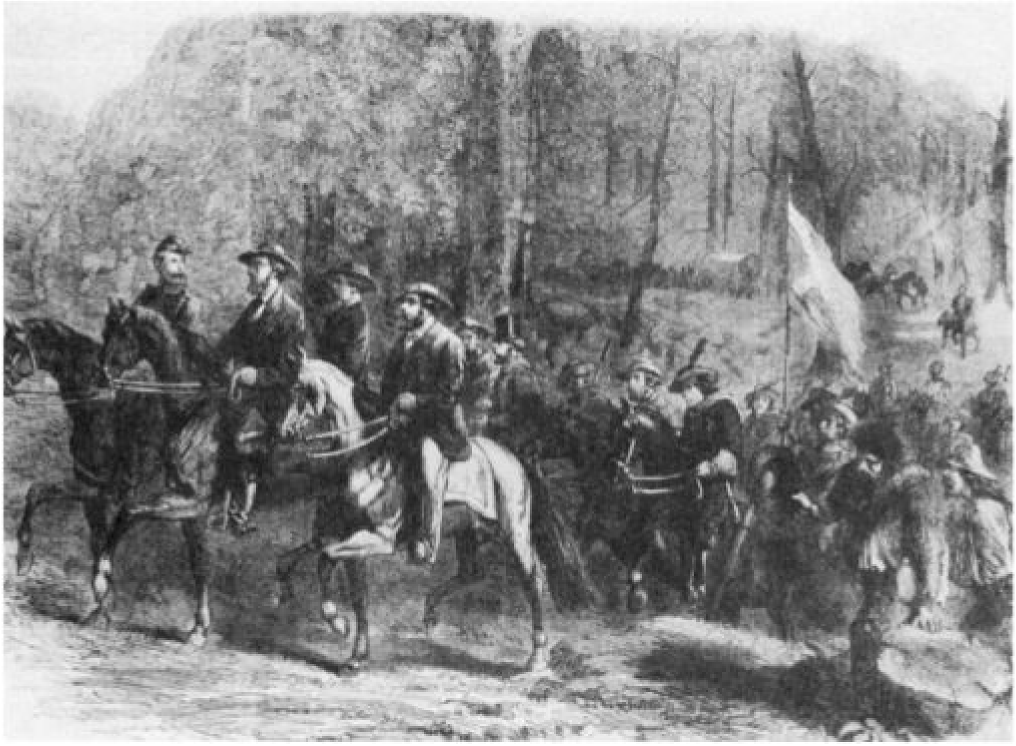
Davis or Benjamin to the bombing and kidnapping plot, but there is convincing circumstantial evidence that Davis and Benjamin set in motion a plot which ended in a rogue agent killing the president. All of these desperate schemes and many others failed.

By late March 1865, the siege of Petersburg was coming to an end and General Lee was waiting for the roads to dry out so that he could combine his army with General Johnston's army in North Carolina. Gen. Lee sent a message to Maj. Gen. John C. Breckinridge, the secretary of war, at 10:40 a.m. on April 2 warning him that the army would have to evacuate their position that night. This took place at about the same time General Lee sent information to President Davis, who had to be called out of Sunday morning church service.[22]

Secretary of State Judah Benjamin methodically destroyed all documents, correspondence, official records, files on covert operations, and anything else which would prove embarrassing if found by the Yankees. He personally destroyed the department's Secret Service records. Like others in the government, Benjamin anticipated that this hour might arrive and had sent his clerk and six boxes of key documents south to Charlotte. At 2:00 p.m. on April 2, Benjamin was visited by Alfred Paul, the French Consul. "I found him extremely agitated … his hands shaking, wanting and trying to do and say everything at once," Paul told his superiors. "Mr. Benjamin said to me in a trembling voice, 'I have nothing in particular to say to you, but I wanted to be sure to shake your hand before my departure.'"[23]

On Sunday afternoon, April 2, 1865, the Confederate government announced it was departing Richmond. On Sunday night, Emma Mordecai heard a "terrific explosion, which jarred the house to its foundation." She and her sister-in-law and her niece all got in bed together, terrified and trembling. The Confederates had set fire to ships, ammunition magazines, and ordnance. The arsenal was ignited. Soon, however, the women, alone on the family plantation and surrounded by slaves, decided that they had best begin making plans to hide their valuables and food.[24]

Two trains left Richmond that night, one carrying over a half a million dollars worth of gold and silver, all that was left of the Confederate Treasury, and the other carrying the presidential party: Mr. and Mrs. Jefferson Davis; Judah P. Benjamin; Stephen R. Mallory, secretary of the navy; George Davis, attorney general; Judge John H. Reagan, postmaster general; and George A. Trenholm, secretary of the Treasury. "Now," Ernest B. Furgurson wrote, "legislature and governor, Congress and president were gone," and Richmond "was capital of nothing."[25] Benjamin had regained his composure from the afternoon. His "Epicurean philosophy was ever at command," Stephen Mallory recalled, "and his hope and good humor inexhaustible … with a never-give-up-the-ship' sort of air, [he] referred to other great national causes which had been redeemed from far gloomier reverses than ours.” A. J. Hanna wrote: “The morale of the official family was strengthened by [former Texas governor Francis R.] Lubbock’s large stock of Texas anecdotes, Mallory’s Seminole Indian war stories, and Benjamin’s inexhaustible wit and good humor.”[26]

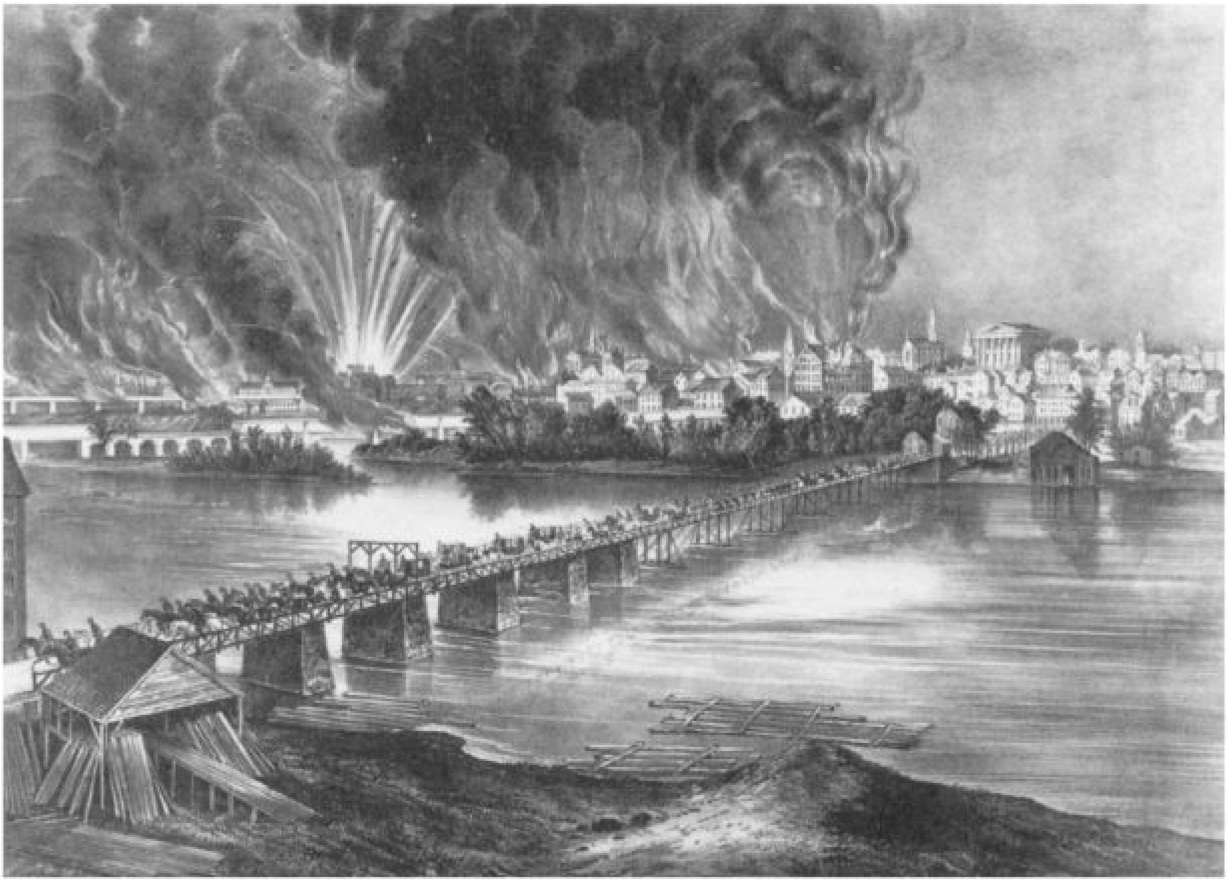


The Confederate cabinet escaping in April 1865. Judah P. Benjamin kept President Davis and his fellow cabinet members amused as they traveled south from Richmond. Benjamin is just behind Davis, wearing a silk hat. (Courtesy of the Library of Congress.)

Richmond was now at the mercy of the rabble. Looters roamed the streets. The Confederate army had evacuated, but the Union army had not yet arrived. Stores were ransacked. Fire swept the city. “The city was wrapped in a cloud of densest smoke, through which great tongues of flame leaped in madness to the skies,” one Federal officer recalled.[27] Philip Whitlock, still in the Quartermaster Department, stayed to the end, packing records to be sent south. “It is hard to describe the condition of this country at this time,” he recalled. The people of Richmond “did not know what will become of us. Some of us expected to be put in prison and all our property taken away.” Whitlock saw rioters and robbers plundering and setting fire to downtown Richmond, “people carrying away the goods on their Heads and rolling out Barrels of Licquor in the Streets.”[28]

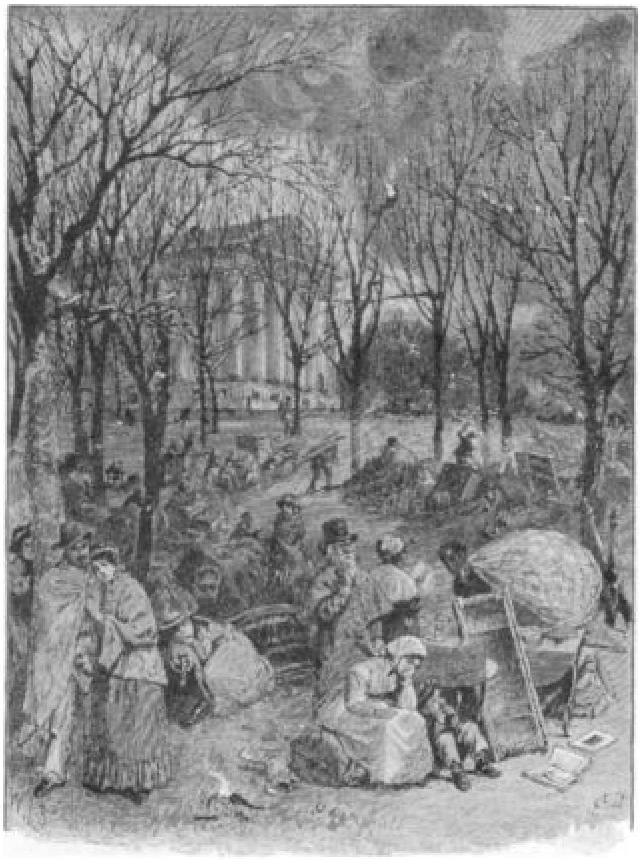
When Whitlock finished his packing job around midnight, he tried to leave the building but was prevented from doing so by a sentinel who told Whitlock he had orders to form all the men into a company to follow Lee's army. "This did not suit me," he later wrote. "I knew that there would be no use," so he went down to the basement, found an unguarded door, and escaped. It was on his way to his home and shop at the corner of Mayo and Franklin that Whitlock encountered the rioters. He determined to save his goods. When he arrived, his wife met him with "a whole Apron full of Confederate money," she had earned selling tobacco and cigars. Whitlock carried box after heavy box of tobacco up three flights of stairs to hide them from the looters.[29]

The next morning, the Whitlocks were awakened at 6 a.m. by the great explosion from the arsenal which broke several windows in their home. Fortunately, the fire did not destroy their building, and the arrival of Federal troops restored order. "That was a day," he wrote, "which was remembered by the people that were here as long as they lived."[30]



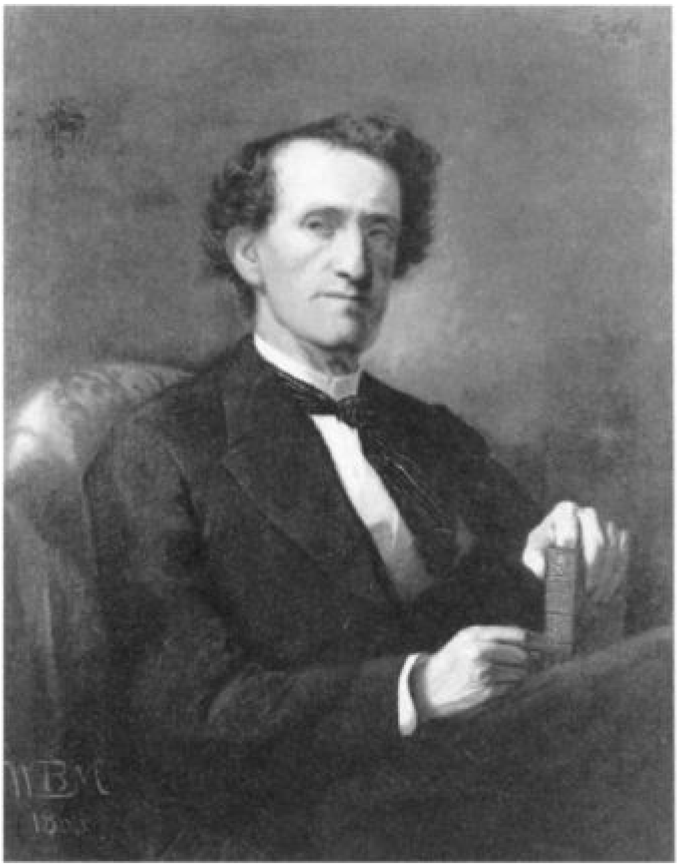
Richmond at the end of the war. The Confederate army and many civilians flee Richmond as the Union army is poised to enter. (Courtesy of the Library of Congress.)

On Tuesday, April 4, John A. Campbell, formerly a justice of the U.S. Supreme Court, asked a number of prominent Richmonders to accompany him on a visit to see President Abraham Lincoln.[31] Lincoln had come to the city a day after the Confederate government left. Accompanied only by sailors, the president walked through downtown Richmond, passing Philip Whitlock's store on Franklin Street and likely passing near Beth Ahabah on his way to the mansion Jefferson Davis had only just abandoned.[32] Campbell hoped to convince the president to be lenient. Gustavus Myers had heard from many citizens that they opposed taking an enforced oath of allegiance and he hoped to convince Lincoln to dispense with it. He also wished "to ascertain the tone and temper existing on the part of the Federal authorities towards the Citizens," and went also out of respect for Campbell, who did not wish to go alone. On the morning of April 5 Campbell and Myers met with Lincoln aboard the Malvern. The president was friendly and told the two men that he knew that they came in no official capacity and that they were not authorized to act on behalf of the government. He handed Campbell a paper outlining his conditions, which included that the authority of the United States would be recognized in all parts of the nation, that his sentiments on slavery would be respected, and that all fighting must end and all hostile forces disbanded. Lee, of course, had not yet surrendered and the war was still ongoing. The president said that he was disposed to exercise his authority with regard to the return of confiscated property "in the spirit of sincere liberality," that he hoped "to see an end of the struggle," and that he was considering a plan to ask the Virginia legislature to meet in Richmond. Myers expressed his concern about the oath to the president, who said "he had never attached much importance to the oath of allegiance being required." The men talked about the president's policy of leniency and lack of vin-dictiveness. Campbell gave the president a draft of proposed articles for a military convention to be held by Lee and Grant, which the president accepted. "Throughout," Myers recalled later, "it was conducted with entire civility and good humor."[33]



Citizens of Richmond in Capitol Square during the conflagration. (Battles and Leaders of the Civil War.)

Nothing came of the conference. Lincoln was assassinated nine days later, on April 14, 1865.



Gustavus A. Myers was Civil War Richmond's most prominent Jewish citizen after Judah P. Benjamin. He served on the city council and was active in civic affairs. He befriended Benjamin and, together with former Supreme Court Justice John A. Campbell, met with President Lincoln aboard the Malvern when the Union army occupied Richmond. His son, Will, was an adjutant to major generals Samuel Jones and William W. Loring. (Courtesy of the Virginia Historical Society, Richmond.)

Meanwhile, the train carrying the Confederate leaders from Richmond pulled into Danville, Virginia, where the cabinet stayed for a week. It was obvious to Benjamin that the cause was now definitely lost, and he determined to escape or die trying. A fellow refugee later recalled, "I will never forget the expression of his countenance or the pitiless smile which accompanied his words when he said, 'I will never be taken alive.'" The train proceeded to Greensboro, North Carolina, and then to Charlotte. Burton Harrison recalled: "I could see from afar the occasional bright glow of Benjamin's cigar." While the other travelers were "perfectly silent, Benjamin's silvery voice was presently heard as he rhythmically intoned for their comfort verse after verse of Tennyson's 'Ode on the Death of the Duke of Wellington.'"

Mourning when their leaders fall,

Warriors carry the warrior's pall,

And sorrow darkens hamlet and hall …

Lead out the pageant: sad and slow,

As fits an universal woe,

Let the long procession go,

And let the sorrowing crowd about it grow.[34]

After Pvt. Eugene Henry Levy recuperated from his wounds, he returned to his artillery unit and participated in the last desperate defense of Richmond. "Oh, ever-memorable day of horror!" he wrote in his diary on April 3, 1865, "I heard of the capture of Petersburg, the evacuation of Richmond, and the retreat of Lee's army…. May God protect our noble commander, for the name of Lee will act as a talisman for the recall of the army." He retreated with his company from Richmond. On Saturday, April 8, "a lovely day," he fell in behind the artillery and marched twenty-two miles until dark, "by which time we had arrived at the base of the hill on which is situated the pretty town called Appomattox C.[ourt] H.[ouse]. Here we parked for the night." Levy was captured and became a prisoner of war. Pressed into service to drive wagons, he met several fellow prisoners from the New Orleans Washington Artillery "bragging as usual in a disgusting manner." When the Yankee officers tried to convince Levy and his comrades that Lee would soon surrender, they "hooted at the idea" and its "fabricators." Of course Lee did surrender the next day.[35]

After Lee's surrender, neither Greensboro nor Charlotte was particularly hospitable to Jefferson Davis and the Confederate cabinet. The Union army was advancing in their direction, and the citizenry feared Yankee wrath in Charlotte. Benjamin lodged with the Abram Weill family. Weill was an ardent Confederate who not long before had offered his home to Varina Davis. When Benjamin was leaving, he presented the Weills with a gold-headed cane he had when he made his farewell speech to the U.S. Senate.[36]

Before leaving Charlotte, the full Confederate cabinet held its last meeting on April 26. Only President Davis wanted to continue the fight. The cabinet members saw the reality of the situation. The leaders of the Confederacy now had to consider their personal situations. Benjamin feared that, should he be captured, he would be blamed for acts committed by Confederate Secret Service agents. Lincoln's assassination had occurred on April 14, after Lee's surrender, but while the Confederate leaders were in flight. Federal authorities searched for Booth and his co-conspirators throughout the next twelve days. Booth was captured and killed on April 26, when the Confederate cabinet was in North Carolina. Davis had learned of Lincoln's death by telegram on April 19, when he arrived in Charlotte.[37]

There was talk of hanging the Confederate leaders. Gen. George Boutwell wrote General Butler that, if there were any evidence connecting any of "the rebel leaders with the plot," they should be pursued. "It is not unlikely," he concluded, "that Davis, Breckenridge and Benjamin had a hand in the business." The Jewish secretary of state, the man after Jefferson Davis most detested in the North, would almost certainly be a target. He was described by the former Speaker of the House, James G. Blaine, as the "Mephistopheles of the Rebellion, the brilliant, learned, sinister Secretary of State." Lincoln's secretary of state, William H. Seward, who disliked Benjamin, thought him, alone of the Confederate cabinet, guilty of complicity in Lincoln's assassination. Orville Browning recalled: "Mr. Seward expressed his belief that Booth and Surratt had conferred with Benjamin upon the subject, and that Benjamin had encouraged and subsidized them; but he did not believe that the matter had ever been under discussion before the Richmond Cabinet or received the countenance of other members of the Cabinet than Benjamin." Seward had unsuccessfully debated Benjamin when they served in the Senate before the war. When cornered by Benjamin in those years, Seward could only plead that he was not a lawyer. Seward, in fact, was likely the only Senator Benjamin had truly disliked.[38]

As it turned out, Federal prosecutors attempted to use the perjured testimony of one Sandford Conover, who claimed that he knew of letters from Davis and Benjamin authorizing the assassination. This attempt failed, but Benjamin could not know this in April and May of 1865. During the military trial of the Booth conspirators, the prosecutors continually claimed that the Confederate government was the real culprit. Writing in 1895, David M. Dewitt claimed in The Judicial Murder of Mrs. Surratt that scoundrels and perjurers attracted by the scent of reward money "flocked like buzzards, around the doors of the old Penitentiary … to swear that Davis and Benjamin were the instigators of Booth and Surratt."[39]

Years later, L. Q. Washington, Benjamin's secretary, wrote to Francis Lawley,

> I was present at the time when Mr. Thompson [Jacob Thompson, a Confederate secret agent serving in Canada] received his instructions from Mr. Benjamin. They were oral and largely suggestive and informal. Much was left to his discretion and wisely; for he was an experienced and conservative man. But there was not a word or a thought that looked to any violations of the rules of war, as they exist, among civilized nations. As a matter of fact, Mr. Davis, Mr. Benjamin, General Lee and the other leaders of the Confederacy believed to the last that it was not merely > right, but the wisest and best policy to maintain and respect every one of the humane restrictions in the conduct of war which are upheld by the publicists.[40]

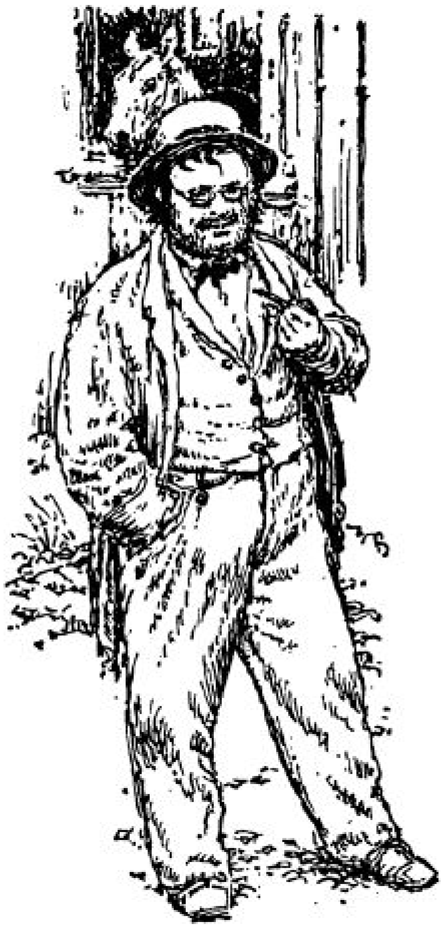
Like Davis, Benjamin determined to escape. Unlike Davis, he determined to leave the South. The cause had been lost. Only Benjamin and Breckinridge escaped imprisonment, although no member of the Confederate cabinet was ever executed. Benjamin left Davis and the dwindling presidential party after crossing into Georgia. Other cabinet members had already left. Benjamin decided not to make the next leg of a proposed escape on horseback. “Thus,” Varina Davis recalled in later years, “these two master minds … parted with mutual respect and affectionate esteem … after breasting as one man the heavy storm which beat upon them for five bitter years.” Benjamin had left a trunk of his personal belongings in Abbeville together with money for his sisters, now refugees in LaGrange, Georgia. He traveled disguised as a Frenchman who could not speak English, M. M. Bonfals. He had had the foresight to prepare a false passport describing himself as a French national. “The name itself,” Eli Evans wrote, “showed a kind of bravado—probably a play on the Cajun French for ‘a good falsification’ or ‘a good disguise.’ It must have given him a certain pleasure to tease his pursuers with a Cajun word-game.” He traveled with Col. Henry J. Leovy of New Orleans, who had served the Confederacy in espionage matters. Leovy “translated” for Benjamin. He made his way to the west coast of Florida, which he supposed would be an easier place from which to escape the country, and parted from Leovy, who later recalled that never was Judah Benjamin so great “as during the time of adversity. Traveling in disguise, sleeping at night in log huts, living on the plainest fare, subjected to all the discomforts of such a journey, with all his plans shattered and without definite hope for the future, his superb confidence and courage raised him above all.”[41]



Judah Benjamin disguised as "Monsieur Bonfals" during his daring escape through Florida. (Reprinted from A. T. Hanna, Flight into Oblivion. Courtesy of Louisiana State University Press, Baton Rouge.)

After a harrowing four-month flight to avoid capture, which included hiding in swamps, Benjamin took passage on a ship that sank not long after sailing and spent weeks at sea in another smaller boat and even sailed into a dangerous storm. "I had never seen a waterspout," he wrote his sister. "I got, however, more than I bargained for." When he finally landed in Southampton, England, he was bereft of assets and an occupation, but not of friends and hope.[42]

When the war ended, the business affairs of Benjamin's former Senate colleague David Yulee were in shambles. His home at Homosassa, Margarita, "the most beautiful in the land," was destroyed by fire in a Union naval assault. He had removed his family inland to Archer, thirteen miles west of Gainesville, where he built Cottonwood, a humbler structure. Another home was taken over by strangers. "Nearly all my means of support [were] lost," he wrote, "by acts of force of both the Governments during the war." Although he was not a diehard Confederate, Yulee was fiercely opposed to freeing the slaves to the bitter end. No other issue gave him as much concern. He wrote Davis in October of 1864 opposing the use of slaves as soldiers. Fighting for the Confederacy meant that slaves would be entitled to “the prerogatives of the citizen,” which could not be, because “This is a white man’s Government. To associate the colors in the camp, is to unsettle castes.”[43]

Now, Yulee counseled peace, acceptance of the Union victory and the end of slavery, and reconciliation between the sections. “The conflict of arms is ended,” he wrote one correspondent, “ended by the unconditional surrender of the South: and thereby, as practical facts, Slave labor is abolished…. It is bootless to look back…. The great duty, then, of the day, is Pacification. Not a partial, and constrained, but a solid, true, enduring pacification; thus restoring, as soon as practicable, a complete and earnest reconciliation.” Yulee may have wanted peace, but his many enemies wanted revenge for his role in the events leading up to secession. He was arrested a few weeks later.[44]

The Yulee family had one other connection with the Confederacy: The Confederate baggage and treasure train. When the Confederate government fled Richmond, they took with them officials records, baggage, and the Confederate Treasury. Traveling at first by train, and then by wagon, carriage, and horse, the presidential party went to Danville, Virginia, through North Carolina, and on to Abbeville, South Carolina, where the last war council was held. Some papers were left in Abbeville with Mrs. Henry J. Leovy, the wife of Judah Benjamin's friend Col. Leovy. With the cabinet dissolved, Davis and one cabinet member, John H. Reagan of Texas, and a few aides continued on with a wagon and two ambulances. Davis separated from the wagon train in Georgia and was soon captured. The wagon train, however, continued on to Florida, and the last remnant of the Confederate cabinet's records arrived at Yulee's plantation, Cottonwood, in Archer, Florida, near Gainesville on May 22, 1865. While at Cottonwood, the young soldiers escorting the train learned of the surrender of Gen. Joseph E. Johnston. "A general gloom," Tench Tilghman recalled in his diary, "pervades our camp. Of course the last hope is gone of the Confederacy." Yulee was not at home when the wagon train arrived, which was prior to his arrest and imprisonment. In his absence, Mrs. Yulee and young Wickliffe helped the soldiers hide and bury the valuable trunks and records. One of the trunks contained Jefferson Davis's personal papers. When the senator returned, two of the young soldiers asked his advice as to what they should do. He told them to obtain their parole, "return home to their families, and resume the duties of civil life." The trunks were eventually discovered by the Union troops.[45]

After his parole, and with other young Confederate officers from Johnston's army, Alroy Jonas hopped aboard the top of a railroad boxcar and traveled from North Carolina to Richmond, hoping to secure transportation back home. He and his comrades stopped at the Powhatan Hotel, run by fervent Confederates, where a theatrical company and its leading lady, a Miss Annie Rush, were also staying. One day Miss Rush came into the sitting room where Jonas and his friends were assembled, with a handful of Confederate $500 bills, blank on the back, which someone had given her, and requested that each officer write "a sentiment" for her on the back of the bills. "Well, I had been doing a good deal of doggerel during our sojourn," Jonas recalled, "and so I had the whole load dumped upon my shoulders and performed the required task for each as speedily as possible." He wrote poems for each of his friends, but, for his own contribution, he wrote a sentimental poem entitled "Lines on the Back of a Confederate Note," which was published shortly thereafter in the New York Metropolitan Record, a Copperhead (pro-Southern) newspaper, under the heading "Something Too Good To Be Lost." The author was not identified until years later, but the poem was an instant success, appealing in a sentimental way to the tragic frame of mind of Southerners in 1865. The idea of a hungry, penniless man giving away a $500 bill was a bit of grim humor for many Southerners. According to the Aberdeen Examiner, Major Jonas's newspaper, to write the lines of this verse on the back of a Confederate bill and send it to “some woe-begone friend” became a fad.[46] As Jonas later put it, he had “unwittingly … touched a subtle heart chord that gains vibration as the days pass by, and like Banquo’s ghost, it will not ‘down.’” The famous lines are as follows:

Lines on the Back of a Confederate Note

Representing nothing on God’s earth now,

And naught in the waters below it,

As the pledge of a nation that’s dead and gone,

Keep it, dear friend, and show it.

Show it to those who will lend an ear,

To the tale that this trifle can tell,

Of a liberty born of the patriots dream,

Of a storm-cradled nation that fell.

Too poor to possess the precious ores

And too much of a stranger to borrow,

We issued today our promise to pay

And hoped to redeem on the morrow.

The days rolled by and the weeks became years,

But our coffers were empty still;

Coin was so rare that the treasury’d quake

If a dollar should drop in the till.

But the faith that was in us was strong indeed,

And our poverty well we discerned

And this little check represented the pay

That our suffering veterans earned.

We knew it had hardly a value in gold,

Yet as gold each soldier received it.

It gazed in our eyes with a promise to pay

And each Southern patriot believed it,

But our boys thought little of price or of pay,

Or of bills that were overdue;

We knew if it bought us our bread today

’Twas the best our poor country could do.

Keep it, it tells all our history o’er

From the birth of the dream to its last;

Modest and born of the angel Hope,

Like our hope of success, it passed.[47]

Simon Mayer had enlisted in 1861 in the Natchez Light Infantry. He had served throughout the war in various Mississippi regiments, surrendered, and was paroled at Greensboro, North Carolina, on May 1, 1865.[48] He wrote his family, “At sunrise this morning we turn our faces homeward.” He was joyous about seeing his family again, “but how sad the reflection that all our efforts for the last four years have been in vain. Eager and anxious as I am to once more be at home, yet willingly would I forego that pleasure if I thought we could alter the present circumstances of our return.” He still believed fervently in the justice of the Southern cause. He was “proud and defiant,” believing that the South succumbed to over-whelming numbers. “We have still made an honest and glorious fight and as the boys express it ‘have kept the flies off the Yanks for the past 4 years.’” He hoped that “ere the month of June shall have passed that the ‘major’ will be able to present himself to you in ‘proper person.’” By May 25, “Maj. Simon Mayer AAG Sharp’s brigade paroled prisoner of the Army of Tennessee” was given permission “to proceed to his home in Natchez, Mississippi.”[49]

Lt. Simon Mayer was the son of immigrants who settled in Natchez. He served in the Natchez Southrons of the 10th Mississippi and was an ardent Confederate soldier. (Courtesy of Joan and Thomas H. Gandy, Natchez, Mississippi)

Most of Richmond's Jewish families were devastated by the war. Emma Mordecai visited Richmond in the early days after the end of the war and found the "pavement was covered with the plate glass from the fire doors and windows, reduced to powder by the explosions while rough boards supplied its place. All stores were closed and the street filthy." Later when she returned, she found it a "strange looking place … sidewalks thronged with Yankee soldiers and saucy Negro women." She was, needless to say, mortified and devastated by the fall of the Confederacy and concerned about its leaders. She wrote in her diary, "When I think of our President [Jefferson Davis], the victim of their petty tyranny, my heart aches, and fervently my prayers ascend to Heaven, that he may be sustained in these dark days, by a high and unfaltering trust in God!"[50]

Even the mild-mannered Mrs. Jacob A. Levy could not abide Yankees. When her nephew Jacob Ezekiel Hyneman came to visit her, she met him at the door. "Oh, Jacob, Jacob," the grieving mother of a dead Confederate son exclaimed, "I have made a vow never to touch the hand of a man who wears that uniform; but how can I keep it with my own flesh and blood, my sister's son?" Poor Hyneman had more to come. He went outside to see his cousin, in whom he had a definite romantic interest. She would not see him until he took off his sword. “The war is over,” he said. “I guess I can surrender.” His cousin then introduced the disappointed Jacob to her fiancé, 1st Lt. Edwin Kursheedt of the Washington Artillery, with the words, “This is my traitor cousin, Jacob Hyneman, from Philadelphia.” Kursheedt rose to his former enemy’s defense by telling young Miss Levy that she ought not call Jacob a traitor, as he had left Richmond as a little boy and was raised up North. Finally Jacob gave up. “I had an old briar-wood pipe sticking in my cap,” he later recalled. “Edwin said: ‘Comrade, let’s smoke a pipe of peace together,’ producing his tobacco pouch.”[51]

On April 9, 1865, Perry Moses of Sumter married Rosalie Levy of Mobile. They had met earlier, when Perry and his brother Jack were invited to dinner at the Levy home. “As the two young men came up the walk to the house,” Dorothy Bultman wrote, “Rose and Adele peeped through the blinds at them. Rose promptly chose ‘that one’ and Adele ‘the other’—a choice that was to end in marriage for both couples.” But on April 9, the war was not quite over and a squad of Yankees came looking for Lieutenant Moses. “Run, Cap’n run, the Yankees are after you,” an old servant yelled. Moses fled and did not see his bride for three months until they were reunited. They settled in Louisiana and later in Sumter, South Carolina, and had seven children.[52]

Raphael Moses Jr., Master, CSN, attached himself to the 20th Georgia Volunteers and served as a courier in Benning’s brigade during the retreat from Petersburg. He was with Lee’s army on that fateful April 9 and surrendered and was paroled at Appomattox Court House. He either marched the eight hundred miles home with Benning’s brigade or “walked home.” In early May his father, Raphael Moses, was ordered to Washington, Georgia, and he and another son, Israel Moses Nunez (“Major”), were staying with Moses’s old friend Robert Toombs. One day a cavalryman rode up and delivered a sack containing $5,000 in gold for Toombs’s personal use, presumably to make his escape from the Union army. Toombs handed the money to “Major” and told him to buy corn and provisions and distribute it among the returning soldiers, which he did. Toombs said he would not defile his hands with “any of the damn stuff.” Not long thereafter, Union soldiers arrived at Toombs’s home to arrest him, but young Major met the Union officer between the gate and the house while Toombs escaped. Toombs barely got away but eventually made his way with his wife to Paris, where he lived in exile. He was never pardoned and, years later, paid a call on President Grant and told him, so the story goes, that it was his practice, whenever he visited a foreign country, to call on the chief magistrate of the land.[53]

Davis was determined not to surrender. On May 5, the last fragments of the Confederate government met in Washington, Georgia. Present were Davis; John C. Breckinridge, secretary of war; John C. Reagan, former postmaster general and now secretary of the Treasury; A. R. Lawton, quartermaster general; I. M. St. John, commissary general; and Raphael J. Moses, major, Confederate army. The government had ceased to exist, and most of the treasury had been disbursed on May 2. It now became necessary to dispose of the remaining gold bullion in the possession of the government. As the remnant of the government dissolved, one of the final orders of the Confederate States of America was given by W. F. Alexander, assistant to the quartermaster general: "Major R. J. Moses will pay Ten thousand dollars, the amount of bullion appropriated to the Q.M. Department by Secretary of War to Major R. R. Wood./May 5th, 1865. By order of Q.M. General/W. F. Alexander, Maj. & Assist./to the Q.M. General."[54]

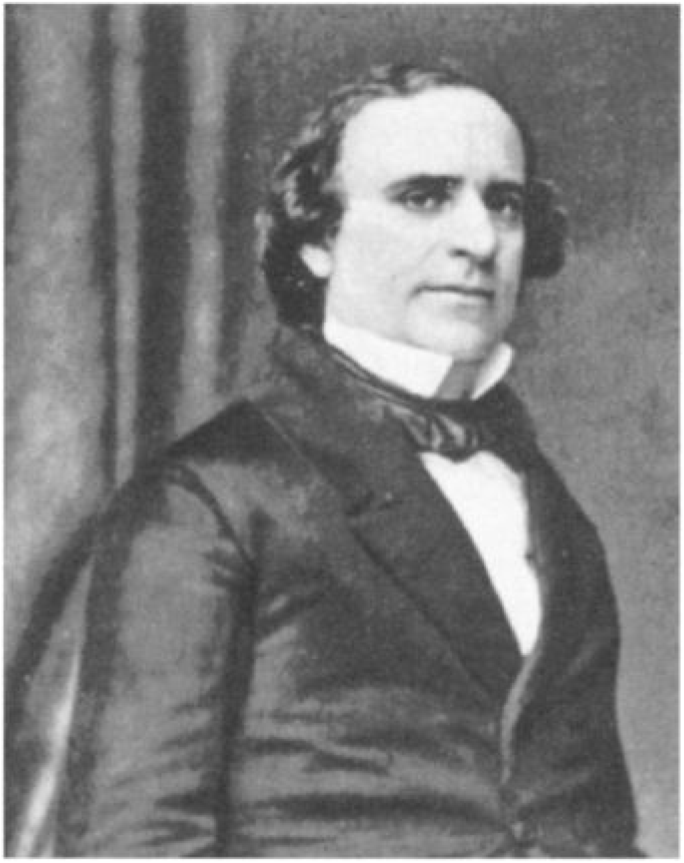
Moses was faced with what to do with this gold bullion in the midst of what can only be described as anarchy. The war was over. Soldiers were discharged. Union troops were nearby. Many were desperate for food and money. Local government was in disarray. Toombs gave Moses the names of ten reliable soldiers to guard the funds. He took a squad to destroy all the liquor in the shops. Then he put the gold in an unoccupied wooden building with a keg of powder under it and a guard around it. He passed the word that a trail of powder led outside and that, if the guard was challenged, the fuse would be lit. After a sleepless night, Moses and his detail boarded a train for Augusta but were met at the train depot in Barnett, Georgia, by a large group of unruly former Confederate soldiers. Rumor had it that the car containing the gold would be stormed. Moses's guard stood by him, but the men certainly had to consider whether they were willing to die protecting gold in a war that was over.[55]

Moses determined to go out into the crowd and talk quietly but directly to the men. He read his orders and told them he had no interest in protecting the bullion except to fulfill his orders; that every dollar of it would be devoted to feeding their fellow soldiers and caring for the wounded; that he would do his best to carry out these orders; that they might kill him and his guard but that would be murder; and that if he and his men killed any of them, which they "would certainly endeavor to do," they would be justified on grounds of self-defense and, he added, "the discharge of a sacred duty." A number of the men who knew Moses spoke up and assured the rest that Moses would not steal the money. The bullion was successfully delivered to the commanding general of the Union army in Augusta.[56] Raphael J. Moses had carried out one of the Confederacy's final orders.[57]

Jewish soldiers who had fought for the Confederacy straggled home to rebuild their lives. But David Yulee was home and the end of the war brought him his greatest suffering. The governor of Florida had appointed Yulee as one member of a commission to negotiate Florida's reentry into the Union. In May he met with Salmon P. Chase, secretary of the Treasury, and Whitelaw Reid, a journalist and Chase confidant, who let Yulee know in no uncertain terms that neither Yulee nor any Southern white man was going to negotiate for or reorganize the government of Florida. Disappointed, Yulee went home to Archer; martial law was declared on May 22, and a few days later Yulee and Gov. Abraham K. Allison were arrested. Yulee was sent to Jacksonville as a prisoner. Gen. Israel Vodges treated him with great courtesy and gave him the run of the city. Higher authorities, however, soon ordered Yulee to Fort Pulaski near Savannah.[58]

At the war's end, President Lincoln had not decided on the fate of the Southern leadership. Many believed that treason should be punished severely. There was substantial sentiment, particularly in the aftermath of Lincoln's assassination, to hang Davis, Lee, Benjamin, and other high-ranking officials. Thus when Yulee was taken off to prison, no one could know his fate. In fact, he had no idea what he was to be charged with until early January 1866, when Secretary of War Stanton reported to President Johnson that Yulee was charged with treason "while holding a seat in the Senate of the United States."[59]

Mrs. Yulee and the children visited him in prison on their way to Washington to plead his case. They stayed with family in Maryland, where Mrs. Yulee's father, Governor Wickcliffe, joined her crusade to free her husband. There were rumors that Yulee would be court-martialed and hanged. The family hoped to utilize their contacts in the government to free the imprisoned former senator. Few Confederates had been arrested or imprisoned. Lee was paroled by General Grant. Along with Davis and Sen. Clement Clay, Yulee, however, remained imprisoned longer than any of the other Confederates. He was still a prisoner after Robert Toombs and Alfred Iverson, Confederate senators from Georgia; Howell Cobb and George A. Trenholm, secretaries of the Treasury; Francis W. Pickens, governor of South Carolina; John A. Campbell, assistant secretary of war; Wade Hampton, Confederate lieutenant general; and many others had been released.[60]



David Yulee. (Courtesy of Frank and Marie-Therese wood print collections, Alexandria, Virginia.)

The reasons are not readily apparent. Robert L. Clarke contends that Yulee's Northern partners in the Florida Railroad Company kept him in prison "until they were satisfied that he would cooperate with them." Professor Thompson agrees that this may have been a factor. It does appear that a notorious carpetbagger lawyer, Lyman D. Stickney, came to Fernandina after it was captured and influenced local events. Serving as a Federal tax commissioner and lawyer for one of the northern creditors of the Florida Railroad, he sought out Union major-general Joseph Holt, now judge advocate general, and urged him to keep the "proslavery men, the active rebels during the rebellion" from resuming power. One way to do that—and take over the Florida Railroad at the same time (which Stickney attempted)—was to keep David Yulee in prison. No contemporary or historian has suggested that Yulee's Jewish lineage played any part in his outrageous treatment, but Yulee's fate was certainly not lost on his old colleague Judah Benjamin.[61]

The Yulee family had a more personal and more credible explanation: Yulee's former brother-in-law and old nemesis, Union Maj. Gen. Joseph Holt. Margaret Crepps Wickliffe, one of the Wickliffe sisters, had, in Mrs. Clay's words, "married Joseph Holt, [who] rose high in Federal honours after the breaking out of the War, having sold his Southern birthright for a mess of Northern pottage." Holt had been a stereotypical prosecutor as a young man. His loyalty to the Union caused him to reject not only his wife's family, but also his own brother in Mississippi and mother in Kentucky. As Holt was a staunch Unionist, Lincoln had appointed Holt judge advocate general of the Union army and had offered to appoint him attorney general. He had seriously considered him to head the War Department. During the war, Holt ferreted out spies, traitors, and, at times, political dissenters, and was conspicuously loyal to Edwin Stanton, his superior, in his various political difficulties. It was Holt who headed the investigation into the Copperhead and Order of American Knights movements, and it was Holt who was the chief judge in the military-style trial of Booth's co-conspirators. Holt and Yulee had known each other for decades, first as brothers-in-law until Holt's wife's death just before the war, and second as political allies during the Buchanan administration.[62]

Holt now accused Yulee of treason, and Holt was now the nation's chief prosecutor of traitors. He was also a bitter man rejected by his own family and little concerned about the rights of his victims. Holt felt he had been used by both Yulee and Stephen Mallory, and he now had both of them arrested and accused both of "overt acts of treason" and "skulking treachery." It was clear from gossip passed on by another Wickliffe brother-in-law, Judge William Merrick, that Holt was behind the arrest and detention of Yulee. Yulee, of course, was no more guilty of treason than millions of other Southerners and considerably less guilty than thousands who served more actively than he in the armed forces and the Confederate government.[63]

Holt based his accusations of treason on Yulee's attempt to learn about the condition of the Federal military in Florida while he was still a senator. Holt cited Yulee's January 1861 letter in which he promised to give "the enemy a shot" and "that I am willing to be their masters but not their brothers" in his continuing efforts to keep Yulee in prison and put him on trial for treason.[64]

Holt was so bitter he accused Mallory and Yulee of cowardice. He wrote, "Many of the most conspicuous of these modern conspirators—and this was especially true of Yulee and Mallory … —seem to have shrunk away from the bloody conflicts of the war in which they had so eagerly involved the deluded States and people they represented." Wickliffe Yulee described Holt as suffering from a "diseased vanity," a man "who sought to bite the hand that had aided him, and shine, in artificial light, as a spurious Brutus. He had been degraded, by the noble-minded Lincoln from his cabinet place" to the position he now occupied, where he "resembled the notorious Fouché," the French revolutionary. There was much truth to these allegations. Holt detested not just Yulee and Mallory but all of his former Southern friends and colleagues. He was willing to use perjured testimony in order to convict Davis and Clement Clay of complicity in the Lincoln assassination.[65]

Yulee's family and friends flooded Stanton and Johnson with letters and petitions and called in person. Mrs. Yulee went to Maryland so that she could work for her husband's release in person. In July she wrote that Holt "has gone to the White Mountains. If only he would stay there. The temperature would suit his heart." Yulee's old friends in high places, such as his former friend and lawyer Edwin Stanton and William Seward, refused to help. They were waiting to see which way the political wind would blow, and, in Stanton's case, he may have felt an obligation to support Holt as Holt had once supported him. President Andrew Johnson wrote a now thoroughly worried Governor Wickliffe: "Tell Mrs. Yulee that not one hair of her husband's head shall be touched—but for me to do anything now in his behalf, while passions remain excited, would only injure his cause."[66]

While passions cooled, the family continued to hope. When advised that a letter from General Grant would help, the Yulees turned to an old friend, Joseph E. Johnston, the former Confederate general whom Yulee had helped become quartermaster general of the U.S. Army under Buchanan. Johnston wrote Grant. "Wires flashed," Wickliffe Yulee recalled, "and magically the prison doors were thrown open; as were the hearts of Senator Yulee and his family, for the great and simple soldier, who had enemies only in time of war." He was pardoned by President Johnson and released on March 25, 1866, having been imprisoned for ten months.[67]

Emma Mordecai of Richmond spoke for her fellow Jewish Confederates when she wrote, "I feel as if there was nothing more to live for in this world. My very heart and soul were bound up in our cause and while I can truly say I do not murmur at God's will, I feel utterly cast down, at our failure."[68]

CHAPTER 8

★

We Are Passing through Another Captivity

THE CIVIL WAR BROUGHT a social revolution to the South. Millions of slaves were freed, and those who had invested in the South's "peculiar institution" lost a great proportion of their wealth. White Southerners had expended their capital in a failed war for independence. Political power ebbed from antebellum elites to their former slaves, free blacks, and newcomers to government, both Northern and native-born, "carpetbaggers" and "scalawags," respectively, as native white Southerners called them. Much of the South lay devastated by the war, particularly Richmond and Charleston. Jewish Confederates who had shared in the glories, the honors, and the triumphs of the war now shared the despair and gloom of defeat.

The old Southern Jewish families, the few Sephardim remaining, those most committed to the cause, suffered the greatest losses. Judah P. Benjamin was in exile, having literally lost everything he had—his land, his home, his law practice, his fortune, and the comfort of his family. David Yulee spent almost a year in prison, uncertain of his fate. Abraham C. Myers lost his military career, his health, and his reputation, as did Camden DeLeon. Judith Hyams Douglas, recalling her Aunt Ann in 1936, remembered that she "wore her poverty as a badge of honor as all loyal Southerners did."[1]

Raphael J. Moses, Longstreet's commissary, returned to The Esquiline in Columbus. He had lost a son as well as a way of life. The war had taken a heavy toll on the extended Moses family. In addition to their son Albert, Raphael and Eliza Moses lost three nephews: Pvt. Perry Moses Jr., mortally wounded at Malvern Hill; Lt. Joshua L. Moses, killed at Fort Blakely; and Lt. David Cardoza Levy, killed in action at Murfreesboro (Stone's River), Tennessee. Five cousins were killed: Saul Magnus, Van Den Corput's Company, Georgia Light Artillery, at Resaca, Georgia; Alexander Hilzheim, Bradford's corps of Scouts and Guards, at Kennesaw Mountain, Georgia; Gratz Cohen, Bentonville, North Carolina; and two brothers, Cpl. Isaac Phillip Goldsmith, 17th South Carolina Cavalry Battalion, at James Island, South Carolina, and Lt. Mikel Myers Goldsmith, 1st South Carolina Regiment, Charleston Guard, at Macon, Georgia.[2]

Maj. Raphael J. Moses of Columbus, Georgia, served as a major and was Longstreet's commissary at Gettysburg. Douglas Southall Freeman called Moses "the best commissary of like rank in the Confederate service." He lost one son, Albert Luria, in the war, as well as several nephews. He was a vigorous opponent of the carpetbagger government of Georgia after the war. (Courtesy of the Jacob Rader Marcus Center, American Jewish Archives, Cincinnati, Ohio.)

Yet life went on for the Moses clan. On June 28, 1865, less than three months after Appomattox, Nina Moses, Raphael's daughter, married William Moultrie Moses, who had served in Company G, 2d Georgia in Longstreet's corps. It was likely no coincidence that the patriotic Moses family from South Carolina, whose daughter was marrying a man named for the great hero of the American Revolution, chose "Carolina Day" as the day of the wedding. (On June 28, South Carolinians celebrate the colonists' first victory of the Revolution, the defeat of the British fleet off Sullivan's Island, when Gen. William Moultrie led the victorious troops.) The couple was married at the family plantation before sundown under a huppah, the canopy prescribed by Jewish custom. The huppah, held up by four friends, was made of evergreens and white flowers. The proud father performed the ceremony himself, as no rabbi was available.[3]

Henry Hyams, who had gone west to Louisiana in the 1820s to seek his fortune, lost it in the war. "As Israelites," the former lieutenant governor of Louisiana wrote a family member in April 1868, "we are passing through another captivity which relives and reenacts all the troubles so pathetically poured forth by the inspired Jeremiah. Let us hope with him that the days of Bondage will have a permanent end and that freedom will again reign in our unhappy land.” Hyams and the defeated Jewish Confederates saw in the Union occupation and Reconstruction a modern-day version of the Jewish exile in Babylonia after the destruction of the Jewish state. Hyams believed that the spirituality of the Jewish faith had been adopted by its political conquerors and, in that sense, “Jerusalem has prevailed.” So he now hoped that the “pure patriotism of the Southern mind must one day conquer and overcome its present vanquishers—despite our present degradation.”[4]

Hyams lost three plantations and two hundred slaves in the war. His land was confiscated. At first, he accepted the results of the war philosophically. He moved to New Orleans. By September 1865, he had opened a law practice, and he worked diligently to have his friend, former Governor Moore, restored to his political rights. His interest in Governor Moore was personal. His son Kosciusko (“Kossie”) married Moore’s daughter, Emma Jane.[5]

By April 1868 Hyams, along with the rest of the white population of Louisiana, bore the yoke of the Reconstruction government. The Federal government, controlled by the Radical Republicans, at first denied the Southern states representatives in the Congress and divided the South into military districts. Later, rigorous laws were passed ensuring the right to vote to the former slaves and effectively taking control of the state governments away from native whites. The former leadership of the Southern states—planters, businessmen, lawyers—were removed from office and new leaders, loyal to the Union, took their place. This was revolution in the eyes of white Southerners, a revolution they did not accept.[6] Hyams wrote a family member, “I hope that we will all live long enough to see the end of our personal and political suffering. So far there is scarcely any ray of light ahead.” Despite his troubles, he felt he had done his duty and that sustained him. Like most native whites, Hyams was aghast at the tactics of the carpetbaggers, the Union occupying army, and the Reconstruction government.[7]

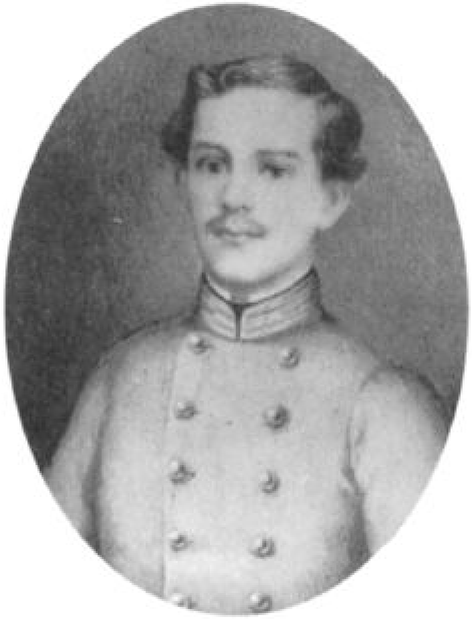
Hyams did not live to see the end of Reconstruction. He died on June 25, 1875. Some of the district courts in Louisiana adjourned out of respect for his memory, and the next day a hundred members of the legal profession assembled in the Louisiana Supreme Court to offer a tribute. The Daily Picayune relayed the sad circumstances of Hyams’s last years: “The downfall of the South—the death of his fair and accomplished daughters and of two sons—the latter within one year—and recently the demise of the worthy and cherished wife of his bosom, all contributed to break his noble spirit. He had devoted all his affection to these beings, too dear to him, and their loss, to use Irving’s phrase, was the bankruptcy of his heart. This good, and true and chivalrous old man had died overwhelmed with grief!"[8]

Abraham Myers, the former quartermaster general, never accepted his fall from grace. He contended after the war that his removal from office was illegal, that he had been the Confederacy's only quartermaster general, and that he had been promoted to general. Indeed, the words "Gen. A. C. Myers" are the most prominent ones on his original headstone.[9]

Many Southerners left the South; many Jewish Southerners did the same. Moses Cohen Mordecai, his shipping business destroyed by the war and his eyesight gone, moved to Baltimore. His son-in-law, Marks H. Lazarus, who had served in the Washington Artillery (South Carolina), handled his business affairs in Charleston. Eleanor Cohen of Columbia finally married Benjamin Mendes Seixas on August 2, 1865, in Columbia. The sun shone. The bride was radiant. She was dressed plainly in "white swiss muslin high & long sleeves." All "passed off well, the glass broke [the Jewish custom of breaking a glass], the ring was on my finger & from every side I received kisses & congratulations." After the wedding, Eleanor moved to New York City despite her concerns about living among those who were so recently her enemies. Her heart, she confided to her diary, was filled with "Southern fire" and bitterness toward the North. Retruning to Charleston in 1866 to have her first child, she was shocked by the crowds of Yankees, freedmen, and "colored soldiers." Many of her friends were dead; some were still refugees. She eventually had four children and died, a New York resident, at age thirty-four in 1874.[10]

Slavery was at an end, and Jewish slave owners experienced the same exodus of their slaves as their fellow Southerners. In some instances slaves stayed on as paid servants. In most cases, they left, searching for a new life. Emma Mordecai, living with her sister-in-law Rose on a plantation, witnessed the rapid deterioration of the relationship between the former masters and their slaves. Cy, now a freedman, demanded part of the farm on account of all the work he had done. Emma's nephew Willie Mordecai told Cy "he would give him three days to find a place to move." The Mordecais bargained for the former slaves to work until new servants could be hired. Cy did return and "expressed to Rose his regret for his improper conduct … and was very much affected at parting with her. She could not take leave of him without emotion and has felt miserable ever since." This, of course, left Rose and Emma with all the housework. "I have been doing drudgery for the greater part of the week," Emma complained, "assisted unwillingly and inefficiently by a little white girl from town."[11]

Emma Mordecai's experience with the freeing of her own slaves was more friendly. Like many city dwellers, Emma owned slaves whom she hired out to others for a portion of their wages. Moses, her former slave, was now a bricklayer. She remained on good terms with him. “No servant,” she wrote, “could behave better than he has done. He shewed great interest in me and all of us, and begged me to call upon him whenever he could do anything for me.” Emma was, in a sense, relieved at the turn of events, because she had the expense of Moses, his sickly wife, and young children, and it took nearly all of the wages Moses could earn to pay his family’s medical and clothing expenses.[12]



Gratz Cohen of Savannah died at the battle of Bentonville. (From the collection of Louis Schmier, Valdosta, Georgia.)

Eleanor Cohen of Charleston and Solomon Cohen of Savannah lamented the end of slavery. All of Eleanor Cohen’s clothing, she wrote, was saved from the fire in Columbia by Rose, “our faithful servant. She and Helen were true, so was Lavinia. I shall ever remember her devotion to us. She gave us cotton homespun and behaved like a friend. Ben, who we believed faithful, left us; he says, or said, he was forced to.”[13]

Many Jewish communities and congregations were decimated by the war. Although life went on in Norfolk, New Orleans, and Memphis, Charleston was practically destroyed by the Civil War. More dependent on slavery and the planter class than Richmond, besieged by an invading army for years, more remote from railroad lines, and bound to an agricultural economy, Charleston’s economic life came to a standstill. The ranks of the old Charleston Jewish families and the new German and Polish immigrant families were shattered by the war. Many had died: Thomas W. Mordecai, 4th South Carolina, in 1861 at Fort Moultrie; R. Blankensee, Hampton Legion, at First Manassas; Jacob Blankenstein, 15th South Carolina, near Richmond; Mikell. M. Goldsmith, 1st South Carolina Charleston Guard, killed accidentally in 1864; Isacc P. Goldsmith, 5th South Carolina, of disease; Jacob M. Hoffman, 10th South Carolina, at Franklin; Isaiah Jacobs, 2d South Carolina, at Chickamauga; 1st Lt. W. Myer Wolff, Co. G, 11th South Carolina, at Swift Creek; Mendel Brown, 10th South Carolina, at Atlanta; 5th Sgt. Jacob B. Cohen, Company A, 21st South Carolina, at Fort Fisher; Marx E. Cohen Jr., Hart's (South Carolina) Battery, at Bentonville. Add to this partial list a much longer list of the wounded, disabled, impoverished, the widows, the orphans and the grieving survivors, and it is apparent that the old Jewish elite of Charleston was no more.[14]

The leaders of congregation Shearith Israel took advantage of the military occupation to take over Beth Elohim's synagogue. The military authorities, now administering the laws and acting as the local government, gave possession of the temple to the Wentworth Street congregation until the Beth Elohim trustees petitioned Brig. Gen. William Gurney, the provost judge, "that they be put in possession and control of their Synagogue in Hasell Street." The military judge agreed with Benjamin D. Lazarus and B. F. Moise that the "congregation to which Mr. Moise belongs" had the right to the building on account of a decision by the state courts before the war.[15]

The once proud Jews of Charleston, like their fellow Charlestonians, were reduced to poverty and misery. Many prominent businessmen left the city to find work elsewhere. One-third of Beth Elohim's congregation were stricken from the rolls in 1867 for their inability to pay dues. A fund established before the war by Abraham Ottolengui for "poor Israelites" of the city, had among its applicants some of the formerly well-to-do, including Ottolengui himself.[16]

In January 1866, Beth Elohim's building was still not repaired and was so dilapidated and damaged that its few members met in the Hebrew Orphan Society building. The minutes noted that the "Organ, Chandeliers, Sepherim and Remonim … removed for safety" to Columbia for safekeeping were destroyed when "that City was invaded by the ruthless Army under command of General Sherman." Beth Elohim and Shearith Israel, soon voted to combine the two synagogues "on a basis of mutual concessions." The membership of Beth Elohim, the minutes noted, had been "disastrously diminished by death, and removals and by the ravages of War, its property … seriously damaged, and its finances greatly reduced." Charleston Jewry no longer had the luxury to debate the merits of Reform versus Orthodoxy. It had to survive. The new constitution was a compromise: the service would be a shortened version of the Orthodox Portuguese Minhag. The Wentworth Street synagogue would be sold; the two cemeteries on Coming Street would be combined. Secession on one level had ironically led to union on the congregational level.[17]

When the indefatigable journalist Rabbi Isaac Leeser visited Charleston in the summer of 1866, he found Shearith Israel "so greatly injured during the war, as almost to render it useless as a place of worship." He found Beth Elohim "much disfigured by the explosion of shells fired indiscriminately into Charleston during the protracted siege it underwent, and, by being so long closed, it suffered likewise by natural dilapidation." When Leeser went to Beth Elohim to preach on Saturday morning, June 2, 1866, he saw "the unwashed floor, the dust resting on the furniture and benches, many panes of glass broken, [and] the ceiling crushed in many places by the explosion of shells that penetrated the roof." The "Polish synagogue" on St. Philips Street, Lesser found, was "without a permanent minister." Leeser found that many of the assimilated Charleston Jews were dead or gone.[18] Charles Henry Moise, a grandson of Abraham and Sarah Moise from Haiti, served as president of Beth Elohim for four years. Moise spent a great deal of time raising funds up North to rebuild the Jewish community. Because he could not make a living in Reconstruction Charleston, Moise went to live with his brother Edwin in Sumter.[19]

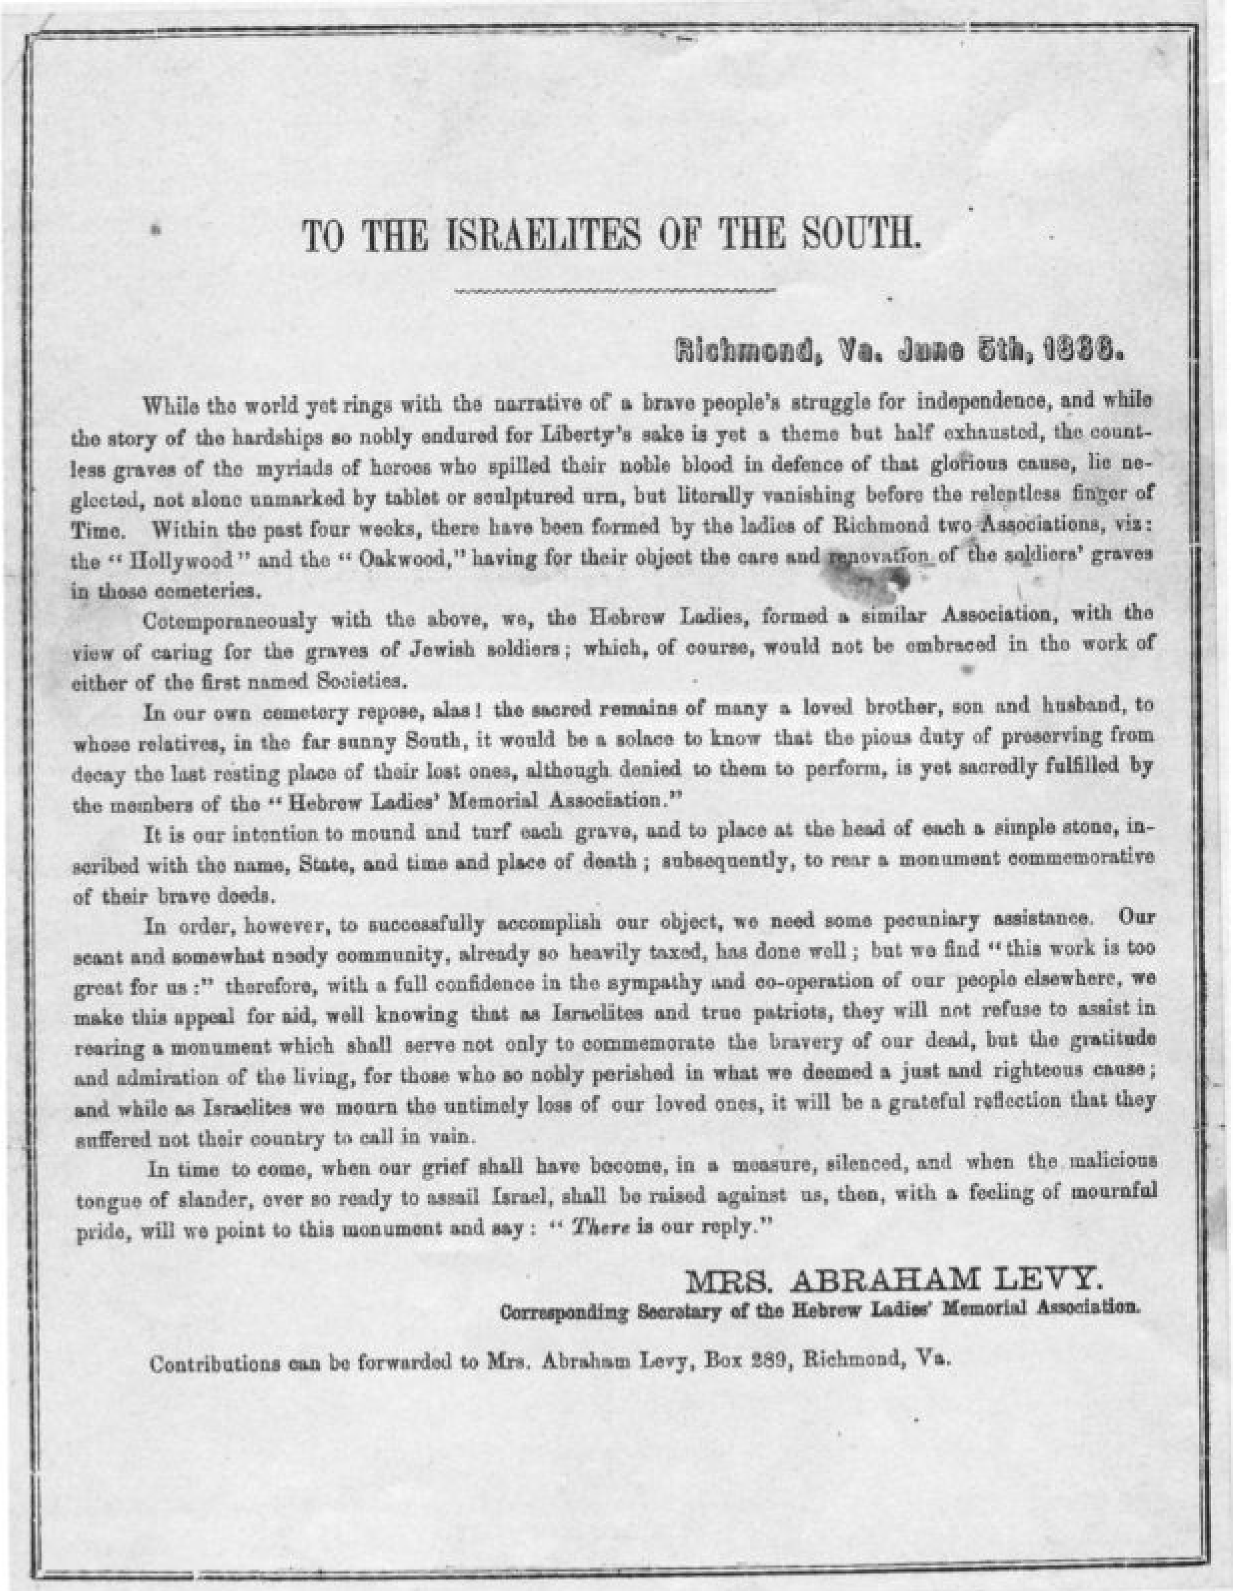
The Jewish community of Richmond was in deep despair after Appomattox. The old Virginia Jewish families could not abide the invaders. "Richmond is a strange looking place," Emma Mordecai confided to her diary, "with its heap of ruins, its streets transversed by U.S. Army wagons, sidewalks thronged with Yankee soldiers and saucy Negro women." Mordecai could not bear the thought of Yankees in Richmond. "Everything looks unnatural and desecrated," she wrote, "and the eye is offended by all it sees, and the ear by all it hears."[20] Like the Jews of Charleston, the members of Richmond's Jewry were subject to grinding poverty. Rosena Hutzler Levy recalled that all she and her husband Leopold Levy "had worked for & as he thought saved it … was swept away."[21] Jacob Ezekiel could not make a living and was forced to move in order to support his family. Richmonders, like Charlestonians, grieved for the many killed and wounded.[22]

Rabbi Leeser described Richmond in October 1865: "Suffering had been familiar to them in every shape, and the deprivation of many comforts of life had become habitual, and it is only wonderful that all this had left so few traces in them. It must be recorded to the credit of the Israelites of Richmond, that they kept up all their various organizations during the trials through which they had passed."[23] The returning soldiers took their places in the community. For four years, Beth Ahabah had been without its secretary, Capt. Ezekiel Levy. The congregational minutes of May 1865 reflected that Levy had returned to his congregational post.[24]

In 1866 Beth Shalome's Franklin Street cemetery was "a vacant lot, overrun with rank weeds and grass, showing the track of wagons and bearing the hoof-marks of horses and which is washed into deep ruts and gullies by the rains of many a season." The city had been badly damaged and, indeed, in some places destroyed, by the shelling and the fires set by looting mobs and the departing Confederate army in 1865.[25]

The Jewish women of Richmond formed the Hebrew Ladies' Memorial Association for the Confederate Dead. Many a Southern Jewish youth had died and been buried in Richmond. Jewish Richmonders took on the responsibility of caring for their graves. Their notice in the newspaper read as follows: "HEBREW LADIES MEMORIAL ASSOCIATION FOR CONFEDERATE DEAD.—A society has been formed by the Hebrew ladies of this city for the purpose of caring for the graves of the Israelitish soldiers of the Confederate army who have been interred in their cemetery on Shockoe Hill. This society will not come in conflict with the others already formed, but is merely intended for the deceased of their own persuasion, while they have all joined in the general associations for Hollywood and Oakwood, recently established. We will publish their proceedings shortly." A circular was sent out "To the Israelites of the South" asking for funds to "mound and turf each grave," to place simple stone markers, and eventually to erect a monument to the Jewish Confederate dead. Time was of the essence, the circular said. "While the world yet rings with the narrative of a brave people's struggle for independence," it began, and while the story of their noble sacrifices for liberty was fresh, the graves themselves were neglected. This was not a situation which Southern Jewry should allow. Southern Jews should remember "the myriads of heroes who spilled their noble blood" in defense of the "glorious cause." The circular was also designed to appeal to the Southern Jewish readers' fear of anti-Semitism: "In time to come," it concluded, "when the malicious tongue of slander, ever so ready to assail Israel, shall be raised against us, then, with feeling of mournful pride, will we point to this monument and say: 'There is our reply.'"[26]

Tending to graves became an important event. William B. Myers, Gustavus A. Myers's son and a former Confederate officer, designed the railing around the Confederate graves in the Hebrew Cemetery on Shockoe Hill, complete with furled flags, stacked muskets, and a Confederate flag. Every May the Jewish ladies would, like their Christian counterparts, "decorate" the graves of the Confederate dead with wreaths of roses and magnolias. In May 1869, the Richmond Dispatch contained this notice: "Hebrew Memorial Day. This is the day set apart by the Hebrew Ladies Memorial Association for the decoration of the graves of the young men of their nationality who fell in the Confederate struggle. They cordially invite the people of Richmond to unite with them in the sad but pleasing exercises, and contribution of flowers will be thankfully received. The Hebrew cemetery is in the northern part of the city—a pleasant walk or ride."[27]



TO THE ISRAELITES OF THE SOUTH.

Richmond, Va. June 5th, 1866.

While the world yet rings with the narrative of a brave people's struggle for independence, and while the story of the hardships so nobly endured for Liberty's sake is yet a theme but half exhausted, the countless graves of the myriads of heroes who spilled their noble blood in defence of that glorious cause, lie neglected, not alone unmarked by tablet or sculptured urn, but literally vanishing before the relentless finger of Time. Within the past four weeks, there have been formed by the ladies of Richmond two Associations, viz: the "Hollywood" and the "Oakwood," having for their object the care and renovation of the soldiers' graves in those cemeteries.

Cotemporaneously with the above, we, the Hebrew Ladies, formed a similar Association, with the view of caring for the graves of Jewish soldiers; which, of course, would not be embraced in the work of either of the first named Societies.

In our own cemetery repose, alas! the sacred remains of many a loved brother, son and husband, to whose relatives, in the far sunny South, it would be a solace to know that the pious duty of preserving from decay the last resting place of their lost ones, although denied to them to perform, is yet sacredly fulfilled by the members of the "Hebrew Ladies' Memorial Association."

It is our intention to mound and turf each grave, and to place at the head of each a simple stone, inscribed with the name, State, and time and place of death; subsequently, to rear a monument commemorative of their brave deeds.

In order, however, to successfully accomplish our object, we need some pecuniary assistance. Our scant and somewhat needy community, already so heavily taxed, has done well; but we find "this work is too great for us:" therefore, with a full confidence in the sympathy and co-operation of our people elsewhere, we make this appeal for aid, well knowing that as Israelites and true patriots, they will not refuse to assist in rearing a monument which shall serve not only to commemorate the bravery of our dead, but the gratitude and admiration of the living, for those who so nobly perished in what we deemed a just and righteous cause; and while as Israelites we mourn the untimely loss of our loved ones, it will be a grateful reflection that they suffered not their country to call in vain.

In time to come, when our grief shall have become, in a measure, silenced, and when the malicious tongue of slander, ever so ready to assail Israel, shall be raised against us, then, with a feeling of mournful pride, will we point to this monument and say: "There is our reply."

MRS. ABRAHAM LEVY.
Corresponding Secretary of the Hebrew Ladies' Memorial Association.

Contributions can be forwarded to Mrs. Abraham Levy, Box 289, Richmond, Va.

Circular sent to Southern Jews in 1866 by the Hebrew Ladies' Memorial Association. The Jewish women of Richmond raised funds to care for the graves of "the glorious dead" at the Hebrew Cemetery on Shockoe Hill. (Courtesy of Beth Ahabah Museum and Archives, Richmond, Virginia.)

The war certainly did not bring the contentious factions of Nashville Jewry together. A story in a Jewish periodical in 1867 described Nashville's 250 Jewish families as "divided into three groups [who] … do not cooperate…. The spirit of unity did not move them to establish and build a united synagogue, but each has bought a place to build its own house of worship, and that which one planned to build, the others plotted to destroy."[28] In 1868, two prewar synagogues united to form Khal Kodesh Ohava Sholom, later known as the Vine Street Temple. Former President Andrew Johnson, who had so many anti-Semitic things to say about Judah P. Benjamin and David Yulee, was one of the speakers at the dedication of the Temple in 1874. He told his listeners that he hoped the temple "would ever remain a monument to the industry, prosperity and welfare of the Jewish citizens of Nashville."[29]

Of course the Jewish South after the Civil War did not belong exclusively to native Southern Jewry. More Jewish immigrants from Germany, Poland, Russia, and the North came South during the Reconstruction years. Often poor, like the previous generation of peddlers, these new settlers, rejuvenated many moribund congregations and helped rebuild the shattered Southern economy.[30] These new settlers did not share the same feelings about the war as those who had lived through it, but there is little evidence that they played any significant political role in the Reconstruction era. Clearly, however, Jewish immigrants from abroad and the North played a substantial role in rebuilding Atlanta, Memphis, and Richmond.

Janice O. Rothschild wrote of these newcomers to Atlanta: "These enterprising young men [peddlers for Northern merchants] perceived that Atlanta, a booming hub of trade and transportation, would be a good place to go into business for themselves. By 1866 they were sufficiently prosperous to organize a social club, the Concordia Society, forerunner of the present Standard Club." In 1867 Rabbi Leeser returned to Atlanta to again urge the formation of a congregation. This time he succeeded. "The Israelites of the place," he wrote, "have rented a hall, purchased a Sepher [Torah] and intended holding services…. We expect much from Atlanta. The city has been fearfully devastated during the late war…. Still, it is a center of commerce…. Israelites will, to a certainty, take their share in the regeneration of Georgia."[31]

* * *

Before the war, Dr. Simon Baruch had courted Isabelle ("Belle") Wolfe, the daughter of a prominent Jewish planter, Saling Wolfe. Belle was the granddaughter of Charleston Rabbi Hartwig Cohen and the niece of Baruch's mentor, Mannes Baum. When the war ended, the Wolfes, like their fellow South Carolinians, were ruined and impoverished. Their fortune had been invested in Confederate money. The Wolfe plantation in Winnsboro—the home, the crops, the outbuildings—were all burned by Sherman's army. A neighbor found Mr. and Mrs. Wolfe "with all their little children gathered around them offering up prayers in Hebrew."[32] Simon Baruch married Isabelle Wolfe on November 28, 1867.[33] They lived in Camden, in the Midlands of South Carolina. Life was difficult in Reconstruction South Carolina. Baruch was a country doctor who soon had four children, including the second son, Bernard, born in Camden in 1870. (Bernard Baruch later became one of the most prominent Jews of the twentieth century, a friend and advisor to Franklin D. Roosevelt.)[34]

John and Jeanette Mayer continued to live in Natchez. Their son, Simon, returned from the war a hero. He had narrowly escaped being killed at the Battle of Franklin when a bullet passed through his hat but missed his head as he carried a message to Gen. Jacob H. Sharp when he served as acting adjutant. The Mayers's home was, according to their daughter, "the center of all Jewish festivities, and at the long dining table … there were often seated as many as thirty-five guests on Passover Eve, the feast of Seder, which was always celebrated with much 'pomp and ceremony.'" In 1865 the Jewish community was small. It had an Orthodox congregation, Chevra Kadusha (Holy Society), made up mainly of Polish Jews. The older families and German Jews soon established a Reform congregation, and a new temple was dedicated in 1871.[35]

When the war ended, the Lehman brothers were in business as Lehman, Durr & Co., still at Court Square in Montgomery. The business had to be rejuvenated, and the family worked diligently to rebuild its fortune. By 1866 Emanuel Lehman reactivated the New York office of Lehman Brothers at 176 Fulton Street. They also opened a New Orleans office the same year. In 1868 Mayer Lehman moved to New York, and Lehman Brothers soon became one of the largest brokers of commodities in New York City. The firm traded petroleum, coffee, and sugar as well as cotton.[36]

After the war, Thomas Cooper DeLeon moved to Baltimore, where he served as the editor of the Cosmopolite Magazine, lending a hand to his poverty-stricken colleagues from the South, including Phoebe Pember. The Cosmopolite published some portions of Pember's memoir, A Southern Woman's Story. DeLeon moved to New York City in 1866, where he wrote for newspapers and magazines and was a translator of French novels. He collected and edited South Songs, a collection of war poems of the South in 1866. In 1868, DeLeon moved to Mobile to become the managing editor of the Mobile Register. There, he became a well-known member of society, creating and managing the Mobile Mardi Gras Carnival for twenty-five years. He became the owner and editor of the Register in 1877 and also owned and edited the Gossip and the Gulf Citizen. He was a prolific writer, publishing plays, novels, and memoirs of the war. His Confederate poems included "Asleep with Jackson," an ode to Stonewall Jackson, and "Paladin and Poet," a tribute to Robert E. Lee. He wrote two journalistic memoirs of the Civil War, which have become classics: Four Years in Rebel Capitals, published in Mobile in 1890, and Belles, Beaux, and Brains of the ’60s.[37]

Thomas Cooper DeLeon served as a clerk in the Confederate government in Richmond. After the war, he became a noted Southern author, writing Four Years in Rebel Capitals and Belles, Beaux, and Brains of the ’60s, two Civil War classics. He also wrote Confederate poetry and, in later years, was known as “the Blind Poet of the Confederacy.” The Civil War–era DeLeons abandoned Judaism. They proved to be more Southern than Jewish, according to Jacob Rader Marcus (Gergel and Gergel, Tree of Life, 35). (Courtesy of South Caroliniana Library, University of South Carolina, Columbia.)

Yates Levy resumed the practice of law after the war and became the outspoken pro-Southern editor of the Daily Advertiser, a Savannah newspaper. His editorials during the Union occupation were not acceptable to General Meade, and he was forced to resign. His father wrote in 1868, “I should not be surprised if he again finds himself one of these days in prison.” He resumed the practice of law and was active in Mikve Israel, serving as the congregation’s attorney.[38]

Jacob and Fanny Levy survived the war and moved back to Savannah. Former Alabama Sen. Clement C. Clay and Jefferson Davis were among a group of prisoners that passed through Savannah on their way to Northern prisons on May 14, 1865. Clay and Davis were sent to Fort Monroe on the tip of the Virginia Peninsula.[39] Mrs. Clay followed them to Savannah so that she could be close to her husband. She relates in her charming memoir, A Belle of the Fifties (1904), a story of the Levy family:

> Just before leaving the hospitable coast city [Savannah], I was the guest of Mrs. Levy, mother of the brilliant Mrs. Philip Phillips, of Washington, of Mrs. Pember, and of Miss Martha Levy, one of the readiest wits I have ever known. During the evening … many guests were introduced, among them some of Savannah's prominent Hebrews. For an hour Miss Martha had been busy presenting her friends, both Christian and Jew, when one after another came Mr. Cohen, Mr. Salomon, Dr. Lazarus and Dr. Mordecai. At this remarkable procession my risibles proved triumphant. I glanced slyly at Miss Martha. Her eyes shown with mischief as she presented Dr. Mordecai. "And is Hayman here, too?" I asked.[40]

The extended Levy family cared passionately about the welfare of Varina and the imprisoned Jefferson Davis. The Davises were old friends of Eugenia and Philip Phillips and Henrietta Levy Cohen and her husband, Octavus Cohen. One of the Phillipses's daughters, Carolina Meyers, remembered in 1900 how much she valued her association with "that dear martyr Mr. Davis. As a girl, I often sat on his lap with my arms around his neck." After the war, Octavus Cohen took a leading role in raising funds for Mrs. Davis.[41]

The Levy family regrouped in Savannah and the younger members adjusted to the new order. By 1868 Clavius Phillips was socializing every night and even attending the opera. Like his fellow Southerners, Jacob C. Levy was devastated economically by the war and bitter about the Reconstruction government. He detested Republican rule. “There may be some choice to be sure in the Quality of the Scamps,” he wrote his daughters in 1868, “for the invading Yankees always make one believe they confer a favor on you in all that is done.”[42]

In later years after his presidency, Ulysses S. Grant made a tour of the South and stopped in Fernandina and visited for several days with the Yulees. David Yulee spent his later years pursuing his railroad and farming ventures. He continued to be an officer or director of the Florida Railroad Company until his death. Not only did time cool the hatred of his captors, but Yulee was even compensated in later years for his efforts on behalf of the railroad during the Civil War. The company prospered in the postwar era, and the rail lines over which two armies made war were gradually absorbed by bigger companies. Yulee retired with a comfortable income. He had been the great Floridian of antebellum Florida history, and he had mapped out his state’s internal improvement system and its railroads.[43]

When Maj. Alroy Jonas returned to Aberdeen, Mississippi, in 1865, he was, like most Southerners, broke. On a shoestring budget, he established the Aberdeen Examiner, which was published weekly, and Jonas was its editor for fifty years. He married a Methodist woman of Aberdeen, and their children were raised in the Methodist church. The major apparently never joined a church, but must have ceased the practice of Judaism. Yet he was always considered to be Jewish.[44]

Jonas became something of a local character. His office was a curiosity shop, having, one local newspaperman said, “more the appearance of an agricultural museum than newspaper establishment.” When Sen. L. Q. C. Lamar of Mississippi was appointed chairman of the senate committee on the Mississippi River and Tributaries, Jonas was appointed clerk and Lamar’s secretary. Jonas’s fortunes in Washington, like those of all white Southerners of the period, rose and fell with those of the Democratic Party. He moved to Washington for a time, where his brother, Frank Jonas, was a senator from Louisiana. Then he served on the staff of the sergeant at arms, as secretary to the Assistant Secretary of the Interior Colonel Muldrew, and as Lamar’s clerk when Lamar became secretary of the interior.[45]

Maj. Alroy Jonas, the author of the famous poem "Lines on the Back of a Confederate Note." (Courtesy of Mel Young, Chattanooga, Tennessee.)

* * *

Jewish Southerners who had served in the Confederate army and who had supported the South's war for independence were outraged by the Federal military occupation and Reconstruction. In 1868 Octavia Harby Moses of Sumter, South Carolina, wrote a poem about her dead son, Josh Moses, containing these lines:

The lovely land thou died'st to save,

Is ruled by traitor and by slave,

Wretches who in their thirst for gain,

An eminence of guilt attain.[46]

Some of the old Southern Jewish elite, like some of their former comrades in arms, returned to power at the end of Reconstruction. Indeed, a number of Jewish Confederates were active in the Conservative (or "Bourbon" or "Redeemer") Movement, which returned the old antebellum elite and a new business elite to power. Three Jewish Confederate officers in particular played prominent roles in the Reconstruction era: Edwin Warren Moise of South Carolina, who had served with Wade Hampton in Virginia and North Carolina; Raphael J. Moses, who had served with Longstreet at Gettysburg; and Benjamin Franklin Jonas of Louisiana, who was sergeant major of Fenner's battery.

When the war ended, Frank Jonas returned to New Orleans, where he practiced law with Henry Hyams. He became a key leader of the Democratic Party in Reconstruction Louisiana. Elected to the Louisiana House of Representatives in 1865, Jonas served as chairman of the finance committee. The Picayune observed that the legislature was charged with nothing less than the reorganization of the entire civil government. Louisiana whites intended to control the state government and keep the black population from exercising many of their newly created rights. The Federal government disagreed, and the legislature was dissolved by Maj. Gen. Philip Sheridan of the occupation army. In 1872 Jonas was nominated as lieutenant governor on a ticket with John McEnery, when the native white Louisianians attempted unsuccessfully to take the reigns of power from the Republican regime. But with the formation of the "fusion ticket," Jonas withdrew in favor of another candidate. He was elected to the state senate in the same year and sat in that body as long as McEnery was governor. When the Federal courts declared that the Republican candidate had been elected governor, Jonas refused to serve, even though he was chosen by the election boards of both Republicans and Democrats. In the colorful language of Louisiana politics, Jonas's supporters later boasted that "he refused to sit in the Legislature created by fraud, by the midnight order of a drunken Federal Judge, and maintained by the bayonets of United States troops." Jonas later told the U.S. Senate, "I never entered the door or took my seat by the grace of military permission."[47]

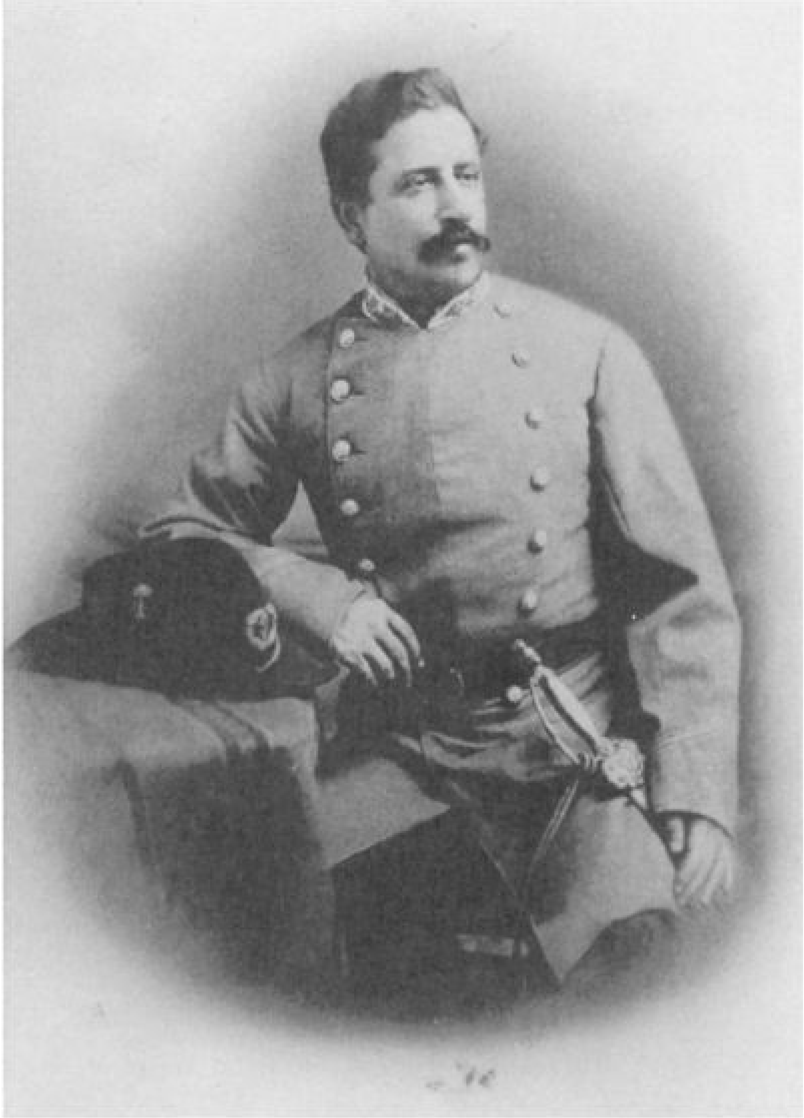
Sen. Benjamin Franklin Jonas. Frank Jonas's father, Abraham, served in the Illinois legislature with Abraham Lincoln. Frank Jonas moved to New Orleans and fought in Fenner's battery. He was elected city attorney of New Orleans and then to the U.S. Senate in 1876, becoming the first practicing Jew elected to the Senate. (Courtesy of Tulane University.)

Louisiana politics was among the most turbulent in the Southern states during Reconstruction. Military rule was accompanied by violent and at times deadly factionalism and racial confrontation. For a time after the 1872 election, the state had two governors and two legislatures which even the U.S. Army could not subdue. Jonas was regarded as a key leader of the old regime by the opposition. A carpetbagger from Vermont, Marshall H. Twitchell, who would have served in the Louisiana Senate with Jonas, wrote: "In the Senate a party of newly elected extremists under the leadership of a little wizened-faced person by the name of Jonas decided they would not take the oath" written by the carpetbag regime. "Lit-the Jonas never forgave me," Twitchell concluded.[48]

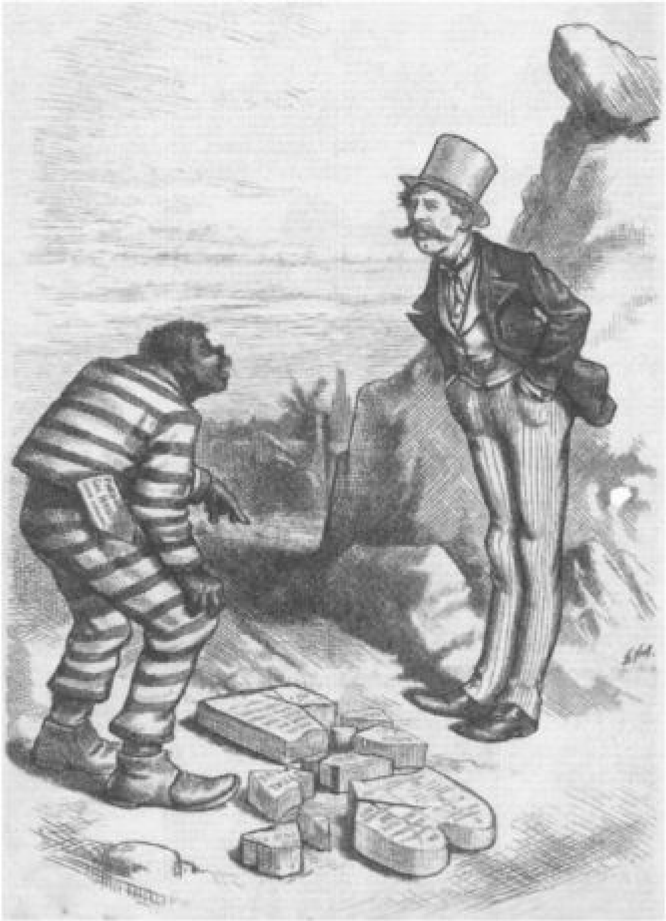
Jonas was a brilliant attorney. He became city attorney of New Orleans in 1875 and was elected to the state legislature in the tumultuous year of 1876. He served as chairman of the Judiciary Committee in 1877 and 1878 and was an ally of Governor Nicholls in his efforts to expel the Republicans from the state supreme court, framing and offering the legislative resolutions on this controversial issue. He undoubtedly helped to organize the crowd of armed citizens who went to the supreme court to "install" the newly elected justices and eject the Republican court.[49] At the height of his political power, Jonas was elected U.S. senator in 1879. No doubt many in the Louisiana legislature saw in Benjamin F. Jonas a reincarnation of Judah P. Benjamin.

Capt. Edwin W. Moise surrendered with Wade Hampton at Greensboro, North Carolina. He returned to Columbus, Georgia, but saw no future there and then moved to Sumter, South Carolina, where some of his family lived. He arrived, Harold Moise wrote, "riding a wounded horse and paid the first month's board for his family of a wife and five children from the sale of that horse." He built a law practice, went into politics, and wrote for the local newspaper. The charismatic Moise, now in his early thirties, became one of the most successful trial lawyers in the region and a noted orator as well. A physically powerful, energetic man, he was a natural leader who campaigned effectively for his many political friends. He was involved in community affairs and even represented the Episcopal Church. While he himself was a practicing Jew, he was invited to become an honorary member of the vestry, an invitation he declined.[50]

Like Jonas, Moise was a bitter opponent of the Reconstruction government. South Carolina, like Louisiana, suffered under one of the most corrupt state governments in American history. Indeed, Gov. Franklin J. Moses Jr., the son of a Jewish father (but raised as a Protestant) became known as the "Robber Governor" on account of his acceptance of bribes and misappropriation of funds. He was, wrote R. H. Woody, "the most perfect scalawag, perhaps, in all the South." Moses served as governor in the early 1870s, and after his two-year term ended, the Republicans would not renominate him. When he was elected a circuit judge for the Sumter area by his cronies in the legislature, Edwin Moise, by then a well-respected Sumter lawyer, threatened to shoot and kill Moses if he came to Sumter. (Gov. Daniel Chamberlain refused to issue the commission, and Moses never served.) The Jewish Moses families of Sumter changed their names to DeLeon and Harby to avoid any identification with the governor.[51]



Edwin Warren Moise, a South Carolina native, raised a company of men for the Confederate army in Columbus, Georgia, where he resided. Known as the "Moise Rangers," it was one of the few Confederate companies named for a Jewish Confederate. A captain, Moise served with the 7th Cavalry under Gen. Wade Hampton and was one of the commanders of "the Great Beefsteak Raid" in 1864. After the war, he was an energetic Hampton lieutenant in Reconstruction South Carolina and commander of the Red Shirts. He was elected adjutant general of the state in the tumultuous 1876 election. (Courtesy of the Jacob Rader Marcus Center, American Jewish Archives, Cincinnati, Ohio.)



Franklin J. Moses Jr., the “Robber Governor” of South Carolina, was the very essence of a scalawag. He is depicted here in a political carton by Thomas Nast. Despite the fact that he had been raised as a Christian, the public and the press identified him with the Jewish religion because of his name and background, and indeed Moses had many connections to the South Carolina Jewish community. (Author’s collection.)

Franklin J. Moses Sr. had been a distinguished lawyer and state senator for twenty years before the war. After the war and during Reconstruction, he was elected chief justice of the South Carolina Supreme Court. Like his son, he was alienated from the white majority. But, unlike his son, he was an honest and competent jurist. “He was a man of recognized ability,” Simkins and Woody wrote, “and served with distinction until his death.”[52] The News and Courier lamented his death while deploring his connection with the Reconstruction government. “It is pleasantest to know,” the Charleston paper concluded, that Judge Moses was about to rule in favor of Wade Hampton’s contested election as governor, but death prevented Moses from delivering the opinion. “The act that would have blotted out the past he was not, in God’s Providence, allowed to perform. From the heights, like the Hebrew lawgiver, he might look down upon the land where reigned plenteousness and peace, but he had not kept the faith, and in the flesh he might not enter in."[53]

In the dramatic election of 1876 in which the fate of Republican rule, and indeed the continuation of Reconstruction, was at stake, Moise enthusiastically supported his former commander, Wade Hampton, for governor. This campaign—which pitted Hampton's Red Shirts, a volunteer armed organization, against the Republicans led by carpetbagger Daniel H. Chamberlain—included intimidation of blacks by some and the wooing of black voters by others. Moise ran for adjutant general on Hampton's ticket and commanded the Red Shirts, who engaged in armed intimidation at times. He made numerous appearances and speeches to rally South Carolinians to elect Hampton and overthrow Republican rule. While Moise counseled moderation and nonviolence, he directed the armed might of Hampton's followers. Moise stumped the state and spoke to black audiences on behalf of Hampton's candidacy. "The only brand Wade Hampton's slaves ever wore," he exclaimed, "was the name of their master stamped on their loving hearts."[54] The office of adjutant general was especially critical in 1876 because the successful candidate would command the state's militia. The election was permeated by fraud, bribery, and intimidation. Both candidates claimed to have been elected. In fact, as had happened in Louisiana earlier, rival general assemblies existed. This time, though, the outcome was different. As part of a bargain in the disputed presidential election of 1876, Rutherford B. Hayes withdrew the last of the Federal troops from South Carolina and the Reconstruction government collapsed.

Moise was elected adjutant general and commanded the militia in a fair and evenhanded way. He was now a general. Like Hampton, Moise was a moderate on racial issues, inviting black South Carolinians to join the militia even in the racially charged atmosphere of the 1870s. Moise served a second term as adjutant general but declined reelection in 1880. He ran for Congress in 1892 but was defeated. By then, Moise had become a fierce opponent of "Pitchfork" Ben Tillman, the Populist demagogue. He retired from the law to tend his little farms near Sumter but remained active in civic affairs.[55]

Like his brother Confederate officers, Raphael Moses detested the Reconstruction regime in Georgia: "we were," he wrote, "surrounded by spies, carpetbaggers, a class of politicians, men without character who came from the North in swarms seeking whom they might devour." Columbus society, like Southern society generally, was "upheaved and the bottom turned on top by the revolution." Moses felt that his fortunes, like those of other members of the gentry, were destroyed by the war and the bitter reconstruction. "No one except one who had passed through the ordeal can realize the changes of fortune … [and] change of position, that takes place in a generation following a revolution."[56] Ironically, because Moses had never held elective office, he was one of the few prominent men in Muskogee County eligible to serve in the legislature under the early Reconstruction laws. He was elected to the Georgia House of Representatives and was appointed chairman of the Judiciary Committee. He was described in The Occident in April 1866 as the acknowledged leader of the House, "a short, heavy-built Israelite—proud of his tribe—with raven hair … and dark eyes, languid in repose, but which when aroused kindle with Promethean fire…. Being chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, he is often called to address the House, and never fails to command attention."[57]

Moses was regarded as an outstanding orator and a man of integrity. When the state decided to create a lottery designed, ostensibly, to fund a Confederate orphan's home, Moses opposed it because he believed it would result in corruption, and he knew and distrusted the proponents. Unable to defeat the bill, he offered an amendment at the last minute replacing all of the trustees, except the bill's proponent, with Confederate widows. He eulogized their dead husbands, and the amendment passed by an overwhelming majority. Moses took on the oversight of the lottery by acting as advisor to the widows on the board, all of whom were paid handsome salaries for the times. Eventually, Moses was able to catch the manager and his staff in corrupt practices and did his best to keep the lottery honest.[58]

Moses remained active in politics after the war, but, except for another brief term in the Georgia House in 1877, he never held another elective office, although he was a candidate for several. He was in the thick of the resistance to the Reconstruction regime in Georgia, in one instance acting as counsel for a group of young white men, the "Columbus Prisoners," accused of killing a carpetbagger politician, George W. Ashburn. When funds were raised to pay the legal fees, Moses and his fellow Columbus lawyers gave the money to the Democratic Club. (The trial was suspended and never concluded.)[59]

Moses was pugnacious when defending his religion, and, as he was both an experienced soldier (and presumably a good shot) and hot-tempered, few chose to antagonize him. Once, in the 1870s, Moses took on the case of a Jewish immigrant to Columbus named Koemeker who had saved a thousand dollars to visit his mother in Germany. He obtained a check with his cash to be used in New York. Unbeknownst to Koerneker or anyone else, the bank was in the midst of collapse, and the local bankers, who took the poor immigrant's money, knew full well the check would not be honored in New York. Koerneker had to abandon his trip. The bank went into bankruptcy. Moses fought the bankruptcy and "had no hesitancy in saying on the streets that if [the banker] had purchased a check from Koerneker, a Jewish Banker, under the same circumstances, the Jew would have been hung to a lamp post."[60]

In 1877 he was reelected to the Georgia House. In 1878, he campaigned vigorously for a candidate named Harris in the congressional race. At a campaign rally when Moses was not present, Harris's opponent, Tuggle, attacked Moses as a Jew. Moses was livid. He published an open letter to Tuggle in which he took the candidate to task: "You could not have honored me more highly, nor distinguished me more gratefully than by proclaiming me a Jew," he began. "I am proud of my lineage and my race; in your severest censure you cannot name an act of my life which dishonors either, or which would mar the character of a Christian gentleman." The letter continued: "Would you honor me? Call me a Jew. Would you place in unenviable prominence your own unchristian prejudices and narrow minded bigotry? Call me a Jew. Would you offer a living example of a man into whose educated mind toleration can not enter—on whose heart the spirit of liberty and the progress of American principles have made no impression? You can find it illustrated in yourself."[61]

Moses's finances declined after the war. Like many Southerners, he lost a fortune. He had invested money in forty-seven slaves. When the war ended, he wrote, "I had forty-seven free men. All left me except one—old London, he stayed with me until he died." His crops could not be sold. He owed money he could not repay. He had earned nothing from his law practice for years.[62]

Finally, he retired to The Esquiline, where he lived quietly with his wife, Eliza; his daughter Isabel; her husband, Lionel Levy; and their children. Moses kept in touch with his children and his grandchildren. When William Moultrie Moses died in 1879, his widow, Raphael's daughter Penina, came to live at The Esquiline with her children. Among the children was seven-year-old Stanford. Years later, when Stanford Moses entered the Naval Academy at Annapolis, Raphael Moses wrote him a long letter filled with advice. He instilled in his grandson pride in being Jewish: "You can point to your ancestry and show the wisdom of Solomon, the poetry of David, the music of Miriam and the courage of the Maccabees. Who can excel you in your past?"[63]

The greatest of the Jewish Confederates had gone to England. Judah Benjamin wrote a former colleague, Senator Bayard of Delaware, that he had arrived "on the 30th of August, nearly four months after my separation from the President, during which time I had spent twenty-three days seated in the thwart of an open boat, exposed to the tropical sun in June and July, utterly without shelter or change of clothes. I never, however, had one minute's indisposition or despondency but was rather pleased by the feeling of triumph in disappointing the malice of my enemies."[64]

Benjamin Disraeli offered to assist him. Shortly after his arrival, he visited with Sir Frederick Pollock, lord chief baron of the exchequer, and his family. When Sir Frederick's daughter asked him what the Northerners would have done to him if they had caught him, he replied that they probably would have put him to death. When the young lady exclaimed "in horror at such an atrocity, he said apologetically that party feelings ran so high just then that his side might have done the same, had the circumstances been reversed." The former attorney general of the Confederacy and nominee to the Supreme Court of the United States now became a law student again at age fifty-five at Lincoln's Inn. He wrote for newspapers to earn a living, and at one low point despaired of making a living. But Benjamin persevered at his first and only love of his life: the law.[65]

The English bar quickly accepted Benjamin, and he became a member of the esteemed Charles Pollock's chambers. He wrote an authoritative treatise on the law of sale of personal property, which came to be known as Benjamin on Sales, and gradually advanced to the front ranks of the bar. He became a queen's counsel and developed a profitable commercial and appellate law practice in the Northern Circuit, Liverpool, the port to which the South exported its prewar cotton and a city where he was well known to the business, legal, and political communities. He was so successful that he eventually limited his practice to the highest courts in the land, the House of Lords and the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. His cases involved important legal issues or substantial financial interests. He became an acknowledged expert on international commercial law. His cases involved appeals from former French colonies ceded to England, the supreme courts of Canada and New Zealand, the consular courts of Constantinople, and the court of appeals of Malta, among other exotic jurisdictions.[66]

Despite Benjamin's resolve to stay out of political matters and never look back to his former life, he was compelled in September of 1865, only months after arriving in England, to come to the defense of Jefferson Davis. The former president was being held under deplorable circumstances as a prisoner in Fort Monroe, shackled to the wall in a damp cell. His health was failing. Benjamin, outraged by this barbaric mistreatment of his former chief, wrote a long letter to the London Times defending Davis's record, his integrity, and his honor. He knew Davis better, he wrote, "than he is known by any other living man," and he told the readers of the Times (and readers in the United States, because he knew the letter would be reprinted widely), "Neither in private conversation nor in Cabinet council have I ever heard him utter one unworthy thought, one ungenerous sentiment." Davis consistently rejected any plan to inflict atrocities on the enemy, Benjamin argued. Davis, for his part, told the prison doctor that Judah Benjamin had been "the ablest and most faithful member of his advisory council."[67]

In 1868 Jefferson and Varina Davis traveled to England and spent considerable time in the company of their fellow former Confederates. Benjamin met the Davises in Paris and attended a round of parties and receptions in their honor. Benjamin helped Davis in the preparation of his memoirs, but only on the condition that he be left out of it.[68]

When at the age of seventy-two Judah Benjamin retired, the London Times called him "almost the leader of the English Bar in all heavy appeal cases, and 'in the widest sense of the term, an international lawyer.'" Lamenting that he was not made a judge, the Times noted that Benjamin had "equal authority with a standard text-book." He was so popular with the English bar that its leaders all gathered for a farewell dinner in his honor at the Inner Temple Hall in London. More than two hundred lawyers and judges, including the lord chancellor, the attorney general, the lord chief justice, the solicitor general, and other distinguished guests, came to pay tribute to one of Great Britain's greatest advocates.[69]

Benjamin remained married to Natalie, and he continued supporting her and their daughter Ninette. He gave up all of his savings to create a dowry for his daughter when she wed Henri deBousignac, a French army captain, in a Catholic ceremony in Paris. He determined to retire to Paris one day. He built a mansion there, on the Avenue d'Iena. While on a brief visit to Paris in 1880, he was severely injured as he attempted to jump off a moving trolley car, as he was used to doing thirty years earlier in New Orleans. He died at home in Paris in his mansion near the Arc de Triomphe on May 6, 1884.[70]

Judah P. Benjamin in his barrister's wig after the war. (Author's collection.)

Solomon Benjamin, Judah's older brother, had died shortly after the war. Brother Joseph Benjamin also left the country and settled in Spanish Honduras. "And here," Robert Douthat Meade concludes, "after various vicissitudes, this cultured graduate of the University of North Carolina operated a store and plantation near Puerto Cortes." Joseph's descendants, still living in Honduras in the 1940s, are perhaps Judah P. Benjamin's nearest relatives.[71]

Benjamin never forgot the South. When he resided in England, he never claimed British citizenship, and in his application to study law at Lincoln's Inn he stated simply that his father was a merchant of Charleston, South Carolina. In his letters home, he said he could not bring himself to return to New Orleans and see firsthand the carpetbaggers in power. Toward the end of his life, he told a visitor from home: "Louisiana … remember me there."[72]

EPILOGUE

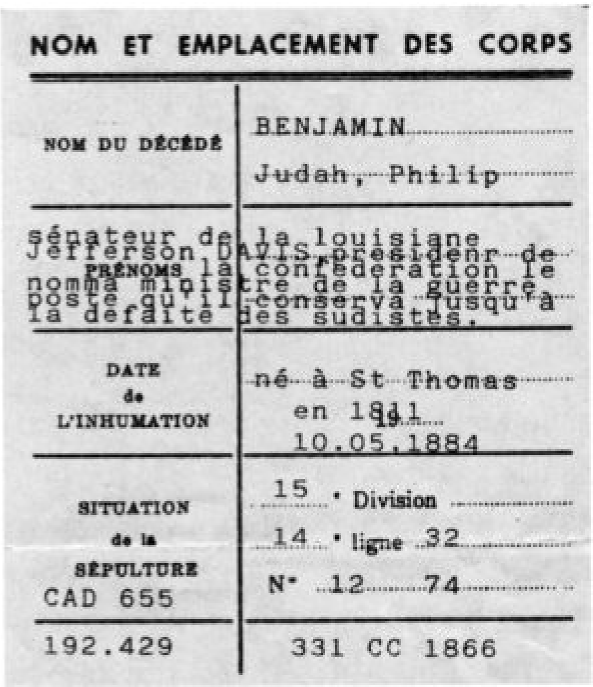
★

It Seems Like a Dream As We Look Back

Remember the days of old, consider the years of many generations: ask thy father, and he will show thee; thy elders, and they will tell thee.

Moses' song of farewell to the Israelites, Deuteronomy 32:7

Judah P. Benjamin lies buried in Père Lachaise Cemetery in Paris. The official record card reads as follows: "BENJAMIN, Judah Philip, sénateur de la louisiane, Jefferson DAVIS, président de la confédération le nomma ministre de la guerre poste qu'il conserva jusqu'a la défaite des sudistes" (senator from Louisiana, named secretary of war by Confederate President Jefferson Davis, he served until the Southerners were defeated.) The gravesite gave no indication of who he was until, in 1938, the United Daughters of the Confederacy, Paris chapter, placed a plaque on his grave identifying him as attorney general, secretary of war, and secretary of state of the Confederate States of America.[1] He wanted history to forget him. He had discouraged biographers and destroyed his papers.



NOM ET EMPLACEMENT DES CORPS

NOM DU DÉCÉDÉ	BENJAMIN Judah, Philip
PRÉNOMS	sénateur de la louisiane Jefferson DAVIS presidenr de la confederation le nomma ministre de la guerre poste qu'il conserva jusqu'à la défaite des sudistes.
DATE de L'INHUMATION	né à St Thomas en 1811 10.05.1884
SITUATION de la SÉPULTURE CAD 655	15 • Division 14 • ligne 32 N° 12 74
192.429	331 CC 1866

The record of Judah Benjamin's burial at Père Lachaise Cemetery in Paris. (Author's collection.)

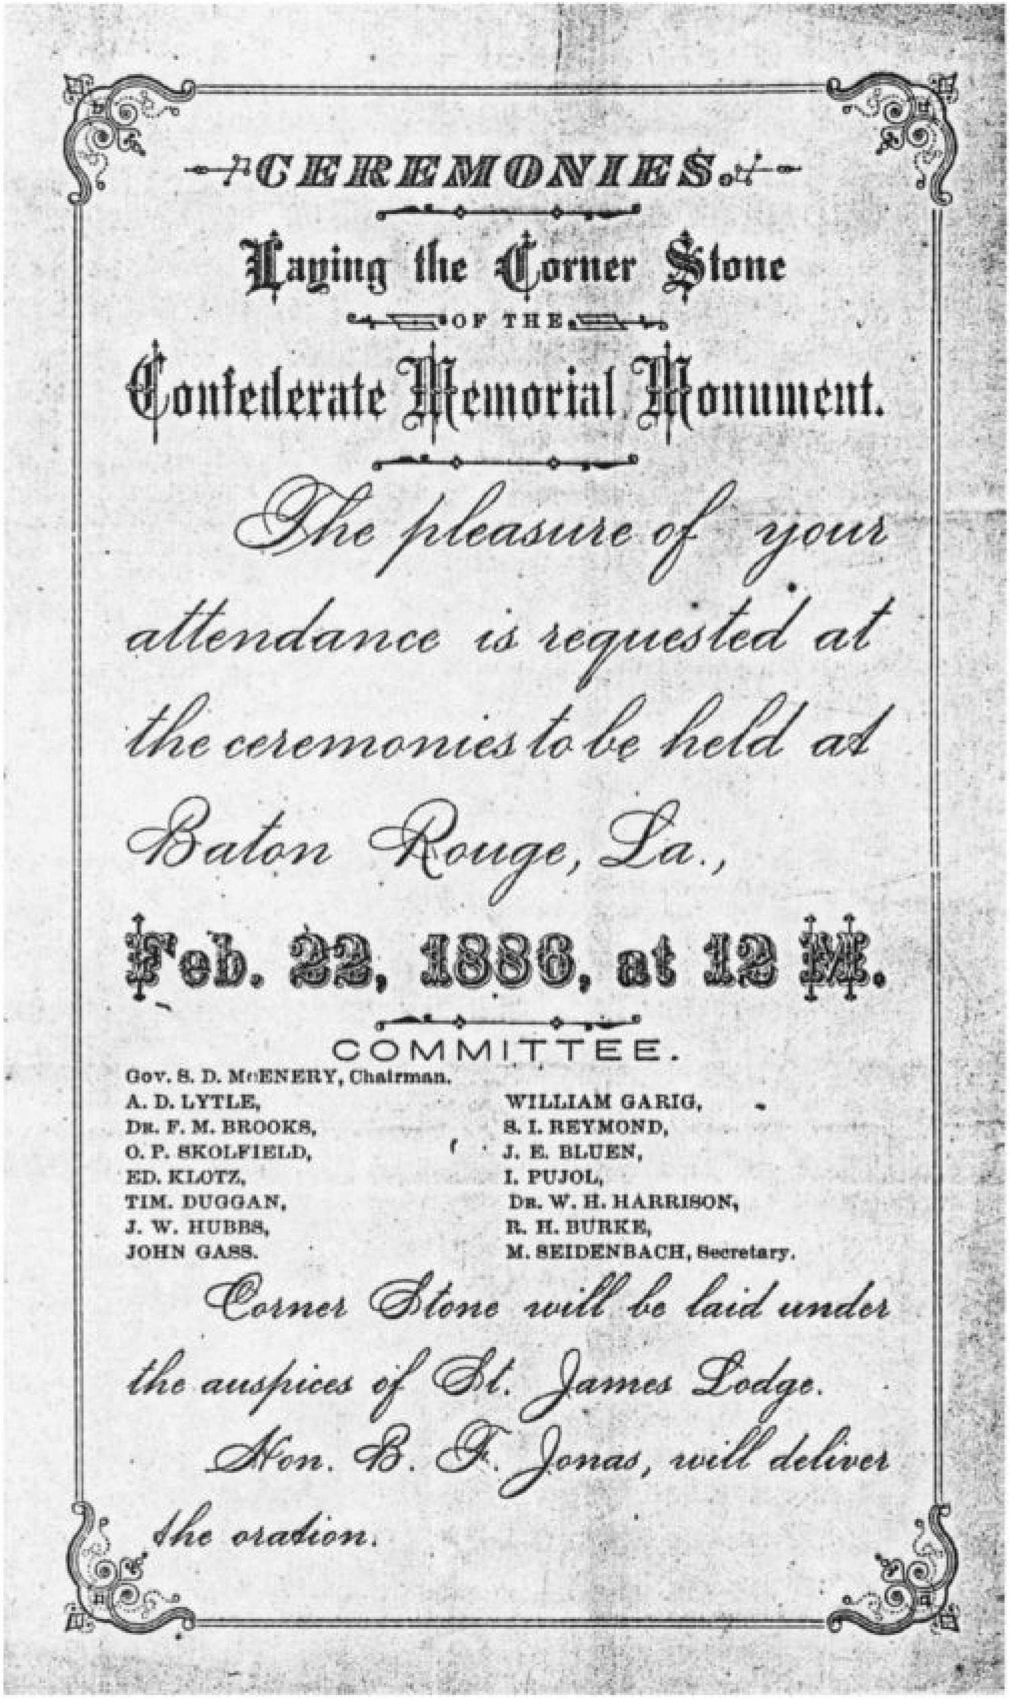
But people did not forget him. In 1889, Benjamin's nephew Ernest Benjamin Kruttschnitt was asked by Varina Howell Davis to serve as a pallbearer at the funeral of her husband. She had not forgotten Benjamin and wanted to honor his memory as her husband would have wished. In 1906, when Kruttschnitt died, the New Orleans Item editorialized, "His mother was sister of that orator, statesman and lawyer, Judah P. Benjamin, and it is the inherited qualities of his ancestors that irradiated his life."[2]

In 1911 Confederate Veterans celebrated the centennial of Benjamin's birth. In Florida in 1925, the United Daughters of the Confederacy saved from destruction the Gamble Mansion, where Benjamin had hidden out during his escape through Florida. (The house has since been deeded to the State of Florida.) In 1927 Stephen Vincent Benét published his monumental poem John Brown's Body, referring to Benjamin as "the dapper Jew / Seal-sleek, black-eyed, lawyer and epicure / aide, well-hated, face alive with life." In 1930 the City Council of Richmond granted approval to the Stonewall Jackson Camp, Sons of Confederate Veterans, to erect a monument to Benjamin at the intersection of Monument and Malvern Avenues "to perpetuate the character and services of the Honorable Judah P. Benjamin." In the 1930s, the Louisiana State Museum made an effort to preserve Belle Chasse but failed. In 1942 the United Daughters of the Confederacy arranged for the erection of a memorial marker in Sarasota, Florida. The governor of Florida attended the ceremony. In 1948 the two Jewish congregations of Charlotte made a gift of a monument to Benjamin on South Tryon Street (between Third and Fourth Streets) to the North Carolina Division of the UDC.[3]

Why did Judah Benjamin's memory survive? "Without a question," Rabbi Korn wrote, "he achieved greater political power than any other Jew in American history." Rabbi Calisch of Richmond explained his meaning for Southern Jews in 1902: "I stand here in the name of the Jewish community of this city.… Judah P. Benjamin was born of Jewish parents and reared as a Jewish child. I have not been able to discover if he was an observing Jew or not. But this I know, had he been a traitor we would have had to bear the ignominy of his wrong doing—but as he was a hero, a statesman, a gentleman and a patriot, we claim the privilege of sharing in the reflection of his glory."[4]

* * *

In 1886 Sen. Benjamin F. Jonas gave the main address at the laying of the cornerstone of the monument to the Confederate dead at Baton Rouge. Representatives of the regiments and military organizations Louisiana sent into the field were present. "Over twenty years have past since the last gun was fired in the civil war," he told his listeners, "and since the last soldier who gave his life to the cause which he espoused was gathered to his rest." Looking back to 1861, Jonas said, "the call to arms, North and South—all of these strange things passed with the rapidity of a dream, and it seems like a dream as we look back upon them after the lapse of twenty-five years." The old soldiers, now in "the afternoon of life … with the shadows of evening gathering," the former Confederate continued, "look back through the twenty years of trials and struggles … without regret over precious years wasted and sacrifices made in vain, but with feelings of melancholy satisfaction and pride over duty done." He closed on a personal note, recalling his own wartime experience: "In memory, I see again these regiments and battalions starting for the front, with music and banners and all the panoply of war, and memory brings back to me, and to all of you, the recollection of loved faces and brave hearts of many who were marching in the ranks. … We cannot strew flowers upon their scattered graves; we cannot mark their unknown resting places with stone or monument … but we erect this monument in their honor that all people in all time to come may know that the soldiers who died for the Confederate cause are not without love and honor and reverence in the land which gave them birth."[5]



CEREMONIES.

Laying the Corner Stone

OF THE

Confederate Memorial Monument.

The pleasure of your attendance is requested at the ceremonies to be held at Baton Rouge, La.,

Feb. 22, 1886, at 12 M.

COMMITTEE.

Gov. S. D. McENERY, Chairman.
A. D. LYTLE,
Dr. F. M. BROOKS,
O. P. SKOLFIELD,
ED. KLOTZ,
TIM. DUGGAN,
J. W. HUBBS,
JOHN GASS.
WILLIAM GARIG,
S. I. REYMOND,
J. E. BLUEN,
I. PUJOL,
Dr. W. H. HARRISON,
R. H. BURKE,
M. SEIDENBACH, Secretary.

Corner Stone will be laid under the auspices of St. James Lodge.

Hon. B. F. Jonas, will deliver the oration.

Invitation to the ceremonies laying the cornerstone of the Confederate memorial monument in Baton Rouge, 1886. "Hon. B. F. Jonas will deliver the oration." (Author's collection.)

One by one the old Jewish Confederates passed into history.

In 1866, Edwin Kursheedt of the Washington Artillery married “Miss Sallie” Levy of Richmond. They returned to New Orleans, where Kursheedt resumed his occupation as a merchant. He was later in the hardware business and served as assistant postmaster of New Orleans. He continued to serve in the Washington Artillery. Active in the Jewish community, he was president of the Jewish Orphan’s Home and treasurer of the Touro Infirmary. Upon his death, he was buried with full military honors attended by the members of his old company. His casket was wrapped in the battle flag of the Washington Artillery.[6]

Solomon and Fanny Cohen alternated between living in New Orleans and Meridian, Mississippi, where they operated stores selling boots, shoes, saddles, and custom-made leather goods. “In both,” his daughter remembered, “Solomon sat reading and studying while Fanny took care of the customers.” The 1880 census shows Solomon married to Fannie, living in New Orleans with three daughters, Cecelia, Laura, and Minni, and two elderly servants, both Irish. Their descendants live in New Orleans today.[7]

Harris Kempner of Galveston, Texas. (Courtesy of the Jacob Rader Marcus Center, American Jewish Archives, Cincinnati, Ohio.)

The young Polish immigrant who settled in Cold Springs, Texas, Harris Kempner, returned to his general merchandising business. He had invested his funds, Jacinto County’s funds, and his neighbors’ funds wisely during the war. In the 1870s, Kempner moved to Galveston, where he went into the wholesale grocery business. He later owned a cotton factory, a merchant bank, hotels, manufacturing plants, cotton baling plants, and interests in railroads and shipping. He was an early and enthusiastic member of the Confederate Veterans. In 1885 he organized and supported a militia unit, the Kempner Rifles. By his death in 1894, Harris “Herschell” Kempner was one of the wealthiest men in Texas.[8]

Leopold Levy returned to Richmond after the war and went into the supply and grocery business. He was one of the first members of the Robert E. Lee Camp Number One of the Confederate Veterans and became a director in the Veteran Cavalry Association of the Army of Northern Virginia. He was an early member of the Tobacco Exchange and a prominent businessman. He died in November 1897. The R. E. Lee Camp reported “the death of our beloved and esteemed comrade.” His funeral took place from his residence at 15 East Marshall Street, Rabbi Calisch presiding. He was buried in the Hebrew Cemetery. Eight members of the camp were detailed to attend Levy’s funeral.[9] In January 1988 the descendants of Leopold Levy were included in a commemoration of the birthday anniversaries of Robert E. Lee and “Stonewall” Jackson at the Virginia State Capitol in Richmond.[10]

Eliza Moses died in June of 1892 at the age of eighty. Raphael Moses survived her by sixteen months. In 1893 the old soldier embarked on a pleasure trip to Europe with his daughter Mathilda and her husband, Robert Samuel. He died in Brussels, Belgium. His calling card still read, “Major Raphael J. Moses, C.S.A.”[11]

William Mallory Levy served in Virginia as a captain in the 2d Louisiana. The Confederate cause, he wrote his wife, “is a righteous one.” He later served in Louisiana as a lieutenant colonel and adjutant under Lt. Gen. Richard Taylor. Levy was elected to Congress from Louisiana and served one term from 1875 to 1877. He later served on the Supreme Court of Louisiana. He died in Saratoga, New York, on August 18, 1882, and was buried in Natchitoches, Louisiana. (Courtesy of the Historic New Orleans Collection.)

Adolph Proskauer remained in Mobile after the war. He was active in his synagogue and served in the Alabama legislature. He moved to St. Louis in 1895, served as president of the Merchants’ and Cotton Exchanges, was engaged in the life insurance business, and was active in social clubs and the Confederate Veterans Association. He died at age sixty-two in 1900 and was buried in Mount Sinai Cemetery, St. Louis. Joseph Proskauer, Adolph Proskauer’s nephew, became a prominent New York lawyer, a judge, an adviser to Alfred E. Smith, and a leader in Jewish affairs.[12]

On March 28, 1878, Mayer Lehman’s eighth and last child was born. He named the boy Herbert, in honor of his friend Hilary A. Herbert, colonel of the 8th Alabama, and his lawyer in Montgomery. Herbert H. Lehman, the namesake of a Confederate officer and a New Yorker, later became the first Jewish governor and a U.S. senator.[13]

Col. Henry J. Leovy, the military judge and confidant of Judah Benjamin, returned to the practice of law in New Orleans. He was the executor of the estate of William R. Hunley, the builder of the famous Confederate submarine CSS Hunley. Elected city attorney of New Orleans, he built a successful commercial law practice representing railroad and insurance companies.[14] He was prominent at the bar and was a partner with Judah Benjamin’s nephew E. B. Kruttschnitt in the 1870s. Leovy was an exceptional lawyer. He had the confidence of the leading members of the former Confederate government and army. They may have met Leovy through Judah P. Benjamin, and with Benjamin gone, they turned to the lawyer to whom Benjamin himself had entrusted his legal affairs. Both Jefferson and Varina Howell Davis were his clients, as was Gen. Albert Sidney Johnston’s son, Col. William Preston Johnston. In 1877 Johnston wrote to Leovy to ascertain the facts about General Butler’s opening of his famous father’s tomb on the pretext of searching for treasure. Leovy died in 1902.[15]

Octavus S. Cohen as an older man. The Cohens were a prominent Jewish family in Savannah before, during, and after the war. "Octy" Cohen served in the 32d Georgia at Morris Island and in the Battle of Olustee, Florida. (Courtesy of Bob Marcus, Springfield, Virginia.)

When Wade Hampton died in the same year, Edwin W. Moise was asked to give the oration at the memorial services in Sumter. "Wade Hampton with his latest breath," Moise told his fellow townspeople, "had given his blessing to all his people, white and black. Who here does not feel that he is richer for blessing of so good, so great, so pure a man?" Let Harold Moise, his grandson, conclude the story of Captain Moise's life: "Eight months later in the twilight of December 12, 1902, coming out [of] a coma, his eyes unclosed to see the fading light, Hampton's faithful lieutenant uttered his last words, What a beautiful sunset!'"[16]

LEON DAWSON MARKS
MORTALLY WOUNDED

ONE HUNDRED AND TWENTIETH
INFANTRY
COL. MARCUS M. SPIEGEL
OHIO

Monuments to a Jewish Confederate colonel, Leon Dawson Marks, and a Jewish Union colonel, Marcus H. Spiegel, at the Vicksburg Battlefield.

This is undoubtedly the only instance of monuments to Jewish colonels of the Confederate and Union armies on the same battlefield. (Courtesy of the Vicksburg National Park.)

Col. Leon Dawson Marks of Shreveport was remembered at Vicksburg in 1903 when a bronze relief portrait case by Tiffany was mounted on a granite base and placed on the battlefield. It overlooks the area were Marks was mortally wounded. In 1992 the Col. Leon D. Marks Camp of the Sons of Confederate Veterans was formally chartered.[17]

Maj. Alexander Hart of the 5th Louisiana was presented with a handsome sword by the residents of New Orleans in recognition of his service during the war. He soon returned to Richmond, where he married Leonora Levy and went into business. He and Leonora had four children. They lived in Staunton for a while and then in Norfolk. Hart was active in the Confederate Veterans, serving as commander of the Pickett-Buchanan Camp in Norfolk in 1906. His family belonged to the Ohef Shalom Temple, where Hart conducted services in the absence of the rabbi. His tombstone in Norfolk reads, "Major Alexander Hart, 5th La. Inf. C.S.A."[18]

Maj. Alexander Hart, a native of New Orleans. Hart became major of the Louisiana 5th. He met one of Jacob A. Levy's daughters in wartime Richmond, married her, and settled in Virginia after the war. He is pictured here in 1893 as the president and minister of the Staunton,

Virginia, synagogue. (Courtesy of the Jacob Rader Marcus Center, American Jewish Archives, Cincinnati, Ohio.)

David Levy Yulee died in 1886. Fernandina suspended all business, and the church bells rang during the hour appointed for the funeral service. The Washington Post remembered that before the Civil War, “as Senator from Florida, he was better known than the state he represented.” The Florida Times-Union regarded him as “by far the ablest man that Florida ever sent” to Congress. Florida has remembered its first senator in the name of Levy County, and the towns of Yulee and Levyville. The Wickliffe Madonna from Kentucky and the Father of Florida Statehood are buried beneath a marble angel in Oak Hill Cemetery in Georgetown in Washington, D.C. In 1939 the United Daughters of the Confederacy erected a bronze plaque at Cottonwood Plantation in honor of the “First United States Senator from Florida” and the officers who accompanied the Confederate baggage and treasure train. A great-grandson of Moses Levy, Samuel Yulee Way, was mayor of Orlando, Florida, in the 1940s. The remnants of Yulee’s plantation at Homosassa are now a Florida state park, the Yulee Sugar Mill Ruins State Historic Site.[19]

Despite his heroic efforts as the religious leader of Beth Ahabah before, during, and after the war, the synagogue board declined to reelect Max Michelbacher as its minister. The reason, apparently, was Michelbacher’s guttural German accent, which the board felt was not appropriate for the more acculturated English-speaking congregation. Michelbacher stayed in Richmond, remained active in the Jewish community, taught, and conducted weddings and other services. He died in 1879. In 1904 Beth Ahabah placed a stained glass window in the synagogue depicting the Eternal Light “to symbolize,” Allan Creeger wrote, “the illumination which came from Michelbacher.” Michelbacher’s descendants are active members of Beth Ahabah today.[20]

Rabbi James Gutheim. This portrait of the distinguished rabbi was painted in 1884, two years before his death and long after the war. As can be seen by comparing an earlier likeness at page 249, he had come a long way from his immigrant roots. His funeral in 1886 was reputedly the largest in the Crescent City since the Civil War. (Courtesy of Louisiana State Museum.)

New Orleans escaped the ravages of war. Its Jewish community prospered. Rabbi James Gutheim returned to New Orleans but left again in 1868 to officiate at Temple Emanuel in New York City. He returned to New Orleans in 1872 to become rabbi at Temple Sinai on St. Charles Avenue. In 1882 the South’s most distinguished rabbi spoke to the Southern Historical Society, then meeting in New Orleans, about the history of the Lost Cause, a cause “which had enlisted the warm sympathies and active participation of our noblest, purest and ablest minds.” He talked to the delegates, who included Jefferson Davis, about sectional reconciliation, citing the history of ancient Israel. “The eloquent Rabbi was loudly applauded,” the minutes noted.[21] Gutheim became a venerated figure in both Jewish and Christian circles, and when he died in 1886 his funeral was reputedly the largest in the Crescent City since the Civil War. His body, guarded by young men of the synagogue, lay in state at Temple Sinai. Jewish businesses in New Orleans closed, as did the Louisiana legislature. “The funeral cortege was the largest ever seen in New Orleans,” the Israelite reported. Rabbis came from throughout the South, as did local Christian ministers. The governor of Louisiana and the mayor of New Orleans were pallbearers. “It was,” reported the Israelite, “the greatest demonstration of respect ever shown to a Jew in the United States.”[22]

In 1869 George Jacobs left Richmond to assume the pulpit left vacant by the death of Isaac Leeser. He returned to Richmond often to visit his wife’s family, the Levys, and returned in 1870 at the request of the entire Jewish community when fifty-six people were killed in the collapse of a balcony at the capitol building. He died suddenly in 1884, still in his late forties. Among the mourners were Jacob E. Hyneman and Edwin J. Kursheedt of New Orleans, who had met and smoked a peace pipe at the Levy home in Richmond in 1865.[23]

Miriam DeLeon Cohen’s son, Lawrence Ludlow Cohen, the young lieutenant in the Boykin Rangers who fought for Stonewall Jackson, survived the war unhurt. In 1870, however, he was killed in a duel fought near Savannah, falling at the fourth exchange of shots. The seconds were indicted for murder, but the case was dismissed for lack of evidence. The affair, according to Perry M. DeLeon, “put an end to dueling in Georgia, so young Cohen did not die in vain.”[24] It must have ended Mem Cohen’s life, however, because she died soon thereafter. Her old friend Mary Chesnut lived on in sadly reduced circumstances in Camden, South Carolina, until her death in 1886. Her famous memoir was published posthumously as A Diary from Dixie in 1905.[25]

Thomas Cooper DeLeon lost his sight in 1903 but continued to write articles and books and attend to his many social obligations. He became known as “The Blind Laureate of the Lost Cause.”[26] Edwin DeLeon remained in Europe, writing for English periodicals. He was a part of the literary world that included Dickens and Thackery. In 1881 he was involved in bringing the telephone to Egypt, and he published several books and novels, including The Khedive’s Egypt. He died in New York in 1891 while on a lecture tour. His wife survived him by a few days.[27]

Miss Alice Kruttschnitt as Queen of Comus (Mardi Gras) in 1896. The caption on the reverse of this photograph at Tulane reads: “Miss Kruttschnitt was the daughter of John Kruttschnitt and Penina Benjamin K. (sister of Judah P. Benjamin).” (Courtesy of Howard-Tilton Library, Tulane University, New Orleans, Louisiana.)

Julius Ochs died in 1888. He was buried in Chattanooga, with members of the Grand Army of the Republic at his graveside. As he had requested, the Stars and Stripes was placed over his coffin. Bertha Levy Ochs died in 1908. She was a charter member of the A. P. Stewart Chapter of the United Daughters of the Confederacy, and members of her chapter attended the funeral. She was buried next to her husband. Bertha Ochs’s coffin was, at her request, draped with the Confederate flag.[28]

Pvt. Simon Kohlman of the Point Coupee Artillery in later years. He was active in the Confederate Veterans. (Courtesy of Cecile Levine, New Orleans.)

Their son Adolph Ochs went to Chattanooga in 1877 and became a successful newspaperman. He owned and operated the Chattanooga Times for years and became the city's most prominent citizen. In 1896 he saw an opportunity to buy a floundering newspaper, the New York Times. By the early 1900s it was one of the nation's leading newspapers. In 1928 Adolph Ochs made a gift of a new temple to Congregation Mizpah in Chattanooga.[29]

Sen. Benjamin F. Jonas died in December 1911. He was buried near his brother George in the Dispersed of Judah Cemetery on Canal Street, several miles from the French Quarter. The Solomon family remained in New Orleans. In the 1870s the family lived on Magazine Street. Their fortunes declined. Alice married in 1866. Clara married a much older man in 1866; the following year he died. Solomon Solomon died in 1874 at age fifty-eight. Clara next married Dr. George Lawrence, a former Confederate doctor, in 1872; the couple had four daughters. Clara died in New Orleans in 1907. Emma Solomon, Clara's mother, outlived her husband by almost forty years, dying in Atlanta in 1913.[30]

Graves of Solomon and Emma Solomon, Dispersed of Judah Cemetery, New Orleans. (Photograph by Susan Rosen. Author's collection.)

Alroy Jonas lived to be seventy-seven, telling one correspondent that "Time's hand has fallen gently upon me, and I have changed but little in nature or appearance since the days I wore the gray." He died in 1915, survived by two children. He is buried in Aberdeen, Mississippi. The R. E. Lee Chapter of the United Daughters of the Confederacy erected a monument to him on the Parkway in Aberdeen where James Street crosses Commerce. The inscription reads: "United Daughters of the Confederacy, In Memory of Major S. A. Jonas, Editor, Journalist, Poet." The lines of his famous poem were inscribed on the back.[31] His poem lives on. Margaret Mitchell quoted from it in Gone with the Wind ("Oh, how beautiful! How touching!" cried Melanie when she read it).[32]

Simon Mayer of Natchez married Emma Roos. They named their first child Robert E. Lee Mayer.[33] On January 19, 1898, the anniversary of Robert E. Lee's birthday, Simon Mayer spoke to the Confederate veterans about the Lost Cause, the honored dead "with the rest of Heaven upon their cheeks & the fire of liberty in their eyes." But time was running out for the Confederate veterans. The war had been over for more than thirty years, and the "majority of that vast army are fast joining their grand old comrades on the other shore, but what a precious legacy they can leave to their children and posterity."[34] In 1915 Herbert T. Ezekiel of the distinguished old Richmond Ezekiels gave an address to a Jewish group. (The son of a Jewish Confederate, Ezekiel goodnaturedly told the group that he had no idea why “one who was not born in the United States” was asked to give the talk. Ezekiel was born in 1863 in Richmond—then in the Confederate States of America.) “Confederate Jews,” he concluded, “are becoming scarce. Most of them are resting quietly in our home of the dead.”[35]

Lewis Leon lived to see his Diary of a Tar Heel Confederate Soldier published in 1913. After the war, he returned to his job as a store clerk. He later owned his own store in Charlotte, North Carolina. He died in 1919 at the age of seventy-eight in a home for old Confederate soldiers. Isaac Hermann apparently learned to obey orders, became a pillar of his community, and rose to the rank of Captain in the Georgia militia. He died at age seventy-nine in 1917.[36] Herman Kaminski returned to Georgetown, South Carolina, where he became a highly respected businessman, owning a hardware company and a steamship company, and becoming a bank officer.[37]

Yours Truly
M. Ezekiel

Sir Moses Ezekiel, Virginia’s internationally renowned sculptor. After the war, with the encouragement of Robert E. Lee, then president of Washington College, Ezekiel pursued his dream of becoming a sculptor. (Courtesy of American Jewish Historical Society, Waltham, Massachusetts, and New York City.)

Moses Ezekiel graduated from VMI in 1866, and, after consulting with Robert E. Lee, then president of Washington College, decided to pursue his dream of becoming a sculptor. “Whatever you do,” Lee told the aspiring artist, “try to prove to the world that if we did not succeed in our struggle, we were worthy of success.” He left for Europe, where he achieved international celebrity as an artist. He later lived in Rome, was decorated by European royalty, and was knighted by the king of Italy. He never forgot that he was a Virginian and a Confederate. His works stand now in the Old Dominion: Thomas Jefferson before the Rotunda at the University of Virginia, Virginia Mourning Her Dead (1903) at VMI, and the monument to the Confederate War dead at Arlington National Cemetery, dedicated by Woodrow Wilson in June 1913. Ezekiel died in Rome in 1917 and was buried in his home state, at the base of his monument at Arlington. President Warren G. Harding eulogized the famous sculptor from Richmond’s Jewish community as a great American and a great Virginian.[38] The simple inscription on his grave reads: “Moses J. Ezekiel, Sergeant of Company C, Battalion of Cadets of the Virginia Military Institute.” “And now,” the Confederate Veteran reported, “the eye that saw is closed, the hand that executed is still.” The “soldier lad who fought so well” was lauded in foreign lands, but dying “his last request was that he might rest among his old comrades at Arlington.”

Moses Ezekiel's Confederate monument at Arlington National Cemetery. (Courtesy of Andrew Felber, Bethesda, Md.)

Eugene Henry Levy returned to New Orleans, where he joined his father in the banking and brokerage business. In 1875 he left New Orleans and bought a sugar plantation at Vermillionville, Lafayette Parish. In 1886 he moved to New York, where he was a stockbroker. A victim of the perils of the stock market, he became a correspondent on financial matters for the New Orleans Item and the Picayune. He later opened a rare-books store on Liberty Street called the Dixie Book Shop, which served a great many Wall Street businessmen. He never missed a Confederate reunion or the meeting of the Confederate Camp, of which he was a member. His bookstore was a place where "those who were interested in the cause he loved so well could foregather and obtain the books which told of the Confederacy." He died at eighty-one and is buried at the Confederate Veterans Cemetery at Mount Hope, New York. Prior to his death in June 1921, he claimed the honor of being the only surviving private of the Confederate army.[39]

Alfred Huger Moses and Mordecai Moses of Montgomery became prominent citizens after the war. Mordecai served three terms as mayor from 1875 to 1881, and the brothers became successful businessmen, building the tallest building in Alabama in 1887, the six-story Moses Building on Court Square, near the offices of Lehman, Durr and Company.[40] By 1880, according to Kenneth Libo, "Moseses brothers was the largest real estate, insurance, and retail banking institution in the state." Alfred's daughter Adeline married Carl M. Loeb, a young man who boarded with her aunts. Their son John, Alfred's grandson, married Frances Lehman, Mayer's granddaughter, thereby joining two exceptional Jewish families from Alabama, the Moseses and the Lehmans.[41]

Philip Whitlock of Richmond died in 1919 at the age of eighty-one. His tobacco business had grown mightily since the war. He had pioneered the manufacture of inexpensive cigars, inventing and producing the "Old Virginia Cheroot." He eventually sold his company, one of the largest employers in Richmond, to the American Tobacco Company, and retired. He was buried at the Hebrew Cemetery, Rabbi Edward N. Calisch of Beth Ahabah presiding.[42]

In 1867, only two years after the war ended, Eugenia and Philip Phillips returned to Washington, where Mr. Phillips became a successful lawyer practicing before the U.S. Supreme Court. He argued hundreds of cases before that Court and published scholarly articles on the law and a treatise on the Supreme Court. Before the war, he had proposed the creation of the court of claims and is credited with being one of the fathers of that federal court.

In 1876, when Phillips wrote his memoirs, he remembered Eugenia's arrest as a noble moment: "If the imprudence of my wife brought on her these difficulties, she endured the consequences of them with a heroic spirit that could not be excelled." It also afforded Phillips amusement "to look over the letters of my daughters as I prepare this [memoir]. These two young girls of amiable disposition wrote under the excitement which then pervaded the public mind like two viragos. If they could read them now they would themselves laugh heartily at their extravagant expressions. It is no less amusing to note the extravagant excitement of the Provost Marshal, who gravely endorses the tattle of these two children as 'Rank treason.'"[43] Philip Phillips died in 1884 at the age of seventy-seven. He was buried in Laurel Grove Cemetery in Savannah, Georgia, the last home of the Levy family.

Eugenia Phillips lived on in Washington, the irascible leader of the old Washington society. She had been a part of the "best" Washington society since the 1850s. One newspaper, before her death, described her as "the most remarkable of the hostesses of the old Washington regime…. Her brilliant sallies, caustic wit, kind and generous heart… have been the wonder and despair of the other social celebrities."[44] Three of her children preceded her to the grave: William Hallet, who lived with his mother, was a prominent international lawyer in Washington. He accidentally drowned several years earlier. Eugene, the Confederate navy veteran, had died in New Orleans; and Randolph had died in Savannah.

After the war, Fanny Phillips married Capt. Charles S. Hill, nephew of the wealthy banker W. W. Corcoran. (Hill had served as chief of ordnance on General Forrest's staff.)[45] Clavius Phillips married a Cohen of Savannah, and John Walker Phillips married Nellie Jonas of New Orleans, the daughter of Sen. Benjamin Franklin Jonas.[46]

Eugenia Phillips died in 1902 at the age of eighty-three, being, her daughter Caroline remembered, "the last of the old regime and the grand old ladies of the day."[47] Newspapers ran fanciful obituaries recalling her famous brushes with the Union authorities. Her famous exploits grew with time. One newspaper lamented that "Washington society has suffered a great loss by the death of Mrs. Eugenia Levy Phillips…. During the Civil War Mrs. Phillips acquired fame as a Confederate spy and once she slapped Gen. "Ben" Butler in the face." She was buried next to her husband in Savannah, Georgia.

Phoebe Pember returned to Georgia after the war. She was appointed, with the help of Raphael J. Moses, to the Georgia Lottery Commission. She spent many of the postwar years traveling at home and abroad and writing articles for magazines such as the Atlantic Monthly, Harper's New Monthly Magazine, and the Independent.[48] She wrote her memoir, A Southern Woman's Story, in the 1870s. She moved to New York and died in Pittsburgh on March 4, 1913. She is buried next to her husband in Laurel Grove Cemetery in Savannah. Maj. Gen. Jeremy F. Gilmer and Mrs. Gilmer, Phoebe's dear friend "Lou," are buried nearby.[49]

In 1995 the U.S. Postal Service issued twenty stamps commemorating the Civil War. A committee of historians chose the battles and famous persons to be depicted. Among them was Phoebe Pember, Confederate nurse. The back of the postage stamp reads: "Confederate Nurse, Phoebe Yates Levy Pember, 1823–1913, Directed care and dietary needs of over 10,000 soldiers at Richmond's Chimborazo, one of CSA's largest hospitals. Speciality: chicken soup. Criticized poor care in her A Southern Woman's Story."

The Straus family left Georgia after the war and moved to New York City. In the 1890s, Isidor and Nathan Straus took over R. H. Macy and Company. In 1912 Isidor Straus refused a lifeboat while women still remained on the Titanic. Mrs. Straus stayed with her husband, and they died at sea.[50]

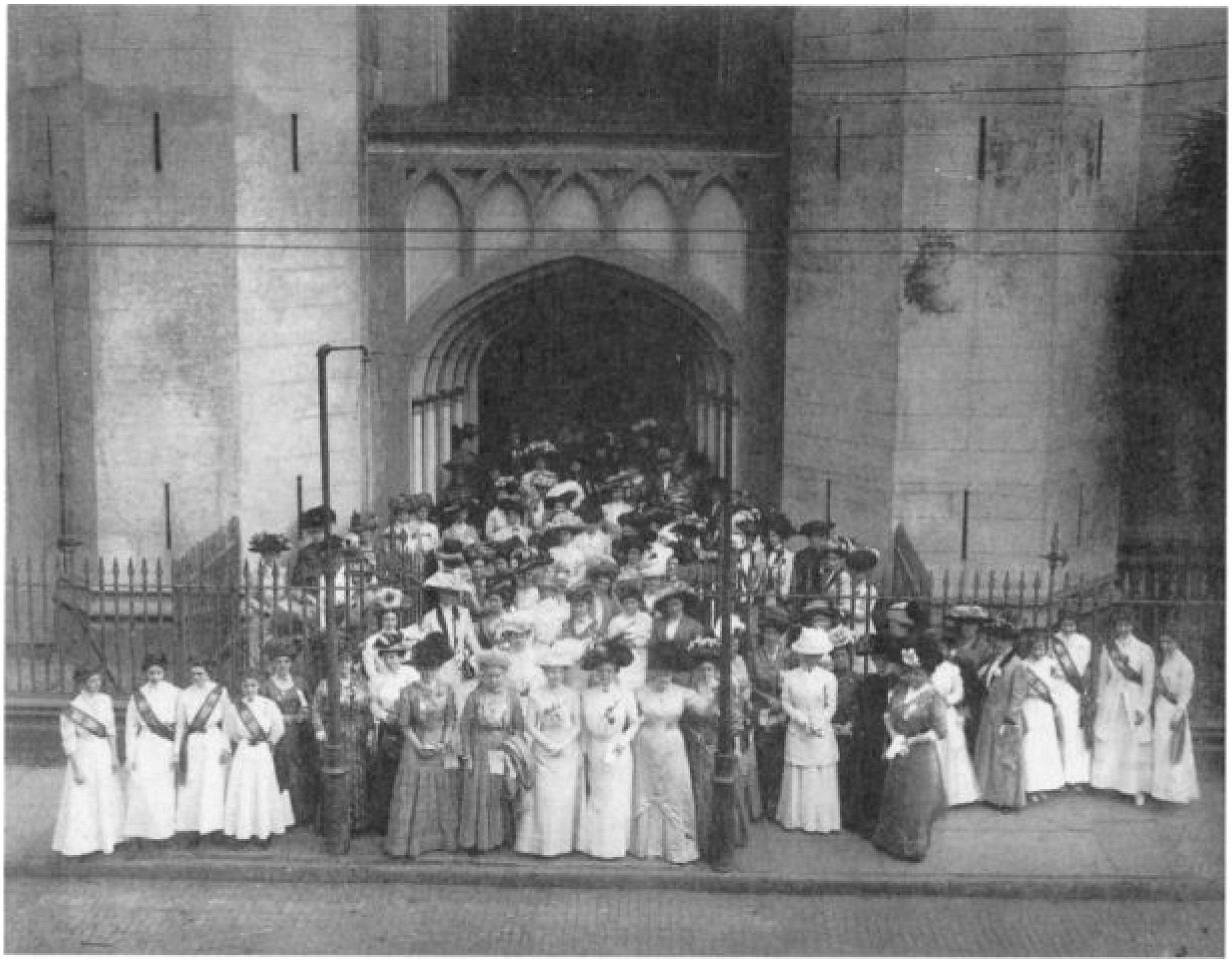
Dr. Simon Baruch moved his family up North to pursue his medical career. By the early 1880s the Baruchs were living on West Fifty-seventh Street, in those days the northernmost fringe of Manhattan. Dr. Baruch soon became a prominent physician, surgeon, and public health reformer. (He once described Manhattan as a "body of land surrounded by sewage.") He wrote books on hydrotherapy and taught at Columbia University. His son Bernard grew up in New York City and became the most successful financier of his time and one of the best-known American Jews of the twentieth century. He was chairman of the War Industries Board during World War I, an adviser to Woodrow Wilson at Versailles, and a close friend of Franklin Roosevelt.[51]

Dr. Simon Baruch as an older man. (Courtesy of American Jewish Historical Society, Waltham, Massachusetts, and New York City.)

Simon Baruch never forgot his Southern heritage. He was an active member of the Confederate Veterans and a frequent contributor to the Confederate Veteran.[52] Belle Baruch also remained a staunch Southerner, becoming a member of the United Daughters of the Confederacy. The Baruchs raised their children with pro-Southern views. If a band struck up "Dixie," no matter where he was, Dr. Baruch would jump up and give the rebel yell. Bernard recalled that as soon as the tune started, the whole family knew what was coming. "Mother would catch him by the coattails and plead, ‘Shush, Doctor, shush!’ But it never did any good. I have seen Father, ordinarily a model of reserve and dignity, leap up in the Metropolitan Opera House and let loose that piercing yell.”[53] Dr. Baruch died in New York on June 3, 1921.

* * *

In the 1890s, the few remaining old Southern Jewish families still revered their Confederate ancestors and joined the Sons of Confederate Veterans and the United Daughters of the Confederacy. Joseph Proskauer wrote in Boyhood in Mobile of his veneration for his Uncle Adolph. “My grandmother’s attic was a storehouse of worthless Confederate bills,” he recalled. “[M]y uncle’s partner, Leopold Straus, was known as ‘Johnny’ because he had been a fighting Johnny Reb…. Until my entrance into college in 1892 I was never quite sure that a ‘Yankee’ could be anything but damned.”[54]



The leadership of the South Carolina division of the United Daughters of the Confederacy. President Irene Goldsmith Kohn, wearing a dark hat, is standing at the far left of the five women in the very front row. (Courtesy of Julian Hennig Jr., Columbia, South Carolina.)

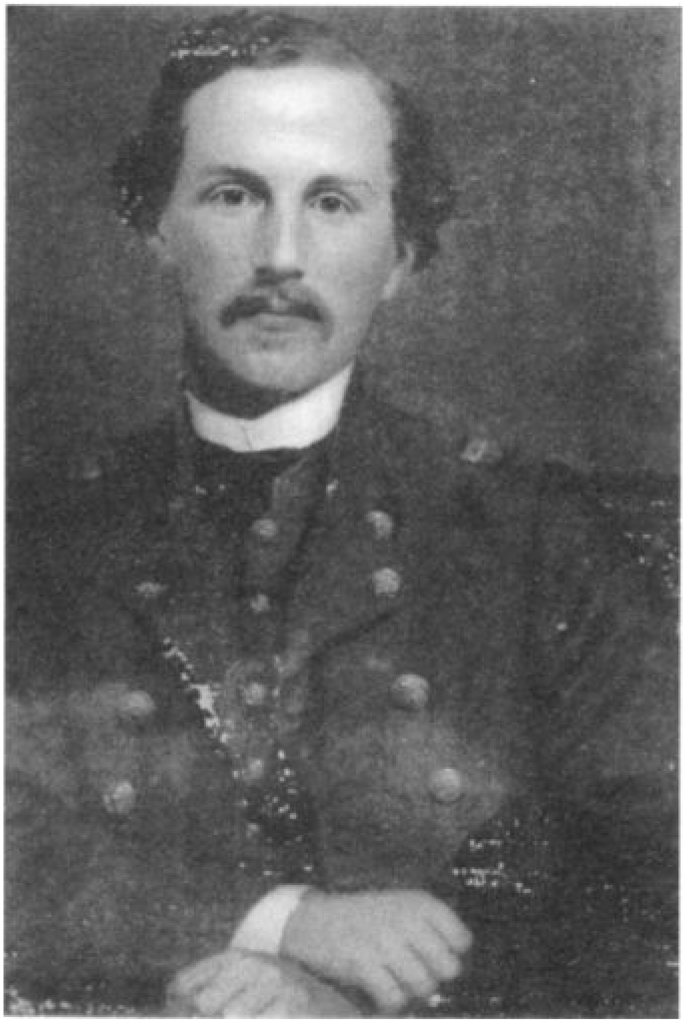
Irene Goldsmith was born in 1868 in Charleston, the daughter of Abraham A. Goldsmith, who had been seriously wounded at Antietam. Four Goldsmith boys had fought in the war. Her mother's only brother, Alexander Hilzheim, was killed at Kennesaw Mountain during Sherman's campaign against Atlanta. His body was never recovered, but his name is inscribed on a monument in the Coming Street Cemetery, "A victim at 18 years to the horrors of war." In her application to the Wade Hampton Chapter of the United Daughters of the Confederacy, she noted that she had four uncles in Confederate service as well as her father. After marrying August Kohn, Corporal Theodore Kohn's son, in 1894 at Beth Elohim, the couple moved to Columbia, where they helped organize a new congregation, Tree of Life. Irene Kohn, like Joseph Proskauer, also revered her Confederate relatives, and in the 1890s became a charter member of the UDC. In 1909 she was elected president of the South Carolina Division, believing that the war reflected the "sacrifice, devotion to duty, courage, and struggle for conviction" of Confederate soldiers. "In honoring our sires and their patriotism," she wrote, "we honor ourselves."[55]

* * *

In the 1880s Alexander III, the czar of Russia, began a campaign of terror against the Jews of his empire. His pogroms and anti-Semitic brutality drove hundreds of thousands and then millions of poor Russian, Polish, and Ukranian Jews to America, that "fabled land of freedom" that the German Jews had sought fifty years before. By the early twentieth century, these immigrants, like the wave of German Jewish immigrants before them, had overwhelmed the American Jewish community. Like a great ship passing a small boat in a foggy night, the wave of Jewish immigrants from Russia and Eastern Europe came to the South and founded their own communities and institutions. Many never knew the Jewish families in their own cities and towns who had fought and died for the Confederacy.

The old congregations were gradually taken over by the newcomers, who knew little or nothing about Robert E. Lee, Jefferson F. Davis, Judah P. Benjamin, Henry M. Hyams, Edwin W. Moise, or Benjamin Franklin Jonas. Nor did they share the communal loss of Joshua L. Moses, Isaac Levy, Albert Luria, Isaac Valentine, Gustavus Poznanski Jr., Joseph Calhoun Levy, or Leon Marks. They knew little or nothing of the sacrifices made on their behalf on the battlefields of Shiloh and Antietam, Vicksburg, Gettysburg, Cold Harbor, or Atlanta. Indeed, the Confederate War, as their Southern neighbors then called it, was as remote to them as Joshua at the Battle of Jericho. And as the years passed and the Confederate War receded into memory for all Southerners, the Jewish Confederates, many of their descendants no longer members of the ancient faith, disappeared from the communal memory of Southern Jewry. Theirs was a lost world as well as a lost cause.

Little remains of the Jewish Confederate South. Both of Richmond's antebellum synagogues, Beth Ahabah on Eleventh Street and Beth Shalome on Mayo Street, are gone, as are many of the Jewish homes and shops that crowded Main Street in the 1860s, victims of "progress" and Richmond's urban growth. In 1891 Beth Shalome Synagogue was sold to a newly organized Russian congregation and was demolished in 1935.[56] All of New Orleans's antebellum synagogues are gone as well, and for the same reason. The old commercial district near Canal Street has been rebuilt. Belle Chasse was demolished. Judah Benjamin's law office is no more, nor is Frank Jonas's. Clara Solomon's house is gone, and the neighborhood has fallen into decay. The Jackson Street synagogue has been sold, is now boarded up, and is in danger of destruction.

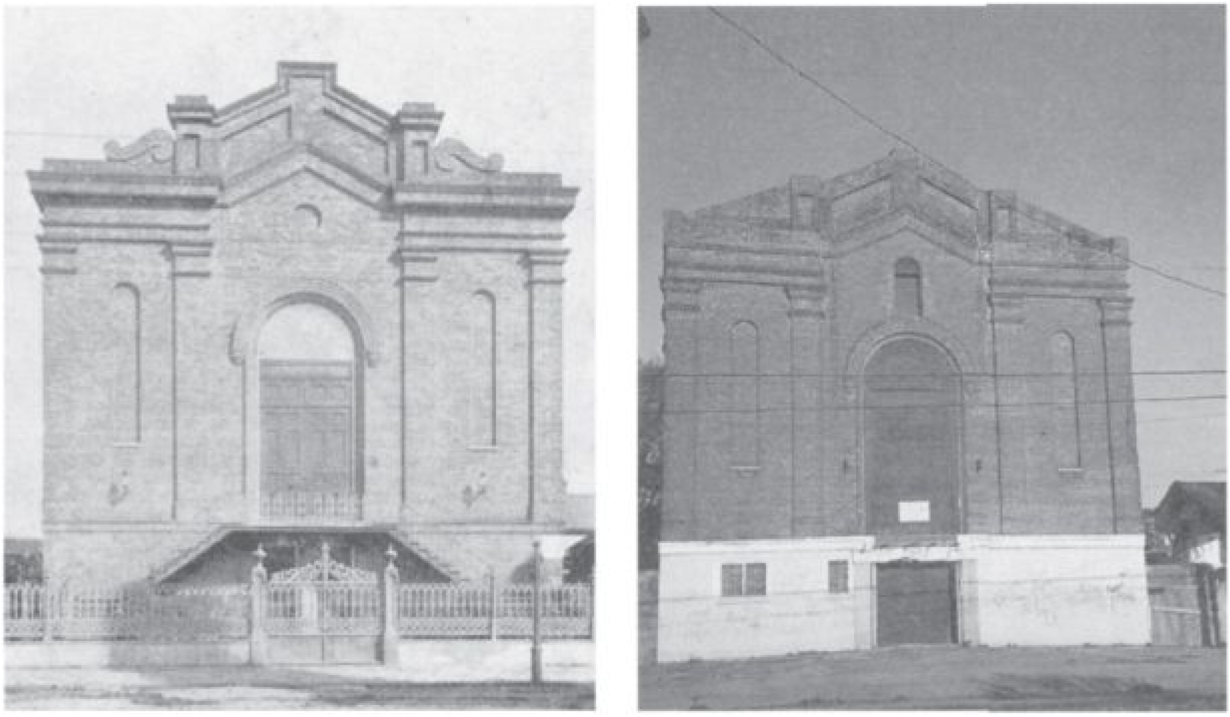


Lt. Joshua Lazarus Moses, Company C, 3d (Palmetto) Battalion, South Carolina Light Artillery. (Painting courtesy of Robert Moses, Sumter, S.C.).

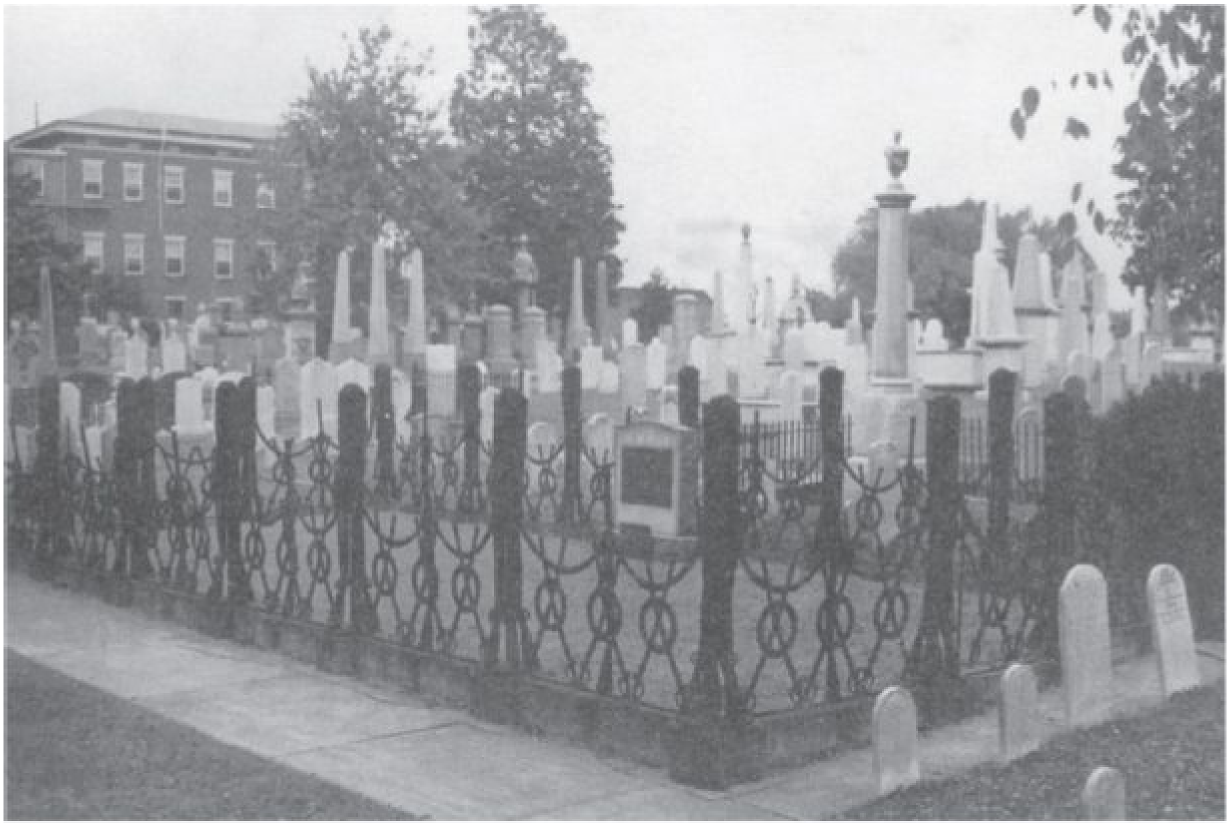
Octavus Cohen's home on Lafayette Square in Savannah, where his daughter excoriated the Yankee invaders, has been replaced by a condominium. Shearith Israel in Charleston was torn down.

Yet some remnants of the Southern Israelites still survive: the Hebrew Cemetery on Shockoe Hill in Richmond; Moses Cohen Mordecai’s house and Phoebe Pember’s childhood home in Charleston; the Solomon Cohen house and the Minis house in Savannah, where Robert E. Lee was charmed by Sarah and Phillipa Minis. And Kahal Kadosh Beth Elohim—where Gustavus Poznanski promised that the sons of Jewish South Carolinians would defend their temple, their city, and their land—still stands on Hasell Street in Charleston, facing east toward Jerusalem.

★ ★ ★

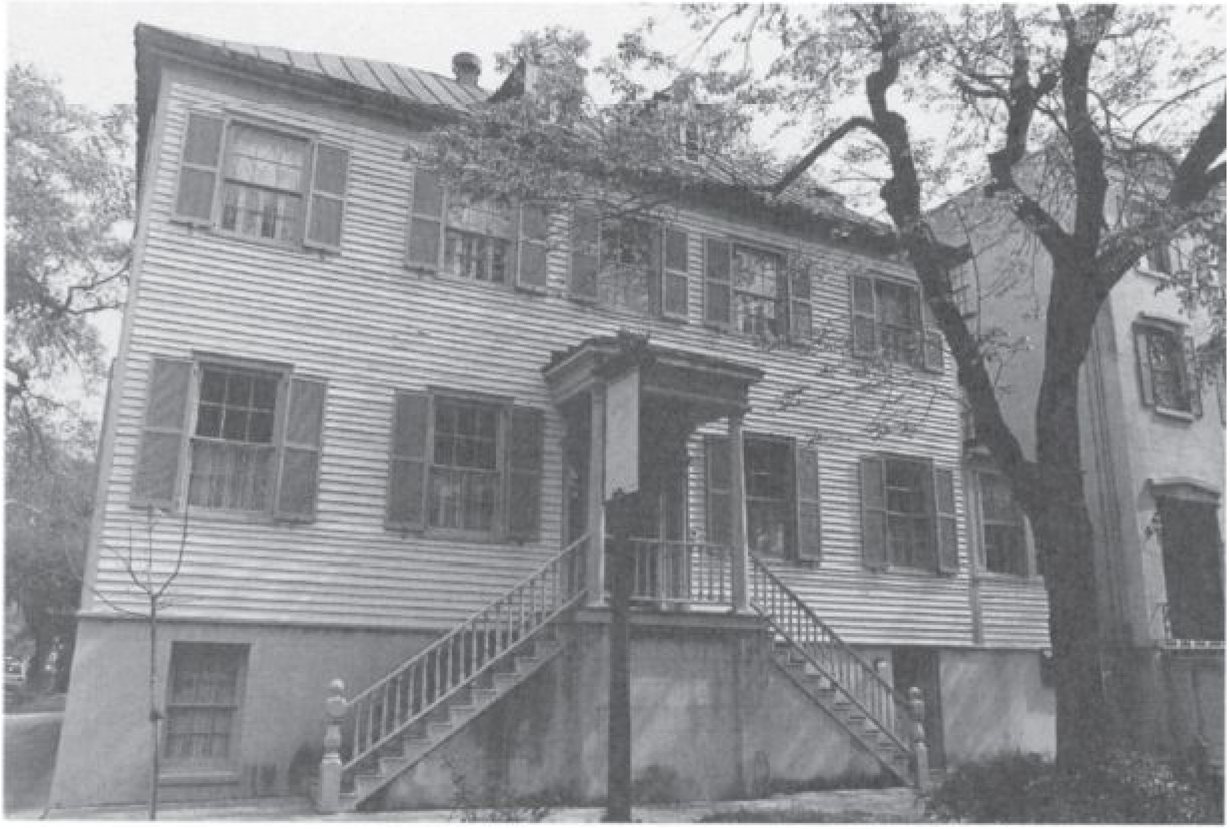


Gates of Prayer, then and now. The Jackson Street Synagogue in New Orleans just after the war and today. (Courtesy of Touro Infirmary Archives, New Orleans, Louisiana; Photograph by Susan Rosen.)

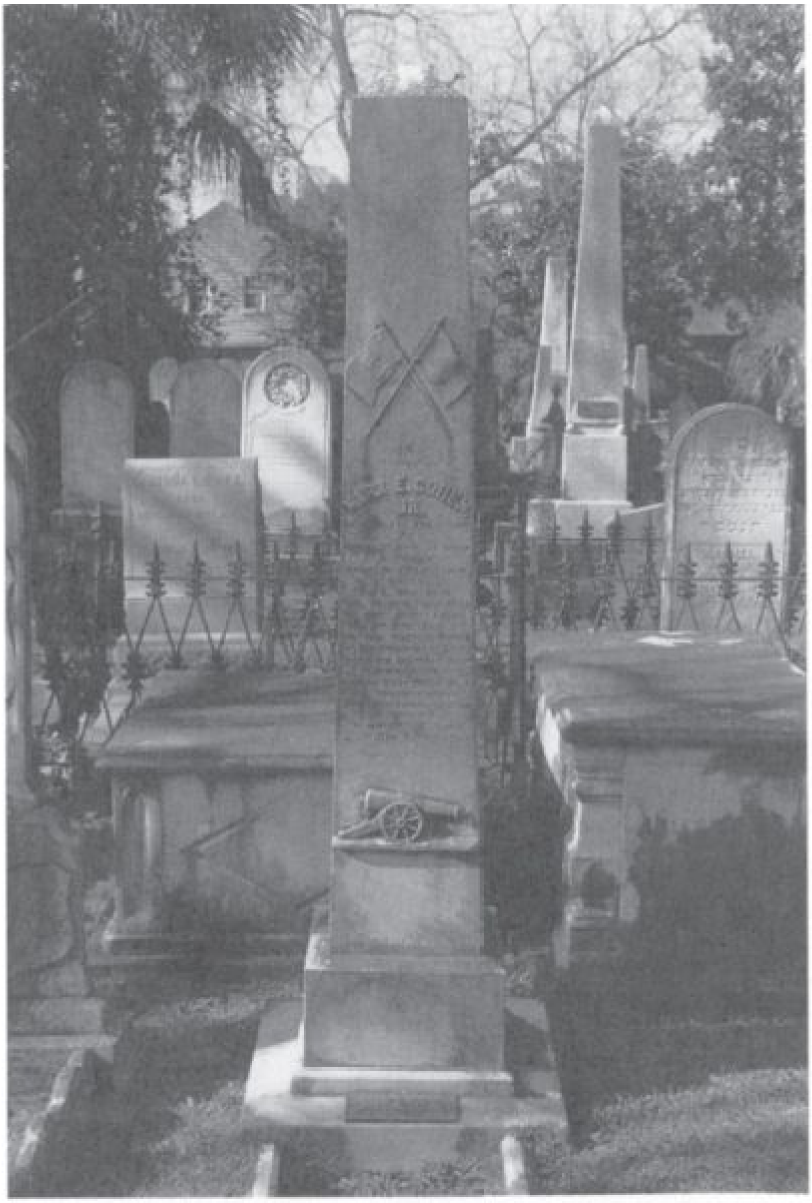


The Hebrew Cemetery, Confederate Section, at Shockoe Hill, Richmond. (Courtesy of Beth Ahabah Museum and Archives, Richmond, Virginia.)

The home of Moses Cohen Mordecai on Meeting Street in Charleston today. (Author’s collection, courtesy of Robert and Susan Prenner. Photograph by Michael Levkoff.)

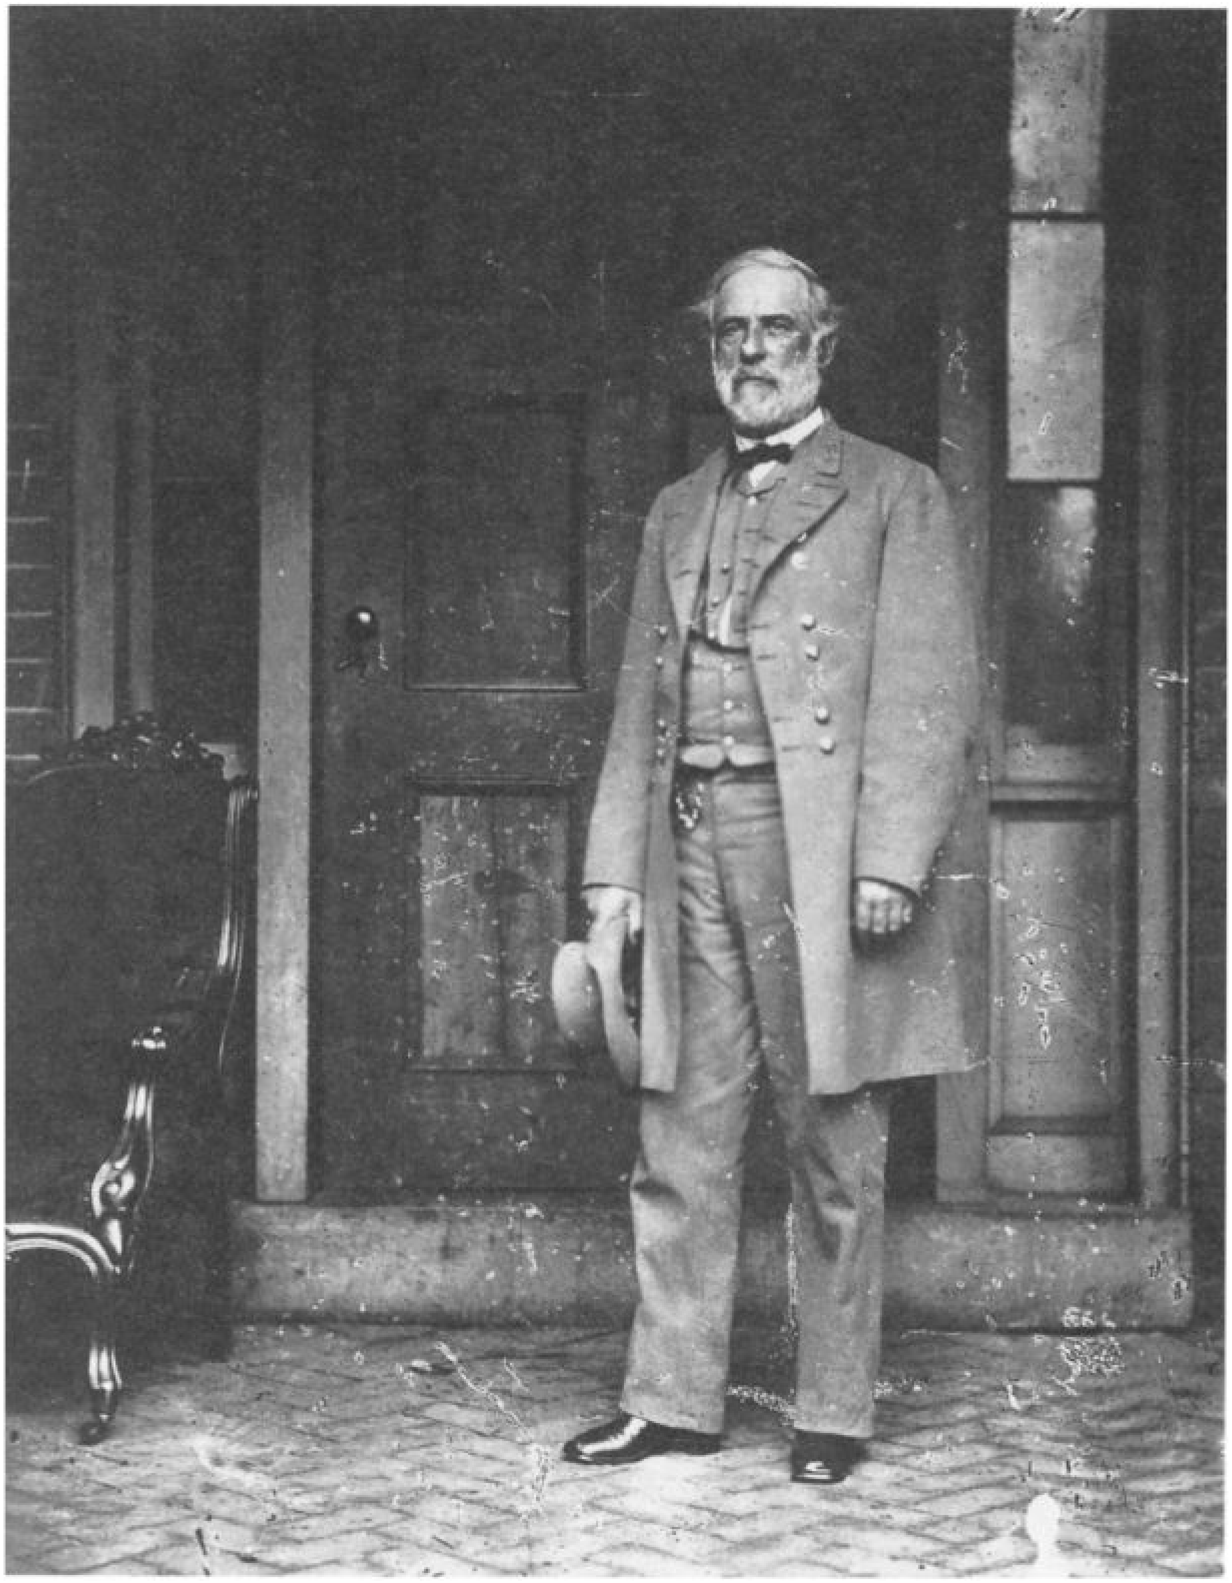


The home of Solomon Cohen at Barnard and Liberty in Savannah today. (Author’s collection. Photograph by Michael Levkoff.)



Monument to Marx E. Cohen Jr. at the Coming Street Cemetery, Charleston, South Carolina. The two flags are the South Carolina flag and the Confederate battle flag. (Author's collection. Photograph by Michael Levkoff.)

Mikve Israel in Savannah, built after the war in 1875. (Author's collection. Photograph by Michael Levkoff.)



Robert E. Lee. This Mathew Brady photograph was taken one week after the surrender. Jewish Confederates continued to venerate Lee. They even named their children for him: "Throughout the Southland today," Simon Mayer of Natchez told his fellow veterans in 1898, "the birth of the immortal Lee is being celebrated." "I was brought up to believe that Robert E. Lee was the epitome of all virtues," Bernard Baruch wrote. "Father often quoted a maxim of Lee's as a guide to my own conduct: 'Do your duty in all things. You could not do more. You would not wish to do less.'" (Courtesy of Mathew Brady Collection, Prints and Photos Division, Library of Congress.)

THE UNIVERSITY OF SOUTH CAROLINA PRESS

Looking for more?

Browse our books at USCPress.com and join our mailing list to get updates on new releases, book events, and promotions.

Sign Up Now

NOTES

★

PREFACE

1. There are two people named Edwin Warren Moise in this work. One was born in Charleston in 1811 and lived in Louisiana; the other was born in Charleston in 1832 and lived in Columbus, Georgia, at the beginning of the war and in Sumter, South Carolina, afterward. Harold Moise, The Moise Family of South Carolina and Their Descendants (Columbia, S.C.: R. L. Bryan, 1961), 48–50, 83–126.

2. Bertram W. Korn, preface to paperback edition to American Jewry and the Civil War, 2d ed. (Cleveland and New York: Meridian Books/World Publishing, and Philadelphia: JPSA, 1961), xx–xxi.

3. Lawrence Fuchs, "Introduction," AJHQ 66, no. 2 (December 1976): 187.

4. Nathaniel Weyl, The Jew in American Politics (New Rochelle, N.Y.: Arlington House, 1968), 54–55. Many Jewish historians, reflecting their own beliefs and preconceived notions and reading history from the present to the past, cannot bring themselves to believe that Jews voluntarily fought for the Confederacy. Typical of this disbelief is Jordan Schwarz in The Speculator: Bernard M. Baruch in Washington, 1917–1965 (Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1981). Simon Baruch, Bernard's father, Schwarz writes, "feeling the social pressure of watching other Camden men enlist for the Southern cause … became a Confederate army medical officer" (11). Baruch was, however, one of the most ardent of the Jewish Confederates. He was active in Confederate Veteran affairs even after he moved to New York after the war.

5. See, for example, Thomas Cahill, The Gifts of the Jews (New York: Nan A. Talese/Doubleday, 1998), 120–22, 154.

6. Tony Horwitz, Confederates in the Attic: Dispatches from the Unfinished Civil War (New York: Pantheon Books, 1998), 63.

7. See chapter 1 below for a discussion of the motivation of Jewish Confederates. The literature on the causes of the Civil War is immense. See the following for an introduction: Allan Nevins, The Emergence of Lincoln: Prologue to Civil War, 1859–

1861 (New York: Scribner's, 1950), chap. 11; David M. Potter, The Impending Crisis, 1848–1861 (New York: Harper & Row, 1976); and Potter, The South and the Sectional Conflict (Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1968). The best single explanation of the relationship between the war and slavery is a minor classic, Charles E. Cauthen's South Carolina Goes to War, 1860–1865 (Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1950), chap. 5 ("Much has been written on the causes of secession, but one who reads the contemporary literature can have no doubt of the fundamental issue in South Carolina" [71]).

8. On the history of early anti-Semitism and Judeophobia, see Klaus Fischer's excellent work, The History of an Obsession: German Judeophobia and the Holocaust (New York: Continuum, 1998), chaps. 1 and 2. (Anti-Semitic pamphlets in Germany in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries claimed that Jews "belonged to an absolutely different nation" [46].) Benjamin F. Perry, quoted in Lewis Jones, South Carolina: A Synoptic History for Laymen (Lexington, S.C.: Sandlapper Press, 1978), 169. On Lee's actions and opinions on slavery, see Douglass Southall Freeman, R. E. Lee (New York: Scribner, 1934), 4:400–401.

9. Lee quote, Freeman, R. E. Lee, 4:401.

10. Rabbi Saul Jacob Rubin, Third to None: The Saga of Savannah Jewry, 1733–1983 (Savannah: Congregation Mikve Israel, 1983), 68.

PROLOGUE

1. Gene Waddell, “An Architectural History of Kahal Kadosh Beth Elohim, Charleston,” South Carolina Historical Magazine 98, no. 1 (January 1997): 6–55, Charleston Daily Courier quote, 55; Solomon Breibart, “The Rev. Mr. Gustavus Poznanski: First American Jewish Reform Minister,” paper delivered at Congregation Beth Elohim on the 100th anniversary of Reverend Poznanski’s death, College of Charleston, January 19, 1979. James W. Hagy, This Happy Land: The Jews of Colonial and Antebellum Charleston (Tuscaloosa: University of Alabama Press, 1993), 236–39. “Kahal Kadosh” (Holy Congregation), traditionally the first two words of all early Sephardic congregations, is usually abbreviated “K. K.,” as in K. K. Beth Elohim.

2. Barnett A. Elzas, The Jews of South Carolina from the Earliest Times to the Present Day (Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott Co., 1905; reprint, Spartanburg, S.C.: Reprint Co., 1983), chap. 12; Charles Reznikoff and Uriah Z. Engelman, The Jews of Charleston: A History of an American Jewish Community (Philadelphia: JPSA, 1950), 157–60; Compiled service record (CSR), Gustavus Poznanski Jr.

3. Raphael J. Moses, Last Order of the Lost Cause—The Civil War Memoirs of a Jewish Family from the “Old South,” edited by Mel Young (Lanham, Md.: University Press of America, 1995), 94–101. The Columbus Light Guards became a part of Wright’s brigade in November 1862.

4. Moses, Last Order, 98.

5. Ibid., xv, 111, 94.

6. Ibid., 162–63.

7. C. Vann Woodward, ed., Mary Chesnut’s Civil War (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1981), 378.

8. Moses, Last Order, 165–66.

9. The Charleston Mercury, June 10, 1862. For the Charleston Daily Courier, see Mel Young, Where They Lie Someone Should Say Kaddish (Lanham, Md.: University Press of America, 1991), 40.

CHAPTER 1

1. Sermon, November 29, 1860, James K. Gutheim, Manuscript Collection, No. 224, AJA, 23.

2. Abraham Barkai, Branching Out: German-Jewish Immigration to the United States 1820–1914 (New York: Holmes & Meier, 1994), passim; Hasia R. Diner, A Time for Gathering: The Second Migration, 1820–1880 (Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1992), 9.

3. Naomi W. Cohen, Encounter with Emancipation: The German Jews in the United States, 1830–1914 (Philadelphia: JPSA, 1984), 11.

4. Sermon, November 29, 1860, J. K. Gutheim Manuscript Collection, No. 224, AJA.

5. Cohen, Encounter, 11.

6. Ibid., 13.

7. "Both sides in the American Civil War professed to be fighting for freedom," James M. McPherson wrote in Battle Cry of Freedom (New York: Oxford University Press, 1988). Jefferson Davis exclaimed in 1863 that the South was "forced to take up arms to vindicate the political rights, the freedom, equality, and State sovereignty which were the heritage purchased by the blood of our revolutionary sires" (vii).

8. Benjamin's farewell speech is described by all of his biographers. See Pierce Butler, Judah Benjamin (Philadelphia: W. G. Jacobs & Co., 1907), 205–13; Robert Douthat Meade, Judah P. Benjamin: Confederate Statesman (London: Oxford University Press, 1943), 152–55; Eli N. Evans, Judah Benjamin: The Jewish Confederate (New York: Free Press, 1988), 109–12 (Mrs. Davis's quote).

9. Meade, Judah P. Benjamin, 116.

10. Thompson, "David Yulee," 494; Joseph G. Adler, "The Public Career of Senator David Levy Yulee" (Ph.D. diss., Case Western Reserve University, 1973), 160.

11. Davis, A Government, 223.

12. Malcolm M. Stern, Americans of Jewish Descent (Reprint, New York: KTAV Publishing House, 1971); Walter E. Burke Jr., Quartermaster: A Brief Account of the Life of Colonel Abraham Charles Myers, Quartermaster General C.S.A. (February 14, 1976), 24 (copy in possession of author and available from the city of Fort Myers and the Fort Myers Historical Museum).

13. Louis Schmier, “Georgia History in Pictures. This ‘New Canaan’: The Jewish Experience in Georgia,” Georgia Historical Quarterly 73, no. 4, pt. 2 (winter 1989): 820 (Cohen quote); Isaac Hermann, Memoirs of a Veteran Who Served as a Private in the 60s in the War between the States, Personal Incidents, Experiences, and Observations (Atlanta: Byrd Printing Co., 1911), 192–93. Hermann’s CSR; see also chapter 3 below.

14. See CSRs of Kaminski, Emanuel, the Levy brothers, and Proskauer. As to Leon, see his CSR and his memoir, Diary of a Tar Heel Confederate Soldier (Charlotte: Stone Publishing Co., 1913); Morris U. Schappes, ed., Documentary History of the Jews in the United States, 1654–1875, rev. ed. (New York: Citadel Press, 1952), 709n. 17; Herbert Ezekiel and Gaston Lichtenstein, The History of the Jews of Richmond from 1769 to 1917 (Richmond: Herbert Ezekiel, 1917), 161. As to Kempner, see Harold M. Hyman, Oleander Odyssey: The Kempners of Galveston, Texas, 1854–1980s (College Station: Texas A & M University Press, 1990), chap. 1.

15. Ezekiel and Lichtenstein, The History of the Jews, 148–93; Myron Berman, Richmond’s Jewry, 1769–1976: Shabbat in Shockoe (Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, 1979), 175–77; John H. Neblett and Roberta C. Neblett, “Emanuel Gerst—A Gentleman of Virginia,” Generations: Journal of Congregation Beth Ahabah Museum and Archives Trust 5, no. 1 (November 1992); Louis Ginsberg, History of the Jews of Petersburg, 1789–1950 (Petersburg, Va.: privately printed, 1954), 42–56; Allan Schoener, The American Jewish Album: 1654 to the Present (New York: Rizzoli, 1983), Guggenheimer on 44–45.

16. Yates Levy to J. C. Levy, March 16, 1865, Phillips-Myers Papers, # 596, UNC.

17. Elzas, Jews of South Carolina, 18–19; Richard Gergel of Columbia pointed out to the author that South Carolina’s constitution was the first to guarantee freedom of religion to the Jews.

18. Hagy, This Happy Land, 9, 34–36; Elzas, Jews of South Carolina, 68–77; Leonard Dinnerstein, Anti-Semitism in America (New York: Oxford University Press, 1994), 6.

19. Abram V. Goodman, “South Carolina: From Shaftesbury to Salvador,” in Leonard Dinnerstein and Mary Dale Palsson, eds., Jews in the South (Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1973); Ira Rosenwaike, “The Jewish Population of the United States as Estimated from the Census of 1820,” AJHQ 53, no. 2 (December 1963): 131–19; Rev. Isaac Leeser, “The Jews in the United States—1848,” AJA 7, no. 1 (January 1955): 82–84; Uriah Z. Engelman, “Jewish Statistics in the U.S. Census of Religious Bodies (1850–1936),” Jewish Social Studies 9 (1947): 127–32.

20. Rubin, Third to None, 1–25; Berman, Richmond's Jewry, chap. 1;, Melvin I. Urofsky, Commonwealth and Community: The Jewish Experience in Virginia (Richmond: Virginia Historical Society and Jewish Community Federation of Richmond, 1997), 1–16, 30, 36, 55.

21. Eli Faber, A Time for Planting: The First Migration, 1654–1820 (Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1992), 127–28.

22. Samuel Proctor, “Jewish Life in New Orleans 1718–1860,” Louisiana Historical Quarterly 40 (1957): 110–32.

23. Korn, American Jewry and the Civil War, 15–31, and Jews and Negro Slavery in the Old South, 1789–1865 (Elkins Park, Pa.: Reform Congregation Kenesseth Israel, 1961), published also as a chapter entitled “Jews and Negro Slavery in the Old South, 1789–1865,” in Leonard Dinnerstein and Mary Dale Palsson, eds., Jews in the South (Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1973), 89–134; Hagy, This Happy Land, 93; Barkai, Branching Out, 109–11.

The 1850 census, which records all slaveholders and the number of slaves they owned, gives the names of 51 Jewish Charlestonians who owned a total of 288 slaves. Twelve Jewish Charlestonians owned 10 slaves or more. David Lopez owned 14, and, as he was a builder, he likely employed his slaves in construction work. Abraham Ottolengui owned 13, Hannah Myers, 15, and Morris Goldsmith, 16. There were approximately 500 Jews living in Charleston in 1850. In the same year, there were 3, 441 free blacks in Charleston, of whom 266 owned 1,087 slaves, more than three times the number owned by Charleston Jewry. Some free blacks, like Louisa R. DaCosta and William Penceel, owned a substantial number of slaves. “Indeed, so widespread was black slaveholding in the City of Charleston,” Larry Koger wrote, “that the majority of free black heads of household owned slaves from 1820 to 1840.” See Larry Koger, Black Slaveowners: Free Black Slavemasters in South Carolina, 1790–1860 (Jefferson, N.C.: McFarland & Co., 1985), 23; Bernard E. Powers Jr., Black Charlestonians: A Social History, 1822–1885 (Fayetteville: University of Arkansas Press, 1994); Hagy, This Happy Land, 91–93. See also Michael Johnson and James L. Roark, Black Masters: A Free Family of Color in the Old South (New York: W. W. Norton & Co., 1984); and Michael Johnson and James L. Roark, ed., No Chariot Let Down: Charleston's Free People of Color on the Eve of the Civil War (Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1984). A Northern visitor to Charleston noted that “a number [of blacks] are free and own slaves themselves. This may seem strange to many Northern people, especially to that class who cannot understand nor appreciate that system of labor known as slave labor" (Koger, Black Slaveowners, 23). Both the free black and Jewish slave owners of Charleston utilized slaves as domestic servants, as artisans, and in small commercial and manufacturing businesses. Many free blacks were engaged in the garment trade and utilized slave labor to sew and make clothes. Jewish Charlestonians sold clothing and dry goods, and it is possible there was an economic tie between the two antebellum minority communities. Mark Greenberg points out that the Jews of Savannah generally utilized slaves as domestics or hired them out. Henry and Isaac Meinhard put most of their sixteen slaves to work in their wholesale dry goods business. Solomon Cohen and Dinah Minis, the largest Jewish slaveholders in the city, with 23 and 18, respectively, hired most of them out. (Greenberg, "Becoming Southern," 61).

For a discussion of the minor role played by Jews in the slave trade in the colonial era, see Eli Faber, Jews, Slaves and the Slave Trade (New York: New York University Press, 1998).

24. Greenberg, "Becoming Southern," 57–58 and passim.

25. Richard C. Wade, Slavery in the Cities: The South, 1820–1860 (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1964), 20, appendix and passim; Robert N. Rosen, A Short History of Charleston (Columbia: University South Carolina Press, 1997), 67–79.

26. Korn, "Jews and Negro Slavery," 111–13. He was apparently a kindly master. After the war, his former slave came with his family to Philadelphia. See Korn, American Jewry, 29.

27. Korn, American Jewry, 29; Berman, Richmond Jewry, 163, 166. Frederick Law Olmsted described blacks in Richmond wearing "the cast-off clothes of the white people … purchased of the Jews, whose shops show that there must be considerable importation of such articles, probably from the North." Olmsted, who was blatantly anti-Semitic, wrote that Jews in the South engaged in "an unlawful trade with the simple Negroes, which is found very profitable" (Korn, American Jewry, 104). The Ezekiels operated a dry goods store in Richmond, which Moses Ezekiel recalled "was filled with Negro clothing [including] ready-made dresses of all sizes." Moses's grandparents, the store owners, "were monopolists in the sense that every Negro who was brought to Richmond from the South to be sold at auction was, on the morning of the sale, brought to our store to be dressed" (Zebulon Vance Hooker II, "Moses Jacob Ezekiel—The Formative Years," Virginia Historical Magazine 60 [April 1952]: 241–54, 243).

28. Barkai, Branching Out, 1–31; I. J. Benjamin, Three Years in America, 1859–1862, edited by Oscar Handlin and translated from the German by Charles Reznikoff (Philadelphia: JPSA, 1956), 1:75. The history of German Jewry is rich and complicated. See Michael A. Meyer, ed., German-Jewish History in Modern Times, 4 vols. (New York: Columbia University Press, 1996–1998).

29. Barkai, Branching Out, 93–94; Malcolm M. Stern, "Preface," Americans of Jewish Descent (New York: reprint KTAV Publishing House, 1971). Ironically, American German Jews were proud of their German heritage, culture, and language. One writer observed that "nowhere [exists] a truer tribe for Germany than in the Jews…. On the prairies of America we hear the Jew speaking German; he carries the German fatherland along everywhere and can never leave it" (Howard M. Sacher, A History of the Jews in America [New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1992], 61). Hasia Diner points out in A Time for Gathering that many so-called German Jews actually came from Poznan (Posen) or Silesia, which were part of Poland annexed by Prussia. Joseph Proskauer always said his parents were German, but they actually came from Hungary and Breslau in Silesia. German ancestry was clearly more prestigious than Polish ancestry (see pp. 9, 49–50). In her autobiography, Kitty Carlisle Hart said that her mother, who was born in Shreveport, falsely claimed that her family came from Alsace-Lorraine "because she thought it was more exotic. (She would have preferred France, but since [her father's] name was Holtzman, Alsace was as near as she dared get.)" Kitty: An Autobiography (New York: Doubleday, 1988), 3. It seems her mother and father both tended to exaggerate a bit. Her grandfather Holtzman claimed to have been a gunner on the Merrimack, to have sold a tie to President Lincoln after the war, and to have been at Ford's Theater when Lincoln was shot. Kitty Hart's father did, however, marry Stella Baer (pronounced "Barr"), the daughter of Max Baer, who signed the pro-Confederate letter of the Shreveport congregation, which denounced The Jewish Messenger. For a detailed history of nineteenth-century anti-Semitism in Germany, see Klaus Fischer, The History of an Obsession: German Judeophobia and the Holocaust (New York: Continuum Publishing Co., 1998).

30. Marcus, United States Jewry, 1776–1985, 4 vols. (Detroit: Wayne State University Press, 1989–93), 3:14–15.

31. Reznikoff and Engelman, Jews of Charleston, 148, 208; Jacob Rader Marcus, To Count a People: American Jewish Population Data, 1585–1984 (Lanham, Md.: University Press of America, 1990), 208, 204; Ford's Census, Charleston, 1860, South Carolina Historical Society, Charleston. The condescending attitude of the Jewish elite at Beth Elohim and elsewhere toward the newer Polish immigrants is reflected in a statistical report of Jewish congregations that dismissed Berith Shalome as "a Polish congregation … numbering a few foreigners" (Reznikoff and Engelman, Jews of Charleston, 148). In 1905 Rabbi Elzas wrote that Charleston had "a Polish congregation," but it had "no history, communal or otherwise, worth recording" (Elzas, Jews of South Carolina, 261n. 1). Solomon Breibart has pointed out that Berith Shalome was the first Ashkenazi congregation in the South. Belinda Gergel and Richard Gergel, In Pursuit of the Tree of Life: A History of the Early Jews of Columbia, South Carolina, and the Tree of Life Congregation (Columbia, S.C.: Tree of Life Congregation, 1996), 8–34.

32. Marcus, To Count a People, 204–5; Steinberg, United for Worship and Charity: A History of Congregation Children of Israel (Augusta, Ga.: privately printed, 1982). The demographics of this era is a maddening subject. Modern historians still rely on contemporary estimates of the Jewish population made by the eminent rabbi and editor Isaac Leeser of Philadelphia. Steven Hertzberg, in Strangers within the Gate City: The Jews of Atlanta, 1845–1915 (Philadelphia: JPSA, 1978), claims that some of Leeser's estimates "may have been high" (281n. 18). Elliott Ashkenazi in The Business of Jews in Louisiana, 1840–1875 (Tuscaloosa: University of Alabama Press, 1988), states that Leeser's figures "are little more than estimates, and I believe that they err on the low side" (183n. 15). Jacob Rader Marcus, in To Count a People, continues to give Leeser's estimates as the only information available. Like Hertzberg and Ashkenazi (in the "absence of more concrete data"), I have accepted Leeser's numbers as estimates, but like Ashkenazi, I believe them to be low.

33. Joseph B. Mahan, Columbus: Georgia's Fall Line "Trading Town" (Northridge, Calif.: Windsor Publications, 1986), 48.

34. Rabbi Newton J. Friedman, "A History of Temple Beth Israel of Macon, Georgia" (Ph.D. diss., Burton College and Seminary, 1955), 11–25.

35. Hertzberg, Strangers within the Gate City, 10–18; interview with Jacob Haas, Atlanta; Franklin M. Garrett, Atlanta and Environs: A Chronicle of Its People and Events, reprint, 3 vols. (Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1969–1987; originally published New York: Lewis Historical Publishing Co., 1954), 1:214–55. Apparently, Sarah was pro-Union. The family recorded a story that after the battle on the Columbus bridge on April 16, 1865, friends ran to her to compliment her on a conspicuous act of courage of her son, Julius M. Alexander. She is said to have replied, "Pity it was not done in a better cause" (Henry Aaron Alexander, Notes on the Alexander Family of South Carolina and Georgia and Connections [privately printed, 1954], Atlanta Jewish Federation Archives and CC, 59).

36. Pittsburgh Evening Leader, Merz file, Pittsburgh, March 31, 1875, AJA; Fannie Herzberg, "Pioneer Members and History of Temple Beth-El, 1859–1959," Chattahoochee Valley Historical Society Bulletin, November 1959 (reprinted in the Newsletter of the Southern Jewish Historical Society).

37. The Moses family were prominent, prosperous, and cosmopolitan for the place and times. When Hannah, a Moses daughter, married Isaac I. Moses, the Moseses had a large wedding with more than three hundred guests, thirty of whom spent the night at the plantation. Moses's children visited relatives and friends in South Carolina and Pennsylvania. One daughter, Penina, met the famous rabbi Dr. Isaac Leeser on a visit to Philadelphia. She was expecting her brother, Lea, when Rabbi Leeser arrived. "I rushed to the door," she later recalled, "and finding my mistake was much embarrassed and said 'Oh! I thought you were Lea, sir' to which he laughingly replied 'It is Lee—ser'" (Moses, Last Order, 70–82).

38. Isaac Wheeler Avery, The History of the State of Georgia (1881; reprinted New York: AMS Press, 1972), 155–56.

39. Berman, Richmond's Jewry, 10, 36–50; Second Annual Directory for the City of Richmond (1860), microfilm, VSL.

40. Urofsky, Commonwealth, 63–65; Our First Century and a Quarter, 1844–1969, a history of Ohef Sholom Temple by Elise Levy Margolius (privately printed, 1970). My thanks to Jennifer Gregory Priest, Ohef Sholom's archivist, for her kind assistance in sending me this work. Hazzan is Hebrew for cantor. In the nineteenth century, hazzan sometimes meant "reader" as well as "cantor." It even meant "rabbi" at times, because there were few ordained rabbis.

41. The Oxford Dictionary of the Jewish Religion, 440; Washington Daily National Intelligencer, August 27, 1861, front page, quoting the Richmond Enquirer. The Enquirer pointed out that Manassa and Manassas were both corruptions of Manasseh. In 1991 the town of Manassas debated the question of whether or not it was named for a Jewish innkeeper or an Indian (Native American). Although there was little or no evidence for the Indian origin, in the interest of political correctness, the town put up a marker saying it could be either (Washington Jewish News, December 5, 1991).

42. Marcus, To Count a People, 204–5; Urofsky, Commonwealth, 79.

43. Moses, "Jews of Mobile," 120, 121–22; Robert J. Zietz, The Gates of Heaven, Congregation Sha'arai Shomayim: The First 150 Years, Mobile, Alabama, 1844–1994 (Mobile: Congregation Sha'arai Shomayim, 1994), 11–33.

44. Elliot Ashkenazi, A Centennial, Lehman Brothers, 1850–1950 (New York: Lehman Brothers, 1950); Harry's name change courtesy of Kenneth Libo; Cotton quote in Harriet

E. Amos, Cotton City: Urban Development in Antebellum Mobile (Tuscaloosa: University of Alabama Press, 1985), xiii. On Civil War Montgomery, see William W. Rogers, Jr., Confederate Homefront: Montgomery during the Civil War (Tuscaloosa: University of Alabama Press, 1999).

45. Allan Nevins, Herbert H. Lehman and His Era (New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1963), 7–8.

46. Leo E. Turitz and Evelyn Turitz, Jews in Early Mississippi (Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, [1983]), 12, 18, 35–36, 43, 121; Carolyn Gray LeMaster, A Corner of the Tapestry: A History of the Jewish Experience in Arkansas, 1820s-1990s (Fayetteville: University of Arkansas Press, 1994), 7; Clara L. Moses, Aunt Sister's Book (New York: privately printed, 1929), 2–3.

47. William Howard Russell, My Diary North and South (Boston, 1863), 242.

48. Marcus, Memoirs, 3:104.

49. Ashkenazi, Business of Jews, 9–11, citing Hertzberg, Strangers within the Gate City (see note 49); Wade, Slavery in the Cities, appendix ("Population of Major Southern Cities, 1820–1860"). Norfolk's population was 14, 620.

50. Eric Brock, preface to "The Jewish Cemeteries of Shreveport, La." (privately printed, 1995); Proctor, "Jewish Life," 123. Rabbi Max Heller states in "Jubilee Souvenir of Temple Sinai, 1872–1922" (New Orleans: Temple Sinai, 1922) that the second Touro synagogue was opened in 1857 on Carondelet near Julia. Cathy Kahn says 218 (old numbering system) Carondolet, river side, between Julia and St. Joseph (letter to author).

51. Bobbie Malone, "New Orleans Uptown Jewish Immigrants: The Community of Congregation Gates of Prayer, 1850–1860," Louisiana History 32, no. 3 (summer 1991): 239–65; Proctor, "Jewish Life," 126; Malone, "New Orleans Uptown," 242–56.

52. Ashkenazi, Diary of Clara Solomon, 142, illustrations and captions between pages 342 and 344. Drew Gilpin Faust describes the Solomons in Mothers of Invention: Women of the Slaveholding South in the American Civil War (Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1996). Indeed, the title of her book is taken from Clara's diary ("Necessity & war is the mother of invention," Diary [May 18, 1862]; see page 2 for epigram). Ironically, Clara Solomon was atypical of Jewish Southern women because, first, she was not an immigrant and, second, she came from a more affluent segment of society (as Faust acknowledges). Faust points out that Clara's emotional extravagance, her fantasy life, and her interest in other women were not unusual or deviant in the 1860s. Such expressions, she writes, “represented a sensitivity and authenticity of feeling celebrated in this sentimental mid-Victorian era as appropriate to true friendship as much as true love” (144).

53. “The Story of the Jewish Orphan’s Home of New Orleans” (New Orleans: Louisiana State Museum, 1905); Malone, “Uptown,” 242.

54. Ashkenazi, Business of Jews, 8–11; Malone, “Uptown,” 242–43.

55. Ashkenazi, Business of Jews, 13; Rabbi Martin I. Hinchin, Fourscore and Eleven: A History of the Jews of Rapides Parish, 1828–1919 (Alexandria, La.: McCormick Graphics for Congregation Gemiluth Chassodim, 1984), 2–4; my thanks to Nancy Greenberg and Rabbi Task of Alexandria for providing me with this local history. Korn, Early Jews, 189; Marcus, Memoirs, 3:104.

56. Brock, “Shreveport,” 57, preface and passim; Schappes, Documentary History, 439–40.

57. Bernard Postal and Lionel Koppman, “Tennessee,” in A Jewish Tourist’s Guide to the U.S. (Philadelphia: JPSA, 1954), 585–95; Rabbi James A. Wax, “The Jews of Memphis: 1860–1865,” West Tennessee Historical Society Papers 3 (1949): 39–89; Selma S. Lewis, A Biblical People in the Bible Belt: The Jewish Community of Memphis, Tennessee, 1840s–1960s (Macon, Ga.: Mercer University Press, 1998), 1–54; Fedora Small Frank, “Nashville Jewry during the Civil War,” Tennessee Historical Quarterly 39, no. 3 (fall 1980): 310; Frank, Five Families and Eight Young Men (Nashville and Her Jewry, 1850–1861) (Nashville: Tennessee Book Co., 1962), 9.

58. Cecilia Felsenthal, The Felsenthal Family, 2nd ed. (Memphis, Tenn: Goldberger Printing & Publishing, 1939), 13–42. In 1732 a Felsenthal ancestor named Isaac (so the family legend goes) went to a local meeting. When he announced “Isaac” to a roll call, he was asked “From where?” He answered, “Ich komme uber fels und thal” (I came over rock and dale). He became Isaac Felsenthal.

59. Ruthe Winegarten and Cathy Schechter, Deep in the Heart: The Lives and Legends of Texas Jews (Austin: Eakin Press and Texas Jewish Historical Society, 1990), 7, 12–13; Juliet George, “By the Brazos and the Trinity They Hung Up Their Harps: Two Jewish Immigrants in Texas” (master’s thesis, Texas Christian University, 1991), 4.

60. Harold M. Hyman, Oleander Odyssey: The Kempners of Galveston, Texas, 1854–1980s (College Station: Texas A & M University Press, 1990), 3–13.

61. Winegarten and Schechter, Deep in the Heart, 16–22; George, "By the Brazos," passim; Frances R. Kallison, "100 Years of Jewry in San Antonio" (master's thesis, Trinity University, 1977).

62. Sacher, A History of the Jews in America, 72.

63. Elzas, Jews of South Carolina, 244; Rubin, Third to None, 119; I. J. Benjamin, "Introduction," Three Years in America, 1859–1862, vol. 1, edited by Oscar Handlin and translated from the German by Charles Reznikoff (Philadelphia: JPSA, 1956).

64. Benjamin, Three Years, 76.

65. Greenberg, "Becoming Southern," 72–74. Greenberg astutely points out that, by every indicator, Jews were more accepted in antebellum Savannah than the Irish. ("Nativism directed primarily against Irish immigrants restricted their access to political office to a far greater degree than anti-Semitism affected Savannah Jews.")

66. Woodward, Mary Chesnut, 288.

67. Ibid., 459: "They say," Mary quoted a Mrs. Goodwyn,"there has never been a fallen woman among them." "Rachel—a shining light to the contrary," Mary jokingly replies, referring to the beautiful Rachel Lyons.

68. Ibid., 317, 346, 359.

69. Mary was attracted to Mem's lively personality and enjoyed her many stories. She recorded one in her diary:

> Some man was terribly angry with his son, who had a weakness for some beautiful Jewess, swore at all Jews, and used bad language freely. Being high church and all that, he read the service for them on Sunday.
>
> Son: "I do not want to hear anything from Isaiah or Solomon or Moses and the prophets—or Matthew, Mark, Luke, or John."
>
> "Silence, sir—with your ribaldry."
>
> "But, my father—you know they are only damned old Jews' anyhow." (359)

70. Oscar S. Straus, Under Four Administrations (Boston and New York: Houghton Mifflin Co., 1922), 10. "In the Bible Belt," Selma S. Lewis writes in A Biblical People, "the dominant community felt more tolerant of Jews" (33).

71. William R. Taylor, Cavalier and Yankee: The Old South and American National Character (New York: George Braziller, 1961), 325. See, generally, Eugene D. Genovese, A Consuming Fire: The Fall of the Confederacy in the Mind of the White Christian South (Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1998), 9, 38–39 ("we have provoked the Holy One of Israel to anger"; "bless our future Zion" [55]), ("The divines preached the model of the Abrahamic household" [70]; Heb. 6:4–8, the fate of Babylon).

72. Woodward, Mary Chesnut, 217, 233, 548.

73. "The Civil War Music Collector's Edition," notes by Charles K. Wolfe (Alexandria, Va.: Time-Life Music, n.d.): "And lift thou up thy rod, and stretch out the hand over the sea and divide it," God commands Moses (Exod. 14:15). Moses, of course, was a hero to the Union as well. "O, Let My People Go" was sung by the freed slaves ("O, go down Moses / Away down to Egypt land / and tell King Pharaoh / to let my people go").

74. "Civil War Music Collector's Edition," notes by Charles K. Wolfe.

75. Rev. J. William Jones, Personal Reminiscences of General Robert E. Lee (reprint, Richmond: U.S. Historical Society Press, 1989), 419.

76. Capt. R. E. Lee, Recollections and Letters of General Robert E. Lee (Garden City, N.Y.: Garden City Publishing Co., 1904), 105–6; Jonathon Kirsch, Moses: A Life (New York: Ballentine Books, 1998), 187–89.

77. See "Biographical Sketches of Jews Who Have Served in the Congress of the United States," in The American Jewish Yearbook, vol. 2, 1900–1901 (Philadelphia: JPSA), 517–24. (The Southerners were Benjamin of Louisiana, Yulee of Florida, Philip Phillips of Alabama, and, for added measure, likely David S. Kaufman of Texas. The Jewish Year Book included him as a Jew.)

78. Bertram Wallace Korn, Eventful Years and Experiences: Studies in Nineteenth Century America Jewish History (Cincinnati: AJA, 1954), 114–15; Frederic Cople Jaher, A Scapegoat in the New Wilderness: The Origins and Rise of Anti-Semitism in America, (Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1994), 177.

79. Abraham J. Peck, “The Other Peculiar Institution: Jews and Judaism in the Nineteenth Century South,” Modern Judaism 7, no. 1 (February 7, 1987): 106. Hammond was, to say the least, a curmudgeon of the highest order. He disliked Jews—but then, Hammond disliked everyone.

80. Carol Bleser, ed., Secret and Sacred: The Diaries of James Henry Hammond, a Southern Slaveholder (New York: Oxford University Press, 1988), 94–95 (June 1842); Jaher, Scapegoat, 187.

81. John F. Marszalek, ed., The Diary of Miss Emma Holmes, 1861–1866 (Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1979), 162, 209, 306; Carol Bleser, ed., Tokens of Affection: The Letters of a Planter’s Daughter in the Old South (Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1996), 343. Bleser refers to this remark as anti-Semitic, which it does not appear to be. After all, the family had a Jewish houseguest, and the letter was simply a private expression of the writer’s surprise at what was a strange custom in the South—or the Western world generally—refusing to eat pork and ham.

82. Jaher, Scapegoat, 91. “The guilt of the bloud [sic] of the Lord of Heaven and Earth lyeth upon that Jewish nation,” Increase Mather bellowed in 1669 (Marcus, Colonial American Jew, 3:1113–14). Rhode Islander John Bannister referred to Moses Lopez as “a Jew, the offscouring of the human species” (Rubin, Third to None, 10).

83. See, generally, Jacob Rader Marcus, Early American Jewry (Philadelphia: JPSA, 1951), 1: chap. 5 (“it is … a matter of record that the New Englanders, with rare exception, had no use for Jews. The original Puritans were interested in Hebrew and in ancient Hebrews … but not in their descendants as long as they remained Jews”). Unlike Southerners, the Puritans “frowned at the thought of tolerating or assimilating others” (103). Rabbi Marcus correctly refers to “the bigots of Massachusetts” (116) in The Jews in America: Four Centuries of an Uneasy Encounter, a History (New York: Simon and Schuster, 1989). Arthur Hertzburg points out that the Massachusetts Bay colony “had chased professing Jews out of Boston” (34). Of course Puritans hanged Quakers (see John T. Noonan, Jr., The Lustre of our Country [Berkeley: University of California Press, 1998]). Lee Friedman tries to whitewash early Massachusetts anti-Semitism in Early American Jews (Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1934), and succeeds at muddying the water somewhat. Friedman apparently did not know that the South existed, as he fails to mention colonial South Carolina, Georgia, or Virginia. In 1821, Massachusetts narrowly approved a constitutional revision removing a declaration of belief in Christianity as a qualification for election to public office. Old New Englanders like Leverett Saltonstall, true to their anti-Semitic ancestors, objected that “jews, mahometans, deists, and atheists” were “opposed to the common religion of the Commonwealth and believe it an imposition, a mere fable, and that its professors are under a wretched delusion." Jews, he thought, were not "suitable members of a Christian state" (Jaher, Scapegoat, 131). Leonard Dinnerstein agreed with this general assessment in Anti-Semitism in America, 8.

84. Charles Francis Adams, ed., Memoirs of John Quincy Adams, 12 vols. (Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott, 1874–77), 10:483; 11:155, 162, 500; 12:164; Jaher, Scapegoat, 131, 190; Korn, in Jews in the South, 139; Dinnerstein, Anti-Semitism, 11. Adams wrote in 1780 that the Jews of Amsterdam "would steal your eyes out of your head if they possibly could."

85. Korn, Eventful Years and Experiences, 104; Dinnerstein, Anti-Semitism, 31–32.

86. Gergel and Gergel, Tree of Life, 33–35.

87. Confederate Veteran, 23:8, 343, August 1915. This is in a letter from Simon Baruch to The Confederate Veteran.

88. Samuel Proctor and Louis Schmier, eds., with Malcolm Stern, Jews of the South: Selected Essays from the Southern Jewish Historical Society (Macon, Ga.: Mercer University Press, 1984), 37; Schmier, "Georgia History in Pictures."

89. Greenberg, "Becoming Southern."

90. Lewis, A Biblical People, 34.

91. The lithograph of Lilienthal is at the Judah L. Magnes Museum (Western Jewish History Center), Berkeley, California; see p. 36. The lithograph was purchased for $110,000 in 1996. See Maine Antique Digest, "Pacific Currents," Pacific Book Auction Galleries Quarterly (April 1996): 8-A.

92. Lewis, A Biblical People, 32; Frank, Five Families, 87.

93. Sinai 7 (1862), 158–63, AJA; Korn, Jews and Negro Slavery, 26, 56–57; Berman, Richmond Jewry, 372n. 77. The author acknowledges the kind assistance of Andrea Mehrländer in translating this article, which has been cited by previous historians but has never been accurately translated into English. As to Jewish abolitionists, see Jayme A. Sokolow, "Revolution and Reform: The Antebellum Jewish Abolitionist," Journal of Ethnic Studies 9, no. 1 (1981): 26–41.

94. Korn, "Jews and Negro Slavery," 123.

95. Ibid., 131–32; Korn, American Jewry, 17. The American Jewish community generally avoided the debate over slavery in the antebellum years. Too small, vulnerable, and foreign to affect the outcome; too insecure in their social, political, and economic strength; suspicious of the abolitionist movement; and anxious to assimilate, neither organized Jewry and few Jews individually had anything to say on the controversy, North or South. National Jewish publications such as Isaac Leeser's Occident maintained a policy of silence or strict neutrality. National organizations, such as they were, took the same position: these were political issues and inappropriate for official Jewish comment. B'nai B'rith, a Jewish fraternal organization, ignored the issue. The American and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society issued an Annual Report in 1853 in which it found that the "Jews of the United States have never taken any steps whatever with regard to the Slavery question." Korn, American Jewry, 15–16.

When Rabbi David Einhorn of Baltimore's Har Sinai congregation preached the abolition of slavery, he was forced to flee Baltimore. In May 1861 he was threatened during riots between Confederate and Union mobs. His board advised him that he should avoid "the excitable issues of the time" (Barkai, Branching Out, 110; Cohen, Encounter, 135). Another abolitionist rabbi, Bernard Felsenthal of Chicago, preached against the evils of slavery (Barkai, Branching Out, 113).

Numerous rabbis and Jewish leaders in the North answered Rabbi Raphall's defense of slavery. The majority of Jews in the North opposed slavery, and there were a number of Northern Jewish abolitionists. Michael Heilprin, a Polish Jewish-American writer, was outraged by Raphall's "sacrilegious words." "Have we not had enough of the 'reproach of Egypt?' Must the stigma of Egyptian principles be fastened on the people of Israel by Israelitish lips themselves?" (Felsenthal felt so strongly about slavery that he refused to even apply for a position at the Mobile congregation; Korn, American Jewry, 18–23.)

96. Solomon Cohen to "My Dear Aunt," transcription courtesy of Lewis Schmier, copy in possession of author.

97. Marcus, Memoirs, 2:295.

98. Schappes, Documentary History, 436–41.

99. Korn, American Jewry, 250n. 48; Jaher, Scapegoat, 138, 200–203, 215. For a different view of the abolitionists, see Louis Ruchames, "The Abolitionists and the Jews," PAJHS 42 (September 1952–June 1953): 131–55. Ruchames moderated his views in "The Abolitionists and the Jews: Some Further Thoughts," in A Bicentennial Festscrift for Jacob Rader Marcus (Waltham, Mass: AJHS, New York KTAV, 1976), 505–17. (See "The Abolitionist and the Jews," 145.) Jaher concedes that the abolitionists occasionally had positive things to say about the Jews. See page 310. See also Dinnerstein, Anti-Semitism, 16. Of course, white Southerners generally detested New Englanders and abolitionists. “Nothing on earth shall ever induce us to submit to any nation,” one South Carolinian said in 1861, “with the brutal, bigoted blackguards of the New England States” (Battle Cry of Freedom, 234–35).

100. John Weiss, Life and Correspondence of Theodore Parker (New York: D. Appleton, 1964): Theodore Parker, “Journal,” March 1843, 1:214, and Parker to Dr. Francis, May 26, 1844, 1:236, “Letter to the Members of the 28th Congregational Society of Boston” (1859), 2:497, and “Some Thoughts on the Charities of Boston” (1858), 1:397, and to Bev. David Wasson, December 12, 1857, 1:395–96. See also Egal Feldman, Dual Destinies: The Jewish Encounter with Protestant America (Urbana and Chicago: University of Illinois Press, 1990), 56–59; Jaher, Scapegoat, 200–203.

101. Liberator 15 (May 20, 1842): 1; 19; (May 18, September 21, 1849): 77, 751; Jaher, Scapegoat, 201.

102. Edmond Quincy, “A Jew and a Christian,” Liberator 18 (August 11, 1848): 126; Liberator 15 (May 20, 1842): 1; 19 (May 18, September 21, 1849): 77, 751. Quincy, a Boston Brahmin and a cousin of John Quincy Adams, was an officer of the Massachusetts and American Anti-Slavery Society, editor of the Massachusetts Abolitionist, and a contributor to the Liberator. He wrote a novel, Wensley: A Story without a Moral, published in 1854, in which the villain is a forger and cheat named Aaron Abrahams. The book is laced with every cliché of old-fashioned Boston anti-Semitism: the Jew as a liar, cheat, and coward (see pages 275–91). See also Jonathon D. Sarna, “The ‘Mythical Jew’ and the ‘Jew Next Door’ in Nineteenth-Century America,” in David A. Gerber, ed., Anti-Semitism in American History (Urbana and Chicago: University of Illinois Press, 1986), 57–78; for a detailed treatment of Child, James Russell Lowell, and others; and David A. Gerber, “Cutting Out Shylock: Elite Anti-Semitism and the Quest for Moral Order in the Mid-Nineteenth Century American Market Place,” Journal of American History 69, no. 3 (December 1982): 615–37, for the anti-Semitic credit reporting of Arthur and Lewis Tappan, leading abolitionists and merchants. Of course, not all New England intellectuals were anti-Semites. Henry Wadsworth Longfellow, for example, wrote philo-Semitic works, including “Tales of a Wayside Inn” and “Judas Maccabaeus.”

Lydia Maria Child, Letters from New-York (New York: Charles Francis, and Boston: James Munroe, 1843), 12–13, 26–29, 31, 33–34, 217–18, 225 (Judaism was rife with superstition, vengeance, blindness; its ceremonies “strange … spectral and flitting”). Child, of Boston, was one of the most famous female writers of her time and a vocal abolitionist. Her husband was a member of the Massachusetts legislature and an early member of the New England Antislavery Society. She wrote numerous antislavery tracts and edited the “Anti-Slavery Standard.” Her Letters from New-York was a best-seller in the 1840s. See also Patricia G. Holland and Milton Meltzer, eds., Guide to the Collected Correspondence of Lydia Maria Child, 1817–1880 (New York: Kraus Microform, 1980), s.v. “Jews,” especially letters to Louisa Gilman Loring (September 4, 1846) and Ellis Gray Loring (March 5, 1854).

As to Henry Wilson’s views, see The Congressional Globe, 36th Cong., 2d sess., February 21, 1861, 1091; and 37th Cong., 2d sess., February 13, 1862, 789; Korn, American Jewry, 168 (“The race that stoned Prophets and crucified the Redeemer of the World”; “the Jew brokers”; “curbstone Jew broker”); Meade, Judah P. Benjamin, 139; Marcus, U. S. Jewry, 3:36.

103. Ibid. See notes 84 and 102, above.

104. Sacher, A History of the Jews of America, 73.

105. History of the Jews of Louisiana, Their Religious, Civic, Charitable and Patriotic Life (Jewish Historical Publishing Company of Louisiana, 1903), 33; Scherck to J. L. Meyer, Columbus, Ga., September 9, 1864, AJA; Charleston Daily Courier, March 11, 1861.

106. Dauber, 2, 927.

107. Harry Simonhoff, Jewish Notables in America, 1776–1865: Links of an Endless Chain (New York: Greenberg, 1956), 297–300; Woodward, Mary Chesnut, 11.

108. Edwin DeLeon, Thirty Years of My Life on Three Continents (London: Ward and Downey, 1890), 1:13.

109. William L. King, The Newspaper Press of Charleston, S.C. (Charleston, 1872), 159–61.

110. Avery, History of Georgia, 115.

111. Greenberg, “Savannah Jews,” 238; Journal of the Public and Secret Proceedings of the Convention of the People of Georgia (Milledgeville, Ga., 1861), Georgia Historical Society, Savannah.

112. Some sources claim that Hyams presided over the Louisiana Secession Convention, but this is erroneous. Louisiana History 2 (winter 1961): 7–105 (Journal of the Convention); New Orleans Daily Picayune, March 26, 1861; John D. Winters, The Civil War in Louisiana (Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1963), 9.

113. Bernard Lemann Diary, Lemann Family Papers, Tulane Special Collections, TU; Ashkenazi, Business of Jews, 31–38, 42–43.

114. Thus, while one can barely find a single opponent of the war among Charleston, Savannah, or Richmond Jewry, there was identifiable opposition to secession in New Orleans. Clara Solomon, for example, was highly critical of one immigrant: "Mr. E. [Elburger] is a very intelligent, well informed man, full of information. He expressed strong union sentiments. He said that Lincoln was our President, and if not we then were 'Rebels,' thus endorsing Lincoln's words. His interests are with the North, and had better be guarded in his speech." (75)

These sentiments were more likely to be expressed by the most recent German and Polish immigrants.

115. Ralph A. Wooster, The Secession Conventions of the South (Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1962), 101.

116. John Frederick Nau, The German People of New Orleans, 1850–1900 (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1958), 38.

117. Weil's views were not shared by his brother Henry, who took a more moderate view. Henry did not even enlist in the Home Guard, although he did purchase Confederate bonds, an investment Jake thought unwise. His friends Lehmann and Durr also felt that Jake was unwise to involve himself in the controversy. (Jake Weil to Josiah Weil, May 16, 1861, Jake Weil Papers, Alabama Dept. of Archives & History, Montgomery, Ala., copy in possession of author, courtesy of Bert Fischel, and at Touro Infirmary Archive, courtesy of Catherine Kahn.) A second copy in the author's possession states as follows: "This is a copy of a letter made by the Father of Peter Weil (a student at the University of Texas) from an original in private hands in Montgomery, Alabama, and loaned to Dr. Barnes F. Lathrop, December 1, 1961." This copy is at the LBJ Library, University of Texas, according to Bert Fischel. Maurice Kahn Weil of Shreveport has the original, according to Catherine Kahn.

118. Berman, Richmond's Jewry, 177–78.

119. Ibid., 172–74; Stanley L. Falk, "Divided Loyalties in 1861: The Decision of Major Alfred Mordecai," PAJHS 48:3 (March 1959), 168.

120. Phoebe Yates Pember, A Southern Woman's Story: Life in Confederate Richmond, ed. Bell Irvin Wiley (Jackson, Tenn.: McCowat-Mercer Press, 1959; reprint, Wilmington, N.C.: Broadfoot Publishing Co., 1991), 24; Phillips-Meyers Papers, Philip Phillips Diary, Southern Historical Collection, University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill, 38; Jacob Rader Marcus, Memoirs, 3:151.

121. Rosen, Confederate Charleston (Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1997), chap. 4; I. Valentine obituary, Charleston Daily Courier, June 21, 1862; Young, Where They Lie, 1–2, 41; Hagy, This Happy Land, 200–201; Samuel Wylie Crawford, The Genesis of the Civil War: The Story of Sumter, 1860–1861 (New York, 1887), 429. Lieutenant Valentine's report is in OR, ser. 1, 1:53; Elzas, Jews of South Carolina, 236. Col. Roswell S. Ripley also cited Valentine for his prompt and energetic performance of duties. (OR ser. 1, 1:30–53; see page 39, "Operations Charleston Harbor"). Gen. Samuel W. Crawford, an eyewitness, described the enfilade battery in The History of Fort Sumter, published after the war. "Taking the most important battery upon the parapet reverse, its guns were so actively worked, and at such short intervals of fire, that six hundred and eleven shots were fired from it alone. 'The object of our firing,' said the officer who immediately commanded it, Lieutenant Jacob Valentine, in his official report, 'was to sweep the crest of the parapet, the roofs of the quarters within Fort Sumter, to dismount the barbette guns, if practicable, and to drive the enemy from the parapet.' The latter object was accomplished." Crawford, The Genesis of the Civil War, 429; Young, Where They Lie, 1-2. Lieutenant Valentine's report is in OR, chap. 1, 53; Elzas, Jews of South Carolina, 236. Beauregard agreed that Valentine's battery had been effective and prevented the use of the Sumter's barbette guns. In his official report of April 27, 1861, the general praised his men and mentioned, "in the highest terms of praise," two captains and the eight commanders of batteries of Sullivan's Island, including Lieutenants Wagner, Rhett, Yates, and Valentine.

122. Crawford, Genesis, 434; OR, ser. 1, vol. 1, 31, 53–54.

123. OR, ser. 1, vol. 1, 32, 34; Elzas, Jews of South Carolina, 205; Dorothy Bultman, The Story of a Good Life (Sumter, S.C, 1963).

124. On Sunday afternoon, after Governor Pickens, General Beauregard, and their staffs had started from Sullivan's Island to take possession of Fort Sumter, they were told that a fire had broken out. Their boat returned to Sullivan's Island and took two fire engines on board. Later that day, more equipment was sent to the fort "in charge of our very efficient chief, M. H. Nathan, Esq.," the local press reported. ("The Battle of Fort Sumter and First Victory of the Southern Troops," pamphlet, 1861 [1961 reprint], 24.)

The local press also reported that the first Palmetto flag was raised over Fort Sumter by Colonels Franklin J. Moses Jr. and J. L. Dearing of Governor Pickens's staff (pamphlet, 27). Although he was raised as a Jew and never converted to Christianity, young Moses's father, Franklin J. Moses Sr., married a Christian and raised his son in the Protestant faith. Franklin Jr. was born and raised in Sumter, studied at South Carolina College, and began his career as the Civil War began, as private secretary to Gov. Francis W. Pickens. He was fervent for secession (DAB, 112). His service during the war was varied. He was private secretary and/or the aide to the governor, but was terminated by the Executive Council because he was unable to perform satisfactorily (Charles E. Cauthen, ed., Journals of the South Carolina Executive Councils of 1861 and 1862 [Columbia: S.C. Archives Dept., 1956], passim; John B. Edmunds, Jr., Francis W. Pickens and the Politics of Destruction [Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1986], 166, 168, 220n. 26; Woodward, Mary Chesnut, 406). He served at Fort Moultrie and at Battery Gregg on Morris Island as second lieutenant in Company F, 1st Regiment of South Carolina Regulars, which served as an artillery unit. He was absent from his unit for extended periods of time because of illnesses, and he apparently ended the war as a colonel, serving as "an enrolling officer" pursuant to the Conscription Act. He was almost certainly under fire on Morris Island, as the records show him reporting in August 1863 "with special instructions to receive and forward ordnance stores" and, by September, he was "mounting the Dahlgren gun at Gregg" (OR, ser. 1, vol. 28, pt. 1, 468–69, 479–80, "Operations on Morris Island").

After the war, Franklin J. Moses Jr., whose father had been a respected member of the prewar general assembly, turned his back on his community and became a Radical Republican, a scalawag, and, in 1872, governor of South Carolina. Known to American history as "the Robber Governor," he was, according to R. H. Woody, "the most perfect scalawag, perhaps in all the South" (R. H. Woody, "Franklin J. Moses, Jr.: Scalawag Governor of South Carolina, 1872–74," North Carolina Historical Review [April 1933]: 111). The Jews of South Carolina were so mortified by Moses that the Moseses of Sumter changed their names to Harby and Moses's wife resumed her maiden name, Richardson, and renamed their children Richardson (Herbert A. Moses, "Pertaining to the Moses Family" ["The less said of him the better. He was dishonest, dishonorable, and dissolute"]); interview, Belinda Gergel, Columbia, August 1999).

125. Henry Steele Commager, The Blue and the Gray (New York: Bobbs-Merrill Co., 1950), 1:607. See Cauthen, South Carolina Goes to War, 1860–1865, chap. 5, for a full treatment of the reasons South Carolina seceded.

126. Wooster, The Secession Conventions of the South, 131. For the relationship between secession and slavery, see McPherson, Battle Cry, 242, 255, 283–84.

127. Winters, The Civil War in Louisiana, 8.

128. Letter of Solomon Cohen to "My Dear Aunt," transcription courtesy of Louis Schmier, Valdosta, Georgia; copy in the possession of the author.

129. Marcus, Memoirs, 3:308–9; see James M. McPherson, For Cause and Comrades: Why Men Fought in the Civil War (New York: Oxford University Press, 1997), for the motivation of Civil War soldiers, especially 108–10, 309.

130. April 17, 1864, letter, Simon Mayer Papers, Box 1, TU; see chapter 7, note 48, below, for the details of Mayer's military service. He became a lieutenant late in the war.

131. McPherson, For Cause and Comrades, chap. 1

132. Charleston Mercury obituary, June 19, 1862, 1; Charleston Daily Courier obituary, in Young's Where They Lie, 39–40.

133. McPherson, For Cause and Comrades, 23; Young, Where They Lie, 39.

134. Letter dated July 8, 1863, addressed to "Dear Brother Isaac and Sister Amelia" (Mr. and Mrs. Isaac Meinnart) in Richmond from Philip Rosenheim, AJA.

135. Turitz and Turitz, Jews in Early Mississippi, xvii.

136. Typewritten autobiography of Sir Moses Ezekiel, 75–76, BA. See also Joseph Gutman and Stanley F. Chyet, eds., Moses Jacob Ezekiel: Memoirs from the Baths of Diocletian (Detroit: Wayne State University Press, 1975); VMI Alumni Review (Spring 1973): 1; Stanley F. Chyet, "Moses Jacob Ezekiel: A Childhood in Richmond," PAJHS 62 (1973): 286–94.

137. VMI Alumni Review (Spring 1973): 1.

138. Berman, Richmond's Jewry, 194–95.

139. J. Gottlieb to Mr. J. Abeles, Philadelphia, June 12, 1861, Personal Papers, Confederate Miscellany, Acc. 22812, VSL (Gottlieb may be listed in the Roster as Isaac Gottlieb, a corporal in Company H, 14th Mississippi).

140. Autobiography of Moses Ezekiel, BA.

141. Woodward, Mary Chesnut, 350.

142. Pember, A Southern Woman's Story, 24.

143. Ezekiel and Lichtenstein, History of the Jews of Richmond, 186; Schmier, Reflections of Southern Jewry, 4–7.

144. Helen Kohn Hennig, August Kohn: Versatile South Carolinian (Columbia: Vogue Press, 1949), 9–10. Philip Kohn evidently had strong pro-Union views: "If I think about the fact that your eager demagogues, parsons, hussies and wenches neglect nothing to make you inexperienced boys afraid for their failure, then I can only regret that I have a son among them" (10); William Valmore Izlar, A Sketch of the War Record of the Edisto Rifles, 1861–1865 (Columbia: The State Co., 1914; reprint, Camden, S.C.: J. J. Fox, 1990), 53.

145. Gary W. Gallagher, The Confederate War, (Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1997), 28.

146. Bernard M. Baruch, My Own Story (New York: Henry Holt & Co., 1957), 5.

147. Lewis Leon, The Diary of a Tar Heel Confederate Soldier (Charlotte: Stone Publishing Co., 1913), 1; Schappes, Documentary History, 481. The Diary of a Tar Heel Confederate Soldier was kept during the war, or, at least according to Lt. Col. James T. Morehead, "kept by [Leon] from the organization of the regiment [which was a year after the war commenced] up to May 1864, when he was captured." It was published when Leon was seventy-two years old and still an unreconstructed Confederate. There is additional information on Lewis Leon in J. R. Marcus, Memoirs, 3:197, and Schappes, Documentary History, 481, 707–8. My research assistant, Lt. Col. James A. Gabel, an experienced Civil War researcher, writes of Leon's book, "I must say that his little volume is one of the best accounts of life in the ranks I have read." I have also utilized Lewis and Morris Leon's service records at the National Archives. Men were paid a fifty-dollar bounty to join the army. See Albert B. Moore, Conscription and Conflict in the Confederacy (New York: Hillary House Publishers, 1963), 7, 14, 308.

148. Schmier, "Reflections of Southern Jewry," 11. The spelling of Wessolowsky obviously created transcription problems. An A. H. Wessalowsky is shown in 1st Georgia (Ramsey's) Company E as well as an A. H. Wessolowsky in Company E, 32d Georgia. There is an A. B. Wessalowsky in Companies E and G, 32d Georgia. Asa Wessolowsky, then, likely joined the 1st Georgia (Ramsey's) in March 1861, served at Pensacola, then went to (West) Virginia before being mustered out in Augusta, Georgia, in March 1862, just in time to reenlist in the 57th/32d Georgia in May 1862.

149. Gerald Sorin, A Time for Building: The Third Migration, 1880–1920, vol. 3 of The Jewish People in America (Baltimore: The Johns Hopkins University Press, 1992), 49–50, as to Castle Garden; Schappes, Documentary History, 495–96, 86; Hermann, Memoirs, 192–93. Isaac Hermann's Memoirs of a Veteran Who Served as a Private in the 60s in the War Between the States is full of braggadocio, boasting, and outlandish and blatantly untrue tales. There is no way to prove or disprove many of these stories written nearly fifty years after the war. "After reading Isaac Hermann's Memoirs of a Veteran," James Gabel wrote, "I came away with the impression that he was the Forrest Gump of the War Between the States, but with a really bad attitude. He was everywhere, and despite the fact that he was a lowly private, he was frequently in the company of the colonels and generals who often relied on his advice and counsel." Civil War Books: A Critical Bibliography, volume 1, notes that "much of the material is of questionable accuracy." Jacob Rader Marcus wrote more generously in Memoirs of American Jews: "Were only half of the adventures which Isaac Hermann [1838–1917] relates true—and there is no reason to discount his narrative—then he was indeed a hard-bitten Confederate soldier." Marcus, in a rare lapse of judgment, let his sympathies get the better of him. Harry Simonhoff in Jewish Participants in the Civil War (New York: Arco Publishing Co., 1963) is equally forgiving: "Cautious readers may suspect that some of the adventures might have been exaggerated, yet they cannot be dismissed merely as tall tales." Bell I. Wiley in The Life of Johnny Reb warns that memoirs must be used with great care "on account of the caprices of recollection, particularly its tendency to minimize weaknesses and to magnify virtues." He categorizes Hermann's memoirs with those "surcharged with romanticism." The story of Hermann's meeting with Judah Benjamin, for example, is not credible, not to mention all of Hermann's brushes with military justice and his close personal relationships with generals and colonels; his military records do not corroborate his memoirs. Unlike Rabbi Marcus, I think there is good reason to discount much of the memoir and, unlike Simonhoff, I think there are many tall tales. Nevertheless, it is known that Hermann did serve in the Washington Rifles (Company E, 1st [Ramsey's] Georgia) and Martin's Light Artillery Company, and much of the essentials of his military career is corroborated by his military records at the National Archives. There is additional information on Hermann in Marcus, Memoirs, 3:236, and Schappes, Documentary History, 495–96, 712–13.

150. Jaher, Scapegoat, passim, especially 3–4, 117–18, 135–36; Oxford Dictionary of the Jewish Religion, s.v. "Wandering Jew," 718. Many German Jews welcomed World War I, Klaus Fischer wrote in The History of an Obsession, "for the same reasons as their fellow Germans, but perhaps especially because it provided them with the opportunity to prove convincingly that, by laying their lives on the line for Germany, they were loyal German citizens" (120). "All Jews," one German Jewish group stated during World War I, "must do their duty, but the German Jews must do more than their duty" (120). Fischer points out that German Jews sacrificed more in World War I than other Germans. One hundred thousand Jews served in the army; two thousand became officers; twelve thousand were killed (120). The same was true for the Jews of Alsace-Lorraine, who were "more French than the French" (Vicki Caron, Between France and Germany: The Jews of Alsace and Lorraine 1871–1918 (Stanford, Calif.: Stanford University Press, 1988), 192.

151. Letter dated April 17, 1864 to "My dear Parents, Bros. & Sisters," Simon Mayer Papers, Box 1, TU.

152. Ezekiel and Lichtenstein, History of the Jews of Richmond, 183.

153. Philip Whitelock, MS, autobiography, Virginia Historical Society, 92.

154. Ezekiel and Lichtenstein, History of the Jews of Richmond, 183, 16, 175.

155. Jonathon D. Sarna, "American Jewish Political Conservatism in Historical Perspective," AJH 87 (June and September 1999), 113–22.

156. Bertram W. Korn, introduction to "The Jews of the Confederacy," AJA 13, no. 1, "Civil War Centennial Southern Issue" (April 1961): 4. Korn felt that the old Jewish families of the South, both in cities and small towns, "achieved a more genuinely integrated status with their neighbors than has seemed possible in any other part of the United States then or now" (4–5).

CHAPTER 2

1. Meade, Judah P. Benjamin, 4; Evans, Judah Benjamin, 4–5.

2. Benjamin Kaplan, “Judah Philip Benjamin,” in Dinnerstein and Palsson, eds., Jews in the South, 76; Butler, Judah Benjamin, 24.

3. Butler, Judah Benjamin, 22–24; Evans, Judah Benjamin, 5; Burton J. Hendrick, Statesmen of the Lost Cause (New York: Literary Guild, 1939), 169; Meade, Judah P. Benjamin, 11; Ernest B. Kruttschnitt, Benjamin’s nephew, to Pierce Butler, November 3, 1905, Manuscript Department, TU; draft of a letter dated August 13, 1897, from Kruttschnitt to F. C. Lawley TU. Remarkably, Malcolm Stern’s genealogy is incorrect.

4. Evans, Judah Benjamin, 11–14; Richard S. Tedlow, “Judah Benjamin,” in “Turn to the South,” Essays on Southern Jewry, edited by Nathan M. Kaganoff and Melvin I. Urofsky (Charlottesville: AJHS, University Press of Virginia, 1979), 64–65.

5. Leon Hühner, “David L. Yulee, Florida’s First Senator,” PAJHS 25 (1917), 1–29, 18; 18; Joseph Gary Adler, “The Public Career of Senator David Levy Yulee” (Ph.D. diss., Case Western Reserve University, 1973), 2.

6. George R. Fairbanks, “Moses Elias Levy Yulee,” Florida Historical Quarterly 18, no. 3 (January 1940): 165–67; Arthur W. Thompson, “David Yulee: A Study of Nineteenth Century American Thought and Enterprise” (Ph.D. diss., Columbia University, 1954), 4; Mills B. Lord, “David Levy Yulee: Statesman and Railroad Builder” (master’s thesis, University of Florida, 1940), 1–3. In another version, he was quartered alive and burned, and, in a third version, he was imprisoned. See Heller, “Yulee,” 2–4. The vizier’s name was Jacob Attal or Attar but was given the name Yulee, which may have been an honorary title or official name of some kind. In one version of the facts, the family had always been known as Yulee. In another version, the vizier’s widow used her own maiden name, Levy. In 1846 Moses Levy wrote a Florida newspaper, “sirnames [sic] are little thought of by orientals;… a Levite with the Jews is called but Levy.” See Thompson, “David Yulee,” 4–5. It may well be that the entire story is fictional. In the Bible, Joseph was freed from prison and made vizier, second in command of all Egypt (see Cahill, The Gift of the Jews, 96–97); this story may be the origin of the Yulee tale. Chris Monaco clarifies the facts in “Moses E. Levy of Florida: A Jewish Abolitionist Abroad,” AJH 86, no. 4 (December 1998): 377–96. He cites Norman A. Stillman and Yedida K. Stillman, “The Jewish Courtier Class in Late Eighteenth Century Morocco as Seen Through the Eyes of Samuel Romanelli,” in Essays in Honor of Bernard Lewis: The Islamic World from Classical to Modern Times (Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1989), 845–51, and other sources to show that Eliahu Levy was "an influential Jewish courtier of Sultan Sidi Muhammad (1757–90)." See 382n. 27.

7. Adler, "Public Career," 158; Thompson, "David Yulee," 5. David Yulee's mother, Hannah Abendanone, was also Sephardic, a member of the large St. Thomas Jewish community. In addition to their son David, the couple had three other children, Elias, Rahma, and Rachel. Yulee's parents separated in 1815 and divorced in 1818. (This required the approval of the king of Denmark, as St. Thomas was then a Danish colony.) The children stayed with their mother on St. Thomas. The sons eventually were sent to schools in North America; the daughters stayed and married. In 1816 Moses Levy moved to Havana, where he secured military contracts, and it was there that he became interested in settling in Florida. See Thompson, "David Yulee," 5.

8. Leon Hühner, "Moses Elias Levy: An Early Florida Pioneer and the Father of Florida's First Senator," Florida Historical Quarterly 19, no. 4 (April 1941). Moses Elias Levy was also an author and speaker on religious subjects and controversies, and the friend of prominent Jews in America, Europe, and the Caribbean. Fairbanks, in a sketch written in 1901, recalled that "His whole name was Moses Elias Levy Yulee. Moses designated his personal name, Elias a race name, Levy his tribal name and Yulee his father's name." Because this name was too cumbersome for business, he shortened it. See note 6 above.

9. Joseph Gary Adler, "Moses Elias Levy and Attempts to Colonize Florida," in Jews of the South: Selected Essays from the Southern Jewish Historical Society, edited by Samuel Proctor and Louis Schmier, with Malcolm Stern (Macon, Ga.: Mercer University Press, 1984), 21. Moses Levy became a member of the Kariate sect, which rejected the Talmud but believed the literal interpretation of the Scriptures. Mrs. Levy remarried and lived in St. Thomas. In her later years she was forced to rely on financial assistance from her two sons, who supplemented the support she received from her former husband. The two daughters married Sephardic Jewish husbands and continued to live on St. Thomas. Adler, "Moses Elias Levy," 4; Thompson, "David Yulee," 226.

10. Meade, Judah P. Benjamin, 31–33.

11. Louis Gruss, "Judah Philip Benjamin," Louisiana Historical Quarterly 19, no. 4 (October 1936): 988; Meade, Judah P. Benjamin, 43–45.

12. Charles Curran, "The Three Lives of Judah Benjamin," History Today 17, no. 9 (September 1967): 583–85; Meade, Judah P. Benjamin, 34–36.

13. Gruss, "Judah Philip Benjamin," 987; Evans, Judah Benjamin, 47–48.

14. Evans, Judah Benjamin, 28–29.

15. Marcus, Memoirs, 3:306.

16. Butler, Judah Benjamin, 44–47.

17. Butler, Judah Benjamin, 47; Bertram W. Korn, “Judah Benjamin as a Jew,” PAJHS 38 (September 1948): 153–71, quote at 168, emphasis in original.

18. Butler, Judah Benjamin, 99.

19. Thompson, “David Yulee,” 7–8; Hühner, “Florida’s First Senator,” 8.

20. Thompson, “David Yulee,” 17–25; Lord, “Yulee,” 121. Yulee had a talent for making enemies, and his enemies pursued him with unusual zeal. When he was first elected to the constitutional convention, his foes raised the issue of his citizenship, a problem that haunted him throughout his early political career. He was challenged again upon his election as territorial delegate, and extensive hearings were held on the matter. At issue was the citizenship of Moses Levy on July 17, 1821. Although he was onboard a ship in sight of land off the Florida coast at the time (the date set for the exchange of Florida to the United States, on which date all residents were declared U.S. citizens), Moses Levy was not actually on land and residing in Florida. Because Moses Levy was not legally a citizen, his children, then minors, were not citizens either. A strict interpretation of the law would leave Yulee a noncitizen. The spirit of the law prevailed, however, and Yulee was seated.

It appears from the congressional record that although Yulee’s father cooperated and supplied necessary testimony, he was completely estranged from both of his sons. The reason apparently was David’s and his brother’s rejection of the Jewish faith, or at least his father’s peculiar version of it. This is the explanation given by Yulee’s daughter, Florida Yulee Neff. It may have been due also to the father’s unorthodox ideas about life in general, what his son called “the peculiar character of his opinions.” Thompson, “David Yulee,” 223–26.

21. Thompson, “David Yulee,” 220–21. Moses Levy lived to see his son elected to high office. It is ironic that David Levy Yulee, the first person of Jewish ancestry elected to the U.S. Senate, did not acknowledge his Judaism, and yet was raised in a traditional Jewish family by an observant Jewish father whose goal was to provide a homeland for Jews in Florida, the state which sent Yulee to the Senate. Clearly, Yulee’s marriage to a non-Jew was fatal to the relationship between father and son. Moses Levy wrote, “Every Jew who contributes knowingly to the … amalgamation of the House of Israel is an enemy to his nation, to his religion, and consequently, to the world at large.” Quoted in Monaco, “Moses E. Levy,” 12; Jacob Toury, “M. E. Levy’s Plan for a Jewish Colony in Florida—1825,” in Michael: On the History of the Jews in the Diaspora, edited by Lloyd Gartner (Ramat-Aviv, Tel Aviv: ha-Universitah ha-petuhah, 1975), 23.

22. C. F. Adams, Memoirs of John Quincy Adams, 10:304, 483; 11:62, 155, 162, 294, 500–2; Jaher, Scapegoat, 190; Hühner, “Florida’s First Senator,” 14–17; Thompson, “David Yulee,” 40. In Leon Hühner’s view, Yulee’s “most important work … on which his whole heart and soul centered, was that of obtaining the admission of Florida into the Union.” Another historian, Joseph G. Adler, calls him the “architect of Florida Statehood.” Arthur Thompson, a professor of history at the University of Florida, agrees, stating that Yulee was one of Florida’s two major leaders from the 1840s to 1861 and that Yulee spearheaded the drive for the admission of Florida to the Union. Thompson, “David Yulee,” 17, 28, 749; Adler, “Public Career,” 20.

23. Hühner, “Florida’s First Senator,” 19; Adler, “Public Career,” 38–39; Thompson, “David Yulee,” 605n. 21.

24. Adler, “Public Career,” 38–39; Thompson, “David Yulee,” 749.

25. Adler, “Public Career,” 38, 39; Lord, “Yulee,” 121–22.

26. C. Wickliffe Yulee, “Senator David L. Yulee,” Florida Historical Society Quarterly 2, no. 1 (April 1909): 35–36; 2, no. 2 (July 1909): 3–22; Adler, “Public Career,” 87. See, for example, Clyde N. Wilson, ed., The Papers of John C. Calhoun, vol. 20, 1844 (Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1990), 15–16, 48, 56.

27. Dorothy Dodd, “The Secession Movement in Florida, 1850–1861,” pt. 1, Florida Historical Society Quarterly 12, no. 1 (July 1933): 4; Proctor and Schmier, Jews of the South, 163–64; Adler, “Yulee,” 63–64.

28. Hühner, “Florida’s First Senator,” 22; Dodd, “Secession,” 6, 10; Adler, “Public Career,” 67.

29. Thompson, “David Yulee,” 73; Robert L. Clarke, “The Florida Railroad Company in the Civil War,” Journal of Southern History 19, no. 2 (May 1953): 180–92. (“More than a decade before the Civil War,” Clarke wrote, “Senator David L. Yulee of Florida had envisioned a railroad that would cross the state from a point on the Atlantic just north of Jacksonville to Cedar Keys on the Gulf of Mexico. His plan was to provide a short land route that would eliminate the tricky passage through the Florida Keys and tap the lucrative trade between New Orleans and New York.”) For an excellent discussion of the Whig and Democratic Party rivalry in this period, see Michael F. Holt,

The Rise and Fall of the American Whig Party (New York: Oxford University Press, 1999), chap. 16 (Yulee's defeat at 564).

30. Meade, Judah P. Benjamin, 84–85; Jacob R. Marcus, "Jew Who Refused Supreme Court Seat," Jewish Advocate, January 13, 1972 (also at AJA in typescript).

31. Gruss, "Judah Philip Benjamin," 1003, 1018–28. By Southern lights, Sumner deserved the beating because in a speech on the Senate floor he, in effect, called the older, courteous, and popular senator Andrew P. Butler of South Carolina a liar. The speech was tasteless, deplorable, and "pure rant." See Allan Nevins, Ordeal of the Union: A House Dividing 1852–1857 (New York: Charles Scribner, 1947), 437–44.

32. Butler, Judah Benjamin, 62.

33. Meade, Judah P. Benjamin, 96.

34. Evans, Judah Benjamin, 93.

35. Meade, Judah P. Benjamin, 100–104.

36. Evans, Judah Benjamin, 96–97.

37. Adler, "Public Career," 119–20, 161.

38. Robert W. Johannsen, Stephen A. Douglas (New York: Oxford University Press, 1973), 721; Thompson, "David Yulee," 121; Adler, "Public Career," 121, 129–32

39. Yulee, "Senator David L. Yulee," 1:38; Thompson, "David Yulee," 481.

40. Dorothy Dodd, "The Secession Movement in Florida, 1850–1861," pt. 2, Florida Historical Society Quarterly 12, no. 2 (October 1933): 45–66, at 52–53, 64; Hühner, "Florida's First Senator," 23–24.

41. Hühner, "Florida's First Senator," 25–26.

42. Adler, "Public Career," 149.

43. Ibid., 151, 154–55.

44. Ibid., 155–57; OR 52:15.

45. Adler, "Public Career," 113; Clarke, "Railroad Company," 182; Bertram Korn Collection, no. 99, folder 34, p. 8, AJA. (The undated clipping is from a Jewish periodical, which quotes the New York Times in an article entitled "Attacks on the Jewish Name."). The New York Times article appeared on the front page of the "Supplement to the New York Times" on Saturday, March 15, 1862. It is the last paragraph in an article entitled "From the Southern Coast."

46. Dorothy Dodd, "The Secession Movement in Florida, 1850–1861," Florida Historical Quarterly 12, no. 1, pt. 1 (July 1933), and 12, no. 1, pt. 2 (October 1933), 53; Adler, "Public Career," 165.

47. Butler, Judah Benjamin, 193.

48. Meade, Judah P. Benjamin, 139.

49. Ibid., 145.

50. S. I. Neiman, Judah Benjamin: Mystery Man of the Confederacy (Indianapolis: Bobbs-Merrill Co., 1963), 101; Meade, Judah P. Benjamin, 153.

51. Meade, Judah P. Benjamin, 159–60; Butler, Judah Benjamin, 226–28.

52. See note 102, chap. 1; Thomas Cooper DeLeon, Belles, Beaux, and Brains of the '60s (New York, 1909), 91–93.

53. Evans, Judah Benjamin, 110–11; Hans L. Trefousse, Andrew Johnson, 414n. 22; Johnson quoted in Charles Francis Adams, 1835–1915: An Autobiography (1916; reprint, New York, Russell and Russell, 1968), 94; Jaher, Scapegoat, 190–91.

54. Neiman, Judah Benjamin, 88.

55. Butler, Judah Benjamin, 231; William Howard Russell, My Diary North and South (Boston, 1863), 175.

56. Meade, Judah P. Benjamin, 161.

57. Butler, Judah Benjamin, 234.

58. DeLeon, Belles, Beaux, and Brains, 91–93; Meade, Judah P. Benjamin, 175.

59. Meade, Judah P. Benjamin, 177–79; DAB.

60. Meade, Judah P. Benjamin, 179–81; Evans, Judah Benjamin, 134.

61. Neiman, Judah Benjamin, 124–33; Meade, Judah P. Benjamin, 185–207.

62. Butler, Judah Benjamin, 232–53; Meade, Judah P. Benjamin, 219–27.

63. Neiman, Judah Benjamin, 131, 134; Meade, Judah P. Benjamin, 220–37.

64. Tedlow, “Benjamin,” 46; Evans, Judah Benjamin, 147–49.

65. Neiman, Judah Benjamin, 145–46; Meade, Judah P. Benjamin, 235; George C. Rable, The Confederate Republic (Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1994), 130.

66. Thompson, “David Yulee,” 558; Yulee, “Senator David L. Yulee,” 2:4.

67. Yulee, “Senator David L. Yulee,” 1:38; Mrs. Clement C. Clay Jr. (Virginia Clay-Compton), A Belle of the Fifties (New York: Doubleday, 1904), 202. The records of the Washington (Georgia) Rifles show no Elias Yulee. There is an Elias Yulee, captain and commissary, and a Lt. E. Levy, an ordnance officer in Lee’s Corps, either of which could be Yulee’s brother.

68. Robert C. Black III, The Railroads of the Confederacy (Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1952), 209; Thompson, “David Yulee,” 560.

69. Black, Railroads, 37, 200.

70. Thompson, “David Yulee,” 519, 526; Lord, “Yulee,” 150.

71. Thompson, “David Yulee,” 150–53; 525–58; OR I, 6:292–93.

72. Thompson, “David Yulee,” 525–28; OR I, 53:214; Lord, “Yulee,” 150.

73. Thompson, “David Yulee,” 153–56, 533, 556; ORN I, 12:573–76; Lord, ‘Yulee,” 151.

74. A. J. Hanna, Flight into Oblivion (Richmond, Va.: Johnson Publishing Co., 1938), 194.

75. Gruss, “Judah Philip Benjamin,” 1046; Butler, Judah Benjamin, 332; Robert Selph Henry, The Story of the Confederacy (Indianapolis, Ind.: Bobbs-Merrill, 1931), 85, 87.

76. Roland, The Confederacy (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1960), 83, 111.

77. Neiman, Judah Benjamin, 112; Butier, Judah Benjamin, 332.

78. Meade, Judah P. Benjamin, 261.

79. Evans, Judah Benjamin, 175–97; Meade, Judah P. Benjamin, 253–69.

80. Evans, Judah Benjamin, 196–97.

81. Ibid., 196–97; Statesmen of the Lost Cause, 222–23; Meade, Judah P. Benjamin, 253–69.

82. Evans, Judah Benjamin, 197.

83. Meade, Judah P. Benjamin, 258–59; Evans, Judah Benjamin, 156, 196.

84. Roy Z. Chamlee Jr., Lincoln's Assassins: A Complete Account of Their Capture, Trial, and Punishment (Jefferson, N.C.: McFarland & Co., 1990), 401.

85. Meade, Judah P. Benjamin, 297–305. For more on Henry J. Leovy, see p. 412, n. 195 below; Evans, Judah Benjamin, 193.

86. Meade, Judah P. Benjamin, 301–4; William A. Tidwell, Come Retribution: The Confederate Secret Service and the Assassination of Lincoln (Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1988), chap. 8; Tidwell, April '65: Confederate Covert Action in the American Civil War (Kent, Ohio: Kent State University Press, 1995), 127–9.

87. Yulee v. Canova, 11 Florida 9; Florida Reports, xi, 11–17.

88. Thompson, "David Yulee," 154–55.

89. Black, Railroads, 137, 209; Clarke, "Railroad Company," 182–84.

90. Black, Railroads, 208, 210; Thompson, "David Yulee," 546 (quote is incorrect in Black).

91. Black Railroads, 211–12, 190; Clarke, "Railroad Company," 189–91.

92. Black Railroads, 201; Yulee, "Senator David L. Yulee," 2:7–8; Thompson, "David Yulee," 64.

93. Yulee, "Senator David L. Yulee," 2:7–9; Thompson, "David Yulee," 164.

94. Joseph G. Adler, "The Public Career of Senator David Levy Yulee," 171.

95. Evans, Judah Benjamin, 279–80.

96. Ibid., 282.

97. Ibid., 284–85; Meade Judah P. Benjamin, 307.

98. Chamlee, Lincoln's Assassins, 403, 532; William Hanchett, The Lincoln Murder Conspiracies (Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1986), 52; Tidwell, Come Retribution, 419, 430, and passim; Tidwell, April '65, chap. 5; Chamlee, Lincoln's Assassins, 403 ("the evidence linking the Confederate leaders to the kidnap plot is undeniable").

CHAPTER 3

1. Letter dated April 17, 1864, to “My Dear Parents, Bros. & Sisters,” TU, Simon Mayer Papers, Family Papers, #815, Box 1; CSR, Simon Mayer. Mayer served officially as a private for most of the war. He served as a clerk in the assistant adjutant general’s office in Chalmers’s brigade and became acting assistant adjutant general of Sharp’s Brigade by war’s end. He was promoted to first lieutenant, and his parole records show him as a first lieutenant in the Consolidated 9th Mississippi. Nevertheless, he may have been unofficially promoted to major in the field as befitted the position of division AAG, as Sharp’s Brigade was composed of the consolidated remnants of three brigades. Local histories refer to him as major, but this rank is not reflected in his CSR.

2. Berman, Richmond’s Jewry, 126.

3. Gallagher, The Confederate War, 96–111, 144.

4. Adolph’s grandfather, Mayer Ben Halevey Proskauer, was, according to family tradition, a professor at the University of Proskau. Prior to Napoleon’s edict that all Jews should have surnames (or “Christian names”), the professor’s name was Joseph Mayer Ben Halevey (Hah-LAY-vey). One day, so the family story goes, the professor stopped at a toll gate to talk to one of his fellow members of the goldsmith and silversmith guild, who called each other “brother” (Brudder). The keeper of the tollgate asked who the professor was, and, as he had failed to comply with the law requiring a surname, his fellow guild members said “almost in unison, that is brother Proskauer, because he was known for teaching at the University of Proskau. So the tollman wrote down, Joseph Mayer Proskauer.” (Jenny Proskauer Recollections, October 28, 1948, St. Louis, Mo., AJA, p. 2); see note 59, p. 406.

5. As to Triest, see note 131, p. 410; Baruch, see note 180, pp. 411–12; Kursheedt, see note 72, p. 407; Fischel, see Turitz and Turitz, Jews in Early Mississippi, 48–49.

6. Simonhoff, Jewish Participants in the Civil War, 193; Young, Where They Lie, passim; as to Hyams, see notes 226–235, pp. 413–14; E. J. Levy, notes 29–32, p. 403; Moise, note 86, p. 408; Valentine, note 2, ch. 1, p. 392; Yates Levy, notes 33–40, pp. 403–5; Luria, note 3, prologue, p. 380; n. 137, ch. 3, p. 410.

7. Jewish officers undoubtedly encountered some anti-Semitism. One Jewish officer, according to Bell I. Wiley, encountered so much resistance he could not effectively command the unit to which he was assigned. “Although there were many foreigners in the Rebel Army," Wiley wrote, "prejudice against officers on the score of non-nativity was sometimes a factor in their unpopularity." The Jewish officer was a colonel, assigned command of a Texas regiment sent east to Richmond. The men began making remarks in his presence, "What?" said one. "What is it? Is it a man, a fish, or a bird?" "Of course it is a man," said another, "don't you see his legs?" The men opposed him on a daily basis, until he awoke to find his horse without his tail, when he gave up. See Bell I. Wiley, The Life of Johnny Reb, 236–37, citing Nicholas A. Davis, The Campaign from Texas to Maryland with the Battle of Fredericksburg (Richmond, 1863), 18–19. But there is very little evidence of anti-Semitism in the Confederate army, and this one example is atypical.

8. Robert K. Krick, Lee's Colonels: A Biographical Register of the Field Officers of the Army of Northern Virginia (Dayton, Ohio: Morningside House, 1992), introduction (14–18); Gary Gallagher, Confederate War, 98.

9. Karl H. Grismer, The Story of Fort Myers: The History of the Land of the Caloosahatchee and Southwest Florida. ([Fort Myers, Fla.]: Southwest Florida Historical Society, 1949; reprint, Fort Myers Beach, Fla.: Island Press Publishers, 1982, 60–61); Burke, "Quartermaster," 13–19; see note 90 below.

10. Grismer, Fort Myers, 60–61; Historical Times Illustrated Encyclopedia of the Civil War, 767; Burke, "Quartermaster," 22 and 40.

11. Elzas, Jews of South Carolina, 207, 236; Wolf, American Jews, 380.

12. Krick, Lee's Colonels, 236.

13. Leonard G. Dauber, M.D., "David Camden DeLeon, M.D.: Patriot or Traitor," New York State Journal of Medicine, December 1, 1970 (2927–33), 2929; and Twentieth Century Biographical Dictionary.

14. Young, Where They Lie, 175–270.

15. CSR of Michael Levy (6th Arkansas, Company E, and M. Levy General & Staff, Lt. Ord. Off.; Roster of Company A, 6th Arkansas [J. H. Levy]).

16. Young, Where They Lie, 23, 214, 223.

17. CSR of Michael Levy. Gen. Braxton Bragg's chief of ordnance, Lt. Col. Hypolite Olandowski, wrote Maj. J. T. Champney, "Lieut. W. M. Levy [sic] is ordered to report to you for duty. I cannot say he is entirely posted in ordnance manual, but permit me to introduce him as an intelligent and energetic young officer, and I hope, with your instructions and teachings he will be efficient." Presumably, Levy had served under Olandowski and was therefore a part of Bragg's staff. By September 1862 Levy was post ordnance officer. By December 1862 he was stationed in Bridgeport, Alabama, where he was an ordnance officer. He wrote Olandowski requesting an examination by a board so that he could be promoted to first lieutenant of artillery. He apparently had substantial responsibilities, as he sent carloads of ordnance to Brig. Gen. John Hunt Morgan and Gen. Nathan Bedford Forrest. Levy remained at Bridgeport until March 1863 and was promoted to first lieutenant of artillery in September 1863. His salary was ninety dollars per month plus ten dollars in "hazardous duty pay." He was on detached duty with Brig. Gen. Gideon Pillow's Volunteer and Conscription Bureau from October to December 1863. (His military records end in December 1863, but his family referred to him as a captain after the war, so he may very well have been promoted to captain.) See Confederate Veteran 18, no. 6 (June 1910): 265, and his CSR.

18. All of these letters are contained in the CSR of Octavus Cohen.

19. June 10, 1862 letter from Octavus Cohen, Phillips-Myers Papers, Southern Historical Collection, UNC.

20. July 5, 1862 letter, Phillips-Myers Papers, UNC; CSR, O. Cohen.

21. CSR, O. Cohen; John Johnson, The Defense of Charleston Harbor, including Fort Sumter and Adjacent Islands, 1863–1865 (Charleston, 1890), 256.

22. June 13, 1863 letter, Phillips-Myers Papers, UNC.

23. Letter dated July, 1863, Phillips-Myers Papers, UNC.

24. Wise, Gate of Hell, 93, 11, 115–16, 175.

25. Letter dated August, 1863, Phillips-Myers Papers, UNC.

26. Letter dated February 25, 1863, Phillips-Myers Papers, UNC; 545, Historical Times Illustrated Encyclopedia of the Civil War; The Atlas of the Civil War, 147.

27. Phillips-Myers Papers, UNC; CSR of O. Cohen.

28. James I. Robertson Jr., Tenting Tonight (Alexandria, Va: Time-Life Books, 1984), 48.

29. John A. Cutchins, A Famous Command: The Richmond Light Infantry Blues (Richmond: Garrett & Massie, 1934), 130; CSR, E. J. Levy.

30. Isaac Levy, letter, AJA; CSR, E. J. Levy.

31. Cutchins, A Famous Command, chap. 19; CSR, E. J. Levy.

32. Historical Times Illustrated Encyclopedia of the Civil War, 190; James M. Day, Death in the Trenches (Alexandria, Va: Time-Life Books, 1986), 75–78; CSR of E. J. Levy.

33. CSR, S. Y. Levy.

34. September 29, 1862, letter, Phillips-Myers Papers, UNC.

35. Ibid., 1–2.

36. Ibid., 4.

37. CSR, S. Y. Levy.

38. Levy to Jacob C. Levy, September 29, 1862, Phillips-Myers Papers, UNC; CSR, S. Y. Levy. Levy's eloquent Prayer for Peace is set forth below in its entirety:

A Prayer for Peace

Captain Samuel Yates Levy

Savannah, November 2, 1863

Almighty God! Eternal sire and king!

Ruler supreme who all things did'st create,

Whose everlasting praise the angels sing,

Whose word is mercy and whose thought is fate:

Trembling before thy awful throne we kneel,

Beseeching mercy at thy gracious hand,

Praying that in compassion thou wilt heal

The bleeding wounds of this most suffering land.

We know our sins are manifold, oh Lord,
And that thy wrath against us is but right,
For we have wandered wildly from thy word
And things committed wrongful in thy sight.
But thou, oh Lord, art powerful to save
And full of mercy, full of love art thou;
Else had we not the courage thus to brave
Thy righteous wrath — thus at thy feet to bow.
O’er all our fields, where late the joyful air
Struck rustling music from the waving grain,
Now the sad earth is lying stark and bare,
or groaning ‘neath the burden of our slain.
In sackcloth robed, disconsolate and wild,
With ashes strewed upon her lovely breast,
The Country mourns her hearths and homes defiled,
Weeps for her bravest and bewails her best.
From the cold hearths where lately genial fires
Beamed upon scenes of innocent delight,
The little children vainly call their sires
Or fly their burning homes with wild affright.
Our punishment is very hard to bear:
We droop and faint beneath thy chast’ning rod:

Oh list in mercy to our earnest prayer

And move thy anger from us, oh, our God.

Throw, Lord, thy buckler thick ‘twixt us and harm.

Bid the destruction and the carnage cease.

Outstretch in power thy all protecting arm,

Roll back the clouds of War and give us Peace.

And as thou led’st thy chosen people forth

From Egypt’s sullen wrath, oh King of Kings!

So smite the armies of the cruel North

And bear us to our hopes “on eagles’ wings.”

But should thy wisdom still defer the day —

The wish’d for day our freedom shall be won —

Oh grant us the humility to say,

Not human will but Thine, oh Lord, be done.

(AJA, 10, no. 2 [October 1950]: 133–34).

The allusion to “bear us to our hopes ‘on eagles’ wings’” is from Exodus 19:4–6 (“Ye have seen what I did unto the Egyptians, and how I bore you on eagles’ wings and brought you unto Myself”).

39. Historical Times Illustrated Encyclopedia of the Civil War, 115, 117.

40. Letter dated March 16, 1865, from Johnson’s Island, Phillips-Myers papers, UNC; CSR, S. Y. Levy.

41. Eric J. Brock, “An Exhaustive Study of Hebrew Rest Cemetery Number One, Shreveport, Louisiana,” 1992, HNOC; “The Jewish Cemeteries of Shreveport, Louisiana,” 1995; Maude Hearne O’Pry, Chronicles of Shreveport and Caddo Parish

(Shreveport: Journal Publishing Co., 1928), 166; as to Mrs. Grant: Southwestern, March 16, 1859.

42. Louisiana Ordinance of Secession and Minutes of Secession Convention (see note 112, ch. 1, p. 391); O'Pry, Chronicles, 169; W. N. King, "Journal of W. N. King: A Private Soldier in the La. Infantry," MS, Texas State Archives; Shreveport (La.) Times, September 24, 1863; Confederate Veteran, 29:357. The author wishes to thank Eric Brock of Shreveport for his kind assistance and his file on Colonel Marks.

43. Maj. Alexander Hart's military record is derived from his compiled service record, which is quite extensive; Hart Diary (July 6, 1864–May 7, 1865), AJA; Andrew B. Booth, Records of Louisiana Confederate Soldiers and Louisiana Confederate Commands, 3 vols. (New Orleans, 1920; reprinted Spartanburg, S.C.: Reprint Co., 1984), "Hart, Alexander," 210; Hart obituary in the Norfolk Landmark, September 22, 1911; Krick, Lee's Colonels, 159; Confederate Veteran, December 1911, 589; Arthur W. Bergeron Jr., Guide to Louisiana Confederate Military Units, 1861–1865 (Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1996), 82–84; Jones, Lee's Tigers, 128–31, 150–60, 214–17; Stephen W. Sears, Landscape Turned Red: The Battle of Antietam (New Haven: Ticknor & Fields, 1983; reprinted Norwalk, Conn.: Easton Press, 1988), 188–89; Jeffry D. Wert, From Winchester to Cedar Creek: The Shenandoah Campaign of 1864 (Carlisle, Pa.: South Mountain Press, 1987; reprinted New York: Simon & Schuster, 1989), 47–101. Mel Young kindly provided the author with copies of Special Order No. 16 and Report dated January 25, 1864, relative to Hart's brief service in the Department of Henrico (the military prison unit in Richmond).

44. Jones, Lee's Tigers, 236–38.

45. Sears, Landscape Turned Red, 188; Ezekiel and Lichtenstein, History of the Jews of Richmond, 157.

46. Hart Diary, August 1864, AJA.

47. Jones, Lee's Tigers, 216.

48. Hart Diary, November 12, 13, 1864, AJA.

49. Hart Diary, November 16–20, 1864, AJA; CSR, Hart.

50. This sketch of William Mallory Levy is based almost entirely on his compiled service record, the OR (ser. 1, vol. 11, pt. 1, 420–21, "Report of Col. Wm. M. Levy, April 18, 1862"); and a few letters in the Levy Family Papers, 1840–1889, Box 2, MSS 408, Williams Research Center, Historic New Orleans Collection: April 23, 1862, and

July 5, 1862, to his wife. See also Gen. Richard Taylor's article "The Last Confederate Surrender," in Southern Historical Society Papers (1877) and his memoir, Destruction and Reconstruction (1879).

51. Levy to his wife, letter dated April 23, 1862, Levy Family Papers, 1840–1889, Box 2, MSS 408, Williams Research Center, HNOC.

52. Levy to his wife, July 5, 1862, HNOC.

53. Letter, June 12, 1862, in compiled service record of W. M. Levy.

54. Letter dated May 1, 1862, in CSR.

55. Letter dated July 5, 1862, in CSR.

56. Historical Times Illustrated Encyclopedia of the Civil War.

57. Report of General Taylor, April 18, 1864 (Red River Campaign). OR I, 34, part I, 569–70.

58. Taylor, Destruction and Reconstruction (1879); Taylor described his surrender as "The Last Confederate Surrender" in an 1877 article in the Southern Historical Society Papers: "Accompanied by a staff officer, Colonel William M. Levy (now a member of Congress from Louisiana), and making use of a 'hand car' I reached the appointed spot, and found General Canby with a large escort."

59. There is very little written about Adolph Proskauer. His nephew Judge Joseph Proskauer wrote a brief account of his uncle's life in his memoir, A Segment of My Times (New York: Farrar, Straus, 1950). Adolph Proskauer's daughter Jenny Proskauer wrote an unreliable recollection in 1948, which is at the AJA. The chief source of this material is Robert Emory Park, Sketch of the Twelfth Alabama Infantry of Battle's Brigade, Rodes Division, Early's Corps, of the Army of Northern Virginia (Richmond: W. E. Jones, 1906), originally printed in Southern Historical Society Papers 33, pp. 193–296. This work is generally reliable and well written, but Park erred in his description of Proskauer at Gettysburg. Proskauer was neither wounded nor captured at Gettysburg. He was wounded three times, and each is referred to in Proskauer's compiled service record, which also includes a letter from Proskauer himself in 1865 stating that he had been wounded three times. The details of Proskauer's military career are derived from his compiled service record as well as the OR, where his name is misspelled "Proskaner." See ser. 1, vol. 25, pt. 1, 960 (Reports of Col. Samuel B. Pickens, 12th Alabama, May 5, 1863); ser. 1, vol. 36, pt. 1, 1083 (May 9, 1864); 1:27, 563; 1:25, 950–53 (Reports of Col. Edward A. O'Neal, May 12, 1863); 1:29, 891–92

(Reports of Maj. A. Proskaner, January 22, 1864). Also see Young, Where They Lie, 76, 78–79; Krick, Lee's Colonels, 266; Korn, American Jewry, 176; obituary of Adolph Proskauer, AJA (the AJA has an extensive file on Proskauer); Park, Sketch, 5.

60. Park, Sketch, 16–17.

61. Ibid., 31.

62. Historical Times Illustrated Encyclopedia of the Civil War, 18.

63. Park, Sketch, 10.

64. Korn, American Jewry, 176.

65. Park, Sketch, 53–54; Champ Clark, Gettysburg (Alexandria, Va.: Time-Life, 1985), 53–54.

66. Park, Sketch, 54; Foote, The Civil War: A Narrative (New York: Random House, 1974) 2:488, 528.

67. Clark, Gettysburg, 127–28; Historical Times Illustrated Encyclopedia of the Civil War, 196.

68. Park, Sketch, 55.

69. Park, Sketch, 62–69, CSR, Adolph Proskauer.

70. CSR, Adolph Proskauer.

71. Joseph H. Crute Jr., Units of the Confederate Army, 2d ed. (Gaithersburg, Md.: Olde Soldier Books, 1987), passim.

72. Edwin I. Kursheedt's career is described in his compiled service records, the OR (ser. 1, vol. 11, pt. 11, chap. 23, 925–26; chap. 63, 39–40, 222–24); William Miller Owen, In Camp and Battle with the Washington Artillery of New Orleans (Boston: Ticknor & Co., 1885), 17, 134–35, 180–191, 308–9, 314–17, 361; Napier Bartlett, Military Record of Louisiana (Baton Rouge, 1875; reprint, New Orleans: Louisiana State University Press, 1992), 225–31 (Muster Roll of Washington Artillery); and Ezekiel and Lichtenstein, History of the Jews of Richmond. Both the OR and the CSR erroneously refer to Kursheedt as E. J. Kurshudt or R. J. Kursheedt.

73. Ashkenazi, Diary of Clara Solomon, 86, 89; see muster roll of First Company in Napier Bartlett, A Soldier's Story of the War; Including the Marches and Battles of the Washington Artillery and of Other Louisiana Troops (New Orleans, n.p., 1874), 228–29.

74. Ashkenazi, Diary of Clara Solomon, 79.

75. Report of Lt. Charles W. Squires, September 4, 1861, OR I, 151, 39–40, part 1, chap. 63, (Skirmish at Great Falls, Md.); CSR, E. J. Kursheedt.

76. April 27, 1862, letter, Edwin I. Kursheedt papers #2805Z, Southern Historical Collection, UNC.

77. Undated letter, probably May 1862, to “Miss Sallie” (“Bivouac 1 mile from Lebanon Church”), Southern Historical Collection, UNC.

78. Letter to “My Dear Miss Sarah,” June 25, 1862, Kursheedt Papers, UNC.

79. Ibid.

80. Ibid.

81. Owen, Washington Artillery, 134–35.

82. Ibid., 189–91.

83. Eshleman may have been born a Jew, or he may have had Jewish ancestors. He was well known in the New Orleans Jewish community, and the name Eshleman is a German-Jewish name. He married Fanny H. Leverich, who also had a possible Jewish name. Elliot Ashkenazi, the editor of Clara Solomon’s diary, states that Eshleman was “one of several Jewish members of the Washington Artillery,” but Eshleman was a member of the Episcopal Church after the war and served on the vestry of Christ Church for twenty-seven years (Diary of Clara Solomon, 81n. 21); biography of Col. B. F. Eshleman in “Historical Military Data of Louisiana Militia, Washington Artillery, July-Dec. 1861,” Hill Memorial Library, Louisiana State University Collection. All genealogical research to date has failed to prove Eshleman was Jewish. Box 1 of the Craig, Fanny Leverich Eshleman Collection (#225) at Tulane’s Special Collection yielded a 1770 edition of The Book of Common Prayer. Fanny and her siblings were confirmed in the church in April 1861. Clara Solomon, however, generally wrote about Jews in her diary, and Eshleman’s initial romance was with a Jewish woman, Charlotte da Ponte or Brooks. Letter from Elliott Ashkenazi to Mel Young dated February 20, 1997. Kursheedt may have known Eshleman before the war, as the major asked the young sergeant to become his adjutant. “I am under especial obligations,” Eshleman reported after Gettysburg, “to Sergeant Major E. J. [sic] Kursheedt, who (having no adjutant) acted as my aide. He was always at hand, frequently under the heaviest fire, performing his duty with coolness and efficiency.”

84. Owen, Washington Artillery, 314.

85. Korn, American Jewry, 90; letter, December 28, 1864, AJA; see Korn, note 105, 265.

86. This sketch of E. W. Moise is based primarily on The Moise Family, 75, 108–26, as well as his compiled service record. His records are cataloged under Company A, 7th Confederate Cavalry, and the 10th Georgia Cavalry.

87. William Frayne Amann, ed., Personnel of the Civil War (New York: Yoseloff, 1961), 100; Marcus Wright, Local Designations of Confederate Troops (1876).

88. Supplement to OR, Record of Events, vol. 5, Georgia Troops (Confederate) Cavalry, 553–54; Sifakis, Compendium of the Confederate States Armies, 170–71, 159; Crute, Units of the Confederate States Army, 70, 90; OR, 1:18 chap. 30, 142 (February 4, 1863); OR Navy, 1:9, 424–34 (February 2, 1864) (Smith Briggs incident); OR, 1:33 chap. 65, 103 (January 29-February 1, 1864); OR, 1:33, chap. 65, 273–74; Richard W. Lykes, “The Great Civil War Beef Raid,” Civil War Times Illustrated (February 1967): 4; OR, 1:36; 3:421 (May 1864); Mark L. Bradley, Last Stand in the Carolinas: The Battle of Bentonville, 92–104, 376–96; John G. Barrett, Sherman’s March through the Carolinas (Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1956), 204. While the family history shows Moise as a major, his compiled service record does not. He was never officially promoted to major, or if he was, the records do not reflect it.

89. “The Great Civil War Beef Raid,” 47.

90. The best source on Abraham C. Myers is Richard D. Goff, Confederate Supply (Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press, 1969), an excellent scholarly work on the Confederate supply bureaus. Walter Burke Jr. has written a useful pamphlet entitled “Quartermaster: A Brief Account of the Life of Colonel Abraham Charles Myers, Quartermaster General C.S.A,” published in 1976. William C. Davis, Breckinridge: Statesman, Soldier, Symbol (Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1974); Davis, Jefferson Davis: The Man and His Hour (New York: Harper Collins, 1991); and Davis, A Government of Our Own: The Making of the Confederacy (New York: Free Press, 1994). Thomas Cooper DeLeon, the irrepressible author of Belles, Beaux, and Brains of the ’60s and Four Years in Rebel Capitals: An Inside View of Life in the Southern Confederacy, from Birth to Death (Mobile: Gossip Printing Co., 1890), knew Myers personally and was well acquainted with his family, as both DeLeon and Myers had been born and raised in the Jewish community in South Carolina, DeLeon in Columbia and Myers in Georgetown. The same was probably true of Mary Chesnut, who was also from South Carolina and knew the Jewish community through her close friendship with Miriam DeLeon Cohen. Thus, her diary, Mary Chesnut's Civil War, is a good source on Myers.

See also Grismer, Fort Myers; Samuel Bernard Thompson, Confederate Purchasing Operations Abroad (Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1935); Clement Eaton, A History of the Southern Confederacy (New York: Macmillan Co., 1954); Patricia L. Faust, ed., Historical Times Illustrated Encyclopedia of the Civil War (New York: Harper Collins, 1991); Ellsworth Eliot Jr., West Point in the Confederacy (New York: G. A. Baker and Co., 1941); Frank E. Vandiver, ed., "Proceedings of the First Confederate Congress [1723–1726]," Southern Historical Society Papers 50 (1953): 109–12; Black, Railroads; DeLeon, Four Years and Belles, Beaux, and Brains; John Beauchamp Jones, A Rebel War Clerk's Diary at the Confederate States Capital, 2 vols., edited by Howard Swiggett (New York: Old Hickory Bookshop, 1935); Elzas, Jews of South Carolina. I wish to thank Diane Kremski of the City of Fort Myers for providing material on Col. Abraham C. Myers, and my mother-in-law, Mrs. Joyce Ann Corner of Naples, Florida, for finding Ms. Kremski.

91. Goff, Confederate Supply, 6–10.

92. Ibid., 3–4.

93. DeLeon, Belles, Beaux, and Brains, 120; Goff, 16–21.

94. Woodward, Mary Chesnut, 271, 428–29, 496–97.

95. Goff, Confederate Supply, 127–30; Burke, "Quartermaster," 27–28.

96. Geoffrey C. Ward, The Civil War: An Illustrated History (New York: Knopf, 1990), 62.

97. Goff, Confederate Supply, 23–26; Woodward, Mary Chesnut, 124.

98. DeLeon, Four Years, 114.

99. Goff, Confederate Supply, 50–51; Pollard, Southern History of the War, 1:535–56.

100. Goff, Confederate Supply, 27, 29, 33, 34, 52, 72–75.

101. Ibid., 54–62.

102. Ibid., 69–71.

103. Ibid., 75–76, 85–86; “Tax in Kind,” in Historical Times Illustrated Encyclopedia of the Civil War, 74.

104. Richard E. Beringer, Why the South Lost the Civil War (Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1986), 14–16.

105. Goff, Confederate Supply, 40.

106. Ibid., 104–7, 110–11, 41–42.

107. Ibid., 44–46.

108. Ibid., 132, 142.

109. McPherson, Battle Cry, 319; Goff, Confederate Supply, 143–44.

110. Burke, “Quartermaster,” 29–30.

111. DAB; Charles Roland contends that Davis rightly declared the Senate’s action unconstitutional (Roland, The Confederacy, 133).

112. James G. Randall and David Donald, The Civil War and Reconstruction, 2d ed. (Lexington, Mass.: D. C. Heath & Co., 1969): 253.

113. Quoted in Eaton, A History of the Southern Confederacy, 138.

114. Goff, Confederate Supply, 186.

115. Ibid., 142.

116. Eaton, A History of the Southern Confederacy, 138; Davis, Jefferson Davis, 537–38.

117. Davis, Jefferson Davis, 537; Goff, Confederate Supply, 142.

118. Woodward, Mary Chesnut, 437n. 5.

119. Ibid., 437, 447.

120. Ibid., 438.

121. Ibid., 524.

122. Goff, Confederate Supply, 142.

123. Woodward, Mary Chesnut, 532; Sallie B. Putnam [A Richmond Lady], Richmond during the War: Four Years of Personal Observation (New York, 1867; reprinted in Collector's Library of the Civil War, Alexandria, Va.: Time-Life Books, 1983), 275.

124. Jones was a native of Baltimore. A Rebel War Clerk's Diary, condensed edition, edited by Earl Schenck Miers (New York: Sagamore Press, 1958); see 1:186; 2:8; Berman, Richmond's Jewry, 187.

125. Woodward, Mary Chesnut, 551.

126. Goff, Confederate Supply, 150–51.

127. DAB.

128. Burke, "Quartermaster," 34.

129. DAB.

130. Burke, "Quartermaster," 35–36.

131. CSR, Maier Triest; William J. Rivers, Rivers' Account of the Raising of Troops in South Carolina for State and Confederate Service 1861–1865 (Columbia: Bryan Publishing Co., 1899), 29–30.

132. Elzas, Jews of South Carolina, 235. The compiled service record neither corroborates nor contradicts this statement.

133. Jerry Korn, War on the Mississippi (Alexandria, Va.: Time-Life, 1985), 109.

134. Eugene W. Jones Jr., Enlisted for the War: The Struggles of the Gallant 24th Regiment, South Carolina Volunteers, 1861–1865 (Hightown, N.J.: Longstreet House, 1997); on Triest, see 15, 91, 214; Capers letter dated May 17, 1863, South Caroliniana Library, University of South Carolina; Elzas, Jews of South Carolina, 171, 235.

135. Elzas, Jews of South Carolina, 235.

136. Freeman, Lee's Lieutenants, 2:439; G. Moxley Sorrell, Recollections of a Confederate Staff Officer, 126.

137. Moses's three sons all served in the Confederate armed forces. The youngest, Raphael J. ("Lea") Moses Jr. joined the Confederate navy. Albert Moses Luria joined the Columbus Light Guards, transferred to the 13th/23rd North Carolina, and served and died in the Army of Northern Virginia. The oldest, Israel Moses Nunez, born in Florida in 1838, was nicknamed "Major." Major took care of the family plantation and businesses when his father and younger brother Albert went off to war. By virtue of the Confederate "Twenty-Negro Law," a plantation owner with twenty slaves or more was entitled to an exemption allowing one white male to stay at home, which Major did until 1863. The Confederate Congress revised the law in May 1863 and required planters to pay $500 for the exemption. In December 1863, "Major" Nunez enlisted as a private in Parker's Virginia Battery of Artillery in his father's corps and reported for duty at Bean Station, Tennessee, near Knoxville. Probably on account of his father's influence, Major was sent to corps headquarters; he rejoined Parker's battery in the summer of 1864 and served in the trenches with the artillery defending Petersburg, Virginia. At the end of the war in May 1865, Major had rejoined his father in Georgia. See, generally, Moses, Last Order, xiv, 77, 220; McPherson, Battle Cry, 611–12.

138. Nevins, Emergence, 2:434.

139. Rosen, Confederate Charleston, 66.

140. Nevins, War, 1:98; Marcus, Memoirs, 1:146–47; Moses, Last Order, 113–14; CSR, R. J. Moses.

141. Moses, Last Order, 157–59.

142. Ibid., 161–62.

143. Ibid., 114–15, 175.

144. Wert, Longstreet, 208–9; Moses, Last Order, 170.

145. Wert, Longstreet, 211.

146. Moses, Last Order, 170–71.

147. Ibid., 174.

148. Ibid., 175.

149. Wert, Longstreet, 224.

150. Moses, Last Order, 178.

151. D. S. Freeman, Lee's Lieutenants, 2:477–78.

152. Moses, Last Order, 180–82.

153. Fremantle, Three Months in the Southern States: April-June, 1863.

154. Ibid.

155. Ibid.

156. Moses, Last Order, 185–86.

157. Marcus, Memoirs, 1:4; G. Moxley Sorrel, Recollections of a Confederate Staff Officer (New York: Smithmark Publishers, 1994), 126, 178.

158. Wert, Longstreet, 83.

159. Moses, Last Order, 115–16.

160. CSR, R. J. Moses.

161. Moses, Last Order, 187.

162. Fremantle, Three Months, 240.

163. Ibid., 271.

164. Moses, Last Order, 188.

165. Ibid., 201–4.

166. Ibid., 206–7.

167. Wert, Longstreet, 393.

168. H. H. Cunningham, Doctors in Gray: The Confederate Medical Service (Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1958), 27.

169. DeLeon, Belles, Beaux, and Brains, 121.

170. Woodward and Muhlenfeld, The Private Mary Chesnut, 29–31.

171. Dauber, 2932; catalog, AJHS (1962): 406.

172. Cullop, Confederate Propaganda, 80n. 40 (DeLeon to Benjamin January 8, 1863 [Pickett Papers]).

173. Dauber, 2932n. 40.

174. C. Vann Woodward and Elisabeth Muhlenfeld, eds., The Private Mary Chesnut: The Unpublished Civil War Diaries (New York: Oxford University Press, 1984), 29.

175. Ibid., 78.

176. Ibid., 114.

177. Dauber, 2929.

178. Baruch, My Own Story, 5.

179. Ibid., 1–12.

180. Baruch's war record is based on his compiled service record, and his recollections contained in Confederate Veteran Magazine 12 (December 1914): 22, 545–48; and "Bernard Baruchs Father Recounts His Experiences as a Confederate Surgeon," a reprint of a newspaper account in the Long Branch Record of an address Baruch made on September 23, 1915, before a historical society in Long Branch, New York. The reprint is titled "Experiences as a Confederate Surgeon" in Civil War Times Illustrated 4, no. 6 (October 1965): 40–47. Simon Baruch's service records are cataloged under the 13th Mississippi, Surgeon (where his name is sometimes "S. Barnet"); 3rd S.C. Battalion; and "General & Staff Surgeon, 3rd S.C. Battalion," which yielded a typewritten summary and correspondence.

181. Baruch, "Experiences as a Confederate Surgeon," 40–47.

182. Ibid., 42.

183. Baruch, My Own Story, 7–9; Baruch, "Experiences as a Confederate Surgeon," 42.

184. Baruch, My Own Story, 8.

185. Simon Baruch, "A Surgeon's Story of Battle and Capture," Confederate Veteran 22, no. 12 (December 1914): 545–48; Baruch, "Experiences as a Confederate Surgeon," 43.

186. Baruch, "Experiences as a Confederate Surgeon," 43.

187. Baruch, "A Surgeon's Story," 545.

188. Baruch, "Experiences as a Confederate Surgeon," 43.

189. Ibid., 44–45.

190. Baruch, “A Surgeon’s Story,” 546–47.

191. Baruch, My Own Story, 10; Baruch, “Experiences as a Confederate Surgeon,” 45–46.

192. Baruch, “Experiences as a Confederate Surgeon,” 46.

193. Ibid., 46–47.

194. William M. Robinson, Jr., Justice in Grey: A History of the Judicial System of the Confederate States of America (Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1941), 408, 460.

195. Col. Henry J. Leovy’s activities are briefly described in Robinson, Justice in Grey, 409–11. His activities as a special commissioner are described in the OR IV, 4: 802–15 and Kenneth W. Noe, “Red String Scare: Civil War Southwest Virginia and the Heroes of America,” North Carolina Historical Review 69, no. 3, July 1992, 301–22. Noe has Leovy’s name as “Leory” because the OR made the same mistake. On the flight of the cabinet, see Hanna, Flight into Oblivion. See Leovy’s obituary, Daily Picayune, October 4, 1902; 10, col. 2; letters from Jefferson Davis to Leovy dated May 26, 1877, and November 10, 1883, Historic New Orleans Collection (Henry J. Leovy Papers, 1859–1900).

196. Letter dated October 31, 1863, to Leovy, Henry J. Leovy Papers, HNOC.

197. Noe, “Red String Scare,” 301–22. Charles Frazier mentions the Red Strings in his popular novel, Cold Mountain.

198. Noe, “Red String Scare,” 315–16.

199. OR IV, 3:802–15, 805, 812. The OR refers to him as “Leory.”

200. OR IV, 3,:802.

201. Robinson, Justice in Grey, 411.

202. Ledger book of Confederate commissions in the National Archives, chap. 1, vol. 94 (confirmed January 12, 1865, to rank from December 26, 1864). My thanks to Bruce Allardice for providing this information on Leovy.

203. Register of Officers of the Confederate States Navy, 1861–1865 (Washington: GPO, 1931), 48.

204. OBN, I, 2:822–24; Raimondo Luraghi, A History of the Confederate Navy (Annapolis: Naval Institute Press, 1996), 312.

205. Historical Times Illustrated Encyclopedia of the Civil War, 5; Luraghi, History of the Confederate Navy, 277–78, 291–99, 329–31.

206. “Military Record of the DeLeon Family and of Captain Perry M. DeLeon,” PAJHS 1, no. 4 (June 1961).

207. Harby’s military career is confusing. He trained troops in artillery in Harrisburg, Texas, near Galveston early in the war. (H. S. Lubbock to Col. X. B. Debray, October 15, 1862, has Lieutenant Harby stationed at Harrisburg. Debray to Lieutenant General Pemberton, November 12, 1862, has Harby training men in artillery practice. OR I, 15:830–31; 864–65.) He was an officer, not in the Confederate army or navy, but in the Texas Maritime Department or Service. He apparently was commissioned a lieutenant and was later promoted to captain. Harby did not turn the Henry Dodge over to the Confederates; he may have resigned and allowed Lt. William F. Rodgers to do so. See ORN I, 16:867–68; 18:85; Confederate Military History Extended Edition, vol. 6, South Carolina (Wilmington, N.C.: Broadfoot Publishing Co., 1987), 628–29; Charles W. Hayes, History of the Island the City of Galveston (Cincinnati, 1879), 550–77. Henry J. Harby and J. O. Harby are listed in The Roster of Confederate Soldiers; The Jewish Texans, 7; Simonhoff, Jewish Participants in the Civil War, 261; Simonhoff, Deep in the Heart, 24. Harby was married to Leonora R. DeLeon of Savannah (Confederate Military History, 629).

208. Edward T. Cothan Jr., Battle on the Bay (Austin: University of Texas Press, 1998), 108–11; Donald S. Frasier, Cottonclads! The Battle of Galveston and the Defense of the Texas Coast, (Fort Worth, Tex.: Ryan Place Publishers, 1996), 46–77; Sharf, History of the Confederate Navy, 506–13; Confederate Veteran 2 (1998); Campbell, “Victory at Galveston,” 16–26.

209. Magruder’s official report dated February 26, 1863; OR Series I, 15:211–20 (chap. 27).

210. Frasier, Cottonclads!, 73.

211. Cothan, Battle on the Bay, 124.

212. Ibid., 125.

213. Frasier, Cottonclads!, 75.

214. OR I, vol. 15, chap. 27, p. 211.

215. OR I, vol. 15, chap. 27, p. 217.

216. Letter to F. R. Lubbock from J. B. Magruder, February 11, 1863; OR I, vol. 15, chap. 27, p. 974–75.

217. Confederate Military History, 629.

218. Moses, Last Order, xiv–xv.

219. Ibid., 119–21; Civil War Dictionary, "Tattnall."

220. Historical Times Illustrated Encyclopedia of the Civil War, 304; Luraghi, History of Confederate Navy, 231–32. In May 1864, the ship was sold at Liverpool. Moses, Last Order, 223; 1909 obituary.

221. Moses, Last Order, 223–24.

222. Ibid., 224.

223. Luraghi, History of Confederate Navy, 60. Simonhoff, Jewish Participants in the Civil War, 259. Solomon Breibart contends that this was "wishful thinking" on Simonhoffs part.

224. Ruth H. Duncan, The Captain and Submarine C.S.S. Hunley (Memphis, Tenn.: S. C. Toof & Co., 1965), 60.

225. Ibid., 79.

226. The Hyams family has a remarkably undocumented history. Even Simon Wolf misspelled their names in his listing of Confederate soldiers. There is not a biographical essay on Lt. Gov. Henry M. Hyams, who was one of the most prominent practicing Jews of nineteenth-century America. The glaring omission of Hyams and Benjamin F. Jonas in American Jewish historiography is curious. Korn gives a sketch of Hyams in The Early Jews of New Orleans (188–89), as does Elzas in Jews of South Carolina (191). See also Young, Where They Lie, 6–7, 38–9, 158–62; Ashkenazi, Diary of Clara Solomon; Marcus, Memoirs, 3:104 (Rothschild letter); Malcolm H. Stem, Americans of Jewish Descent (New York: KTAV Publishing House, 1971), 87; The Jewish Encyclopedia (New York, 1901–5), 1:512; AJA (obituaries, Korn files, Elzas manuscript, and Judith Hyams Douglas material); obituary, New Orleans Daily Picayune, June 26, 1875; Dictionary of Louisiana Biography, vol. 1 (Louisiana Historical Association). Rabbi Task and Nancy Greenberg of Alexandria, Louisiana, kindly provided me with a brief typewritten recollection of Hyams family members.

The wartime activities of all of the Hyamses is derived from their extensive compiled service records at the National Archives, the Official Record, and various secondary sources on units and battles. A number of Hyamses appear in Andrew W. Booth's Records of Louisiana Confederate Soldiers and Louisiana Confederate Commands.

Despite the fact that Hyams was a lieutenant governor, his wartime career is difficult to reconstruct. He was not at the secession convention. Much of the material used herein is contained in obituaries, letters, and memoranda at the AJA. As to Hyams's life after the war, see letters at AJA and a letter to former Governor Moore, published in the Louisiana Historical Quarterly 13 (January 1930): 20–22.

227. As to Isaac S. Hyams, see his compiled service record, which includes the Benjamin letter; OR I, 20:976; I, 20:762–767; OR Supplement, Record of Events, 23:660–61; Glen Tucker, Chickamauga: Bloody Battle in the West (Indianapolis: Bobbs-Merrill, 1961), 270; History of the Confederate States Marine Corps, 22–39, 184–225.

228. CSR, I. S. Hyams, letter of D. Coleman, January 1863.

229. CSR, I. S. Hyams.

230. CSR, Samuel Myers Hyams; William H. Tunnard, A Southern Record: A History of the Third Regiment, Louisiana Infantry (reprint, Fayetteville: University of Arkansas Press, 1997), 28–39, 64–67, 108–18, 184–85, 324–25, 529; OR Supplement, Record of Events, vol. 23, Louisiana Troops (Confederate), 740; Guide to Louisiana Military Units, 77; OR IV, 1:748–9; I, 53:808–9; I, 3:113–16; I, 3:588–89; Louisiana History 2 (winter 1961): 7–105 (Journal of Proceedings).

231. Tunnard, A Southern Record, 29–30.

232. Ibid., 64.

233. Ibid., 36, 108.

234. Ibid., 324.

235. CSR, Samuel M. Hyams Jr.; OR Supplement, Record of Events, vol. 32, Mississippi Confederate Troops, 345, 339 (Confederate); 38:149, 140; Robert Selph Henry, "First with the Most" Forrest (Indianapolis: Bobbs-Merrill, 1944), 312–15;

OR I, 49:1030–31 (Forrest to Taylor, March 6, 1865); I, 49:956; I, 39:315, 609, 648, 676, 805–6, 809; I, 3:113–16; I, 30:496–97; I, 23:23, 191; I, 16:827–28; I, 8:293–94; I, 41:171. OR Supplement, Record of Events, vol. 32, Mississippi Troops (Confederate)—Cavalry, 141–49; 338–45; Report of Col. Louis Hebert, August 10, 1861.

236. Young, Where They Lie, 7.

237. Abraham Jonas followed his brother Joseph from England to America. Joseph, a native of Exeter, arrived in Cincinnati in 1817 at the age of twenty-five, the first Jew in that town and, indeed, the first Jew in Ohio. The leaders of the congregation in New York warned him that "in the wilds of America and entirely amongst Gentiles, you will forget your religion and your God." An old Quaker woman came to see him. She asked: "Art thou a Jew? Thou art one of God's chosen people. Wilt thou let me examine thee?" She turned, him around and finally said, with a tinge of disappointment in her voice: "Well, thou art no different to other people." Joseph prospered as a watchmaker, silversmith, and mechanic. He was elected to the Ohio legislature and was a founder of the first synagogue in the west, K. K. B'nai Israel. Despite his move to the "wilds of America," he continued to be an observing Orthodox Jew. When the Civil War was over, Joseph moved to Mobile, Alabama, where his son practiced law and where he died in 1869 (Universal Jewish Encyclopedia, 179; Marcus, Memoirs, 1:203–13).

Joseph's brother Abraham Jonas was a Henry Clay Whig. He believed in the national government and disliked the "Slave Oligarchy." Like many pioneers of the West, he moved about. He followed his brother to Cincinnati in 1819 with a group of Jews from Plymouth and Portsmouth and aided in the founding of the synagogue. His first wife was Lucia Orah Seixas, the daughter of Rabbi Gershom Seixas of New York, the Revolutionary War hero and friend of George Washington (Ira L. Harris, "Abraham Jonas, Lincoln's Most Valued Friend," paper at AJA). She died tragically in 1826. To escape his grief, Jonas moved to Williamstown, Kentucky, in 1827 (Simonhoff, Jewish Notables in America, 348–52.). There he met and married Louisa Block.

Jonas was elected four times to the Kentucky House of Representatives in the late 1820s and 1830s (Korn, American Jewry, 189–91). He knew Henry Clay and believed in him. Writing in 1858 to Sen. John K. Crittenden, whom Jonas had known when Crittenden was Speaker of the House of Representatives in Kentucky, he said, "Permit an old friend to express his satisfaction and delight, at reading your recent able speech on Kansas affairs … I am quite sure that had Mr. Clay been alive and by your side in the Senate, he would have spoken as you did" (Korn Papers, AJA, letter dated March 22, 1858). Half of the Jonas children were born in Kentucky in the 1830s and 1840s.

238. Rabbi Bertram Korn was particularly interested in Abraham Jonas and his family. He appended the Jonas-Lincoln correspondence to American Jewry and the Civil War and hoped one day to publish a "sizable monograph" on the patriarch. He regarded Abraham Jonas as "one of the most fascinating Jewish figures of the period" and found it "exceedingly significant that Mr. Jonas's sons achieved positions of importance" (letters in Korn manuscript collection, AJA, no. 99, folder 13/15 to H. E. Pratt, 3–19-52 and Mrs. S. A. Jonas, 3–18-52). On Abraham Jonas and the family generally, I have relied on the following: Korn, American Jewry and The Early Jews of New Orleans (Waltham, Mass.: American Jewish Historical Society, 1969), as well as Korn's manuscript collection at AJA (Collection 99, folder 13/15 Jonas, Abraham; folder 13/18 Jonas Family; Jonas Family and Abraham Jonas Nearprint Box—Biographies; Carl Landrum's series in The Quincy Herald-Whig [especially 1–31-1971, "Lincoln and the Jonas Family"; 2–12-67, "Quincy men helped Lincoln"; 2–6–77, "Lincoln and his friends in Quincy"; 8–29-82, "Abraham Jonas—early leader here"]). While there are entries for both Abraham and Benjamin Franklin Jonas in the Universal Jewish Encyclopedia, there is nothing of substance on Benjamin F. Jonas, the first practicing Jew in the U.S. Senate. This reflects the lack of scholarly work on Louisiana Jewry generally.

239. David C. Mearns, The Lincoln Papers, 3:516; see also Isaac Markens, "Lincoln and the Jews," AJHS 17 (1909): 123–28. Quincy Herald, February 12, 1867, Carl Landrum Series, Korn Papers, AJA.

240. David C. Mearns, The Lincoln Papers (Garden City, N.J.: Doubleday, 1998), 1:203–4 (June 4, 1857).

241. Korn, American Jewry, 228–29. The letter is reproduced in Isidor S. Meyer, ed., The American Jew in the Civil War: Catalog of the Exhibit of the Civil War Centennial Jewish Historical Commission (New York: AJHS, 1962), entry 160.

242. Korn, American Jewry, 194.

243. CSR, Charles H. Jonas; Korn, American Jewry; AJA, Korn Papers.

244. On Benjamin Franklin Jonas, I have utilized his compiled service record, standard references such as the National Cyclopedia of American Biography 4:544; Biographical Directory of the United States Congress, 1774–1949 (1950); A Dictionary of Louisiana Biography, 1:442; Confederate Military History, 459–60; American Jewish Yearbook ("Biographies of Members of Congress"), 1901; and Who Was Who in America, 1897–1942: A Component of Who's Who in American History (Chicago: Marquis Publications, 1968).

Jonas's military record is confusing. His compiled service records conflict with his obituary in essential areas. The records show that he enlisted in September 1862, although perhaps he enlisted sooner.

245. The firms were Farrar, Jonas & Kruttschnitt; Farrar, Jonas, Kruttschnitt & Goldberg; and later Farrar, Jonas, Kruttschnitt & Gurley. The firms are mentioned in more than two hundred reported cases. See, for example, Edrington v. Louisville, N.O. & T.R. Co., 6 So. 19 (La., 1889); State v. Meyer, 6 So. 590 (La., 1889); Stackhouse v. Zuntz, 6 So. 666 (La., 1889)(dealing with Judah Benjamin's former plantation, Belle Chase). My thanks to prominent Nevada attorney Leigh Goddard, Esq., for this information. Korn, Early Jews, 334n. 28. Jonas was likely a member of the Dispersed of Judah congregation, and, when that synagogue went out of existence, he joined the new Reform Temple Sinai, where he served as a member of the Board of Governors and vice president from 1894 to 1904. He was described as "an Israelite by nationality and religion" and was a member of the prestigious Boston Club of New Orleans and the Manhattan Club of New York. He married Josephine Block, whose parents were both Virginians. Many members of the Block family married members of the Cincinnati–Quincy–New Orleans Jonas family, according to Rabbi Korn. Korn, Early Jews, 228; National Cyclopedia of American Biography, 4:544; American Biography (but Confederate Military History says of New Orleans, 459); Korn, Early Jews, 326.

246. Obituary, New Orleans Daily Picayune, December 22, 1911, p. 1; CSR, B. F. Jonas.

247. CSR, Julian J. Jonas. There are a number of listings on file for J. J. Jonas: Captain Greenleafs company (Orleans Light Horse), Louisiana Cavalry; Stewart's Corps, QMSgt; and LA. Inf. Crescent Regiment Company E. Sgt. They all represent Julian Jonas.

248. Historical Times Illustrated Encyclopedia of the Civil War, 370.

249. S. A. Jonas is known to Civil War historians as the author of the famous poem "Lines on the Back of a Confederate Note." A biographical sketch in Confederate Veteran quotes it in its entirety. The Mississippi Department of Archives and History has a collection of biographical and autobiographical material on Jonas (Acc. No. 2109, Boxes 1–2; MS 60–2439 in Nat'l. Union Catalog of Manuscript Collections). The best source, which is repeated almost verbatim in Confederate Veteran and other summaries, is a letter he wrote to Mrs. Fred Cullum dated March 24, 1908, in response to a request for a sketch of his life (Box 2, folder 8, Acc. No. 2109, reprinted in Aberdeen (Miss.) Examiner, August 13, 1936, AJA). He closes with these words:

"Now if you had dreamed of the infliction impending, you would never have ventured the request for this life sketch."

The AJA has substantial material on S. A. Jonas in the Korn Collection and its Nearprint Box-Biographies (Jonas, Major S. A.). Korn's files contain letters about Jonas from descendants as well as newspaper clippings, especially from the Aberdeen (Miss.) Examiner. Major Jonas has an extensive service record at the National Archives, including a summary (marked "CARDED") of his record. See also John B. Hood's memoir, Advance and Retreat: Personal Experiences in the United States and Confederate Armies (New Orleans, 1880); Crute, Confederate Staff Officers, 1861–1865; Young, "The Sons of Abraham," North and South Magazine 1, no. 6, 94 (1999); "The Story of a Poem," North and South Magazine 1, no. 4 (April 1998): 44.

250. March 24, 1908, letter from S. A. Jonas, Miss. Dept of Archives and History Acct. 2109; reprinted in Aberdeen (Miss.) Examiner, August 13, 1936, AJA.

251. Hood, Advance and Retreat, 60.

252. CSR, George B. Jonas and George Jonas.

253. Obituary in Quincy newspaper attached to letter from Frederick Wells III, to Carl Landrum, February 16, 1868, Korn Papers, AJA; "Lincoln and the Jonas Family," Quincy Herald-Whig, January 31, 1871, Korn Papers, AJA.

254. OR, Series I, vol. 22, pt. 1, p. 385; CSR, Edward Jonas.

255. Stanley R. Brav, "The Jewish Woman, 1861–1865," AJA 17, no. 1 (April 1965): 61.

256. Ibid., 63

257. Daniel O'Flaherty, General Jo Shelby, Undefeated Rebel (Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1954), 18. The Gratz family was German, from Langensdorf in Upper Silesia. They had migrated in 1755 and settled in Pennsylvania. The legend of Rebecca Gratz is that one of her closest friends, Matilda Hoffman, was engaged to Washington Irving. When Matilda fell ill, Rebecca Gratz nursed her and spent considerable time with Irving. When Matilda died, Irving traveled to England. There he met Sir Walter Scott, who asked Irving to pen a description of a beautiful Jewess for Scott's use in Ivanhoe. Irving described Rebecca Gratz. Gratz Cohen's mother of Savannah was raised by her aunt, Rebecca Gratz. See David Philipson, ed., foreword, Letters of Rebecca Gratz (Philadelphia: JPS, 1929); DAB; The Universal Jewish Encyclopedia; Dianne Ashton in Jewish Women in America dismisses the Ivanhoe connection as “a legend” and “a popular tale.” However, Stephen Birmingham in The Grandees: America’s Sephardic Elite (New York: Harper & Row, 1971) believes the story is “probably true” (178–80).

258. Young, Where They Lie, 4–6.

259. O’Flaherty, General Jo Shelby, vii.

260. Ibid., 79.

261. OR II, 2:1421.

262. OR I, 53:808–809.

263. James M. Day, Jacob DeCordova: Land Merchant of Texas (Waco: Texan Press, 1962), 124.

264. The best treatment of Edwin DeLeon’s mission to Europe is chapter 5, “The DeLeon Mission,” in Charles P. Cullop, Confederate Propaganda in Europe, 1861–1865 (Coral Gables, Fla.: University of Miami Press, 1969), also published as “Edwin DeLeon: Jefferson Davis’ Propagandist,” Civil War History (State University of Iowa), 8, no. 4 (December 1962): 386. Cullop gives a detailed and balanced account. Frank Owsley treats the subject in King Cotton Diplomacy: Foreign Relations of the Confederate States of America (Chicago: University of Shicago Press, 1959), 2d ed. There are a number of references in the Official Records. See ORN II, 3:971–73.

There are numerous references to the DeLeons throughout Mary Chesnut’s diaries. See Woodward, Mary Chesnut’s Civil War, and Woodward and Muhlenfield, The Private Mary Chesnut. DeLeon wrote his memoirs, Thirty Years of My Life on Three Continents (London, 1890), which deal superficially with his service to the Confederate States. There are sketches of him in Elzas, Jews of South Carolina, 332 (Perry DeLeon); DAB; Twentieth Century Biographical Dictionary; Universal Jewish Encyclopedia; Simonhoff, Jewish Notables; and National Cyclopaedia.

265. Cullop, Confederate Propaganda, 67; DeLeon, Thirty Years, 320.

266. DeLeon, Thirty Years, 296–325.

267. Cullop, Confederate Propaganda, 68–72.

268. ORN II, 3:657, no. 3, January 16, 1863.

269. DeLeon, Thirty Years, 2:3.

270. Ibid., 2:7–8.

271. Owsley, King Cotton, 162–63.

272. DeLeon, Thirty Years, 2:24–31.

273. Ibid., 2:38–40; Cullop, Confederate Propaganda, 108–9; Historical Times Illustrated Encyclopedia of the Civil War, 214.

274. Cullop, Confederate Propaganda, 74; DeLeon, Thirty Years, 2:47; Owsley, King Cotton, 163–64.

275. Cullop, Confederate Propaganda, 75–76.

276. Owsley, King Cotton Diplomacy, 164–65.

277. ORN, I, 9:276, North Atlantic Blockading Squadron, November 11, 1863.

278. Owsley, King Cotton Diplomacy, 165.

279. Cullop, Confederate Propaganda, 82–83.

280. ORN, II, 3:971, December 9, 1863.

281. Cullop, Confederate Propaganda, 83.

282. Gallagher, The Confederate War, 28–29.

283. Randall and Donald, The Civil War and Reconstruction, 545.

284. Muster Roll of Company I, 15th Georgia. Marcus commanded the 15th Georgia at the assault on Fort Gilmer. See Confederate Veteran, June 1905, 269.

285. Letter to Simon Wolf from Col. F. Hay Gantt, November 7, 1864, copy courtesy of Mel Young, in possession of author. W. M. Wolf's CSR is filed under Will Wolff.

286. Obituary ("Perry Moses Passes Away"), Sumter [S.C.] Daily Item, 1916 in possession of author, courtesy of Anne F. Jennings; Arthur W. Bergeron, Confederate Mobile (Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1991), 193; Young, Where They Lie, 130–238.

287. “Diary of Eleanor Cohen Seixas,” in Penelope Franklin, ed., Private Pages: Diaries of American Women, 1830s–1970s (New York: Ballantine Books, 1986), 314.

288. Young, Where They Lie, 130.

289. Octavia Harby Moses, A Mother’s Poems, A Collection of Verses (privately printed, 1915), 54.

CHAPTER 4

1. Wolf, The American Jew, 102–4; Ezekiel and Lichenstein, History of the Jews of Richmond, 163. This remark, contained in a letter to Simon Wolf in the early 1890s, later became the basis of the “fact” that there were ten thousand Jews in the Confederate army, which there absolutely were not.

2. Wolf, The American Jew, 100–101.

3. Wolfs total for all states appears at page 424. The eleven Confederate states total 1, 216, which is approximately the number reached by counting each soldier in these states. At page 410 are 104 men unclassified as to commands. Three listed in an addenda at page 423 must be added, for a total of 1,323. Several Confederate staff officers, such as Abraham C. Myers, are listed at pages 114–15 and are not included in the state lists. Others are included. Finally, eleven naval officers are listed on pages 116. Wolf thus lists approximately 1,340 Confederate soldiers and sailors.

4. Wolf, The American Jew, 46; LeMaster, A Corner of the Tapestry, 46.

5. Letter to author from Eric Brock; list of Shreveport Jewish Confederate soldiers compiled by Eric Brock in possession of author; Eric Brock, “The Jewish Cemeteries of Shreveport, Louisiana” (available at Historic New Orleans Collection, AJA, and CC). Moses Rosenthal, as an example, was a member of “the Hebrew church,” according to The History of Louisiana, 588. Jonas Rosenthal was an immigrant from Alsace-Lorraine. Affidavit dated November 8, 1926, in possession of author courtesy of Nancy Greenberg, Alexandria, Louisiana. Ms. Greenberg identified Mires Rosenthal as her great-grandfather and Moses, Jonas, and Isaac as his brothers.

6. Elzas wrote, “The complete record of the part played by the Jews of South Carolina in the war between the States will never be known” (Jews of South Carolina, 122). He examined 70, 000 names and positively identified 167. The list, he noted, could be “largely extended, had accounts been taken of the sons of South Carolina Jews who fought in the war,” meaning that many, like Franklin J. Moses, had been raised as Christians (237n. 33). The list excluded dozens he could not positively identify, the Home Guard, the Regiment of Reserves, men listed by Wolf he could not verify, and men with Jewish-sounding names (David Jacobs, Isaac Abrahams) who were likely Jewish Confederates. There were forty-two in the artillery, seventeen in the cavalry, and two in the navy. Ezekiel and Lichtenstein, History of the Jews of Richmond, 176–88. The authors, writing in 1916, believed their list of Jewish Confederate soldiers to be “the best that has ever been printed, and it is safe to assume that no more complete or accurate one will ever be published” (176).

7. Wiley, The Life of Johnny Reh, 331.

8. Roster, 37th Virginia; AHA, letter from Philip Rosenheim to the Meinnarts, July 8, 1863; Fannie Herzberg, “Pioneer Members and History of Temple Beth-El, 1859–1959,” paper published in Chattahoochee Valley Historical Society Bulletin 4 (November 1959), and by the Southern Jewish Historical Association. AJA file as Pittsburgh Evening Leader, March 31, 1875; Barkai, Branching Out, 112; Korn, Civil War, 121ff.

9. Korn, Civil War, xiii, preface, paperback ed., 119; Friedman, Jews of Macon; Louis Schmeir, “Diary of Louis Merz.”

10. OR Supplement, Record of Events, Louisiana Troops, 24:235. CSR, I. R. Hyams.

11. Amann, Personnel of the Civil War, 139; Brock, The Jewish Cemeteries of Shreveport, 57, and “Shreveport Jewish Confederate Soldiers,” in possession of author; Roster of Georgia Troops in Confederate Service.

12. Eigenbrun is listed erroneously as J. Engenbrun on the roster (Schappes, 708n. 9); Oppenheim is listed incorrectly as Oppenheimer in Wolf (Schappes, 707–8n. 6); as to Engle, see Schappes, p. 708n. 9, although he is not on the roster.

13. “Moons” for Morris is in Ezekiel and Lichtenstein, History of the Jews of Richmond, 161; CSR, Lewis Leon, Company B, 53rd North Carolina; Morris Leon, Company I, 44th Infantry (Georgia); Leon, Diary of a Tarheel Confederate.

14. Wolf, The American Jew; Encyclopedia of the Confederacy, 266–67.

15. John H. and Roberta C. Neblett, “Emanuel Gerst—A Gentleman of Virginia,” Generations, Journal of Congregation Beth Ahaba Museum and Archives Trust 5, no. 1 (November 1992). See p. lln. 11.

16. Turitz and Turitz, Jews in Early Mississippi, 48.

17. Wolf, The American Jew, passim, as to Cohens, see 374; Ashley Halsey Jr., “The Last Duel in the Confederacy,” Civil War Times Illustrated 1, no. 7 (November 1962): 7; Elzas, Jews of South Carolina, 226; Crute, Units of the Confederate States Army, 271–72; Dorothy Phelps Bultman, “The Story of a Good Life” (November, 1963, Sumter, S.C.), 1 (Courtesy of Thomas Bultman, Esq.).

18. Ernest B. Furguson, Ashes of Glory: Richmond at War (New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1996), 212.

19. Letter dated July 8, 1863, from Philip Rosenheim to the Meinnarts, Korn file, AJA.

20. Rev. A. Toomer Porter, Led On! Step by Step (1898).

21. Albert Moses Luria, Maj. Raphael J. Moses's son, joined the 2d Georgia Battalion on April 19, 1861, arrived in Portsmouth, Virginia, in May 1861, and fought in the Battle of Sewell's Point. On June 17, 1861, he was elected second lieutenant of his new company in the 13th North Carolina Volunteers (NCV). He had transferred to be with a fellow cadet from Hillsboro Military Institute in North Carolina. (The unit entered Confederate service on July 12, 1861. It was redesignated the 23d Regiment North Carolina State Troops in November 1861.) Luria was reelected second lieutenant on April 16, 1862. Wounded in the head on May 31, 1862, at the Battle of Seven Pines, he was treated at Byrd Island Hospital in Richmond (General Hospital No. 3).

22. CSR, Octavus Cohen. Octavus Cohen has an extensive and interesting CSR. There are files under Gallie's Company, 1st (Olmstead's) Georgia Infantry; Company G, 32d Georgia Infantry; Company C, 22d Battalion Georgia Heavy Artillery.

23. Kole, The Minis Family, 115–16.

24. Mac Wyckoff, A History of the 2nd South Carolina Infantry: 1861–65 (Fredericksburg, Va.: Seargeant Kirkland's Museum and Historical Society, 1994), 218. The extended family included Franklin J. Moses, chief justice of the South Carolina Supreme Court during Reconstruction, and his son, the notorious "Robber Governor," Franklin J. Moses Jr.

25. Cutchins, A Famous Command, passim; Berman, Richmond's Jewry, 93–97; Ezekiel and Lichtenstein, History of the Jews of Richmond, 129, 149–52; Collins, 46th Virginia Infantry, 151.

26. Ezekiel and Lichtenstein, History of the Jews of Richmond, 153; David M. Potter, The Impending Crisis 1898–1861 (New York: Harper & Row, 1976), 369–71; Furguson, Ashes of Glory: Richmond at War (New York: Knopf, 1996), chap. 1.

27. Whitelock MS, autobiography, 97–98, VHS.

28. Ezekiel and Lichtenstein, History of the Jews of Richmond, 154.

29. Letters dated April 14, 1954, and February 3, 1954, from Charles B. Levy to J. R. Marcus, AJA.

30. Ezekiel and Lichtenstein, History of the Jews of Richmond, 178, 186–87.

31. VMI Alumni Review (Spring 1973): 1.

32. Joyner, “Georgetown”; Walker, Rolls and Historical Sketch of the Tenth Regiment, So. Car. Volunteers, introduction and 9.

33. Elzas, Jews of South Carolina, 230; J. C. Hemphill, Men of Mark in South Carolina (Washington, D.C., 1907), 1:201–3.

34. Wycoff, A History of the 2nd South Carolina Infantry, 158; Confederate Veteran 22 (1914): 170, 221; Louis Ginsberg, History of the Jews of Petersburg, 1789–1950 (Petersburg, Va., privately printed, 1954), 29, 41; Collins, 46th Virginia, 30, 37–43.

35. Confederate Military History 4 (Va.): 914–15; J. Ambler Johnston, “Not Forgotten, Henry Gintzberger, Private, CSA,” paper, BA.

36. Ruth Friedman, A Portrait of Jewish Life, Fredericksburg, Virginia 1860–1986 (copy at VHS), prologue and chap. 1.

37. LeMaster, A Corner of the Tapestry, 43; Turitz and Turitz, Jews in Early Mississippi, 3, 117–18, 29, 85–86, xvii, 109, 112.

38. LeMaster, A Corner of the Tapestry, 46, 45, 42–44; Felsenthal is listed as David “Felamthall” at the NA.

39. His family, according to Eli Evans, still has his two mess kits—one for meat and one for milk (Evans, The Provincials: A Personal History of Jesus in the South [New York: Athenaeum, 1974], 63). The author could locate no record of Gleitzman. Some of LeMaster’s information is not found in the various rosters.

40. Notes from family members provided by a descendant, Van Harte of Montgomery, Alabama (1995), in author’s file. Oppenheimer’s obituary on the front page of the Memphis News Scimitar, complete with a photograph of him in his Confederate uniform, called him “a picturesque character” who was one of the original California “Forty-niners,” fought the Indians with Custer in the Black Hills, and “Was With Gen. Beauregard at Shiloh,” all of which may or may not have been true. The story states that “Mr. Oppenheimer had served under [Gen. P. G. T.] Beauregard and [Gen. Albert Sidney] Johnston against Grant and Bull at Shiloh. He was captured by federal troops and imprisoned in the courthouse at Trenton. Upon his release he went to Mobile in the latter part of 1863 and participated in the defense of that city against the terrific naval onslaughts of Admiral Farragut." Another newspaper account has him as "a personal friend of Gen. Custer and Buffalo Bill Cody." His family's tradition had him serving in Company D, 3d Alabama Cavalry at Shiloh, Murfreesboro, Chickamauga, Knoxville, and Atlanta, but army records do not confirm this.

41. Oppenheimer told his fellow Confederate Veterans in later years that he was near Gen. Albert Sidney Johnston when he was killed at the Battle of Shiloh and saw him fall. These stories were apparently credible to the Confederate Veterans of Montgomery, who asked him to attend their reunion (undated clipping from newspaper, dateline Montgomery). In his "Soldier's Application for Pension," dated October 13, 1908, Oppenheimer states that he enlisted in the army at Pensacola with the Georgia infantry but was soon transferred to Captain Judkin's Company of the 2d Alabama Cavalry, "where I remained until some time in 1863 when I came home on furlough from Gen. Joe Wheeler." He stated that he was captured at Bolivar, Tennessee, and imprisoned in Jackson, Tennessee. His brother secured his release, and he returned to Alabama to rejoin his command. Ben had a half-brother named Simon Oppenheimer who peddled during the war in the North and the South. It may have been this brother who rescued him from the Union army.

42. Juliet George, "By the Brazos and the Trinity They Hung Up Their Harps: Two Jewish Immigrants in Texas" (master's thesis, University of Texas, Austin, 1991), 88, 90–93. Berliner is listed as "Berlener" and Samuels as "Samuel" at NA.

43. Ibid., 99–100; John D. Winters, The Civil War in Louisiana, 212, 284–99; Historical Times Illustrated Encyclopedia of the Civil War, 587.

44. Eric Brock, "The Jewish Cemeteries of Shreveport, Louisiana."

45. Leon, Diary, 11–4; Charles B. Levy to J. R. Marcus, February 3, 1954, Levy Family Papers, AJA.

46. CSR, Lewis Leon; "Regimental History, 1st Regiment, N.C. Infantry"; Crute, Units, 211–12, 238. Lewis Leon's record is filed under North Carolina 53d Infantry, Company B. Morris Leon's record is Georgia, 44th Georgia Infantry, Company I.

47. Leon, Diary, 1–4.

48. Ibid., 58; CSR, Morris Leon; Crute, Units, 109.

49. Leon, Diary, 29; Crute, Units, 238; CSR, Morris Leon.

50. Leon, Diary, 19–31, 59.

51. Ibid., 39, 28, 41, 56, 61.

52. Simon Mayer Papers, Letter, April 17, 1864, TU.

53. Leon, Diary, 13, 14, 33.

54. Ibid., 15–16, 26, 32.

55. Wiley, The Life of Johnny Reb, 244; Leon, Diary, 17, 27; letter to "Dear Friend" (probably Herman Heyman, September 23, 1862) Merz Papers, AJA; Herzberg, "Pioneer Members and History of Temple Bethel, 1859–1959."

56. Leon, Diary, 7, 76, 8, 25.

57. George, "By the Brazos," 101; Thomas Lowry, M.D., The Story the Soldiers Wouldn't Tell: Sex in the Civil War (Mechanicsburg, Pa.: Stackpole Books, 1994), 28; Leon, Diary, 27.

58. Leon, Diary, 12.

59. Ibid., 27–28, 32–33; Crute, Units, 238.

60. Leon, Diary, 34–35; OR Series I, vol. 27, pt. 2, 342, 564–71, 576–77.

61. Ibid., 35–36.

62. Ibid., 36–39.

63. Ibid., 39, 41; Historical Times Illustrated Encyclopedia of the Civil War, 307.

64. Ibid., 41.

65. Ibid., 43, 53–56.

66. Ibid., 58.

67. McPherson, For Cause and Comrades, 132; Schappes, Documentary History, 709n. 17; Leon, Diary, 59; Ezekiel and Lichtenstein, Jews of Richmond, 16.

68. Leon, Diary, 72; Gordon C. Rhea, The Battle of the Wilderness, May 5–6, 1864 (Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1994), 164–65; Edward Steere, The Wilderness Campaign: The Meeting of Grant and Lee (Harrisburg, Pa.: Stackpole Co., 1960; reprinted Mechanicsburg, Pa.: Stackpole Books, 1994), 162, 172–73.

69. Leon, Diary, 61–63.

70. The date one took the oath of allegiance was important to Southerners after the war. Obviously, if a soldier refused the oath, he was considered more patriotic. Thus Leon had a motive to write that, after Lee surrendered on April 9, he was among 400 Confederate prisoners at the Elmira Prison to take "the cursed oath." But Union prisoner of war records show that Leon took the oath and was released on February 7, 1865. A letter from the military archives dated August 3, 1953, to Dr. Jacob R. Marcus shows that Dr. Marcus was aware of the February date, but he chose to use Leon's version in Memoirs of American Jews. Of course, the military records could be wrong. See Leon's compiled service record; Leon, Diary, 62, 64; Schappes, Documentary History, 708.

71. Leon, Diary, 61–65.

72. Ibid., 61–65.

73. Ibid., 70.

74. Isaac Hermann, Memoirs, 12. His pension records show that he enlisted in Company E, 1st Regiment, Georgia Infantry, on June 30, 1861. Schappes, Documentary History, 712n. 4; Herman's records are filed under Georgia, Capt. Howell's Company, Georgia Light Artillery and 1st (Ramsey's) Georgia Infantry, Company E. His pension record is Confed. Arch., chap. 6, file 751, 58 (April 8, 1916).

75. Stan Cohen, The Civil War in West Virginia: A Pictorial History (Charleston, W.Va.: Pictorial Histories Publishing Co., 1982): 26, 28, 49, 77; OR, series 1, vol. 5, 389–96; Hermann, Memoirs, 15.

76. Historical Times Illustrated Encyclopedia of the Civil War, 135; Hermann, Memoirs, 39, 19.

77. Hermann, Memoirs, 69–71.

78. Hermann, Memoirs, 74. According to Schappes, Hermann was discharged from the 1st Georgia on January 25, 1862, and reenlisted May 10, 1862, in Martins Battery, Georgia Light Artillery. The author's research shows September 1862. He was appointed a musician. Schappes, Documentary History, 712n. 4.

79. Hermann, Memoirs, 83, 86, 99; Schappes, Documentary History, 712. None of his claimed wounds are substantiated by the available records.

80. Hermann, Memoirs, 173, 233–34.

81. Ibid., 64, 89, 91–95, 138–41.

82. Ibid., 163–64.

83. James I. Robertson Jr., Soldiers Blue and Gray (Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1988), 122–24; Leon, Diary, 24.

84. Hermann, Memoirs, 98.

85. Ibid., 227–28; 179; 118; 248; Schappes, Documentary History, 712.

86. Wiley, The Life of Johnny Beb, 108; Hermann, Memoirs, 121, 176.

87. Hermann, Memoirs, 67, 155; CSR, I. Hermann.

88. Marcus, Memoirs, 3:302–6.

89. Obituary says he joined the Donaldsville Artillery, later known as Dreux's Battalion, which is erroneous; Young, Where They Lie, 23, 223; Marcus, 3:299; Ashkenazi, Diary of Clara Solomon, 62, 69–73; Bergeron, Guide to Louisiana Confederate Military Units, 148–49; see CSR, the Levy brothers.

90. Ashkenazi, Diary of Clara Solomon, 62–73, 77.

91. Bergeron, Guide to Louisiana Confederate Military Units, 148; CSR, Eugene and Julian Levy.

92. Marcus, Memoirs, 3:301; Diary of Eugene Henry Levy, AJA, 17 (6–3–1864).

93. Marcus, Memoirs, 3:303; Levy Diary, AJA, 112–13 (December 26, 1864).

94. Marcus, Memoirs, 3:301; Levy Diary, AJA, 19 (June 6, 1884); 33–34 (July 2, 1864).

95. Marcus, Memoirs, 3:302–4.

96. Ibid., 3:304.

97. Levy Diary, 305.

98. Levy Diary, 16–17 (June 1, 1864).

99. Baruch, My Own Story, 36.

100. LeMaster, A Corner of the Tapestry, 43; Historical Times Illustrated Encyclopedia of the Civil War, “Bloody Angle,” 68; “Spotsylvania,” 709; Simonhoff, Jewish Participants in the Civil War, 263–64. His name has had many other spellings in various writings: Frankenthal, Fahrentold, Fronthall. His CSR is under Mark Fraunthall.

101. Thomas T. Murford to Hortense G. Moses, March 22, 1905. The soldier was “Maurice” from Lynchburg, Virginia, Botetourt Dragoons, Company C, 2d Virginia Cavalry, AJA.

102. Gary R. Baker, Cadets in Gray: The Story of the Cadets of the South Carolina Military Academy and the Cadet Rangers in the Civil War (Columbia, S.C.: Palmetto Book works, 1989), 171. Moses was nicknamed “Lord Shaftsbury” because of his “scholarly style of composition.”

103. Obituary, Charleston Daily Courier, September 21, 1862; Wycoff, A History of the 2nd South Carolina Infantry, 218, 117; Turitz and Turitz, Jews in Early Mississippi, 87–88; Young, Where They Lie, p.111; Confederate Veteran 22 (1914): 170.

104. Gergel and Gergel, Tree of Life, 36; Young, Where They Lie, 57; Jack Steinberg, “United for Worship and Charity: A History of Congregation Children of Israel” (1982), 8.

105. Young, Where They Lie, 23–24, 27, 36, 46, 49, 222; OR Series I, vol. 10, pt. 1, 565 (Shiloh); Obituary, Charleston Daily Courier, July 12, 1864; OR I, 20, pt. 1, 799 (Stone’s River).

106. Young, Where They Lie, 54, 56; Merz file, AJA; Herzberg Papers, AJA; Merz Papers, Cobb Memorial Archives, Valley, Alabama; Herzberg, “Pioneer Members and History of Temple Bethel, 1859–1959.” Henry Blankenesee is listed on the granite monument in Washington Park in Charleston as a casualty. Robert Blankensee, Company A, Hampton Legion, was killed at First Manassas, not Second. Robert was confused with Henry, according to Kirkland, Broken Fortunes.

107. Young, Where They Lie, 68, 74, 76, 82, 100–101, 115, 128; Mel Young, “Jewish POWs Buries at Andersonville,” The [Atlanta] Jewish Georgian, November-December 1995, 27.

108. J. Ambler Johnston, “Not Forgotten, Henry Gintzberger, Private, CSA,” paper, BA. Johnston was chairman of the Richmond Civil War Centennial Committee and a descendent of Pvt. N. B. Johnston, who wrote about “the only Jewish soldier” being killed while peering over the breastworks. He was moved to write this paper by the pathos of the death of this poor Jewish peddler, who was then buried under the wrong name, Henry Gersberg, in the Hebrew Cemetery in Richmond. Through Mr. Johnston’s efforts in 1963, Gintzberger’s correct name was placed on a marker at the cemetery.

109. Ezekiel autobiography, 62–65.

110. Darrell L. Collins, 46th Virginia Infantry ([Lynchburg, Va.]: H. E. Howard, 1992), 123.

111. Diary of Emma Mordecai, August 30, 1864; Berman, Richmond’s Jewry, 177.

112. Levy Family Papers, BA.

113. Brennan, Assault on Charleston; Young, Where They Lie, 39, 187, 245, 263.

114. Brennan, Assault on Charleston, 184; Young, Where They Lie, 40, 187, 245.

115. Charleston Daily Courier, June 18 and 21, 1862; Brennan, Assault, 185; Young, Where They Lie, 39–40; Charleston Daily Courier, June 21, 1862.

116. Saul Viener, “Rosena Hutzler Levy Recalls the Civil War,” AJHQ 62, no. 3 (March 1973): 306–13.

117. Young, Where They Lie, 57.

118. Young, Where They Lie, 21–22; Ezekiel and Lichtenstein, History of the Jews of Richmond, 182.

119. Korn, War on the Mississippi, 63, 90; Marcus, Memoirs, 2:33–34.

120. Marcus, Memoirs, 2:39–41.

121. Ibid., 42–43.

122. Wiley, The Life of Johnny Reb, 83.

123. Marcus, Memoirs, 3:116–17.

124. Ibid, 117.

125. Ibid, 118–32.

126. Furguson, Ashes of Glory, 6, 12, 182–85. Whitlock's memoir, "The Life of Philip Whitlock," is at the Virginia Historical Society. These facts are understandably omitted from Berman's Richmond's Jewry and Ezekiel and Lichtenstein's History of the Jews of Richmond which states that Whitelock "was disabled in the service April, 1862 and transferred to the Quartermaster's Department" (188). Whitelock wrote his memoir after Ezekiel and Lichtenstein's book was published and he may not have been as candid with his contemporaries as he was in his memoir.

127. Whitlock MS, 122–24.

128. Lynn Item, August 3 or 8, 1918, clipping courtesy of Mel Young.

129. Morris Silverman, Hartford Jews, 1659–1970 (Hartford: Connecticut Historical Society, n.d.), 247; Korn, American Jewry, preface, xvi; Jones, Personal Reminiscences, 443. There is no listing for Rosenblatt in the Confederate Roster.

130. CSR, Private Max Neugas (Company D, 1 [McCreary's] S.C. Inf. [1 S.C. Inf. Prov. Army]; Pee Dee Light Artillery, Zimmerman's Company, South Carolina Light Artillery; OR I, 2, pt. 2, chap. 23, 860 ("Private Neugas severely wounded"). My thanks to Tom Brooks of Ontario, Canada, for sending me material on Neugas from the Fort Delaware Society.

131. OR I, vol. 21, 649–50; OR I, vol. 25, pt. 1, 937–39.

132. American Israelite (October 16, 1863): 122; and 11 (October 14, 1864): 124; Bernard Postal and Lionel Koppman, Jewish Delaware: History, Sites, Communal Services (Wilmington: Jewish Federation of Delaware, 1976), 26; "Celebrating the Sites of Jewish Delaware," 26; letter from Dean E. Nelson, Delaware Bureau of Museum and Historic Sites to William Craven, president, Fort Delaware Society, enclosing Neugas's letter or petition to Lincoln (April 9, 1864), Archive of Fort Delaware Society. The Boston Athenaeum Library owns a number of prints by Neugas, who was an engraver. The library published a catalog titled "Citizens in Conflict" by Sally Pierce, which contains additional material on Neugas.

133. Young, Where They Lie, 53; Confederate Veteran, January 1908.

134. Leon, Diary, 18, 27, 46; Pioneer Members and Diary of Louis Merz, 31.

135. Korn, "Was There a Confederate Jewish Chaplain?," American Jewish Historical Quarterly 53, no. 1 (September 1963): 63–69; AJA 1, no. 1 (June 1948): 6–22; Ezekiel and Lichtenstein, History of the Jews of Richmond, passim.

136. Korn, American Jewry, 57. "My suggestion … that the Confederate Congress was more liberal than its Federal counterpart has caused a few eyebrows to be raised fairly high," Korn wrote in his preface to the paperbound edition (page xiv). See his article, "Jewish Chaplains during the Civil War," AJA 1, no. 1 (June 1998): 7, for the same quote.

137. Ezekiel and Lichtenstein, History of the Jews of Richmond, 187.

138. Simon Mayer Papers, letter dated May 3, 1865, TU.

139. Leon, Diary, 49; Ezekiel and Lichtenstein, History of the Jews of Richmond, 155.

140. Herbert T. Ezekiel, "The Jews of Richmond during the Civil War," address delivered to Rimmon Lodge No. 68, International Order of B'nai B'rith (I.O.B.B.), February 28, 1915, 1 (Published Richmond, Va: Press of H. T. Ezekiel; copy at VHS).

141. Ezekiel and Lichtenstein, History of the Jews of Richmond, 171; Leon Diary, 47–48.

142. Marcus, Memoirs, 3:306–7; Levy Diary, 107, December 17, 1864.

143. The Oxford Dictionary of the Jewish Religion.

144. A photograph of the prayer is reproduced on page 212; Korn, American Jewry, 88–90.

145. Korn, American Jewry, 92.

146. Ibid., 92.

147. "Death of a Soldier" (Adolph Rosenthal) in "Civil War Centennial, Southern Issue," AJA 13, no. 1 (April 1961): 61–72; Berman, Richmond's Jewry, 180.

148. Wolf, American Jew, 100–101.

149. Ibid.; Clyde L. Cummer, Yankee in Gray: The Civil War Memoirs of Henry E. Handerson (Cleveland, Ohio: Press of Western Reserve University, 1962), 31.

150. Turitz and Turitz, Jews in Early Mississippi, xvii.

151. E. Merton Coulter, The Confederate States of America, vol. 1 of A History of the South, 6th ed. (Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1987), 228; Elzas, Jews of South Carolina, 220.

CHAPTER 5

1. Jewish Southerners were more visible than their small numbers suggest. While it is true that of the 4 million of foreign-born in the United States, only 500,000 lived in the South, they clustered in the coastal and larger river towns. As Herbert Weaver has pointed out in “Foreigners in Ante-Bellum Towns of the Lower South,” JSH 13 (1947): 62–73, “They [all foreigners] comprised a considerable portion of the free population, and their impact upon the society in these centers of concentration produced some significant results.” For example, 67 percent of the foreign-born in South Carolina lived in Charleston; 63 percent in Alabama lived in Mobile. “The concentration in larger towns, such as Mobile, Savannah and Memphis,” Weaver concludes, “was so great that on the basis of total free inhabitants the percentage of foreigners in these cities was comparable to that in Philadelphia and Boston.” Weaver also points out (correcdy in my view) that the foreign-born tended to concentrate in specific neighborhoods. “In 1860,” he writes, “almost a third of the foreigners in Mobile, lived in a single downtown ward” (66–67). While Jews did live throughout all of the Southern cities, the immigrants did tend to cluster in the commercial district. In 1861, upper King Street in Charleston and parts of Main Street in Richmond were definitely Jewish neighborhoods.

There is an excellent bibliography and discussion of this issue in Mark I. Greenberg’s perceptive article, “Becoming Southern: The Jews of Savannah, Georgia, 1830–1870,” AJH 86, no. 1 (March 1998): 55–56. Greenberg points out that 350 Jews constituted 2.5 percent of Savannah’s white population in 1861.

2. Woodward, Mary Chesnut, 368–69.

3. Stern, Americans of Jewish Descent, 130; Gergel and Gergel, Tree of Life, 35,17–18.

4. DeLeon, Belles, Beaux, and Brains, 144; Gordon Grey, “The Ancestry of Nathalie Fontaine Lyons,” edited by Jo White Linn (Salisbury, N.C.: privately published, 1981), copy in possession of author, courtesy of Belinda Gergel.

5. Woodward, Mary Chesnut, 346.

6. Ibid., 91n. 5.

7. Ibid., 358, 387; Hagy, Happy Land, 299; Cohen is erroneously listed in the roster as Ludlow L. Cohen in Company A, 2d Cavalry. The unit did not become Company A, 2d

Cavalry until August 22, 1862.

8. Woodward, Mary Chesnut, 344.

9. Ibid., 366, 371.

10. Ibid., 346, 354, 359. In Exodus, Miriam, the prophetess, "took a timbrel in her hand" and led the Hebrew women in a celebratory dance. Her song, believed by many scholars to be the oldest part of the Hebrew Bible, at Exod. 15:20–21, is as follows:

Sing ye to the Lord for He is highly exalted;

The horse and his rider hath He thrown into the sea.

See Jonathan Kirsch, Moses: A Life
(New York: Ballantine Books, 1998), 192–97.

11. Moise, Moise Family, 65; Solomon Breibart, "Penina Moise, Southern Jewish Poetess," in Proctor and Schmier, Jews of the South, 34–35.

12. "A Reverie," copy in possession of author, courtesy of Solomon Breibart. This poem was written during the Civil War and published in the Charleston World (June 21, 1891); "Cockades of Blue" was reprinted in The American Jewish Yearbook (1906) in an article titled "Penina Moise, Woman and Writer" by Lee C. Harby; Brav, "The Jewish Woman," 36.

13. Brav, "The Jewish Woman," passim; Korn, American Jewry, 99.

14. Brav, "The Jewish Woman," 35; Schappes, Documentary History, 707n. 3; Marcus, Memoirs, 3:366.

15. Diner, A Time for Gathering, 12, 76, 81–85; Sue Eakin, Washington, Louisiana (Bossier City, La.: Everett Co., 1988), 105–7.

16. Zebulon Vance Hooker II, "Moses Jacob Ezekiel: The Formative Years," Virginia Magazine of History and Biography 60 (April 1952): 241–43.

17. Evans, Judah Benjamin, 7.

18. Diner, A Time for Gathering, 81–82.

19. Drew Gilpin Faust, Mothers of Invention: Women of the Slaveholding South in the American Civil War (Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1996): 46–51.

20. Faust, Mothers of Invention, 4–8; 134–38; Diner, A Time for Gathering, 81–82.

21. Ezekiel, “The Jews of Richmond during the Civil War,” 1.

22. Urofsky, Commonwealth and Community, 84; Berman, Richmond’s Jewry, 179–80.

23. Faust, Mothers of Invention, 99.

24. Berman, Richmond’s Jewry, 193–94.

25. Generations, Journal of Congregation Beth Ahabah 3, no. 3 (May 1991).

26. Samuel Mordecai, Virginia, Especially Richmond, in Bygone Days (Richmond: West and Johnson, 1858), 246. All locations from Second Annual Directory for the City of Richmond (1860) on microfilm at the Library of Virginia Archives, Richmond.

27. Creeger, “Michelbacher”; Generations 5, no. 2 (April 1993): 3–4.

28. Ezekiel and Lichtenstein, History of the Jews of Richmond, 162; Korn, American Jewry, 94.

29. Ezekiel and Lichtenstein, History of the Jews of Richmond, 162.

30. Ibid., 162–63.

31. Ezekiel and Lichtenstein, History of the Jews of Richmond, 164–65; Rev. J. William Jones, Personal Reminiscences, 442–44. This account also contains Lee’s letters to Michelbacher dated August 29, 1861, April 2, 1863, and September 20, 1864. Jones quoted the venerable Dr. White as to Lee’s Christian character. “His love for the truth, and for all that is good and useful, was such as to render his brotherly kindness and charity as boundless as were the wants and sorrows of his race” (445).

32. Ezekiel and Lichtenstein, History of the Jews of Richmond, 156–57; Berman, Richmond’s Jewry, 202.

33. Reznikoff and Engelman, The Jews of Charleston, 163; Fass memoirs, CC.

34. Rosen, Confederate Charleston, chap. 6; Moise, Moise Family, 8.

35. Rosen, Confederate Charleston, 99, 144; Reznikoff and Engelman, The Jews of Charleston, 157.

36. Solomon Breibart, “BSBI Celebrates 140th Anniversary,” Charleston Jewish Journal, April 1995. Jeffrey Kaplan wrote a history of Berith Shalom Beth Israel in 1948 for its 130th anniversary booklet.

37. Reznikoff and Engelman, The Jews of Charleston, 152; Gergel and Gergel, Tree of Life, 42.

38. Moise, Moise Family, 8. Eleanor Cohen’s diary has also been printed in Penelope Franklin, Private Pages: Diaries of American Women 1830s–1870s.

39. William Fidler, “Henry Timrod: Poet of the Confederacy,” The Southern Literary Messenger 2 (Revised) (October 1940): 527–35; “Unpublished Letters of Henry Timrod,” Southern Literary Messenger 2 (November 1940): 605–11, and 2 (December 1940): 645–51.

40. Southern Literary Messenger 2 (November 1940), 608.

41. William Fidler, “Notes and Documents: Seven Unpublished Letters of Henry Timrod,” Alabama Review (April 1949): 146.

42. H. Timrod to his sister Emily, June 11, 1861, H. Timrod Papers, South Caroliniana Library, University of South Carolina, Columbia (courtesy of Belinda Gergel).

43. Southern Literary Messenger 2 (December 1940): 645; Charleston Daily Courier, January 23, 1862.

44. Fidler, “Seven Unpublished Letters,” 148–49; Rosen, Confederate Charleston, passim.

45. Rebecca Ella Solomons Alexander Memoir transcript, Alexander Papers, Atlanta Jewish Federation Archives, p. 7.

46. Russell and Hines, Savannah, 104–10.

47. Rebecca Alexander transcript, 6–8.

48. Confederate Veteran, August 1921, 304.

49. Greenberg, “Creating Ethnic, Class, and Southern Identity,” 178.

50. Rubin, Third to None, 115–17; F. O. Lee and J. C. Agnew, Historical Record of the City of Savannah (Savannah, 1869), 171–73.

51. Greenberg, “Creating Ethnic, Class, and Southern Identity,” 165–68.

52. Rubin, Third to None, 135. It was formerly the Liberty Inn.

53. Greenberg, “Creating Ethnic, Class, and Southern Identity,” 164.

54. “Fanny Cohen’s Journal of Sherman’s Occupation of Savannah,” Collections of the Georgia Historical Society, 407–16.

55. Greenberg, “Creating Ethnic, Class, and Southern Identity,” 64, 236–38.

56. Russell and Hines, Savannah, 114; Rebecca Alexander transcript, 9–10; Confederate Veteran 8 (1921): 304.

57. Foreword to Proctor and Schmier, Jews of the South.

58. Rubin, Third to None, 213.

59. Mary A. DeCredico, Patriotism for Profit: Georgia’s Urban Entrepreneurs and the Confederate War Effort (Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1990), 33; Joseph B. Mahan, Columbus, Georgia’s Fall Line Trading Town (Northridge, Calif.: Windsor Publications, 1986), 48–9, 52, 57.

60. DeCredico, Patriotism, 50.

61. AJA 13, no. 1 (April 1861): 73–74.

62. Ibid, 74.

63. Jack J. Steinberg, “The Jews of Augusta” (article in Ancestoring 12 in possession of author); “United for Worship and Charity: A History of Congregation Children of Israel.”

64. Chester G. Hearn, The Capture of New Orleans, 1862 (Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1995), 65.

65. Nau, The German People, 37.

66. Ashkenazi, Diary of Clara Solomon, 233, 273.

67. Ibid., 243, 263–64, 289–90.

68. Records of the Association for the Relief of Jewish Widows and Orphans, bound volume at Louisiana State Museum, New Orleans.

69. Ashkenazi, Diary of Clara Solomon, 325–26, 329, 332; Young, Where They Lie, 223; Congregation Book of Records of Dispersed of Judah, Howard Tilton Library, TU.

70. Ashkenazi, Diary of Clara Solomon, 325.

71. David Nevins, The Road to Shiloh (Alexandria, Va.: Time-Life Books, 1983); Historical Times Illustrated Encyclopedia of the Civil War, 684–85.

72. Ashkenazi, Diary of Clara Solomon, 295, 310, 326, 331, 334n. 24, 340.

73. Ibid, 343–45.

74. Korn, American Jewry, 48.

75. Ibid.

76. Max Heller, "Jubilee Souvenir Booklet," 48–53, 71–75; Jewish Historical Publishing Company of Louisiana, comp., The History of Jews of Louisiana: Their Religious, Civic, Charitable and Patriotic Life (New Orleans: Jewish Historical Publishing Company of Louisiana, 1905), 29.

77. The History of Jews of Louisiana, 176.

78. Woodward, Mary Chesnut, 371–72.

79. Ashkenazi, Diary of Clara Solomon, 350–51.

80. Ibid., 354, 369–70, 395, 424, 419–20; Faust, Mothers of Invention, 207–14.

81. Butler, Judah Benjamin, 336–38.

82. Joseph Benjamin is listed in the Roster of Confederate Soldiers in Benjamin's Company Cavalry, a company he formed in December 1863. The only record is the company muster roll for "Dec. 24, 1863 to Feb. 29, 1864," which shows that the company was enlisted on December 24, 1863, at Bapides, Louisiana, by Maj. William M. Levy. The supposition that it was a headquarters escort is based on comments by Judah Benjamin when Taylor gave up his command and moved east of the Mississippi in August 1864, and the fact that William M. Levy was on General Taylor–s staff from July 1862 until the end of the war. A notation on the surrender rolls for H. M. Hyams says he was paroled with Lt. Gen. Simon Bolivar Buck-ner's escort, commanded by Capt. Joseph Benjamin at Natchitoches in June 1865.

83. James Parton, General Butler in New Orleans (New York, 1864).

84. Benjamin Butler, Butler's Book: A Review of His Legal, Political and Military Career, (Boston, 1892).

85. Evans, Judah Benjamin, 381; Meade, Judah P. Benjamin, 362.

86. Young, Where They Lie, 152.

87. The CSR for Solomon Cohen shows him in Company B (Thomas's), 28th Louisiana Infantry. His son's application for membership in the Sons of Confederate Veterans in 1951 shows Captain Sloan's Company. E. B. Sloan was commander of Company C. The story about the chicken, courtesy of Cathy Kahn and Cecile Levin of New Orleans, December 6, 1997. He is listed as "S. Cohen" in Booth's, 372. (The official 28th Louisiana was Gray's Regiment. Thomas's is listed as the 29th Louisiana, yet in the OR, Thomas's is designated as the 28th. This confusion was not uncommon in the Confederate Army.)

88. Memoir in possession of Cecile Levine of New Orleans, the great-granddaughter of Fanny Goldstein Cohen; copy at the Museum of the Southern Jewish Experience.

89. "Life and Doings of Ferdinand Goldsmith," courtesy of Moise Steeg, Esq., of New Orleans; copy in the possession of the author.

90. A. Metz Kahn, "From the Rhine to Dixie and Beyond," 1992, TU, Metz Papers.

91. The Story of the Jewish Orphan's Home of New Orleans (New Orleans, 1905); Malone, "New Orleans Uptown," 245n. 11. This institution, funded in large part by Judah Touro, was necessitated by the death toll caused by the yellow fever epidemics of 1847 and 1853.

92. Heller, "Jubilee Souvenir Booklet," 11, 39.

93. Ashkenazi, Diary of Clara Solomon, 352.

94. William Tuckman, "Sigmund and Jacob Schlesinger and Joseph Bloch: Civil War Composers and Musicians," AJHQ 53, no. 1 (September 1963): 70–75. A Joseph Block is listed in Company C, Alabama State Artillery, stationed at Mobile.

95. Gov. T. H. Watts to Jefferson Davis, OR II, vol. 8, 1222–24; Nevins, Herbert H. Lehman and His Era, 10; Ashkenazi, A Centennial; Elliott Ashkenazi, "Jewish Commercial Interests between North and South: The Case of the Lehmans and the Seligmans," AJA 63, no. 1 (Spring/Summer 1991): 25–39; "Mayer Lehman in Correspondence with General U.S. Grant, Jefferson Davis and Governor T. H. Watts of Alabama," PAJHS 20 (1911): 154–57 (also in OR II, 7, 1223–24 and II, 8, 69–70, 166, 365).

96. Postal and Koppman, A Jewish Tourist's Guide to the U.S., 7.

97. Kenneth Libo, "The Moses of Montgomery: The Saga of a Jewish Family in the South," Alabama Heritage 35 (spring 1995): 18–25; Loeb book.

98. Owen, History of Alabama, 813.

99. Korn, American Jewry, 49.

100. Ibid., 49; AJA 13, no. 1 (April 1961): 40–42.

101. The Natchez Light Infantry was Company A of the 1st (Parton's) Mississippi, Army of 10,000. The Natchez Southrons was first Company O, then new Company B, 10th Mississippi. During the major reorganization of the Army of Tennessee, most of the 10th Mississippi became Company G, 9th Mississippi (consolidated).

102. ORN I, 19, 181–82. Report of Commodore Porter, commanding USS Essex, Blockading Squadron; Aunt Sister's Book (New York, 1929), 5–6; Turitz and Turitz, Jews in Early Mississippi, 11–12.

103. Aunt Sister's Book, 6.

104. Ibid., 8–12.

105. April 17, 1864, letter, Simon Mayer Family Papers, No. 815, Box No. 1, TU.

106. Aunt Sister's Book, 7–8, 15; Faust, Mothers of Invention, 207.

107. Fedora Small Frank, "Nashville Jewry during the Civil War," Tennessee Historical Quarterly 39, no. 3 (fall 1980): 310–13; Nashville Daily Gazette, September 8, 1861.

108. Frank "Nashville Jewry," 313.

109. Rabbi James A. Wax, “The Jews of Memphis: 1860–1865,” West Tennessee Historical Society Papers 3 (1949): 39–43. Levy was a second lieutenant in the 1st Alabama, Tennessee and Mississippi infantry, also known as the 4th Confederate. He was second lieutenant of Company I, 42d Tennessee, and captain, AQM. He is referred to as a major, which he may have been late in the war.

110. Frank, “Nashville Jewry,” 315–16.

111. Ibid., 317–18.

112. Children of Israel v. Peres, 42 Tenn 620; Wax, “The Jews of Memphis,” 41; Lewis, A Biblical People, 24.

113. Frank, “Nashville Jewry,” 318–20.

114. Frank L. Byrne and Jean Powers Soman, ed., Your True Marcus: The Civil War Letters of a Jewish Colonel (Kent, Ohio: Kent State University Press, 1986), 175–203, 335. This book has been reissued as A Jewish Colonel in the Civil War: Marcus M. Spiegel of the Ohio Volunteers, edited by Soman and Byrne (Lincoln, Tenn.: University of Nashville Press, 1994).

115. Wax, “The Jews of Memphis,” 57, 61, 63, 64.

116. Ibid., 46, 48.

117. Iphigene Ochs Sulzberger, From Iphigene: The Memoirs of Iphigene Ochs Sulzberger, edited by Susan W. Dryfoos (privately printed, 1979); on Julius and Bertha Ochs see, generally, Twentieth Century Biographical Dictionary of Notable Americans [s.v. “Adolph Ochs”]; “Southern Jew as Businessman,” AJH 71, no. 3 (March 1982): 347; Confederate Veteran 36, no. 5 (1928): 164; Gay Talese, The Kingdom and the Power (New York: World Publishing Co., 1966); Gerald W. Johnson, An Honorable Titan: A Biographical Study of Adolph S. Ochs (New York: Harper & Brothers, 1944); Susan E. Tifft and Alex S. Jones, The Trust: The Private and Powerful Family Behind the New York Times (Boston: Little, Brown, 1999).

118. Gay Talese, The Kingdom and the Power, 81–82; Susan E. Tifft and Alex S. Jones, “The Family,” New Yorker 75, no. 8 (April 19, 1999): 44–52.

119. Sulzberger, From Iphigene, 4.

120. Talese, The Kingdom and the Power, 83.

121. Sulzberger, From Iphigene, 3.

122. Ibid., 4; Confederate Veteran 36, no. 5 (1928): 164.

123. The 1864 date is given in G. E. Govan and J. W. Livingood, "Adolph S. Ochs: The Boy Publisher," East Tennessee Historical Society's Publications 17 (1945); other sources say the family moved in 1865.

124. John Y. Simon, ed., The Papers of Ulysses S. Grant (Carbondale, Ill.: Southern Illinois University Press, 1967–81), 7:58; Jaher, Scapegoat, 198–9; Korn, American Jewry, 122–25.

125. Korn, American Jewry, 122–25; Lewis, A Biblical People, 37–42; Schappes, Documentary History, 472–75. Schappes, a New Yorker who compiled this one-volume documentary history in the 1940s, omitted Grant's infamous Order Number 11, despite the fact that it was the most blatant anti-Semitic document ever issued by the U.S. government. Northern Jews of the 1950s were clearly embarrassed by this episode in American history. Schappes did, however, include documents relating to the revocation of Order Number 11 by President Lincoln. "Resembling a Czarist ukase more than an American governmental decree, Grant's order," Jaher wrote, "was the severest attempted official violation—civil or military, federal, state or local—of the rights of Jews in the history of this nation" (Scapegoat, 199).

126. Grant's order was not an isolated event, as his many apologists have argued. Earlier in November, he had issued two orders forbidding travel to all persons, "the Israelites especially," because they were "such an intolerable nuisance." Korn, American Jewry, 126; William S. McFeely, Grant: A Biography (New York: W. W. Norton & Co., 1981), 123–24; Schappes, Documentary History, 472. One of Grant's orders instructed all railroad conductors "that no Jews are to be permitted to travel on the railroad." See Selma S. Lewis, A Biblical People, 38–43; Jaher, Scapegoat, 198–99; Joakim Isaacs, "Ulysses S. Grant and the Jews," in Johanthan D. Sarna, The American Jewish Experience (New York: Holmes and Meier, 1986), 62–71; Brooks D. Simpson, Ulysses S. Grant: Triumph Over Adversity, 1822–1865 (Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 2000), 163–65 ("Some of his statements were clearly anti-Semitic").

Gen. William T. Sherman was, unlike Grant (who was simply reflecting the ignorance about Jews prevalent at the time), a genuine anti-Semite. "The country will swarm with dishonest Jews who will smuggle powder, pistols, percussion-caps, &c., in spite of all the guards and precautions we can give," he wrote in August 1862 (Korn, American Jewry, 148–49). See Sherman to Ellen Ewing Sherman, September 18, 1858, in Home Letters of General Sherman, edited by M. A. DeWolfe Howe (New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1909), 155, 229–30, to Salmon Chase, August 11, 1862, in Memoirs of General William T. Sherman (New York: Appleton, 1875), 1:267, and to the adjutant general of the army, August 11, 1862, OR III, vol. 2, 350. One of Sherman's biographers, Michael Fellman, agrees that Sherman was a genuine anti-Semite. See his Citizen Sherman: A Life of William Tecumseh Sherman (New York: Random House, 1995), 153–54. The notorious Benjamin F. "Beast" Butler was also known to be an anti-Semite (see Jaher, Scapegoat, 192, 198, 200). Korn treats General Order No. 11 at length in chap. 6, "Exodus 1862," (American Jewry, 121–55). He does not believe that Grant was an anti-Semite and that he was instead the victim of unconscious prejudices. To his credit, Grant as president was a good friend to the Jews and had many Jewish supporters. Jewish Tennesseans, however, were not among them. Sacher provides a good summary of the episode in A History of the Jews in America, 78–80.

127. Coulter, Confederate States, 85.

128. CSR, Lewis Leon.

129. Louis Schmier, "An Act Unbecoming: Anti-Semitic Uprising in Thomas County, Georgia," Civil War Times Illustrated 23 (October 1984), 21–25; Louis Schmier, "Notes and Documents on the 1862 Expulsion of Jews from Thomasville, Georgia," AJA 32 (April 1980): 9; Mark I. Greenberg, "Ambivalent Relations: Acceptance and Anti-Semitism in Confederate Thomasviile," AJA 65, no. 1 (Spring/Summer 1993): 13–29. Greenberg and Schmier disagree as to the seriousness of the incident.

130. Schmier, "Notes and Documents," 12–15.

131. Schmier, "An Act Unbecoming," 23.

132. Ibid., 15–16; Schmier, "An Act Unbecoming," 23.

133. Schmier, "An Act Unbecoming," 24.

134. Letter dated September 29, 1862, 4, Phillips-Myers Papers, UNC.

135. Schmier, "Notes and Documents," 15; Greenberg, "Ambivalent Relations," 15–18.

136. Schmier, "Notes and Documents," 17.

137. Ibid., 18.

138. Ibid., 25.

139. Friedman, "History of Temple Beth Israel," 35–39.

140. Jaher, Scapegoat, 200; Bertram Wallace Korn, "American Judeophobia: Confederate Version," in Dinnerstein and Palsson, Jews in the South, 147.

141. Marcus, Memoirs, 2:304.

142. Furguson, Ashes of Glory, 191; Emory M. Thomas, The Confederate State of Richmond: A Biography of the Capitol (Austin: University of Texas Press, 1971), passim.

143. Korn, "American Judeophobia," in Jews in the South, 135; Roland, The Confederacy, 89.

144. Henry S. Foote was a relative of the famed Civil War historian Shelby Foote, whose maternal grandfather was a Viennese Jew, Morris David Rosenstock, who immigrated to the South in the 1880s and worked as a plantation bookkeeper. See Tony Horwitz, Confederates in the Attic: Dispatches from the Unfinished Civil War (New York: Pantheon Books, 1998), 148.

145. Korn, "American Judeophobia," in Jews in the South, 139–44; Roland, The Confederacy, 99.

146. Marcus, Memoirs, 3:309.

147. Korn, in Jews in the South, 148–49.

148. Ibid., 137.

149. Jaher, Scapegoat, 224.

150. Berman, Richmond's Jewry, 185.

151. Jaher, Scapegoat, 224.

152. Putnam, Richmond during the War, 105; see also Coulter, Confederate States, 227.

153. Putnam, Richmond during the War, 105.

154. Earl Schenck Miers edited A Rebel War Clerk's Diary in 1958 and eliminated "Jones' constant harping on Jews," which, Miers wrote, "reaches a point of offensiveness," xxi. For the unedited, unexpurgated version, see John Beauchamp Jones, A Rebel War Clerk's Diary at the Confederate States Capital (New York, 1935; reprint, Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1993).

155. Jaher, Scapegoat, 197–98; Korn, American Jewry, 179, 184.

156. Coulter, Confederate States, 227.

157. Korn, American Jewry, 185; Korn, in Jews in the South, 153.

158. Korn, in Jews in the South, 144.

159. Berman, Richmond's Jewry, 188.

160. Ibid., 189; Korn, in Jews in the South, 150.

161. Korn, in Jews in the South, 150.

162. Ibid., 85.

163. Furguson, Ashes of Glory, 182–83.

164. Marszalek, Diary of Miss Emma Holmes, 209.

165. Korn, in Jews in the South, 142; Coulter, Confederate States, 223–29.

166. Coulter, Confederate States, 227.

167. Marszalek, Diary of Miss Emma Holmes, entry for August, 22, 1862.

168. Wax, "The Jews of Memphis," 73.

169. Korn, American Jewry, 186–87.

170. Korn, in Jews in the South, 143.

171. Korn, American Jewry, 185–86; 295n. 173; Korn, in Jews in the South, 152. In the Book of Joshua, seven priests bore seven rams' horns before the Ark of the Covenant and, when all the people shouted in unison, the wall of Jericho fell (Josh. 6:1–21).

172. Korn, American Jewry, xx; Young, Where They Lie, 185.

173. Butler to Edwin M. Stanton, October 1862, in James Parton, General Butler in New Orleans (Mason Bros., 1864); Jaher, Scapegoat, 198.

174. Parton, General Butler in New Orleans, 391–92; Jaher, Scapegoat, 192.

175. Korn, American Jewry, 163–66.

176. Coulter, Confederate States, 228n. 27.

177. Korn, in Jews in the South, 149n. 45; Moses, Last Order, 14.

178. Korn, American Jewry, 57–58.

179. Ibid., 57. In the introduction to the 1961 paperbook edition of this book, Korn revisited this conclusion, which had caused “a few eyebrows to be raised fairly high,” and found evidence “which ought to satisfy all but the most rabid anti-Confederate historians.” See also Korn, “Was There a Confederate Jewish Chaplain?” AJHQ 53, no. 1 (September 1963), 63–69, and “Jewish Chaplains during the Civil War,” AJA 1, no. 1 (June 1998): 6–22.

180. Preface to the paperback edition of Korn, American Jewry and the Civil War, xiv.

181. Korn, American Jewry, 92–93.

182. Ibid., 112; Young, Where They Lie, 76.

183. Korn, American Jewry, 45–46, 112–13.

184. Ibid., 112–13. One enigmatic Northern Jew, Isachar Zacharie, President Lincoln’s chiropodist (he removed the president’s corns and bunions), took on special missions in the South. The press had a field day with Zacharie’s treatment of the president, the secretary of war, and prominent Union generals. How could the president “put his foot down firmly when he was troubled with corns?” they asked. Jackson’s “bare-footed rebels, who do not know the need or value of a chiropodist,” got the better of Zacharie’s patients, but “Dr. Zacharie has shown us precisely where the shoe pinches” (Korn, American Jewry, 194–96). Lincoln sent his chiropodist friend, whose family was in Savannah, on a number of secret missions, including a meeting with Judah Benjamin and other Confederate cabinet members to discuss possible cessation of hostilities in 1863 (197–200). Zacharie wrote Gen. Nathaniel Banks that “Benjamin said he was under many obligations to you for your kindness towards his sister.” Lincoln may have believed that Zacharie, being Jewish and having a Southern connection, could somehow reach an agreement with the Jewish Confederate secretary of state (198). Lincoln also sent Zacharie to occupied New Orleans to learn the state of affairs directly from a man he trusted, as he had done in 1861, when he sent friends to Charleston to learn the state of affairs there.

Zacharie took a special interest in the Jews of New Orleans. Some were Northerners trapped by the war. Most were Southerners who resented the occupying army. Zacharie apparently helped them cope with the Federal authorities. On another occasion, Zacharie came to the aid of Goodman L. Mordecai, who was arrested and imprisoned as a Confederate commercial agent. Goodman was the son of Benjamin Mordecai of Charleston, who had given $10,000 to the state of South Carolina when it first seceded. Zacharie went to Washington personally to ask the president to release young Mordecai, who was engaged to be married to the niece of a prominent New Yorker, Samuel A. Lewis. Upon his release, young Mordecai insisted on thanking President Lincoln personally. The president shook his hand and, in his humorous way, said, "I am happy to know that I am able to serve an enemy!" (Korn, American Jewry, 199).

185. Robinson, Justice in Grey, 418.

186. Philip Rosenheim to Amelia and Isaac Meinnart, July 8, 1863, AJA.

187. Emilie V. Jacobs, "Biography of George Jacobs," George Jacobs Papers, AJA.

188. AJA 10, no. 2 (October 1950): 150, 133–34.

CHAPTER 6

1. DeLeon, Belles, Beaux, and Brains, 178, 230; Phillips-Myers Papers, UNC.

2. K. K. Beth Elohim, Centennial Booklet (Charleston, 1924), 42–43.

3. Elzas, Jews of South Carolina, 194; K. K. Beth Elohim, Centennial Booklet, 42–43.

4. Biographical sketch by Solomon Breibart and Carolyn Rivers in possession of author; Hagy, This Happy Land, 245; Allison Demoff, “Phoebe Pember” (thesis, College of William and Mary, 1993).

5. DeLeon, Belles, Beaux, and Brains, 178; Woodward, Mary Chesnut, 707; Rubin, Third to None, 92.

6. David T. Morgan, “Eugenia Levy Phillips: The Civil War Experiences of a Southern Jewish Woman,” in Dinnerstein and Palsson, Jews of the South; Proctor and Schmier, Selected Essays, 95–106; David T. Morgan, “Philip Phillips: Jurist and Statesman” in Dinnerstein and Palsson, Jews in the South, chap. 8, p. 107–20; Marcus, Memoirs, 3:133–60; Hagy, This Happy Land, 104.

7. Marcus, Memoirs, 3:161.

8. Ibid., 145.

9. Phillips Diary, Phillips-Myers Papers, UNC, 28–33; William W. Freehling, The Road to Disunion: Secessionist at Bay, 1776–1854 (New York: Oxford University Press, 1990), 553–56; Morgan, “Philip Phillips,” 117.

10. Woodward and Muhlenfeld, The Private Mary Chesnut, 186.

11. Caroline Myers, “Events Which Befell Us in 1861,” Phillips-Myers Papers, UNC.

12. Woodward and Muhlenfeld, The Private Mary Chesnut, 24.

13. Ibid., 24, 183.

14. Marcus, Memoirs, 3:134; Korn, The Jews of Mobile, 46–47. Korn points out that Phillips, unlike Benjamin and August Belmont, “the other two notable Jewish figures of the day,” identified with the Jewish people and religion. Temime Derech was a Polish immigrant synagogue, yet Phillips, an acculturated Reform Jew, had no qualms about identifying himself with the congregation. See Korn, The Jews of Mobile, 46–47n. 30.

15. Ashkenazi, Diary of Clara Solomon, 290, 310.

16. Clay, A Belle of the Fifties, 104–5.

17. UDC [United Daughters of the Confederacy] Magazine, October 1993, 8.

18. Spies, Scouts, and Raiders: Irregular Operations (Alexandria, Va.: Time-Life Books, 1985), 23; Ishbel Ross, Rebel Rose: Life of Rose O'Neal Greehow, Confederate Spy (New York: Harper, 1954), chs. 10 and 11.

19. Pember, A Southern Woman's Story, 25–26.

20. Phillips Diary, 38. Mrs. Phillips states in her memoirs that her husband "had no sympathy with the Confederacy." "Mrs. Phillips: A Southern Woman's Story of Her Imprisonment in 1861 and 1862," Library of Congress, Manuscript Division, 4.

21. Ross, Rebel Rose, chaps. 10 and 11.

22. Ibid.

23. Ibid., 169, 173.

24. August–September 1861, Journal of Eugenia Phillips, Philip Phillips Papers, Library of Congress.

25. Woodward and Muhlenfeld, The Private Mary Chesnut, 172.

26. Ibid., 172, 176.

27. Phillips Diary, 44; Caroline Myers, "Events Which Befell Us," Phillips-Myers Papers, UNC.

28. Phillips Diary, 49; Morgan, "Eugenia Levy Phillips," 99; Marcus, Memoirs, 3:176–77.

29. Myers, "Events"; Morgan, "Eugenia Levy Phillips," 99.

30. Myers, "Events."

31. Marcus, Memoirs, 3:178, 179.

32. Ibid., 3:184; Civil War Dictionary, 109, 945.

33. Myers, “Events,” 4.

34. Marcus, Memoirs, 3:187.

35. Phillips Diary, 50.

36. Marcus, Memoirs, 3:187.

37. DeLeon, Belles, Beaux, and Brains, 177.

38. UDC, October, 1993, 9.

39. Phillips Diary, 50.

40. Myers, “Events,” 4.

41. Phillips Diary, 51.

42. Morgan, “Eugenia Levy Phillips,” 102–5; Marcus, Memoirs, 3:189; Myers, “Events,” 4.

43. Marcus, Memoirs, 3:192–93; Morgan, “Eugenia Levy Phillips,” 104; Phillips-Myers Papers, UNC, letters dated July 10, 1862 and September 1, 1862.

44. Woodward, Mary Chesnut, 411.

45. Morgan, “Eugenia Levy Phillips,” 104; Ashkenazi, Diary of Clara Solomon, 430.

46. Phillips-Myers Papers, UNC, letter dated July 24, 1882; Philhps Diary, 52. For more on Phillips and his memoir, see p. 369.

47. William Garrett, Reminiscences of Public Man in Alabama for Thirty Years (reprint, Spartanburg, S.C.: n.p., 1972), 407.

48. Myers, “Events,” 4; Morgan, “Eugenia Levy Phillips,” 104–5.

49. Marcus, Memoirs, 3:194.

50. Ibid., 195.

51. Clavius Phillips to Eugenia Phillips, November 11, 1862, Phillips-Myers Papers, UNC.

52. DeLeon, Belles, Beaux, and Brains, 179; Phillips Diary, 51.

53. Marcus, Memoirs, 3:154.

54. Letter of Yates Levy to J. C. Levy, September 1862, Phillips-Myers Papers, UNC.

55. CSR, Clavius Phillips (Chatham Artillery, Weaton’s Co.; 2d Confederate Engineers, Co. E; 1st [Olmstead’s] Infantry).

56. Pember, A Southern Woman’s Story, 159; Coulter, Confederate States, 299; DeLeon, Belles, Beaux, and Brains, 179.

57. Phillips-Myers Papers, UNC, letter dated July 17, 1862.

58. Letter from Jacob C. Levy, July 1862, Phillips-Meyers Papers, UNC.

59. Marcus, Memoirs, 3:155.

60. Ibid., 155–56.

61. Ibid., 156.

62. Ibid., 158; Phillips Diary, 56–58.

63. Phillips Diary, 60.

64. Pember, A Southern Woman’s Story, 4.

65. Ibid., 149, 157–58.

66. Woodward, Mary Chesnut, 537n. 16; Pember, A Southern Woman’s Story, 4, 25.

67. Pember, A Southern Woman’s Story, 4–6, 26 (emphasis in original).

68. Phoebe Pember to Eugenia Phillips, September 13, 1863, Philip Phillips Collection, Manuscript Division, Library of Congress, Washington, D.C.; Phoebe Pember to Louisa Gilmer, October 20, 1863, Pember Papers, UNC.

69. Pember, A Southern Woman’s Story, 4–5, 23–24, 28; Robertson, Tenting Tonight, 95–97.

70. Pember, A Southern Woman's Story, 28–29.

71. Ibid., 6–7, 36–40.

72. DeLeon, Belles, Beaux, and Brains, 385.

73. Pember, A Southern Woman's Story, 42–44, 156.

74. Ibid., 66–68.

75. Ibid., 157–58.

76. Ibid., 56.

77. Ibid., 168.

78. Alison Demoff, "Phoebe Pember," 110.

79. Pember, A Southern Woman's Story, 137.

80. Ibid., 151–52.

81. Ibid., 151.

82. Ibid., 161–62.

83. Woodward, Mary Chesnut, 537.

84. Pember, A Southern Woman's Story, 164–67.

85. Ibid., 164–66.

86. Pember, A Southern Woman's Story, 82–83.

87. Ibid., 82–83.

88. Ibid., 185–92.

89. Ibid., 127–8, 136–41.

90. Ibid., 142–43.

91. Ibid., 143–44.

CHAPTER 7

1. Isaac Scherck to J. L. Meyer, Esq., September 9, 1864, Scherck Papers, AJA. A biographical sketch of Scherck appears in History of the Jews of Louisiana, 33.

2. Mayer Family Memoir, Atlanta Jewish Federation Archives.

3. Spencer B. King, “Fanny Cohen’s Journal of Sherman’s Occupation of Savannah,” Georgia Historical Quarterly 41 (December 1957): 414.

4. King, “Fanny Cohen’s Journal,” 410. According to Georgina L. Phillips, Mrs. Octavus Cohen’s granddaughter, General Sherman’s adjutant ordered the Cohen family out of their home within twenty-four hours so that it could be used by General Sherman as his headquarters. While Mr. Cohen was remonstrating with the adjutant, General Hazen happened by and recognized Mr. Cohen. He settled the dispute over the use of the Cohen home by using the front drawing room as his office. According to Miss Phillips, General Hazen used the drawing room as his office until he left Savannah. Note dated November 18, 1949, in the Cohen-Phillips Papers, Collection 162, Folder 2, GHS.

5. King, “Fanny Cohen’s Journal,” 412.

6. Rosen, Confederate Charleston, 133–34.

7. Ibid., 142.

8. Mrs. Lee Cohen Harby, quoted in Voices of the Civil War: Charleston (Alexandria, Va.: Time-Life Books, 1997), 158; Lee Cohen was born in 1849 and married Jacob De La Motta Harby in 1869. Hagy, This Happy Land, 322; front page, New York Herald, March 25, 1865, courtesy of Mel Young.

9. Gergel and Gergel, Tree of Life, 40–44.

10. Eleanor Cohen Diary, AJA, 8–9; see also Marcus, Memoirs, 3:357–64; Gergel and Gergel, Tree of Life, 40; Franklin, Private Pages, 304–23.

11. Cohen Diary, 9; Charles Royster, The Destructive War (New York: Knopf, 1991), ch. 1.

12. Gergel and Gergel, Tree of Life, 40–41.

13. DeLeon, Thirty Years, 1:4–5.

14. Gergel and Gergel, Tree of Life, 41–42.

15. Cohen Diary, 9–10.

16. Gergel and Gergel, Tree of Life, 42n. 42; Korn, American Jewry, 53.

17. Cohen Diary, 10.

18. Gergel and Gergel, Tree of Life, 43.

19. Ibid., 42–43.

20. Ashley Halsey Jr., “The Last Duel in the Confederacy,” Civil War Times Illustrated 1, no. 7 (November 1962): 6–8, 31; Confederate Veteran 9 (1901): 500–501 (Hart’s Battery); Randolph W. Kirkland, Jr., Broken Fortunes: South Carolina Soldiers, Sailors, and Citizens Who Died in the Service of Their Country and State in the War for Southern Independence, 1861–1865 (Charleston: South Carolina Historical Society, 1995), 69; Baker, Cadets in Gray, 192; Roster of Confederate Soldiers; Wolf, American Jew, 374.

21. Tidwell, Come Retribution, 24, 65, 89, 213, 337–41; Tidwell, April ’65, 12–13, 28, 162–64; Chamlee, Lincoln’s Assassins, 532; Hanchett, Lincoln Murder Conspiracies, 52.

22. A. A. Hoehling and Mary Hoehling, The Day Richmond Died (San Diego: A. S. Barnes & Co., 1981), 105–15.

23. Axelrod, The War Between the Spies, passim; Evans, Judah Benjamin, 294.

24. Marcus, Memoirs, 3:327; Furguson, Ashes of Glory, 326–33.

25. Furguson, Ashes of Glory, 325.

26. Meade, Judah P. Benjamin, 312; Hanna, Flight into Oblivion, 31.

27. Furguson, Ashes of Glory, 332.

28. Whitelock MS, 125–27; Furguson, Ashes of Glory, 328–29. Whitelock believed the fires were set by escapees from the penitentiary who did it to mask their crimes. “I saw this with my own Eyes” (127).

29. Whitelock MS, VHS 127–29.

30. Ibid., 130.

31. Furguson, Ashes of Glory, 344–46.

32. Whitelock MS, VHS, 131. He correctly describes Lincoln as being guarded by "a few marines or sailors."

33. Virginia Magazine of History and Biography 41 (October 1933): 318–22.

34. Meade, Judah P. Benjamin, 314. Alfred, Lord Tennyson, wrote his famous ode in 1852.

35. Marcus, Memoirs, 3:312–15.

36. Evans, Judah Benjamin, 308; Hanna, Flight into Oblivion, 45.

37. Long, The Civil War Day by Day, 679–80; Foote, The Civil War, 3: chap. 8.

38. Evans, Judah Benjamin, 303, 306, 334; Gruss, "Judah Philip Benjamin," 999, 1002; John M. Taylor, W. H. Seward: Lincoln's Right Hand (New York: HarperCollins, 1991), 261.

39. Hanchett, Lincoln Murder Conspiracies, 72, 107.

40. Evans, Judah Benjamin, 271–72.

41. Evans, Judah Benjamin, 312–15; Meade, Judah P. Benjamin, 318; Neiman, Judah Benjamin, 190.

42. Meade, Judah P. Benjamin, 322.

43. Thompson, "Yulee," 556, 602, 567.

44. Ibid., 580.

45. A. J. Hanna, "The Confederate Baggage and Treasure Train Ends Its Flight in Florida," Florida Historical Quarterly 24, no. 3 (January 1939): 158–80 (an introduction to the diary of Tench Francis Tilghman).

46. Alroy Jonas letter, November 19, 1936, Korn Papers, AJA.

47. See pp. 152–53 and n. 249, ch. 3, p. 416.

48. Mayer enlisted originally in the 5th Mississippi Army of 10,000, later redesignated Parton's 1st Mississippi. When his original enlistment expired, he joined the Natchez Southrons, Company O of the 10th Mississippi. Later, it was redesignated Company B. He served as a clerk in the assistant adjutant general's office of Brig. Gen. James R. Chalmer's brigade, then in the same capacity on the division staff. He was promoted to first lieutenant on April 8, 1865. Because of the various consolidations of regiments, Mayer ended the war in Company D, 9th Mississippi (consolidated). See CSR, Company O, 10th Mississippi, Company A, 1st Mississippi; Military History of Mississippi, 208–18. When he was paroled, he was officially recognized as a first lieutenant in the Consolidated 9th Mississippi. However, a provost marshall pass given him in Montgomery three weeks later shows him as a major and assistant adjutant of Sharp's brigade. In a letter dated May 3, 1865, he addresses himself as "Major" with the quotation marks. Thus, he may have been promoted to major unofficially in the field by General Sharp or assumed the rank temporarily, as befits an assistant adjutant general of a unit composed of the remains of three brigades.

49. Letter dated May 3, 1865, Sharp's Brigade, TU; Order of Provost Marshall, May 25, 1865, Simon Mayer Papers, Box 1, TU.

50. Jacobs, Biography of George Jacobs; Ezekiel and Lichtenstein, History of the Jews of Richmond, 177; Berman, Richmond's Jewry, 196–98.

51. Ezekiel and Lichtenstein, History of the Jews of Richmond, 158.

52. Bultman, "The Story of a Good Life," 2.

53. Moses, Last Order, 224, 249, 264, 265; obituary of Raphael Moses Jr., 1909.

54. Moses, Last Order, 249, 251, 252.

55. Ibid., 253.

56. Ibid., 255.

57. It could not have been the last order because the last significant land battle was fought at Palmito Ranch, Texas, on May 13; Stand Watie surrendered June 23; the Trans-Mississippi surrendered May 26; and the CSS Shenandoah surrendered at Liverpool, England, on November 6. Nevertheless, it was the last order of the Confederate army in the main theater of the war, and arguably the last order of the Confederate government.

58. Thompson, "David Yulee," 166.

59. Ibid., 172.

60. Yulee, “Senator David L. Yulee,” 2:2, 12–15; Thompson, “David Yulee,” 171, and n. 23.

61. Clarke, “Florida Railroad,” 191; Thompson, “David Yulee,” 169–70, 174, 575.

62. Clay, A Belle of the Fifties, 54; Mary Bernard Allen, “Joseph Holt, Judge Advocate General (1862–1875): A Study in the Treatment of Political Prisoners by the United States Government during the Civil War” (Ph.D. diss., University of Chicago, 1927), 48, 66; on Holt, see also Roger J. Bartman, “The Contribution of Joseph Holt to the Political Life of the United States” (Ph.D. diss., Fordham University, 1958); David Donald, Lincoln (New York: Simon and Schuster, 1995), 313, 325, 333, 550; Thompson, “David Yulee,” 173.

63. Thompson, “David Yulee,” 173.

64. OR II, 8, 668–893, especially 862.

65. Yulee, “Senator David L. Yulee,” 14.

66. Ibid., 594.

67. Thompson, “David Yulee,” 175; Hühner, “David L. Yulee,” 28.

68. Berman, Richmond’s Jewry, 196–97.

CHAPTER 8

1. Notes by Judith Hyams Douglas, October 19, 1936, AJA.

2. Moses, Last Order, 243–44, roster of Confederate soldiers.

3. Ibid., xvi, 268–69.

4. Letter from Hyams dated April 19, 1968, to "My Dear Caroline," AJA.

5. "Thomas O. Moore, Governor 1860–1," Louisiana Historical Quarterly 13 (January 1930): 20–22, Hyams letter dated September 10, 1865, to Moore.

6. The literature on Reconstruction is massive and controversial. E. Merton Coulter gives the traditional Southern viewpoint in The South during Reconstruction (Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1947).

The most recent revisionist view which rehabilitates (or tries to rehabilitate, depending on one's point of view) the carpetbaggers and scalawags is represented by Richard Current in Those Terrible Carpetbaggers (New York: Oxford University Press, 1988) and Eric Foner in Reconstruction, 1863–1877: America's Unfinished Revolution (New York: Harper and Row, 1988). Three works on South Carolina illustrate the debate: Francis Butler Simians and Robert Hilliard Woody give a balanced account in South Carolina during Reconstruction (Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1932); Richard Zuczek in State of Rebellion Reconstruction in South Carolina (Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1996) describes Reconstruction as a continuation of the war and emphasizes the white Redeemers' use of fraud, coercion, and terrorism. Edmund L. Drago gives the "postrevisionist" version in Hurrah for Hampton! Black Red Shirts in South Carolina during Reconstruction (Fayetteville: University of Arkansas Press, 1998), which argues that some blacks did indeed support the Redeemer movement. The historiography of Reconstruction reflects the emotions and politics of the times. See Zuczek's excellent introduction to State of Rebellion.

7. Letter from Hyams dated April 19, 1868, to "My Dear Caroline," AJA.

8. New Orleans Daily Picayune and the New Orleans Times, June 26, 1875.

9. See chapter 3, note 90, pp. 408–9.

10. Elzas, Jews of South Carolina, 231, 265; Penelope Franklin, ed., Private Pages: Diaries of American Women, 1830s-1970s (New York: Ballantine Books, 1986), 318–

21 (diary at 304–23); Moise, Moise Family, 7.

11. Marcus, Memoirs, 3:342–34.

12. Ibid., 3:346.

13. Ibid., 3:364.

14. Reznikoff and Engelman, Jews of Charleston, 303–4; Elzas, Jews of South Carolina, 223–37.

15. Reznikoff and Engelman, Jews of Charleston, 305n. 235; 163–67.

16. Ibid.

17. Ibid., 163–64.

18. Ibid., 162–63.

19. Moise, Moise Family, 91; Jacob S. Raisin, Centennial Booklet (Charleston: KKBE, 1925).

20. Marcus, Memoirs, 3:341.

21. Saul Viener, "Rosena Hutzler Levy Recalls the Civil War," AJHQ 62, no. 3 (March 1973): 313.

22. Ibid., 200; Berman, Richmond's Jewry, 198.

23. Viener, "Rosena Hutzler," 202–3.

24. Herbert Ezekiel, "The Jews of Richmond during the Civil War"; Minutes of Beth Ahabah, BA.

25. Berman, Richmond's Jewry, 45; Furguson, Ashes of Glory, chap. 26.

26. Undated clipping, George Jacobs scrapbook, AJA. The circular is reproduced on page 339. See also Korn, American Jewry, 110–12.

27. Berman, Richmond's Jewry, 200, 206, 377n. 76.

28. Frank, "Nashville Jewry," 319.

29. Postal and Koppman, A Jewish Tourist's Guide to the U.S., 587, 594.

30. Libo and Howe, We Lived There Too, 150–51.

31. Janice O. Rothschild, As But a Day: The First Hundred Years, 1867–1967 (Atlanta: Hebrew Benevolent Congregation, The Temple, 1967), 2–3.

32. James Grant, Bernard M. Baruch: The Adventures of a Wall Street Legend (New York: Simon & Schuster, 1983), chap. 1, "A Doctor's Son." (Deborah Marks, whose father, Samuel Marks, arrived in South Carolina about 1800, married Rabbi Hartwig Cohen. Their daughter Sarah Cohen married Prussian immigrant Saling Wolfe. Simon Baruch married their daughter Isabelle.)

33. Even though Simon had courted Belle for years, the marriage was not a foregone conclusion. When Sherman's troops were setting fire to the Wolfe home, Belle, then fifteen, ran to save a portrait she had painted of Simon. A Yankee soldier took it from her and ripped it with his bayonet. When she protested, the soldier slapped her. A Union officer, Capt. John J. Cantine, came to her rescue and beat the soldier with the flat of his sword. A romance ensued between Belle and Cantine. But Simon persisted. Bernard Baruch later wrote in his memoirs that when he was chairman of the War Industries Board during World War I, he was visited by a young man seeking help to get overseas to the fighting front. He carried a letter of introduction from Baruch's mother. "The bearer of this," she wrote, "is a son of Captain Cantine. I know you will do what you can for him." Baruch, My Own Story, 20–21.

34. Baruch, My Own Story, 32, 34.

35. Aunt Sister's Book, 3, 14, 17; Marcus, Memoirs, 1:269 (portions of Aunt Sister's Book are printed in Marcus).

36. Ashkenazi, A Centennial: Lehman Brothers, 11, 13, 20.

37. Korn, "The Jews of the Confederacy," 6; DeLeon, Four Years, 10–11, "Sketch of the Author"; Who Was Who, 312.

38. Rubin, Third to None, 88, 145, 175; Jacob C. Levy letter dated March 24, 1868, in Phillips-Myers Papers, UNC.

39. Clay, A Belle of the Fifties, 277.

40. Ibid. The reference is to Haman, the minister of Ashasuerus, who plotted to kill the Jews in Persia. He was thwarted by Queen Esther, a Jewish woman, who saved her people at the risk of her own life. The holiday of Purim celebrates this event. See "Purim" in glossary. This story illustrates how well-versed Southerners were in the Old Testament. The story is told in the Book of Esther.

41. "Some Memories," Phillips-Myers Papers, UNC, October 1900, p. 2; Rubin, Third to None, 134.

42. Letter of J. C. Levy, March 24, 1868, in Phillips-Myers Papers, UNC.

43. Yulee, "Senator David L. Yulee," 15–17; Thompson, "David Yulee," 219.

44. Julia McFarlane to Korn, March 19, 1962, Korn Papers, AJA; Aberdeen (Miss.) Examiner, October 15, 1936 ("Major Jonas Corner") clipping in Korn Papers (Jonas).

45. Aberdeen (Miss.) Examiner, April 28, 1966, Korn Papers (Jonas), AJA.

46. Poems of Octavia Harby Moses (privately printed).

47. New Orleans Daily Picayune, November 3, 8; December 6, 10, 16, 1865; Jonas Executive Committee memo, December 12, 1903, Stephens Memorial Library, Southwestern Louisiana Institute; "Speech of Honorable Benjamin F. Jonas of Louisiana in the Senate of the United States, May 20, 1879" (Washington, 1879). While Jonas's own election was undisputed, he and a fellow senator were met at the door of the capitol by an "insolent" Federal officer demanding to know his name. The officer let Jonas pass as the court order affirmed his election, but refused admission to his colleague.

48. Ted Tunnell, ed., Carpetbagger from Vermont (Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1989), 131–33.

49. "Speech of Honorable Benjamin F. Jonas …," May 20, 1879, 14–15.

50. Moise, Moise Family, 112–15; CSR, E. W. Moise.

51. DAB; Harry Simonhoff, Saga of American Jewry, 1865–1914 (New York: Arco, 1959), 21–27; R. H. Woody, "Franklin J. Moses, Jr.: Scalawag Governor of South Carolina, 1872–74," North Carolina Historical Review (April 1933): 111; Elzas, Jews of South Carolina, 197–99; Moise, Moise Family, 116–25; interview with Robert Moses of Sumter, South Carolina. Even Richard Zuczek in his revisionist work State of Rebellion: Reconstruction in South Carolina concedes Moses was corrupt (136). See also Francis Butler Simkins and Robert Hilliard Woody, South Carolina during Reconstruction. Much to the horror of South Carolina Jewry, Franklin J. Moses continues to be identified with the Jewish people. Richard N. Current in Those Terrible

Carpetbaggers: A Reinterpretation identifies Moses as a "descendent of a prominent South Carolina Jewish family" (145). Walter Edgar gives a balanced account in South Carolina: A History (Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1998), but still refers to Moses as "the infamous scalawag" (402). Moise's warning that he would kill Moses is confirmed by the Moses family in Sumter. R. H. Woody in his article on Moses confirms that Charles H. Moise threatened in a public speech to march to the courthouse with "a band of determined men" with "muskets on our shoulders" (129).

52. Simkins and Woody, South Carolina during Reconstruction, 142–43; obituary, News and Courier, March 7, 1877.

53. Obituary, News and Courier, March 7, 1877; see also Simonhoff, Saga, 21–28. Moses was the first Jew to serve as chief justice of the supreme court of any American state. But, in the eyes "of white Carolinians, Franklin J. Moses, Sr., became a scalawag, guilty of treachery to his state and to the white race" (24); Elzas (Jews of South Carolina, 197–99) was adamant that "the notorious Governor" was not "brought up as a Jew, nor were his affiliations Jewish in any way" (199).

54. Manley Wade Wellman, Giant in Gray: A Biography of Wade Hampton of South Carolina (reprint, Dayton, Ohio: Morningside Bookshop, 1980), 262.

55. Moise, Moise Family, 123–25.

56. Moses, Last Order, 280, 287.

57. Quoted in Simonhoff, Saga, 7.

58. The ladies he had appointed were, of course, all grateful to him, except one—Phoebe Yates Pember. Moses had her appointed at the request of her brother-in-law, Octavus Cohen of Savannah, who was Eliza Moses's cousin. "When I had her appointed," Moses recalled, "she wrote me a letter profuse with grateful acknowledgments in giving her a competence when she said she was earning her bread by her needle." Afterward, Mrs. Pember was dissatisfied with her $2,000 annual salary, which, according to Moses, "didn't satisfy her extravagance." She attempted to sell her interest to an investor and make a substantial profit, but Moses scotched her plan. "I have heard of several of her tongue lashings," Moses later wrote, "but I have always regarded her enmity as lightly as I did her friendship." Moses, Last Order, 269–80.

59. Ibid., 280–82; Derrell C. Roberts, Joseph E. Brown and the Politics of Reconstruction (Tuscaloosa: University of Alabama Press, 1973), chap. 7.

60. Moses, Last Order, 297.

61. Ibid., 302–4.

62. Ibid., 263.

63. Ibid., 311, 321.

64. Evans, Judah Benjamin, 321.

65. Gruss, “Judah Philip Benjamin,” 969–70, 1049.

66. Evans, Judah Benjamin, chap. 18.

67. Meade, Judah P. Benjamin, 340–41; Davis, Jefferson Davis, 656–57.

68. Evans, Judah Benjamin, 369.

69. Meade, Judah P. Benjamin, 377.

70. Neiman, Judah Benjamin, 209; Evans, Judah Benjamin, 381.

71. Meade, Judah P. Benjamin, 362. Benjamin’s only child, his daughter, never had children.

72. Gruss, “Judah Philip Benjamin,” 1068.

EPILOGUE

1. Visit to Père Lachaise Cemetery; copy of card in possession of author; Evans, Judah Benjamin, 402–3. Evans writes, "It is as if he tried to escape notice even in Paris." The United Daughters of the Confederacy (UDC), founded in 1895, is sometimes referred to as the Daughters of the Confederacy. See Encyclopedia of the Confederacy, 3:1027–28 ("Memorial Organizations").

2. Clipping, April 16, 1906, in "In Memoriam" book of clippings, Kruttschnitt Papers, HNOC.

3. Judah Benjamin Papers, Memorabilia, AJHS. "The Life of Judah Philip Benjamin," a pamphlet published by the Louisiana State Museum (March 27, 1937), is in the possession of the author. The granite marker in Charlotte is still there. It marks the site of Abram Weil's home on the main street of downtown Charlotte, where Benjamin stayed.

4. Bertram W. Korn, "Judah Benjamin as a Jew," PAJHS 38, pt. 1 (September 1948): 170. Korn believed Benjamin to be "one of the most distinguished Jews in all American history" (169); Rabbi Calisch's remarks in Southern Historical Society Papers 40 (September 1915): 240.

5. "Address of Honorable B. F. Jonas at the Laying of the Corner Stone of the Monument to the Memory of the Confederate Dead at Baton Rouge, February 22, 1886" (New Orleans, 1886), Favrat Collection, TU.

6. History of the Jews of Louisiana (1903); obituary at Touro Infirmary Archive, New Orleans.

7. Census data in possession of Cathy Kahn, New Orleans.

8. Hyman, Oleander Odyssey, 13–48.

9. Obituary, Pittsburgh Evening Leader, November 16, 1897, in Levy File, BA; Report of Robert E. Lee Camp, No. 1, November 19, 1897, Leopold Levy File, BA.

10. Lee-Jackson Memorial Service Program, January 19, 1988, Leopold Levy File, BA.

11. Moses, Last Order, 324–32; Simonhoff, Saga, 6. Raphael Jr. and his wife, Georgina, moved to New York in 1871. The former Confederate naval officer from Georgia became a successful New York lawyer. He died in 1909 (Columbus Enquirer-

Sun, December 14, 1909, p. 8, Confederate Naval Museum). “Major” Israel Nunez and his wife, Anna Moses, moved to Austin, Texas. Stanford, Raphael’s grandson, graduated from Annapolis and was a career naval officer. He retired as a captain in 1927. Belle Moses, Mrs. Lionel C. Levy, continued to reside at The Esquiline into the twentieth century. She resided there when Raphael Jr.’s body was returned from New York so he could be buried on his father’s and mother’s plantation in Columbus, Georgia.

12. Obituary, Proskauer Papers, AJA; Sacher, A History of the Jews in America, 459, 468, 471, 564–65.

13. Nevins, Herbert H. Lehman, 11, 13, 20.

14. Letters to Leovy from Jefferson Davis and William Preston Johnston, Leovy Papers, HNOC.

15. Obituary, New Orleans Daily Picayune, October 4, 1902; 10, col. 2.

16. Moise, Moise Family, 126.

17. Shreveport (La.) Times, February 13, 1869; interview with Eric Brock, Shreveport, in Shreveport Magazine, February 1977, 29.

18. Obituary, Norfolk Landmark, September 22, 1911.

19. Yulee, “Senator David L. Yulee,” 17; Korn Collection, folder 34/8, AJA.

20. Creeger, “Michelbacher,” 5–6.

21. Southern Historical Society Papers, 10:248–50.

22. Yvonne Strug, pamphlet titled “History of Temple Sinai, New Orleans, 1870–1995”; quoted by Leo Shpall, “Rabbi James Koppel Guttheim [sic],” Louisiana Historical Quarterly 22 (1939), 169–70.

23. The American Hebrew, clipping, July 18, 1884, G. Jacobs Scrapbook, AJA.

24. DeLeon, “Sketch”; Greenberg, “Becoming Southern,” 59–60.

25. Woodward, Mary Chesnut, xv, xii–xiv.

26. Confederate Veteran 18 (1910): 379; Who Was Who, 312.

27. DeLeon, “Sketch”; Elzas, Jews of South Carolina, 273.

28. Sulzberger, Iphigene, 4–5.

29. Simonhoff, Saga, 289–96; Johnson, An Honorable Titan, passim. See chap. 5, note 117, p. 431. The Confederate Veteran recalled Ochs as “modest and genteel” and recalled that “Mr. Ochs’s Southern friends rarely have a wish that is not developed in the New York Times” (13, no. 12 [December 1905]: 578–79).

30. Ashkenazi, Diary of Clara Solomon, 439–44.

31. The monument was later moved to the Jonas family plot at Oddfellows Rest Cemetery in Aberdeen (Aberdeen [Miss.] Examiner, April 28, 1966).

32. Margaret Mitchell, Gone with the Wind (New York: Scribner, 1996; originally published New York: Macmillan, 1936), 485.

33. Aunt Sister’s Book; Stem, Americans of Jewish Descent; Marcus, Memoirs, 1:261.

34. “Speech on the Anniversary Birth, Gen. Lee,” January 19, 1898, Simon Mayer Papers, Box 1, TU.

35. Ezekiel, “The Jews of Richmond during the Civil War.”

36. Marcus, Memoirs, 3:197, 236.

37. J. C. Hemphill, ed., Men of Mark in South Carolina (Washington D.C.: 1907), 206–8.

38. Simonhoff, Saga, 137–42; Arthur Coe, “Sir Moses J. Ezekiel: A True Son of the Confederacy,” Jewish Veteran (Winter 1995): 17; Guy R. Swanson, “Sir Moses Ezekiel: The Contribution of a Sculptor,” Southern Jewish Historical Society Journal 3–4 (Lee quote); Confederate Veteran, May 17, 1917, 235–6.

39. Obituary, Levy Papers, AJA.

40. Libo, “The Moses of Montgomery,” 20–25.

41. Ibid., 25.

42. Obituary in Whitelock MS, VHS.

43. Philip Phillips Diary, Phillips-Myers Papers, UNC; Marcus, Memoirs, 3:153–54.

44. Phillips-Myers Papers, UNC, undated clipping.

45. DeLeon, Belles, Beaux, and Brains, 178; Roster of Confederate Soldiers.

46. Obituaries of Eugenia Phillips and other family members. Phillips-Myers Papers, UNC. Stem, Americans of Jewish Descent.

47. Morgan, "Eugenia Levy Phillips," 105; C. Myers, Phillips-Myers Papers, UNC.

48. Demoff, "Phoebe Pember."

49. Pember, A Southern Woman's Story, 16; Civil War News, September 1995, 71.

50. Simonhoff, Saga, 238–43.

51. Grant, Adventures of a Wall Street Legend, chap. 1, 24; Universal Jewish Encyclopedia; DAB.

52. In 1914 Baruch wrote an article titled "The Heroic Death of Marcus Baum," about the brother of his benefactor Mannes Baum. General Longstreet's book From Manassas to Appomattox had mentioned an orderly named "Bowen" of Kershaw's staff who was killed at the Wilderness in May 1864. Baruch knew that "Bowen" was a mispronunciation of "Baum" (pronounced "Bomb") and recalled young Marcus's dashing into camp on a white horse. "Do you hear that volley, Marcus?" Baruch had told young Baum. "The General is always in the front." "I must go to him at once," Marcus cried, and sped off. Marcus Baum reached Longstreet and was killed at his side. "It is but just," Dr. Baruch wrote for the benefit of the Confederate veterans still living, "to chronicle this historic fact and correct the name … [Marcus Baum] was a German and a Hebrew. Though exempt from military duty as a foreigner, he enlisted early. No braver man, none truer to the cause, no soldier more loyal to his chief ever breathed than Marcus Baum" (Confederate Veteran 22, no. 4 [April 1914]: 170).

53. Grant, Adventures of a Wall Street Legend, ch. 1; Baruch, My Own Story, 35; Confederate Veteran 29 (1921): 433. A resolution of the Bedford Forrest Camp, U.C.V., Arlington, Texas, said Baruch was a great friend of Lee, which he was not; that he was "always at the front," which he was not; and that he was captured because he was at the front, which he was not.

54. Quoted by Eli N. Evans, The Provincials, 43.

55. Belinda F. Gergel, "Assimilated 'New South' Daughter: Irene Goldsmith Kohn and the Widening Sphere of Jewish Women in Early Twentieth Century South Carolina," a paper for presentation at the Conference on Southern Women's History, Charleston, June 1, 1997; copy of Irene Kohn's UDC application courtesy of Belinda F. Gergel and Julian Hennig Jr., Columbia, S.C. The inscription to Hilzeim reads, in full, as follows:

In Memoriam of Our Dear Son Alexander M. Hilzeim

A victim at 18 years to the horrors of war. Wounded at Kennesaw Mountain, Georgia, he fills an unknown grave. We do not mourn his loss as God gave and God hath taken away. Truly the works of God are incomprehensible.

(Elzas, The Old Jewish Cemeteries at Charleston, S.C. [Charleston, 1903], 42).

56. Berman, Richmond's Jewry, 44.

AUTHOR’S NOTE

SPELLING, capitalization, italicization, abbreviation, and punctuation in quotations from primary sources have been modernized for readability.

Introduction

ON A TINY ISLAND at the edge of the West Indies, Alexander Hamilton began an unlikely journey. He overcame the perils of orphanhood and decamped from the tropics as a teenager to become a vital figure in the birth of the United States. From the battlefield and the bank to the courtroom and the cabinet, Hamilton shaped the republic to a degree that few others could boast. The remarkable events of his American years have long intrigued scholars and, more recently, theater audiences. While Hamilton biographers are exhaustive in their study of his adulthood, research into his obscure upbringing remains scarce. Yet his Caribbean past is not merely an exotic footnote to the high drama of his American life. Hamilton, like all people, was a product of his roots, and so his West Indian youth matters—not least because he was probably born and raised a Jew.

For more than two centuries, the scant treatment of Hamilton's boyhood has proceeded from a default assumption that he and his relatives were cradle-to-grave Christians. That assumption warps how historians approach his Caribbean background and leads to a double error. For one, they make a series of claims about Hamilton's origins that comport with the premise of his Christian identity but have little grounding in evidence. Moreover, archival sources that should prompt scholars to question this premise are mistakenly interpreted so as to preserve the presumption that he was Christian. By subjecting untested claims to scrutiny and reckoning anew with the historical record, this book concludes that Hamilton, in all likelihood, grew up as a member of the Jewish people.

To be sure, Hamilton did not maintain any identity as a Jew in America. Still, his early engagement with Judaism is hardly just a trivial curiosity. It provides critical context for understanding why the adult Hamilton, more than any other founding father, was connected to Jews and fond of their faith.[1] Many founders commended Jewry and Judaism in one breath only to condemn them in the next. In contrast, Hamilton's favorable relationships with Jews and reverential sentiments about the Jewish religion stand unblemished by bias.

The Hamiltonian-Jewish alliance, in turn, opens a unique window onto the early American republic writ large. A paradox vexed the nation from its inception. The United States was conceived in the name of equality yet defined by hereditary hierarchy—free over slave, white over Native, propertied over landless, man over woman, Christian over Jew. American Jewry challenged the country to confront this paradox directly. Having spilled blood and spent treasure in service of the Revolution, Jews began advocating for a status that Europe denied them for centuries and the Declaration of Independence championed: equality.

The rightful role of Jewry became a subject of fierce debate among Americans of the era. Many Gentiles had long resented Jewish participation in commerce and now balked at the prospect of full-fledged Jewish involvement in civic life. They responded with consternation as Jews grasped for access to the courthouse, ballot box, and elected office. That the Jewish population was miniscule—about one-tenth of a percent—yet prompted such outsized angst speaks to the depth of contemporary antisemitism. Against these reactionary forces, Alexander Hamilton sought an economic and legal order where his Jewish compatriots would stand equal to their Christian neighbors.

The successes Hamilton achieved to that end illustrate the democratic possibilities of the new nation. Just the same, the obstacles he encountered mark the limitations of an America still rife with inherited inequality. The following chapters are as much about the Jewish world of the early republic as they are about Hamilton—and it is the relationship between the two that shows us afresh how the aftermath of the Revolution was neither an undeviating march toward modern equality nor a pure perpetuation of traditional hierarchy. We instead find a young country uneasily navigating the contested terrain between New World promises and Old World prejudices.

Any claim concerning Hamilton's Jewishness must begin with his mother, Rachel, given the matrilineal nature of Jewish identity. She was unquestionably from a Christian family in the British Caribbean. Rachel wedded a colonist in the Danish West Indies named Johan Levine. Although numerous scholars assume he was not Jewish, considerable evidence suggests otherwise, including the unambiguous declaration from Hamilton's own grandson that Johan was a "rich Danish Jew."[2]

There are compelling reasons to think Rachel converted to Judaism for marriage. When the couple had a son, Peter, they abstained from the standard Christian practice of infant baptism. Peter Levine would later be baptized as an adult under circumstances that indicate he was converting to Christianity and thus not a Christian in childhood. Hamilton scholars do not entertain the possibility that Peter had been Jewish and so remain baffled by his adult baptism.

Rachel fled her marriage and bore Alexander out of wedlock to a Christian, yet she chose to enroll Alexander in a Jewish school. His Jewish education is a well-established fact. Some biographers presume that Alexander attended a Jewish school because his illegitimacy must have precluded him from church schooling. Yet the church records do not support the supposition that out-of-wedlock birth posed an obstacle to church membership. And a host of communal, theological, and political factors give us ample cause to believe that the Jewish school would have accepted Alexander only if the local Jewish community considered him one of its own.

His matriculation at the Jewish school also stands as the best evidence that Rachel had earlier converted to Judaism. Because Jewish identity passes through the mother, any recognition by the Jewish school of Alexander as a coreligionist means that it necessarily would have regarded Rachel in the same light. If we assume that she had no prior identity as a Jew, it is hard to make sense of why Rachel would, or how she even could, choose to arrange a Jewish education for her son. Allow for the possibility of her Jewish identity, however, and such difficulties disappear. Two other long-known details about Rachel, which Hamilton biographers mention but treat with no particular significance, harmonize with the notion that she was Jewish. Rachel kept the surname "Levine" long after she severed ties to Johan—until her death, in fact. And upon her passing she was not buried in a church cemetery.

Hamilton was only thirteen when his mother succumbed to a fatal illness, and he stayed in the Caribbean until the age of eighteen. A recently unearthed legal case from those intervening years makes plain that he presented himself as Christian at seventeen—but it also suggests that his affiliation with Christianity had not been lifelong. When assessed for his competency to swear on the Bible as a witness, Hamilton described himself as Anglican. Yet the court prevented him from giving sworn testimony after Hamilton conceded that he had never before received communion. His failure to have participated in the sacrament of communion would be an oddity if he were raised Anglican but is far more explicable if he were a latecomer to the Christian faith.

Tellingly, Hamilton in his American years was both willing and able to conceal parts of his West Indian background. Newly uncovered records reveal that he fabricated his year of birth after leaving the islands. Hamilton maintained this myth for the duration of his adulthood without any Caribbean contemporary ever exposing him, rendering it all the more plausible that he could obscure a Jewish heritage with similar success.

The theory that Alexander Hamilton probably had a Jewish past may seem, on its face, provocative. But were the foregoing facts presented about the early life and family history of any ordinary Caribbean colonist rather than an American founder, it would be uncontentious to claim that the balance of evidence points to his status as a Jew. And if indeed the evidence of Hamilton's Jewish identity is not controversial, but the idea of it remains so, then perhaps the question of Jewish belonging in the United States is as fraught in our time as it was in his own.

This inquiry requires important caveats. Jewish identity has many dimensions—religious, cultural, legal, communal, and ethnic, among others. Often these dimensions overlap for a given individual; sometimes they conflict. The eighteenth-century Atlantic world featured a diverse array of people who were Jewish in some senses and not others, from crypto-Jews to Afro-Caribbean Jews to Gentiles who converted for marriage. An investigation into whether Hamilton was Jewish cannot, therefore, force him into either of two categories: Jew or non-Jew. It must instead center on the likelihood that he had a Jewish identity in any number of the term's multiple meanings for any period of his life.

Furthermore, the process of recreating the personal history of an inconspicuous adult from the West Indies of that time period is an admittedly thorny enterprise, much more so a child. Hurricanes and fires have degraded the historical record. Many of the documents that do survive have been partially eaten by termites. We are left with remnants of individual lives, scraps of evidence that must be read within the context of what is known about the region and era. A great deal of what might be said about most aspects of Hamilton's upbringing and kin are matters of probabilities rather than certainties. The case for his Jewish identity is no different.

If Hamilton were likely Jewish, then the question arises of how such a significant feature about a historical icon escaped notice for so long. It is, in fact, unsurprising that a principal part of his boyhood could have evaded his numerous biographers. After all, the adult Hamilton refrained from discussion of his youth with few exceptions. He was notoriously outspoken—often to a fault—about every vital matter in his American life, making his self-censorship around his Caribbean origins especially striking. Undoubtedly, Hamilton's illegitimate birth was a topic he preferred to avoid.[3] And the United States suffered from antisemitic biases; for a statesman whose acceptance into the highest echelons of national politics required at least a nominal pretense to a Christian identity, keeping quiet about any Jewish roots would have been highly prudent.

Hamilton scholars have largely followed the lead of their subject in glossing over his beginnings. Their interests lie in the spectacle of his American years. Excavating the details of Hamilton's West Indian past is not only a peripheral but relatively recent undertaking. Even a fact as basic as his mother's name remained unknown to historians until the twentieth century.[4] It should come as little wonder, then, that his religious upbringing is an underdeveloped field of study.

What's more, materials pertaining to Hamilton's origins are much less accessible, both linguistically and geographically, than those concerning his adulthood. The latter sources are overwhelmingly in English and either available in published form or conveniently located in archives in the United States. By contrast, documents germane to his Caribbean background appear in a variety of languages—Danish, Portuguese, French, Dutch, and German—and are scattered across West Indian islands as well as the European countries that colonized them. The arduous task of reconstructing Hamilton’s elusive childhood is hardly worth the effort for his typical biographer whose native tongue is English and whose attention focuses on topics like the Federalist Papers or the Treasury Department.

When historians do write about Hamilton’s youth and family of origin, they usually proceed in cursory fashion and recycle untested claims from other scholars. Many of these claims, which take as an article of faith the Christian identities of Hamilton and his relatives, do not withstand scrutiny. And so it is a litany of factors—Hamilton’s secrecy, biographers’ interests, lingual barriers, remote sources, and faulty assumptions—that have all coalesced to inadvertently obscure important facets of his past.

The adult Hamilton never presented himself as Jewish. Nor is there evidence that he covertly practiced Judaism in his maturity. We have, moreover, no indication that upon reaching America he divulged to anyone a prior identity as a Jew. Yet his links to Jewry did not end with his Caribbean boyhood.

Hamilton is best remembered for his financial wizardry, and Jews were pivotal players in his bid to turn the United States into a banking and commercial power. He also served as a distinguished lawyer in New York City, where he represented Jewish citizens in the courts. And at his alma mater, Columbia, Hamilton helped spearhead reforms that were friendly to Jews. He proved instrumental in placing the first Jew on the college board, abolishing mandatory forms of Christian worship for undergraduates, and repealing a religious test that had disqualified Jews and other non-Anglicans from the Columbia presidency.

Keenly aware of the recurrent persecution that Jews suffered, Hamilton viewed their survival since antiquity as beyond remarkable—God’s hand was surely at work. He marveled that the “progress of the Jews … from their earliest history to the present time has been and is entirely out of the ordinary course of human affairs. Is it not then a fair conclusion that the cause also is an extraordinary one—in other words, that it is the effect of some great providential plan?”[5] Perhaps he saw some divine intervention at play in his own improbable rise from Caribbean obscurity to American founder.

Hamilton well understood that the historical train of abuses against Jews continued in the United States. After all, many of his adversaries weaponized antisemitism against his various endeavors throughout his career. During the ratification debates over the U.S. Constitution, Hamilton ranked among its premier defenders while a number of his antagonists denounced the Constitution because it would open federal office to Jewish candidates. The sweeping economic programs that he then advanced as treasury secretary were repeatedly maligned as nefarious plots to benefit Jews. And in a high-profile trial, Hamilton’s Jewish witnesses in court were accused of dishonesty owing to an invidious myth that their religion encouraged them to lie under oath. That the forces of anti-Jewish bigotry assailed Hamilton's agenda so frequently is itself noteworthy testament to his alliance with Jewry. Arguably no other self-professed Christian in the early republic confronted more antisemitism.

Despite this fraught environment, Hamilton never wavered in his affection for the people and faith of Judaism. Indeed, the most impassioned denunciation of antisemitism in the annals of any founder came from Hamilton amid the closing arguments of the aforementioned trial. After opposing counsel impugned his Jewish witnesses, Hamilton responded by exalting Jews as the Chosen People: "Has he forgotten, what this race once were, when, under the immediate government of God himself, they were selected as the witnesses of his miracles, and charged with the spirit of prophecy?" Hamilton then alluded to the Roman conquest of the Holy Land and resulting diaspora for Jews throughout the Roman Empire. He recounted how the Jewish people fractured into "remnants of scattered tribes … the degraded, persecuted, reviled subjects of Rome, in all her resistless power, and pride, and pagan pomp." The Jews were rendered "an isolated, tributary, friendless people." Hamilton would not abide his own legal system perpetuating this age-old animosity. By his lights, the Judaism of his witnesses was not a stigma to be borne but a religion to be honored. "Were not the witnesses of that pure and holy, happy and Heaven-approved faith?" he asked rhetorically. Invoking the allegorical figure Lady Justice, Hamilton declared that she protected Jews the same as she did all others: "Be the injured party … Jew, or Gentile, or Christian, or Pagan, Foreign or Native, she clothes him with her mantle, in whose presence all differences of faiths or births, of passions or of prejudices—all are called to acknowledge and revere her supremacy."[6] Here was a giant of the early republic demanding that Jews, the downtrodden of Europe for centuries, stand equal to Gentiles in an American courtroom. Hamilton's contemporaries remarked that no other trial in his illustrious legal career elicited from him a more emotional performance. Plainly, the case touched something deeply personal within him.

Hamilton's affinity for Jewry undermines the conventional depiction of him, advanced first by rivals and then by scholars, as an aspiring aristocrat with a measure of disdain for those on the periphery.[7] True, he was no populist firebrand. But neither does Hamilton deserve condemnation as an elitist. To reflexively dismiss him as a lackey of the moneyed classes is to overlook how the urban marketplace was more meritocratic than other realms of American life. An enterprising Jew—all too often closed off from the world of law, politics, and colleges—could far more readily access the commercial and financial spheres that Hamilton invigorated. And while many Jewish merchants and brokers in Hamilton's orbit did enjoy a degree of economic security, they were hardly invulnerable to antisemitism. His ties to a Jewish community that was subjected to cultural and legal discrimination call into question the antidemocratic caricature that his foes imagined him to be. It is not without irony that other founding fathers, despite sometimes peddling prejudice against Jews, were far less likely than Hamilton to have charges of elitism leveled against them in their day and afterward.

By fighting for an America where Jew and Gentile would partake alike in civic and economic affairs, Hamilton began to make real the principle of equality in whose name the Revolution had been waged. But the antisemitic resistance that he faced underscores the limits of a hierarchical society still marred by religious intolerance. The experience of American Jewry is certainly not the only one by which to measure the feats and failures of the founding era. Nevertheless, the Hamiltonian-Jewish connections offer us an enriched perspective on the early republic, one that suggests the egalitarian rhetoric of the Declaration of Independence was not an empty promise, even if progress was halting.

Hamilton's appreciation for both Judaism and Jews also has implications for understanding church-state relations. Scholars often presume that historical figures who promoted the separation of church and state were the most compassionate toward minority religions and, correspondingly, that those who saw a role for faith in civic life must have had the least sympathy for religious dissenters. Hamilton's approach complicates these assumptions. In word and deed, he exhibited great esteem for the Jewish faith and its followers. Hamilton also argued for a harmony between devotional and civic ends, contending that religion could help nurture the new American republic. Consider, conversely, Thomas Jefferson. He stood as the foremost proponent of the separation of church and state; Jefferson himself coined the phrase. Yet he was blunt in his contempt for Judaism. Jefferson maligned the Hebrew Bible as "defective," the ethics of biblical Judaism as "repulsive," and the Jewish conception of God as "degrading."[8] Hamilton and Jefferson, in opposite ways, illustrate the same point: there was no necessary relationship between respect for Judaism and the principle of separation in their age.

This book does not read the adult Hamilton's veneration of Jewry and Judaism backward as all the more proof of a Jewish identity earlier in his life. Rather, Hamilton's Caribbean roots can help us more fully make sense of his subsequent support for Jews and their faith. It is a fundamental truism that we are all shaped by our childhoods. To be sure, a measure of humility is in order when a historian draws connections between a subject's youth and maturity; no biographer can insist with exacting precision how a given element of a figure's upbringing informed decisions made decades afterward. But so too is it folly to think, for instance, that Hamilton's exposure to the brutalities of bondage in the West Indies had no bearing upon his later attitude toward slavery.[9] We would be equally misguided in assuming that his clerkship in adolescence at an import-export firm—which afforded him a real-time education in credit, currency, and trade—was wholly unrelated to his financial acumen as treasury secretary.[10] And surely it is no mere happenstance that among the founders, Hamilton was the only one to attend a Jewish school as a boy and then cultivated the greatest involvement with Jews as an adult.

That Jewry and Judaism are the central themes of this book is not meant to imply that they were the central pillars of Hamilton's American years. It would be inaccurate to depict him as engaged in a daily toil on behalf of Jews or perpetually preoccupied with the Jewish religion. Hamilton's affiliations and influences were numerous; other important strands in his story have received extensive treatment elsewhere. This volume seeks to add the relevance of Judaism and its people to our understanding of Hamilton.

Among Hamilton's beloved hobbies in New York was the theater, so it is altogether fitting that the Broadway stage has made him the country's favorite founder. His pride of place in American culture at this moment indicates that his story is highly resonant. And yet Hamilton is a profoundly enigmatic character. Here was the treasurer who saved the nation's finances but died in debt, the strikingly decisive leader forever haunted by insecurities, the champion of the rule of law who met his demise in an illicit duel. For all the attention thrust on Hamilton, he eludes us still.

His youth remains the most esoteric of the many mysteries surrounding his life. Hamilton spilled gallons of ink on seemingly every topic but maintained a singular silence about his Caribbean origins. Even with his own children, he was largely mute on the subject. And yet, tantalizingly, he broke from his usual secrecy to share with them a warm memory from boyhood—his time at the Jewish school. If Alexander Hamilton left this clue about his cryptic past, then it is the intent of the pages that follow to explore what larger truths it may suggest.

1

Genesis

AS JEWISH IDENTITY BEGINS with a mother, so must this story. Alexander Hamilton's mother, Rachel Faucette, was born a Christian around 1729 on the island of Nevis in the British Caribbean. Her parents, John and Mary, had a troubled marriage that culminated in a legal separation in 1740. John Faucette died five years later and left the entirety of his estate to Rachel. Determined to begin their lives anew, Mary and Rachel sailed 150 miles northwest to St. Croix, an isle of stunning scenery in the Danish West Indies.[1] An American poet visiting St. Croix in the eighteenth century insisted that "even those that have no taste to admire the beauties of nature would at the view be forced to confess that the valleys of Paradise were now displayed to the eye."[2] St. Croix was part of the Leeward Islands, a string of small isles dotting the eastern Caribbean.

The tropical heat and rich soil of West Indian islands like St. Croix were ideal for producing the era's ultimate cash crop: sugar.[3] European powers often waged bloody battles with one another for control over these lucrative colonies.[4] So profitable was the sugar trade that Britain, for instance, extracted more riches from its collection of Caribbean islands than from the entirety of its territory in North America. During negotiations that ended the Seven Years' War in 1763, the French had to decide between keeping their vast expanse of Canada or the sugar island of Guadeloupe. They chose Guadeloupe.[5] Denmark was among those Old World kingdoms lured by the promise of Caribbean sugarcane. The business-minded Danes preferred to use the purse over the sword, and they peacefully acquired St. Croix from France for 142,000 rigsdalers (Danish rix-dollars) in 1733.[6]

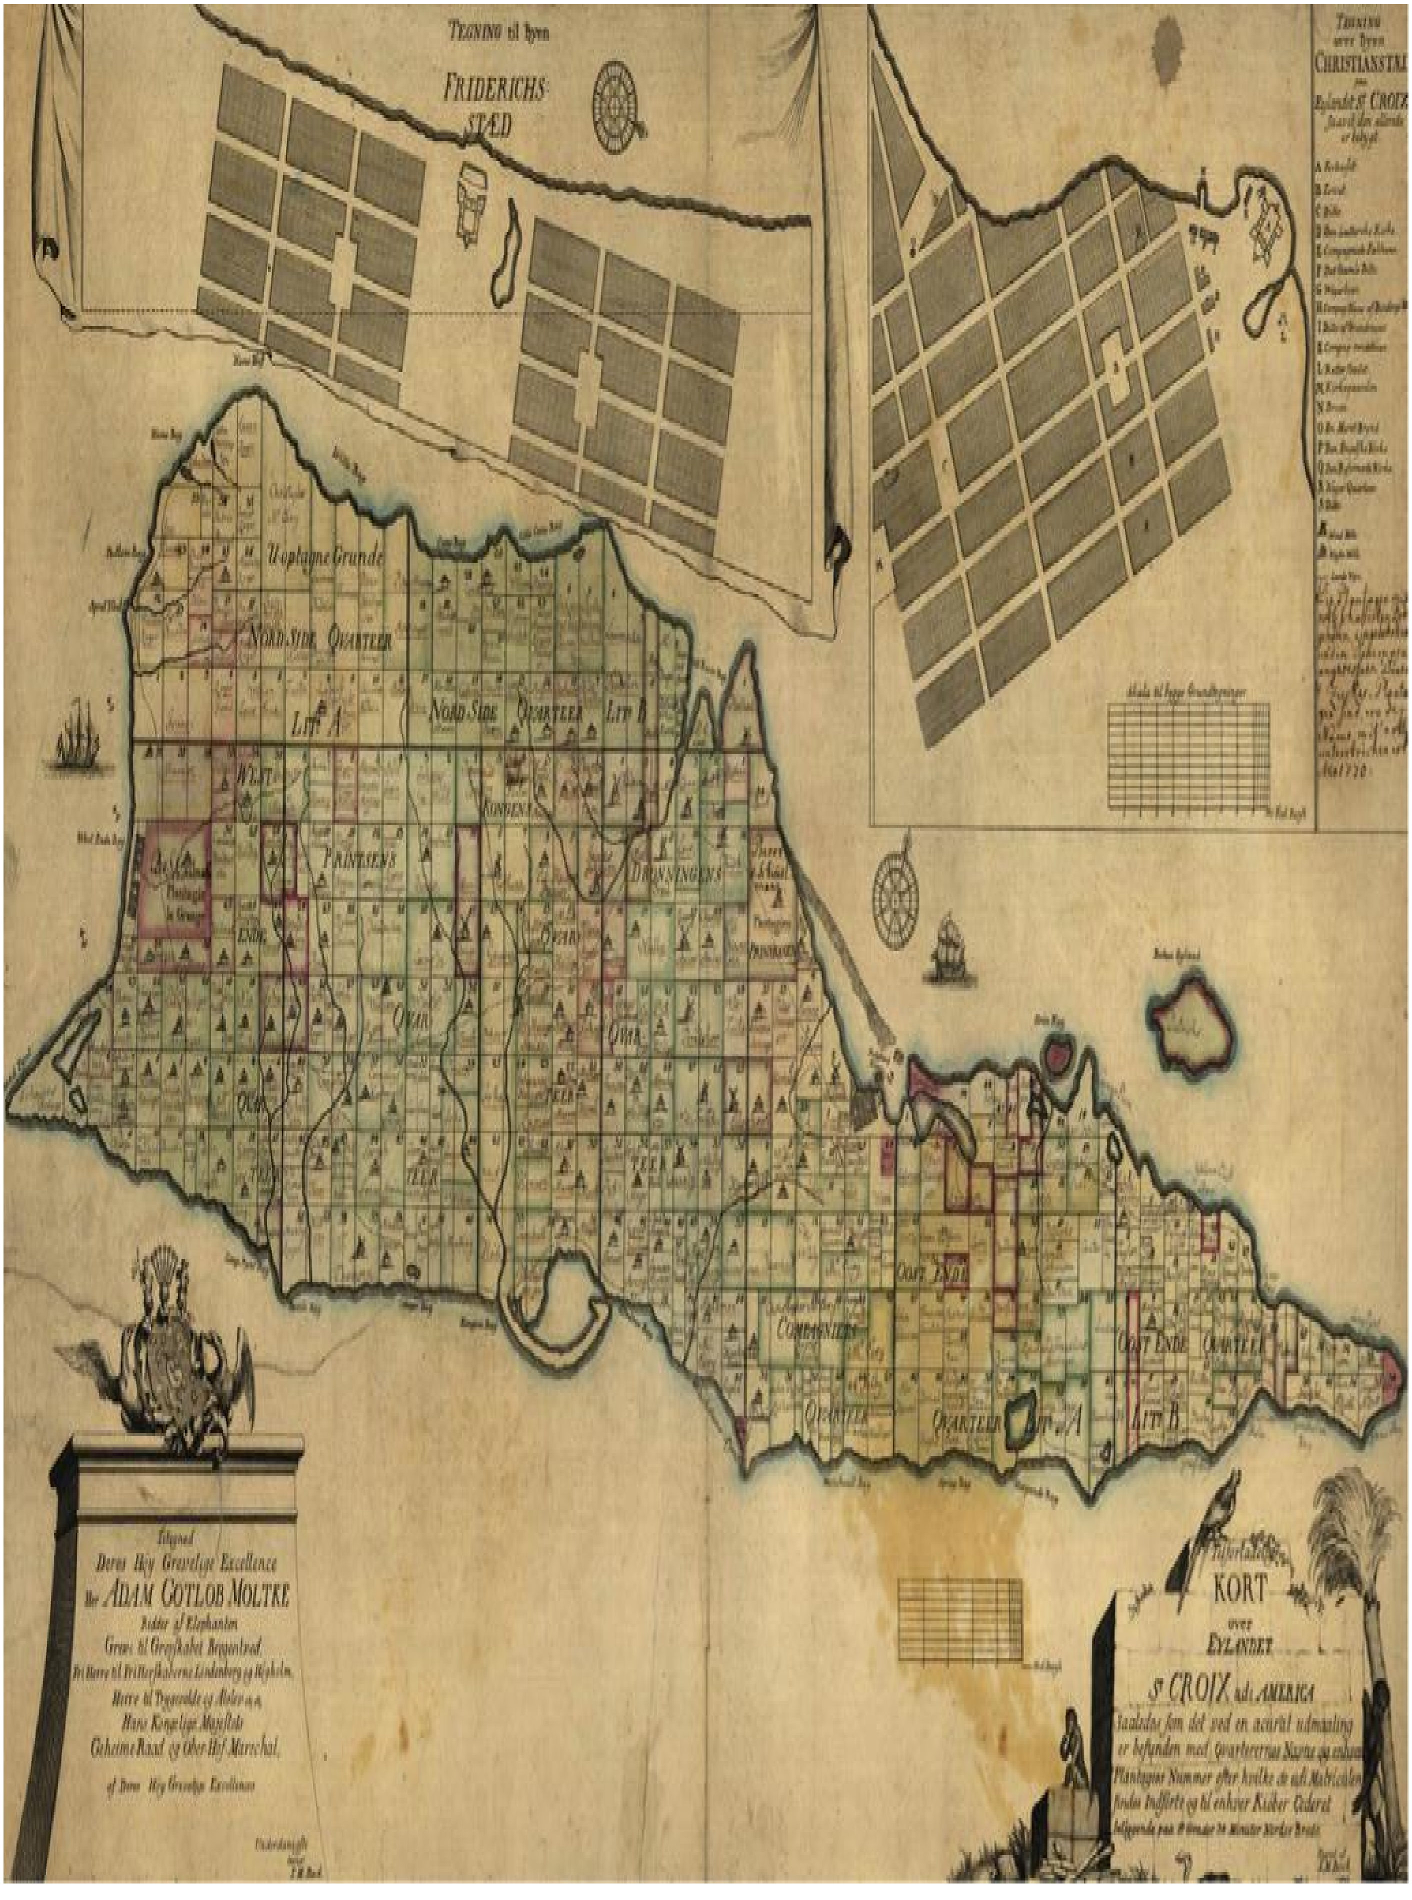
Rachel Faucette and her mother were part of a diverse wave of migrants descending on St. Croix in its early years under Danish rule. Whereas other European nations sought to populate their West Indian islands with their own countrymen, Denmark shrewdly foresaw the benefits of a more inclusive immigration policy. After all, sugar plantations were risky undertakings.[7] The costs of the requisite machinery and slave labor meant significant upfront investment. Droughts, diseases, and hurricanes could summarily wipe out a plantation before a profit was realized.[8] The Danes reasoned that if foreigners wanted to hazard their capital on St. Croix, then Denmark could happily levy its duties on whichever planters managed to win the sugarcane lottery. Relatively few residents of St. Croix were Danish.[9]

Among those who took advantage of St. Croix's open borders were Jews. The Caribbean at large was a magnet for Jewish merchants. Jews had been a stateless people for centuries who lived as outsiders in other lands. Barred by law from many professions, they often assumed the role of cultural intermediaries who served as tradesmen between societies. Jews thus cultivated acumen in commerce and languages not purely by choice but in large part because of their marginality. These very skills proved especially valuable in the early modern era (1500–1800), an age of New World colonization and rising global commerce. Jews became important players in port cities across northern Europe, North and South America, and the West Indies. Not only did Jews boast mercantile expertise and linguistic ability, but they were tapped into transatlantic networks of fellow Jews spread throughout the Atlantic world. Colonial powers willing to accept a Jewish presence stood to profit for their tolerance.[10]

Sephardic Jews of Spanish-Portuguese ancestry composed the bulk of Caribbean Jewry, but some Ashkenazi Jews of German and Polish origin also migrated to the islands.[11] Jewish communities in the West Indies were to be found on British colonies like Barbados, Jamaica, and Nevis; on the Dutch isles of St. Eustatius and Curaçao; and on one of Denmark's other Caribbean territories, St. Thomas.[12] St. Croix never developed the sizable population of Jews that these other islands claimed—in Curaçao, for instance, Jews comprised nearly 40 percent of the free population by 1785[13]—but St. Croix could still tally a handful of Jewish residents.[14]

Amid the polyglot mix of Brits, Germans, Spaniards, Dutch, Danes, and Jews on St. Croix, the largest group by far consisted of African slaves. The sugar trade depended on a steady supply of slave labor. By 1755, St. Croix's slaves would outnumber free people nearly seven to one.[15] Caribbean slavery was particularly barbaric. Interminable hours cutting sugarcane, bouts of tropical disease, and unrelenting heat all exacted a brutal toll on those in bondage. Most slaves perished within just five years.[16] Slaves who faced capital punishment for a given offense often exhibited visible relief that their cruel existence was reaching its end. As one slave owner conceded, "Many who have been hanged or decapitated went to their deaths with the greatest cheerfulness."[17] The picturesque beaches, azure waters, and verdant hills of St. Croix must have made for a perverse beauty in the eyes of slaves, who found themselves in hell amid nature's paradise.

When Rachel Faucette and her mother arrived in St. Croix after a twenty-hour journey,[18] their ship most likely disembarked at the growing port town of Christiansted. The dominant structure along the harbor was Fort Christiansvaern. It housed the colonial governor, the offices of the Danish West India Company, and—as Rachel would personally discover—a prison. The West India Company's warehouse stood opposite the fort and included a courtyard for slave auctions.[19] There prospective buyers would inspect naked slaves, peering into their mouths and checking limbs for defects.[20] Merchants and officials built their houses along King Street, Company Street, and Strand Street, three parallel avenues that began near the water and ran inland. Free blacks were barred from constructing homes in central Christiansted and instead relegated to a separate neighborhood. The Danes demonstrated a unique degree of forethought in urban planning; Christiansted's orderly growth along a grid offered a stark contrast to the hodgepodge development of other West Indian islands. Visitors often marveled at the tidy nature of life on St. Croix.[21]



TEGNING til Byen
FRIDERICHS STÆD
TEGNING over Byen
CHRISTIANSTA
paa
Eylandet St. CROIX
Skala til begge Grundtegninger
Uoptagne Grunde
NORD SIDE QUARTEER
LITr A
NORD SIDE QUARTEER LITr B
WEST
ENDE
QUAR
TEER
PRINTSENS
QUAR
TEER
KONGENS
QUAR
TEER
DRONNINGENS
QUAR
TEER
Prindsens Plantagie
COMPAGNIETS
QUARTEER
OOST ENDE
QUARTEER LITr A
OOST ENDE QUARTEER
LITr B
Tilegned
Deres Høy Grevelige Excellence
Hr ADAM GOTLOB MOLTKE
Ridder af Elephanten
Greve til Grevskabet Bregentved
Fri Herre til Fri Herskaberne Lindenborg og Høyholm
Herre til Tryggevelde og Alslev m. m.
Hans Kongelige Majestæts
Geheime Raad og Ober Hof Marechal
af Deres Høy Grevelige Excellences
Underdanigste
Tiener
J. M. Beck
KORT over
EYLANDET
St. CROIX udi AMERICA
Saaledes som det ved en accurat udmaaling er befunden med Quartererns Navne og enhver
Plantagies Nummer efter hvilke de udi Matriculen findes Indførte og til enhver Kiøber Ciderit beliggende paa 17 Grader 54 Minuter Norder Brede

On this map of St. Croix, the insets show the street layouts for the island's two towns: Frederiksted on the west end and Christiansted on the north shore. Source: Kort og tegninger (1600–1920), Rigsarkivet (Danish National Archives, Copenhagen).

For Rachel and Mary Faucette, St. Croix was an obvious choice for the next stage of their lives. Rachel's older sister, Ann, had already moved there with her wealthy husband, James Lytton, who purchased a sugar estate on St. Croix that came to be known as the Grange.[22] Plantations like his were oriented around a "great house," typically European or neoclassical in style. A planter and his family occupied the upper story of a great house while using the ground floor for storage. Such homes were strategically situated on a property to catch ocean drafts, though the breeziest parcel of land was reserved for the windmill. A great house's dense walls and vaulted ceiling were designed to withstand hurricanes, which could strike with little notice and even less mercy.[23]

Guests visiting an estate for a dance would ride their carriages up an imposing tree-lined drive. The host family made use of imported luxuries like porcelain and silver. Under the Caribbean moon, the sound of the minuet, aroma of flowers, and flavor of punch easily mingled. But come daylight, the unforgiving sun beat down on the slaves toiling in the cane fields. These slaves often lived in simple huts on the estate, lined in two rows with a road in between where the women prepared meals amid playing children. In addition to boiling cane juice into sugar, plantations also produced rum and molasses. Oxen then carted these valuable commodities to the wharf for shipment to ports throughout the Atlantic world.[24]

James Lytton was probably the one who introduced Rachel Faucette to his business associate—and the man she would marry—Johan Michael Levine.[25] Hamilton himself would describe Levine as a "fortune-hunter" who was "bedizzened with gold, and paid his addresses to my mother, then a handsome young woman."[26] Levine acquired a stake in a sugar plantation in 1744. After seeing his investment come to naught, he redirected his energies toward St. Croix's next most lucrative crop: cotton. While the prime real estate on the western side of the island was designated for sugar, the sloping hills of eastern St. Croix were profitably employed for cotton production.[27] Levine's swanky wardrobe surely gave Rachel the impression he was a planter of substantial means.[28]

The vast body of historical scholarship on Hamilton, often excellent in its analysis of his adult years, has been less thorough in documenting his family history. Levine is a consummate example of an understudied and misconceived figure in Hamilton's past. Many Hamilton biographers fail to mention Levine at all.[29] Others acknowledge his presence in Rachel's story but offer no comment on his religious identity.[30] Those who do engage with the question of Levine's faith often make misguided assumptions. Uncovering Levine's religious background is key to unlocking Hamilton's own.

Levine's name raises the possibility of a Jewish identity, specifically ancestry in the tribe of Levi from ancient Israel. His surname appears in various spellings in the historical record, and several of these formulations ("Levin," "Lewin," "Lavien") correspond to surnames used by Jews of Levitic descent in the eighteenth century.[31] Before coming to St. Croix, Levine worked as a merchant, a common Jewish profession, and he did so on Nevis, an island with a Jewish community.[32] Jews were especially likely to conduct commerce among themselves,[33] so it is perhaps telling that when Levine decided to sell his plantation on St. Croix in 1753, he secured two Jewish buyers (and the property soon ended up in the hands of still another Jew).[34] The list of plantation owners on St. Croix for that year included over 300 Gentiles and no more than six Jews, so the probability that Levine would have made the sale to any Jew by mere coincidence was one in fifty.[35] As we will see, Levine would fail to have his infant son baptized, which was standard practice for Christians on St. Croix. And Hamilton's own grandson unequivocally identified Levine as a "rich Danish Jew."[36] Conversely, there is no known source in the historical record referring to Levine as Christian.

While some Hamilton scholars accept that Levine was Jewish,[37] many others insist that even if Levine did have Jewish origins, he was not a Jew by the time he met Rachel in 1745. The argument that Levine did not belong to the Jewish faith—at least by 1745—originated in 1903 with Gertrude Atherton, a novelist–turned–amateur historian. She was the first Hamilton biographer to journey to the West Indies in the hopes of uncovering new information about his ancestry. Her resulting book offers this tentative statement: "I am also informed that Levine or Lawien probably was a Jew by birth, but must have changed his religion—perhaps when he married Rachael?—or he would have been written down in the records: 'Levine the Jew.' "[38] In 1978, James Flexner produced a biography focused wholly on Hamilton's early life, which echoes Atherton's findings about Levine in more definitive terms. "He was not legally considered a Jew," Flexner writes, citing Atherton.[39] Robert Hendrickson's 1981 book The Rise and Fall of Alexander Hamilton similarly claims, "St. Croix records of the time generally identified Jews as such, but Lavien is not so identified. It may be that he had disavowed Judaism by the time of his marriage to Rachel."[40] Meanwhile, William Cissel, a historian with the National Park Service on St. Croix, issued a report in 2004 that expresses doubt Levine was Jewish and repeats Atherton's reasoning: "He was not identified as a Jew (Joder) in annual registers."[41]

Plantagiers Nommer		Capable	Ma-Kion	Over Aar	Under Aar	Datum &c.
	Transport	554	38	68	183
1.	Emanuel Aboab	13		3	3	d 19 Decbr 1743
1.	Francis Brooks	18	4	5		do dato
1.	Samuel Dauning					do dato
2.	Francis Broocks					d 18 april 1737
3.	James Boyle	8	5		2	d 12 decbr 1737
4.	Edward Ewans Arfvingr	23	2		4	d 10 Febr 1740
5.	Friderich Moths Arfvingr	61	11	6	14	d 19 decbr 1743 er overs Kudt fra de Compag: aff Koarun Anno Dom igien for
6.	James Koones Enche og Arfvinger	12	3	4	10	d 24 May 1738
7.	Valentin French	33		1	5	d:
8.	Joseph Robbinson					d 29 octobr 1738
9.	James Lijthon	16			8	d 24 May 1738
10.	Samuel Dauning	23	2		7	d 29 octobr 1738
11.	Joseph Jones	37	3	12		d 20 Juny 1739
12.	Samuel Dauning					d 20 Augt 1739
12.	Johan Michael Lavien	10			7	do dato

This land register from St. Croix lists Emanuel Aboab, who was Jewish, in the first entry and Johan Levine (under the spelling “Lavien”) in the last. Notably, the Danish term indicating Jewish identity, Joder, does not appear for either of them. Source: Mandtalslister og matrikler (1741–1755), Rigsarkivet (Danish National Archives, Copenhagen).

However, the notion that the Danish records necessarily identified Jews as Jews is erroneous. The names of six other residents of St. Croix who were known Jews appear a total of ninety-eight times in the island’s Matrikler (land register) and Mandtalslister (census list) for 1741–1755. In ninety-seven of those entries, the clerks logged no reference whatsoever to these Jews’ religious identity;[42] only in one anomalous instance is Joder used.[43] For over a century now, the basis for denying that Levine was Jewish has been the absence of the term Joder next to his name. In reality, these Danish records provide no grounds for concluding he was a Gentile by birth or choice.[44]

Cissel also argues that Levine was probably not Jewish because “Jews listed in the annual St. Croix property, population, and head-tax registers … bore Sephardic surnames.”[45] Yet it does not follow that because many of the colony’s Jews were Sephardic, Levine was therefore not Jewish. Caribbean Jews in general and St. Croix’s Jews in particular were not exclusively of Spanish-Portuguese descent. Records from the Privy Council of St. Croix during Levine’s era explicitly acknowledge the presence of both Sephardic and Ashkenazi Jews on the island.[46]

The precise details of Johan Michael Levine’s engagement to Rachel Faucette remain lost to history, but whatever the nature of their courtship, it culminated in a wedding in 1745 that was most likely held at the Grange.[47] Rachel bore Johan a son, Peter, the subsequent year. The circumstances surrounding Peter’s religious life harmonize with the notion that he was not Christian by birth or upbringing. Unlike his maternal cousins on the island who were dutifully baptized shortly after their births, Peter was not. Only in adulthood did Peter undertake a baptism in the process of joining the Anglican Church.[48] While Anglican doctrine called for infant baptism, there were three circumstances under which Anglicans would have baptized an adult. The first involved someone who grew up in a Christian denomination that practiced adult rather than infant baptism (such as Mennonites) and who had yet to undergo an adult baptism in his original church. However, this possibility could not have applied to Peter because no such denomination operated on St. Croix at that time.[49] Another potential explanation for an adult baptism in the Anglican Church is that the person in question had been baptized in a non-Trinitarian denomination of Christianity (for instance, Unitarians). Anglicans accepted baptisms from other Christian denominations as valid, except those that reject the Trinity: the belief that God is the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost. So the Anglican Church would have rebaptized someone whose initial baptism had not been in the name of the Trinity.[50] Yet Peter could not have fallen under this category either because there were no non-Trinitarian denominations on St. Croix while he lived on the island.[51] A final reason why Anglicans would have baptized an adult—the only one plausibly pertaining to Peter—is that the person was converting to Christianity.

Hamilton scholars, fixed on the assumption that Peter Levine was born Christian, have been confounded by his adult baptism when they do not ignore it altogether. In 1939, the Danish military officer H. U. Ramsing published a study of Hamilton's origins that notes of Peter, "On Nov. 22, 1769 he was on St. Croix where he, strangely enough, was baptized."[52] Ron Chernow's sweeping biography Alexander Hamilton (2004) characterizes Peter's adult baptism as "shocking and seemingly inexplicable," and poses a question for which Chernow has no sure answer: "Why had he not been baptized before?"[53] Cissel is also puzzled by Peter's adult baptism, describing it as "most curious."[54]

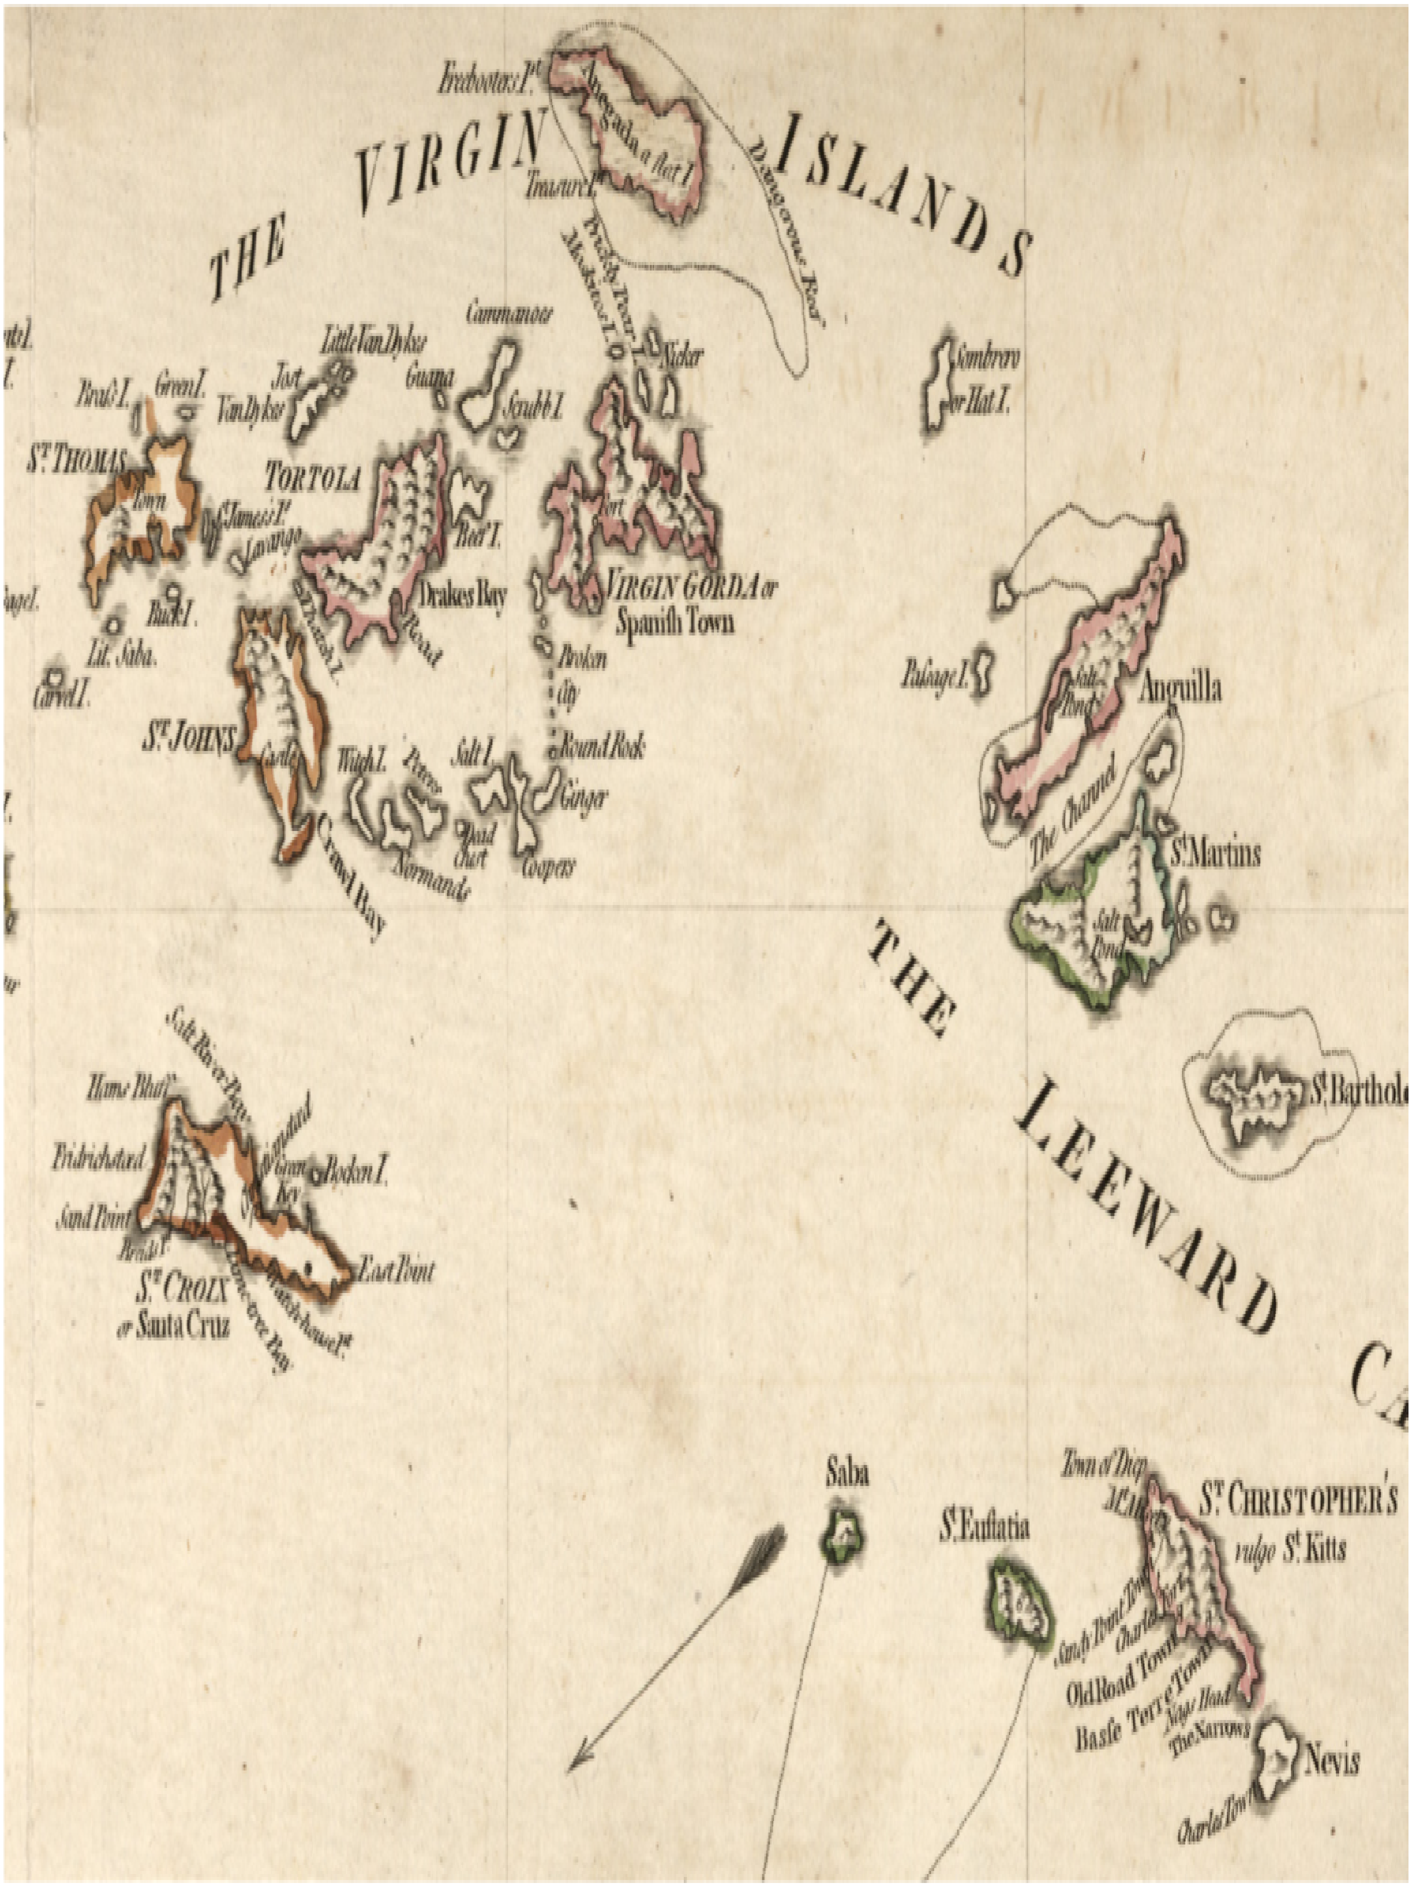
That Rachel and Johan failed to infant baptize Peter is indeed strange, shocking, inexplicable, and curious if we cling to the presupposition that Peter was Christian throughout his life. But if Rachel converted to Judaism prior to his birth, then the matrilineal nature of Jewish identity would make Peter a Jew, and this long-standing mystery about his need for an adult baptism is easily explained.[55] Still another possibility is that Rachel did not convert to Judaism herself but agreed to raise Peter as a Jew to appease her husband.[56] Yet such a scenario is unlikely owing to the matrilineality of Jewish identity and the fact that, as we will see, Rachel maintained ties to Jewry well after Johan and Peter were no longer part of her life.[57] It is also worth noting that the choice of the name "Peter," which is not conventionally Jewish, does not necessarily indicate a Christian identity. Some Jews at this time gave their children non-Jewish first names such as Mark, James, and Andrew.[58]

There were certainly enough Jews on St. Croix to have convened for Rachel a beit din—a Jewish court that could authorize a conversion. The Talmud requires only three adult Jewish males to constitute a beit din, and none need be a rabbi. For a woman converting to Judaism, the sole Talmudic obligation is immersion in a ritual bath known as a mikveh.[59] A conversion for Rachel would not have been unique in the Atlantic world; other Christian women at the time converted to the faith of their Jewish husbands.[60] Given the paucity of Jews on St. Croix relative to many other islands, it would be unsurprising if Levine sought out a Gentile willing to convert in the absence of a suitable Jewish-born woman to marry.

Around five years after their wedding, the marriage between Johan and Rachel Levine deteriorated to the point where he had her imprisoned for adultery. Rachel endured months in a cell usually occupied by petty criminals and disobedient slaves.[61] Johan later said that he had hoped, upon her release, "everything would change to the better and that she, as a wedded wife, [would] change her unholy way of life."[62] Yet once freed from her confinement, Rachel boarded a ship for the island of St. Kitts, abruptly deserting her spiteful husband and their young son.[63]

St. Kitts, like St. Croix, belonged to the Leeward Islands. There the still legally married Rachel met a Christian colonist from Scotland named James Hamilton. Many an enterprising Scotsman moved to St. Kitts hoping to profit from either crops or commerce before returning home. Although James claimed lineage in one of Scotland's aristocratic families, he never met with much success in the West Indies, lacking in talent or luck—or perhaps both. The ill-fated James and Rachel relocated to the neighboring island of Nevis, where Rachel had spent her childhood.[64]

Dominating Nevis's landscape is an extinct volcano, whose peak is perennially kissed by low-hanging clouds. The volcano, thick with green forests, slopes downward into hills, valleys, and beaches before disappearing into the sea. One eighteenth-century observer, approaching Nevis by boat, described how "some refreshing rains had made the whole face of the earth look so verdant and smiling, that no other part of the Globe, which I have as yet seen, could afford a richer gratification of its kind."[65]



THE VIRGIN ISLANDS
Freebooters Pt.
Anegada or Flat I.
Treasure Pt.
Dangerous Reef
Prickly Pear I.
Muskitoes I.
Nicker
Sombrero or Hat I.
Cammanoe
Little Van Dyke
Guana
Jost Van Dyke
Scrubb I.
Brass I.
Green I.
St. THOMAS
Town
TORTOLA
Off
St. James's Pt.
Kawango
Fort
Rat I.
VIRGIN GORDA or Spanish Town
Drakes Bay
Road
Buck I.
Lit. Saba
Carvel I.
St. JOHNS
Castle
Broken Jerusalem Round Rock
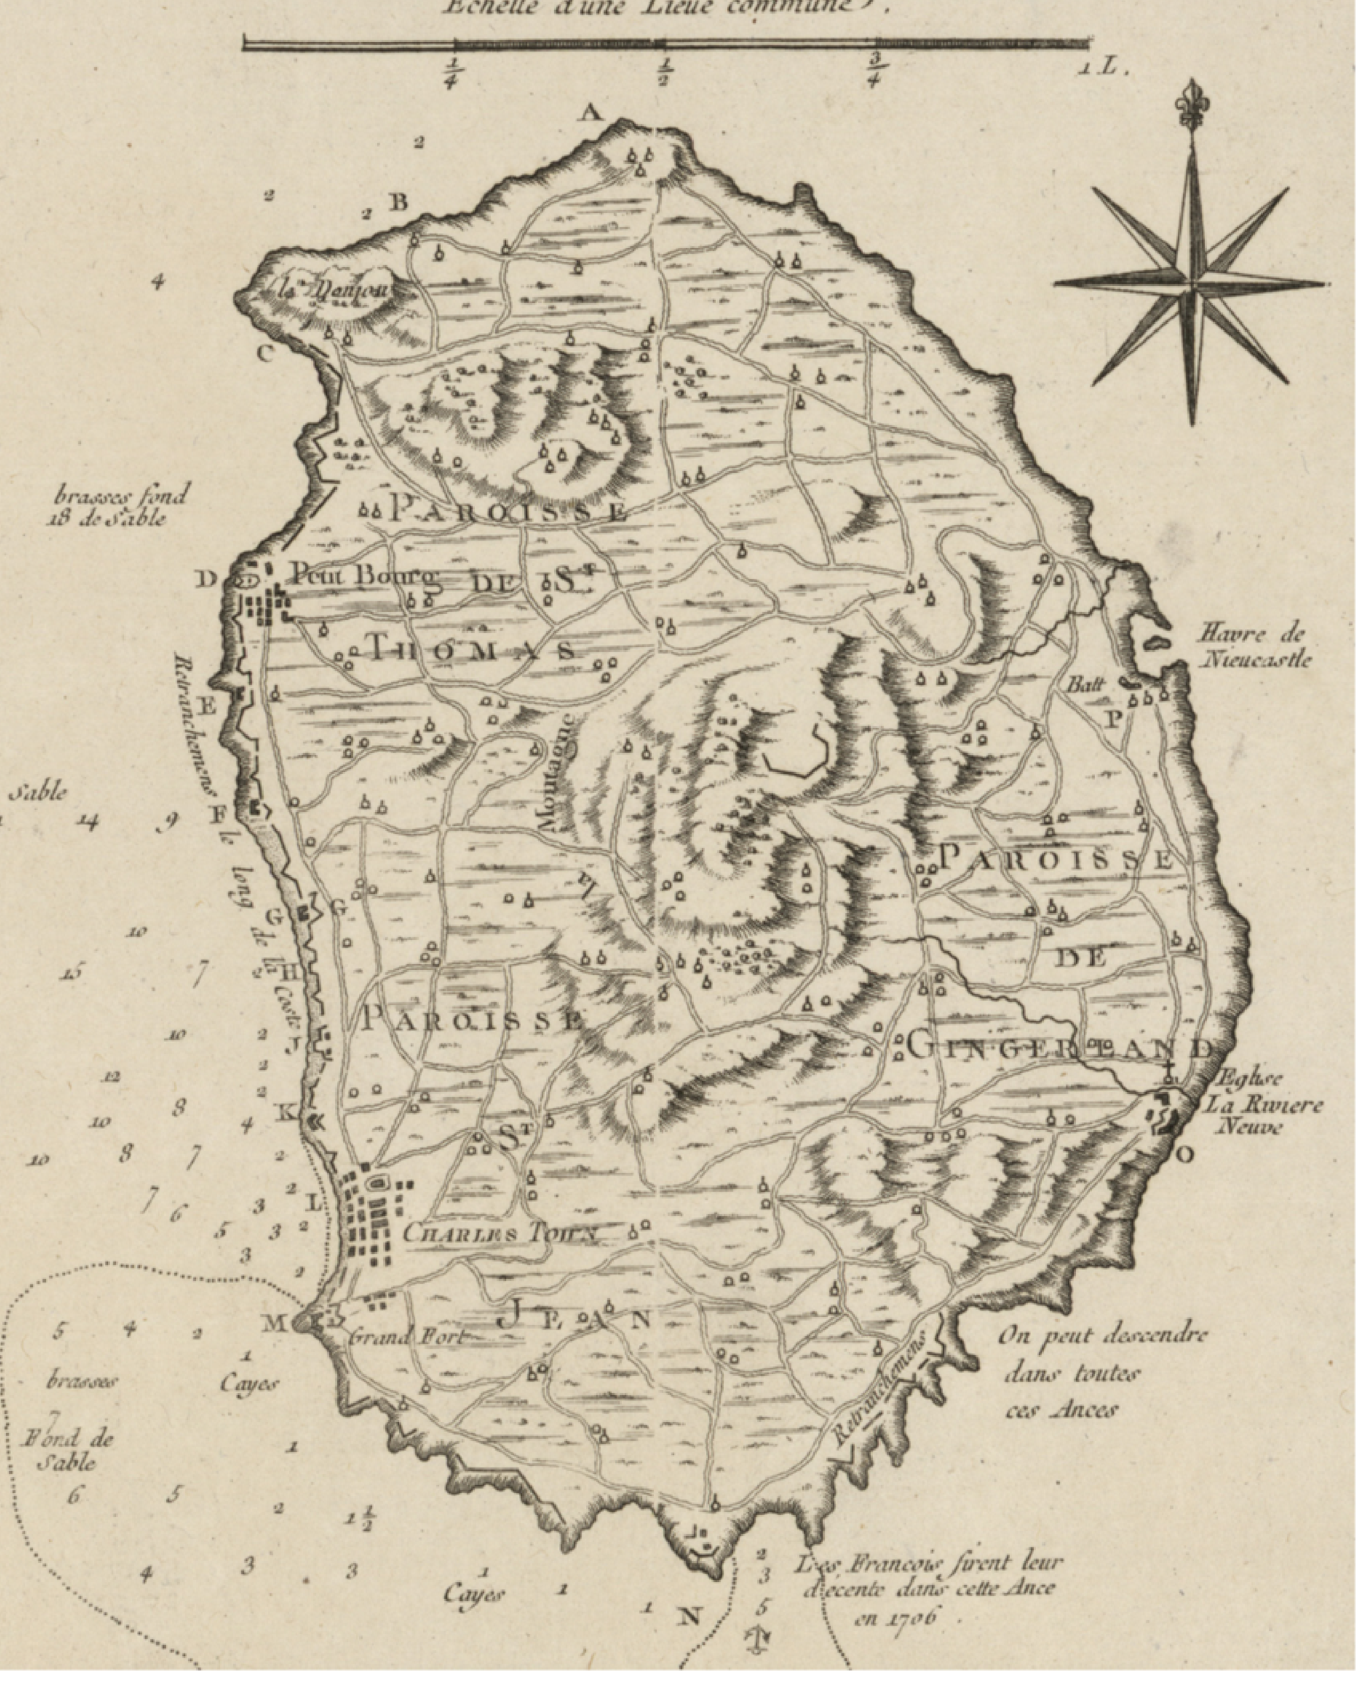
Watch I.
Peters
Salt I.
Ginger
Dead Chest
Normande
Coopers
Cramel Bay
Pasage I.
Anguilla
Salt Pond
The Channel
St. Martins
Salt Pond
THE LEEWARD CA
St. Barthol
Salt River Bay
Hams Bluff
Fridrichstad
Christianstad
Green Key
Booken I.
Sand Point
Bredts Pt.
Lime-tree Bay
Watch-house Pt.
East Point
St. CROIX or Santa Cruz
Saba
St. Eustatia
Town of Deep
St. CHRISTOPHER'S vulgo St. Kitts
Sandy Point Town
Charles Fort
Old Road Town
Basse Terre Town
Nags Head
The Narrows
Nevis
Charles Town

The distance from St. Croix (also known as Santa Cruz) to St. Kitts (St. Christopher) is about 150 miles. Nevis is only two miles from St. Kitts. Source: A map of the Caribbee, Granadilles and Virgin Isles. London: Published by M. Richmond; sold by W. Faden & J. Harris, 1779. Library of Congress, Geography and Map Division.

The island brimmed with wildlife, from native pelicans to imported monkeys.[66] One visitor described a "certain monstrous spider" that was larger than "the palm of a man's hand." And the air hummed with birds of "such art and speed that the huntsman's dexterity is not comparable." Nevis boasted all manner of lizard, the longest of which stretched five feet. When European settlers first tried to kill these giant lizards for food, their bullets proved surprisingly ineffective. Indigenous people taught the naive newcomers that a stick shoved up a lizard's nostril was the surest way to bring death to the reptile and dinner to the colonist.[67]

CARTE DE L'ISLE DE NIEVES



Echelle d'une Lieue commune.
1/4
1/2
3/4
1 L.
A
B
C
D
E
F
G
H
J
K
L
M
N
O P la Manjou
brasses fond
18 de Sable
Peut Bourg
PAROISSE DE ST. THOMAS
Retranchemens le long de la Coste
Montagne
Sable
PAROISSE ST. JEAN
CHARLES TOWN
Grand Fort
brasses
Fond de Sable
Cayes
Havre de Nieucastle
Batt
PAROISSE DE GINGERLAND
Eglise
La Riviere Neuve
On peut descendre dans toutes ces Ances
Retranchemens
Les François firent leur descente dans cette Ance en 1706
2
4
21
14
9
10
15
7
12
8
6
5
3
1
1 1/2

A French geographer created this map of Nevis at the time that Hamilton was living on the island. Source: Jacques Nicolas Bellin, Carte de l'isle de Nieves [Paris, 1764]. Library of Congress, Geography and Map Division.

As with St. Croix, a slave-based sugarcane economy was the lifeblood of Nevis. A network of paths hewn through the trees connected the various sugar estates.[68] The richest soil was to be found in the valleys, but even the flinty land closer to the volcano's peak was employed for sugarcane.[69] So central was sugar to island life that it substituted for currency. "Pounds of sugar and not pounds of sterling is the balance of all their accounts," noted an Englishman.[70] Because nearly every inch of arable terrain was reserved for sugar, islanders imported most of their food rather than making it fresh. Their diet suffered accordingly. In the words of one disappointed diner, the butter was "bad and the cheese worse."[71]

Upwards of fifty vessels a year departed Nevis for England, their hulls full of sugar.[72] Each shipment was a tacit testament to the slaves whose lives were sacrificed to produce what the British called "white gold." Due to the island's acute demand for slave labor, blacks outnumbered whites by more than seven to one. The insufferable workday of a slave could stretch to eighteen hours during boiling season in late winter and early spring.[73] At night, the fires from the boiling houses illuminated Nevis in a fantastic display of light.[74]

It was on Nevis where Alexander Hamilton was born out of wedlock to Rachel Levine and James Hamilton in 1754. They already had one son together, named James Jr.[75] According to island lore, the boys grew up in Nevis's port village, Charlestown.[76] Facing west from the shoreline, Alexander would have seen an endless stretch of Caribbean waters; turning east, Charlestown's maze of winding streets and wooden homes.

Island life was gritty. Slave auctions and public whippings were common sights.[77] In the pointedly named Gallows Bay, captured pirates marked their final moments with the tightening grip of the hangman's noose.[78] A clergyman who lived in Charlestown for nine months described a bizarre habit among the townspeople that was thought to detoxify their bodies. The river water was "operated both by stool and urine" and the locals "would drink of it till they puked, and say they found great benefit by so doing." The clergyman opted not to join them, explaining, "As I have an aversion to puking, I never cared to use it in that way."[79] If Alexander Hamilton ever partook in this curious tradition in his youth, it was not a practice known to have continued into his adulthood.

Charlestown was home to a Jewish community. In the seventeenth century, Sephardic Jews facing expulsion from Portuguese Brazil had found refuge on various Dutch and British islands in the West Indies, including Nevis.[80] Jews arrived in Nevis no later than the 1670s, and within fifty years they comprised fully one-quarter of Charlestown's white population. The town featured the trappings of an established Jewish neighborhood, complete with a synagogue, cemetery, and pathway in between known as “Jew’s Alley.” This kind of walkable distance between a synagogue and burial ground was standard Jewish practice. There was also “Jew Street,” where many Jews resided.[81]

The Jews of Nevis, like their Christian neighbors, were implicated in the institution of slavery. While it appears that these Jews were not especially involved in the slave trade,[82] some notable portion did own slaves. An eighteenth-century priest reported that “with the respect to the Jews” on Nevis and St. Kitts, “many [were] owners of numbers of slaves.” He also observed that throughout the Leeward Islands, slaves operated markets on Sundays when they would “traffick with the Jews in colonies where Jews live, and with the looser sort of Christians.”[83] Although Jews were second-class citizens relative to white Christians, their marginality was of course negligible compared to the subjugation of slaves.

Today the last surviving remnant of the Jewish presence on Nevis is the cemetery. Typical of Sephardic tradition, the horizontal tombstones are partially elevated from the ground. Their inscriptions mix Hebrew, Portuguese, and English, reflecting the linguistic acumen that made Jews so valuable as merchants. Several tombstones bear the same verse from the book of Samuel: “May his soul be bound up in the bond of everlasting life.” The image of open hands on the grave of one Daniel Cohen is symbolic of a priestly blessing.[84] All the graves were dug facing east toward Jerusalem, as per Jewish custom, so that upon resurrection during the Messianic Age, the deceased could walk to the Holy Land.[85]

Jewish identity is complex and can assume at least eight forms. Personal identity means that an individual sees herself as Jewish. Communal identity signifies that someone is accepted as a Jew by his local Jewish community. Public identity relates to a person who is considered Jewish by her Gentile neighbors. Universal identity pertains to an individual whom any Jewish congregation in the world would acknowledge as a member of the faith. Legal identity denotes that someone meets the requirements of Jewish law—that is, he is either the child of a Jewish woman or himself a convert to Judaism. Ethnic identity applies to a person who is descended from the ancient Israelites. Religious identity concerns adherence to the devotional obligations of Judaism. Cultural identity entails an association with the customs, lifestyle, ethics, art, and/or heritage of the Jewish people.

These varieties can overlap but may not necessarily. For instance, the children of a Jewish woman who sheds her faith and hides her past are still legally Jews despite their having no knowledge of their true religious background and thus no personal Jewish identity. A crypto-Jew practicing the faith only in secret to stave off persecution could have a personal Jewish identity, and even a communal one within a subculture of fellow crypto-Jews, but no public identity as a Jew. An individual who converts to Judaism under the auspices of a meager Jewish community—one on the fringes of the diaspora with unrigorous requirements for conversion—might find acceptance communally but not universally. Someone whose father's lineage traces back to the ancient Israelites and whose mother is a Gentile has some Jewish ethnicity but no claim to a legal identity as a Jew.

The eighteenth-century Atlantic world throws into high relief the idiosyncrasies of Jewish identity. Under the Inquisition in Spain and Portugal, for example, Jews had been forced to flee or convert to Catholicism, and many of the conversos' descendants revived their Jewish heritage after migrating to more tolerant territories on both sides of the ocean.[86] Meanwhile, crypto-Judaism persisted in lands under Spanish or Portuguese rule, including New World colonies like New Mexico and Brazil.[87] Further testament to the diversity of Jewish identities was the sizable population of black Jews in the Dutch colony of Suriname that resulted from relations between Jews and slaves.[88] And, as mentioned earlier, there are several known instances of Christian women who converted to Judaism for marriage.

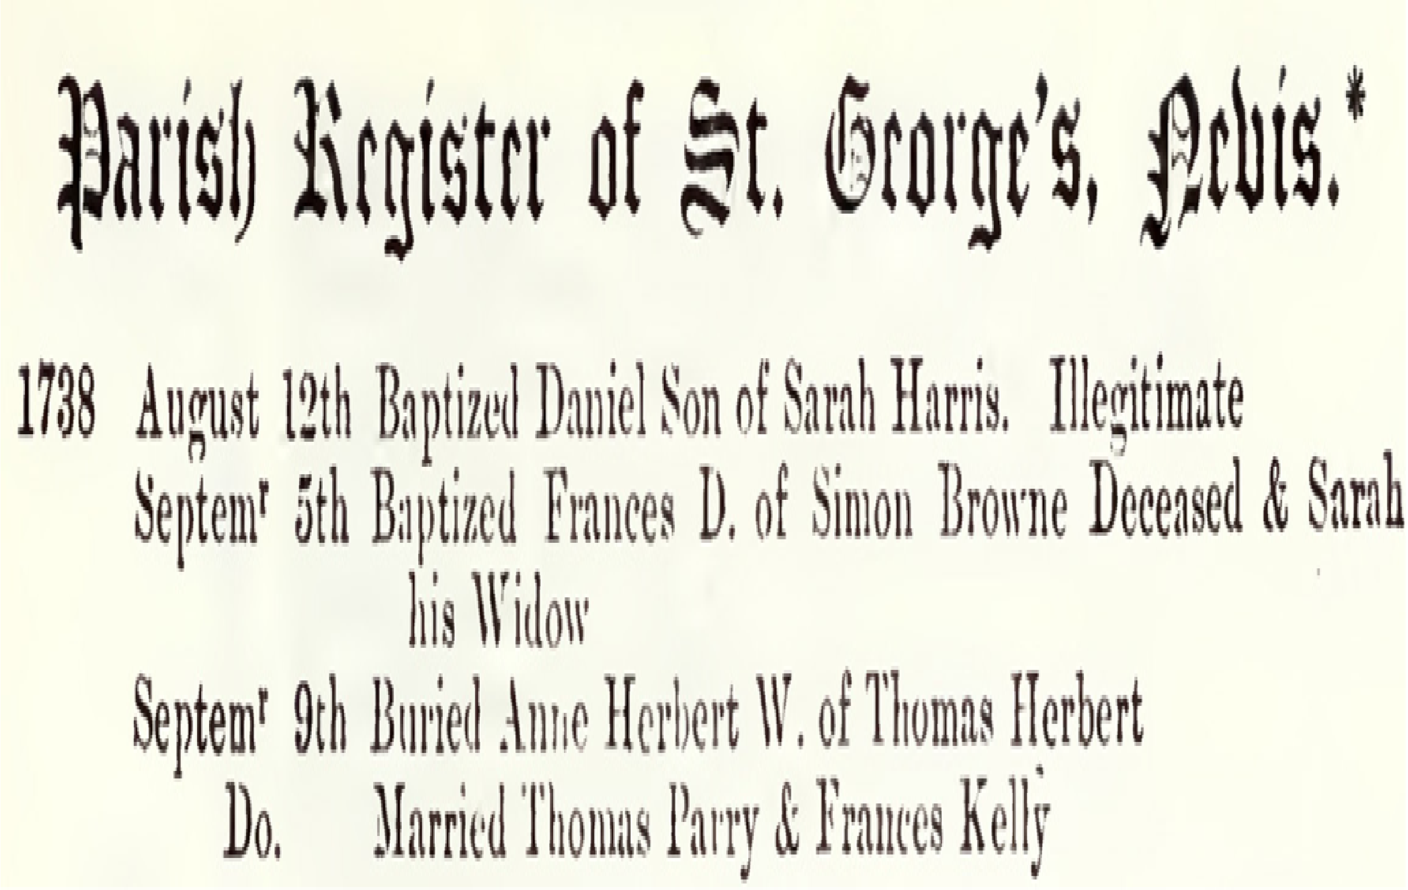
In a world where Jewishness had a multiplicity of dimensions and assumed a variety of forms, the question of Alexander Hamilton's religious identity cannot be reduced to a simple Jew/Gentile binary. Instead, we must consider the likelihood that Hamilton had a Jewish identity in one or more of its many senses for any span of his life. With respect to Jewish law, the Talmud specifies that Jewish identity is matrilineal and, even for converts, permanent.[89] Therefore, if Rachel converted to Judaism to marry John Levine, then Alexander Hamilton legally would be a Jew—at least by the standards of those who oversaw his mother's conversion—regardless of whether she still presented herself as Jewish at the time of Alexander's birth. And the case for Alexander's Jewish identity does not rest on Talmudic technicalities alone. There is compelling evidence that Rachel passed on some communal Jewish identity to her son (and if so, his communal identity likely coincided with other forms of Jewish identity, such as public and personal).

It must first be noted, however, that there is little historical documentation concerning Alexander's birth that is instructive here. If Alexander were born a Jew, he would have been circumcised consistent with Jewish tradition, and if born a Christian, baptized. Yet no records survive from the synagogue in Charlestown, and so if Alexander were indeed circumcised, any source attesting to such a ritual has been lost.[90] Meanwhile, extant church registers from Nevis for the 1750s show no baptismal entry for Alexander (or for his brother, James Jr.). These parish records, however, are fragmentary and thus cannot provide definitive conclusions.[91]

The best evidence of Alexander's Jewish identity is that he attended a Jewish school on Nevis. While he was not known in adulthood for divulging much about his origins, even to his family, one happy memory he did share with his children was his Jewish education. "Rarely as he alluded to his personal history," Hamilton's son recalled, "he mentioned with a smile, his having been taught to repeat the Decalogue [i.e., the Ten Commandments] in Hebrew, at the school of a Jewess, when so small that he was placed standing by her side upon a table."[92] (It remains unknown whether James Jr. also attended this school.)

Many Hamilton biographers make no mention of his Jewish instruction.[93] Those who reference this peculiar detail typically do so in passing without any reflection on why a supposedly Christian child attended a school for Jews.[94] The few scholars who try to make sense of this curiosity point to his illegitimacy. In her 1970 history of St. Croix, Florence Lewisohn maintains without evidence, "Schooling for the boys had been one of the problems in Nevis, since they were held ineligible for church school there because the parents were unmarried. Alexander had gone for a time to the Jewish school."[95] Chernow uses more measured language in speculating along similar lines: "His illegitimate birth may well have barred him from Anglican instruction."[96] There is, in fact, no basis for concluding that Alexander's out-of-wedlock birth raised an obstacle to his attending a church school on Nevis, and good cause to think otherwise. Church records from around the Caribbean—including the very church to which Rachel's parents had belonged on Nevis—list infants who were "bastards" yet baptized.[97] We have no grounds for assuming that a church willing to baptize children despite their illegitimacy would at the same time refuse to educate those very children because of their illegitimacy.[98]

Moreover, there is ample reason to expect that Alexander would have only attended the Jewish school if the community's Jews accepted him as a coreligionist. Although no records still exist from Hamilton's school, we can glean much about the nature of contemporary Jewish education from other schools in that era.[99] As with Christian schools, Jewish educational institutions existed to impart religious precepts. And because Jews were a dispersed minority, their schools took on the added mission of cultivating a shared sense of Jewish peoplehood that bound Jews together across the diaspora. In sum, students gained the knowledge, customs, and identity necessary for adult lives as observant Jews.[100] Jewish schooling for any given child in this era is, therefore, a strong indicator that the local Jewish community considered the student a Jew. What's more, the Talmud prohibits Jews from teaching the Torah to Gentiles (and Hamilton made clear to his children that he undertook, at the very least, rudimentary study of the Torah in its original Hebrew), furnishing yet another reason for Hamilton's school on Nevis to admit Jewish students exclusively.[101]



Parish Register of St. George's, Nevis.*

1738 August 12th Baptized Daniel Son of Sarah Harris. Illegitimate
Septemr 5th Baptized Frances D. of Simon Browne Deceased & Sarah his Widow
Septemr 9th Buried Anne Herbert W. of Thomas Herbert
Do. Married Thomas Parry & Frances Kelly

The entry for August 12 shows that Daniel Harris was baptized despite his classification as "illegitimate." Source: Vere Langford Oliver, ed., Caribbeana: Being Miscellaneous Papers Relating to the History, Genealogy, Topography, and Antiquities of the British West Indies. Vol. 3. London: Mitchell Hughes and Clarke, 1914.

The fraught nature of Jewish-Christian relations on Nevis further suggests that the Jewish school would likely have educated Hamilton only if local Jews saw him as one of their own. Britain's quest to populate its Caribbean colonies with settlers led to laxer restrictions on religious minorities than those applied in Britain proper. Jews, along with other out-groups such as Quakers and Catholics, gained a foothold on islands like Nevis. But religious diversity was not a principle that the British celebrated; it was, instead, a reality that required begrudging acceptance in the name of cash crop cultivation. Tolerance for minority faiths had its limits, especially as islands reached peak productivity and, accordingly, the imperative for additional immigration waned. By 1701, Nevis had banned both Catholics and Quakers. When the Leeward Islands General Assembly—a federated legislature with representatives from Britain's various Leeward colonies—sought to repeal restrictions on Catholics in 1752, the local Nevis legislature erupted in protest.[102]

Nevis's Jews fared better than Quakers and Catholics but still faced civic inequality and cultural stigma. Members of the Jewish faith were disallowed from casting ballots, serving as jurors, joining the militia, becoming justices of the peace, or holding elected office.[103] In 1694, the Leeward Islands General Assembly barred Jews from trading commodities. Although that prohibition would later be lifted, there was still plenty of cause for anxiety among Jews on Nevis and throughout the British West Indies. They were prominent as merchants, and Jewish success in commerce was perceived to come at the expense of Christians. On Barbados, English merchants complained to the Crown that Jews were crafty swindlers who threatened to rob the island of its wealth: "The Jews are a people so subtle in matters of trade that in a short time they will not only engross trade among themselves, but will be able to direct the benefit hereof to other places."[104] Aggrieved Gentile merchants in Jamaica used more dire terms, lamenting, "The Jews eat us and our children out of all trade.… This is a great and growing evil, and had we not warning from other colonies, we should see our streets filled and the ships hither crowded with them. This means taking our children's bread and giving it to Jews."[105] Confronted with this kind of bigotry, Jamaican Jews sought to curry favor with local officials by gifting them "Jew pies," which were baked pies with coins inside.[106]

Nevis was scarcely immune to the antisemitism infecting the British West Indies at large. Nevisian Jews were pegged by the local legislature as "evil-minded persons, intending nothing but their own private gain, and the ruin of the poor." It was further alleged that these Jews tended to "buy whole cargoes of provisions at a cheap rate" and "retail them again at excessive prices, thereby forestalling the market."[107] The Jewish community may have been especially vulnerable to prejudice after a series of misfortunes bedeviled Nevis. Although anointed "the Queen of the Caribees" in its early colonial history,[108] the island's condition steadily deteriorated. Antigua replaced Nevis as the capital of the Leeward Islands in 1687. Soon after, the Nevis-based Royal African Company lost its monopoly on trafficking slaves. The most devastating blow came in 1706, when an invading French force ransacked the island for eighteen days. With crops ravaged, homes reduced to rubble, and the courthouse set aflame, Nevis managed only a partial recovery in the decades to follow.[109] The governor of neighboring St. Kitts relayed to London in 1728 that "Nevis has quite lost its trade and is a desert island to what it was thirty years ago."[110] Hurricanes, soil erosion, and slave rebellions compounded Nevis's decline throughout the eighteenth century.[111]

In troubled times, Jews could become easy scapegoats. A reverend conveyed to the bishop of London that among the free population on Nevis, "one 4th are Jews, who have a synagogue here, and are said to be very acceptable to the country part of the island, but are far from being so to the town [i.e., Charlestown], by whom they are charged with taking the bread out of Christians' mouths." Charlestown's Jews were "by many thought to be the true cause of the strange decay of this place."[112] That fellow Jews had been expelled from the French West Indies likely stoked anxieties for Jews on Nevis that a similar fate could befall them.[113]

The geography of Jewish life in Charlestown reflects how the Jews occupied a separate, and subordinate, rung on the island hierarchy. Jews were not dispersed evenly throughout the town but rather concentrated in a Jewish quarter. And this Jewish neighborhood was hardly the island's most prized real estate. Situated in south Charlestown, the Jewish quarter was sandwiched between the jail on one side and a mosquito-infested backwater called “the bogs” on the other.[114] Jews in many European nations similarly dwelled in their own, less desirable districts. In other words, Jews and Christians did not move to Nevis and create a new set of spatial and social dynamics with each other. Rather, they recreated patterns of Jewish-Christian relations from the Old World—patterns designed to ensure a degree of distance, both physical and cultural, between the two faith groups.[115] The clustered nature of Jewish life on Nevis characterized other Jewish communities throughout the Caribbean.[116] (We do not know where Rachel Levine lived on Nevis. Island legend has it that she inhabited a waterfront property that she inherited from her father, but the claim remains unsupported by historical evidence.)

The site of the official parish church in Charlestown further illustrates how the European practice of religious segregation migrated with the colonists to Nevis. Known as St. Paul’s, the church resided on the northern corner of town, far from the synagogue. Throughout much of Europe, church regulations called for maximal distance between Jewish and Christian houses of worship. No such rule existed in Nevis, and yet the island’s Christians chose to adhere to this convention anyway, testifying to the endurance of Old World religious customs.[117]

When Nevis’s Christians made reference to someone who happened to be Jewish, that Jewish identity was often noted, underscoring that Jews’ religious difference was a salient feature in the eyes of their Christian neighbors. One Gentile recorded after a fishing expedition, “In the month of July, 1719, one Mr. Moses Pinheiro, a Jew, and myself went to angle in Black Rock Pond.”[118] A planter similarly remarked that a local woman compensated “Sampson the Jew for repairing an earring.” The use of language like “the Jew” speaks to a mentality among island Christians that Jewish residents were fundamentally different.[119]

Given the role of Jewish schools in cultivating Jewish identity, the Talmudic prohibition on Jews teaching the Torah to Gentiles, and the segregation of Jewish and Christian life on Nevis, there is substantial cause to believe that the Jewish school would have educated Alexander Hamilton only if the local Jewish community recognized him as a fellow Jew. Alexander’s attendance at the Jewish school is also the most compelling indication that his mother had converted to Judaism back on St. Croix. Under the tenets of Jewish law, recognition of Rachel as a Jew would have been a precondition for Alexander’s own Jewish status. If we proceed from the conventional wisdom that Rachel lacked prior ties to Judaism, it becomes difficult to explain why she would, or how she even could, enroll her child in a Jewish school.

One wonders what the place of Alexander’s father, a Christian, means for making sense of Alexander’s religious identity. Alas, the record is silent; it is impossible to state the extent of James’s involvement in Alexander’s life. We do know that Rachel Levine never married James, which may have made it easier for the Jews of Nevis to accept her.

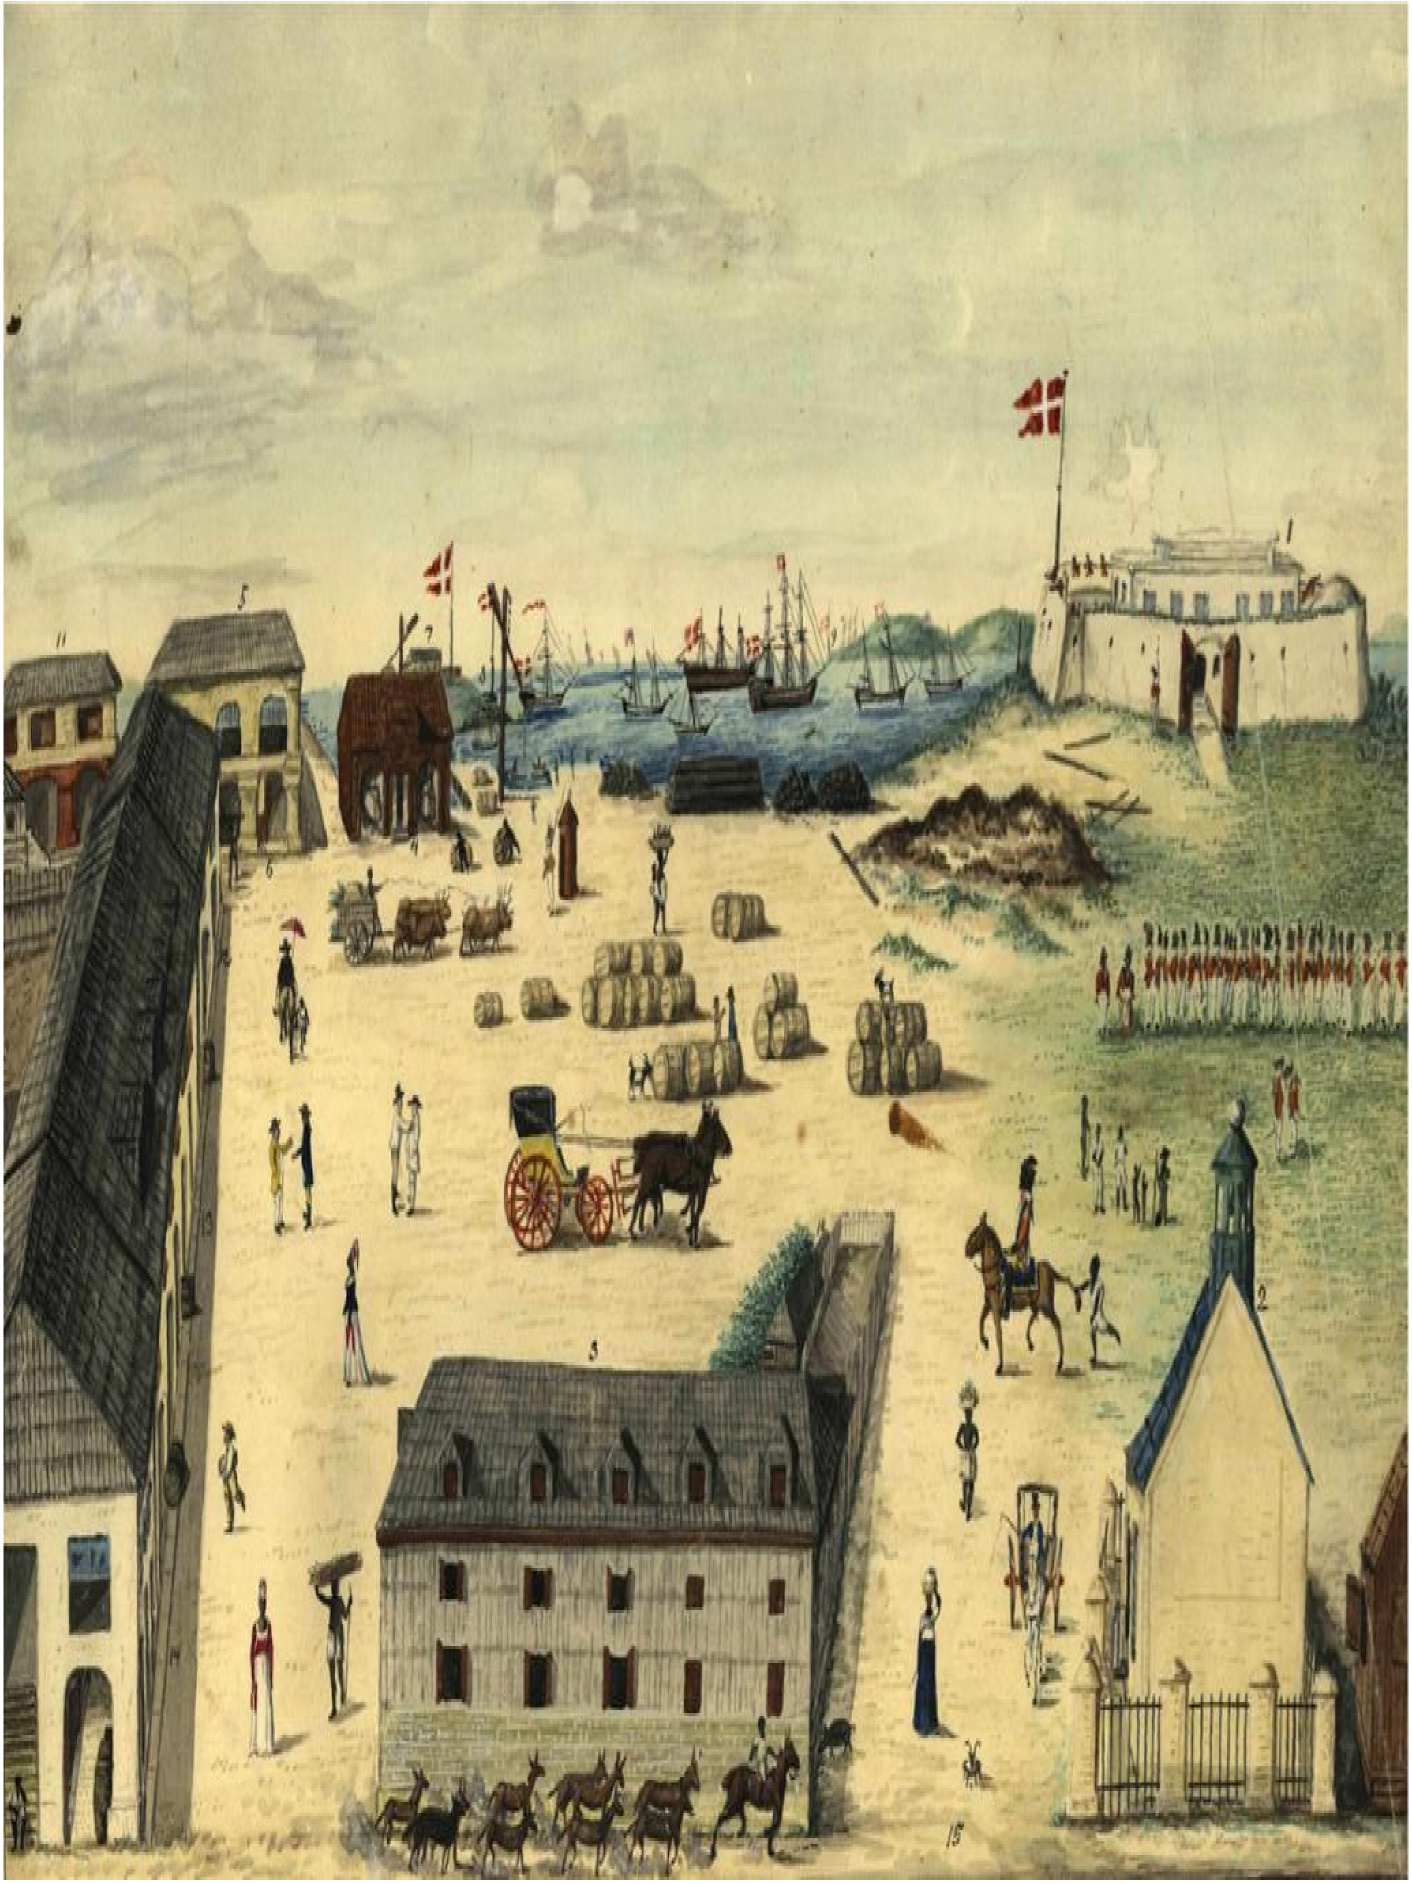
If Rachel did profess a Jewish identity even after fleeing St. Croix, her motivations for doing so remain a matter for speculation—and may have been more strategic than spiritual. Perhaps Rachel found it convenient on Nevis to trade on an earlier conversion to Judaism to secure some measure of acceptance in the Jewish community. And although that community constituted a sizable proportion of Nevis's free population, in absolute numbers the Jewish population there was far smaller than many sister congregations on other islands,[120] and so Nevis's Jews would have had little incentive to rebuff a woman willing to both claim a Jewish identity and contribute tuition payments to the school's coffers. Rachel and Alexander were marginal people; it would be altogether unsurprising if they found themselves on the margins of different faiths at different times in their lives. Indeed, the theory that they were Jewish—in at least some senses of the term and for at least some stretch of time—accounts for more evidence in the historical record than the long-standing assumption they were cradle-to-grave Christians.[121]

2

Exodus

AROUND THE TIME of Alexander Hamilton's eleventh birthday, in 1765, his family relocated to the site of Rachel Levine's past imprisonment: Christiansted, St. Croix. Notably, Rachel appears in the Danish tax rolls under her married name and sometimes under her maiden name but not as Rachel Hamilton, demonstrating that she made no pretense to be James Hamilton Sr.'s wife. James Sr. did move to Christiansted around the same time, but the fact that he is not mentioned at all in the rolls indicates that Rachel and her sons did not even live with him. He abandoned St. Croix altogether not long after his arrival, further suggesting a lack of engagement in the lives of his boys and their mother.[1] Johan Levine, for his part, had secured a divorce from a local court years earlier during Rachel's lengthy absence from St. Croix. She need not have worried about daily run-ins with her ex-husband, as he was now living in the town of Frederiksted on the other side of the island.[2]

St. Croix had come to vie with Jamaica and Barbados as a premier sugar producer in the West Indies.[3] Christiansted was home to a gradually growing population of some 2,200 residents[4] and featured all the varied imports typical of a Caribbean port city. Islanders could purchase flour from New York, oats from Denmark, wine from Madeira—and from the Gold Coast of West Africa, slaves. The local newspaper featured advertisements from craftsmen who journeyed to St. Croix to offer their services. A jeweler from Copenhagen who "flatters himself with giving the utmost satisfaction" promoted his goldsmithing talents, while a Bostonian skilled in "the sailmaker's business in all its branches" sought a market among the seafaring.[5]



11
5
7
1
6
4
2
3
13
14
15

The harbor in Christiansted, St. Croix. Source: Kort og tegninger (1600–1920), Rigsarkivet (Danish National Archives, Copenhagen).

Life on the island did not center solely on sugar and commerce, at least for whites who could afford to partake in festivities and cultural pursuits. Celebratory balls and St. Patrick's Day merriment added color to the social calendar. For those partial to the literary arts, the printing office on Queen Street sold German poetry and English treatises. Planters and merchants hoping to impart some measure of erudition to their children could send them to a private school, which touted a curriculum in "spelling, reading, and writing, together with that truly laudable and excellent accomplishment, the noble science of arithmetic." (There is no evidence that Alexander attended any Caribbean school other than the Jewish one on Nevis.) Rival theater companies put on Shakespearean classics, catering to the tastes of an island where the gentry class had far more Brits than colonists of any other European nationality. Twelve shillings purchased a ticket to a performance of Hamlet or King Lear.[6]

Rachel Levine and her two sons took up residence at 34 Company Street in Christiansted. They resided on the second story, while Rachel ran a store on the ground floor that sold provisions like beef, apples, and rice.[7] Her library held nearly three dozen books, which likely fed Alexander's hunger for knowledge that would characterize him throughout his life.[8] Rachel's mother, now deceased, had bequeathed to her several slaves. One of those slave's children, Ajax, was enlisted to attend to Alexander.[9]

In February 1768, both Rachel and Alexander were struck with a mysterious illness. A doctor was summoned to the fevered mother and son, who suffered together in a single bed. Thirteen-year-old Alexander pulled back from the brink, but on February 19, Rachel Levine drew her dying breath.[10]

Rachel's passing was marked in the St. John's church register, a fact that would seem on its face to signal that she identified as a Christian, at least at the end of her life. However, the recording of a death in a church register may not necessarily indicate that the deceased was a member of that church or even an adherent of the Christian faith generally. At the time, many governments that did not yet keep civil records of births and deaths instead relied on religious institutions to log such details, not just for their respective parishioners but for those outside the flock as well. Jewish people were especially likely to appear in church registers in areas where there were not enough Jews to have a synagogue with its own records.[11]

The details of Rachel's burial may be telling of her religious identity. A plot in a Jewish burial ground would not have been an option for Rachel or anyone else on the island at that time; the earliest epitaph in St. Croix's Jewish cemetery dates from 1779, eleven years after her death.[12] An island Jew in 1768 could therefore only be laid to rest at a family home, and in fact Rachel was buried at the Grange, the estate that her sister's husband had purchased. To be sure, plantations like the Grange often had graveyards, so such a burial was not unusual for an islander of any faith.[13] Still, the fact that Rachel was not interred in the church cemetery would at least conform with the theory that she had a Jewish identity until her death. She also bore her ex-husband's surname even at the end of her life—eighteen years after leaving him—another possible indication of an enduring link to Judaism. Her death was recorded under Johan's last name and a slightly varied spelling of her given name: "Rachael Levine."[14]

A stubborn myth among Hamilton scholars is that a local reverend presided over her funeral. H. U. Ramsing's Alexander Hamilton's Birth and Parentage describes how "the English minister, the Rev. Cecil Wray Goodchild, performed the ceremony of casting earth upon the coffin."[15] In a work that is otherwise exhaustively documented, Ramsing conspicuously cites no source to substantiate this statement. Presumably, he uses the fact that Rachel's death appears in the St. John's register to infer that the Reverend Goodchild of St. John's must have officiated. Broadus Mitchell's study of the first half of Hamilton's life proceeds along similar lines: "Rachael's body was taken in a hearse to the family plot of James Lytton on Grange plantation and was buried there, February 20, by the English minister, the Reverend Cecil Wray Goodchild." Mitchell adds that the "particulars of Rachael's illness and death are from claims presented to the probate court" as well as from "the burial register of St. John's."[16] Yet neither the probate court record nor the burial register make any mention of the Reverend Goodchild's attendance at the interment.[17] Robert Hendrickson's biography of Hamilton follows Mitchell nearly word for word—"Rachel's body was taken in a hearse to James Lytton's family plot on Grange plantation and buried there on February 20 by the English minister, the Reverend Cecil Wray Goodchild"—while providing no evidence for the assertion.[18] Meanwhile, Willard Sterne Randall's Alexander Hamilton: A Life takes poetic license in imagining that "under ancient mahogany trees in the burial yard overlooking the azure Caribbean, Alexander heard the local Church of England curate intone the matter-of-fact Anglican formula."[19] And in Odd Destiny, author Marie B. Hecht mistakenly writes that Rachel "was buried in the churchyard of St. John's Anglican church."[20] These biographers' sundry assumptions notwithstanding, there is no source in the historical record documenting the presence of the Reverend Goodchild at Rachel Levine's funeral.[21]

In the aftermath of his father's flight and mother's burial, Alexander confronted life as an orphan. The tragedies of his childhood only multiplied from there. His vengeful stepfather, Johan Levine, legally challenged the right of Alexander and his brother, James Jr., to their inheritance on account of their illegitimacy. The local probate court awarded Levine's son, Peter—Rachel's only child born in wedlock—the entirety of the estate.[22] Alexander and James Jr. were left in the custody of a cousin named Peter Lytton, and within a matter of months Peter committed suicide. According to the St. Croix records, he “stabbed or shot himself to death.”[23] Alexander Hamilton’s achievements in America are all the more impressive when considered in light of the calamities that befell him in childhood.[24] His contemporaries in the United States would fail to fully appreciate his rise from these harrowing origins partly because of his lifelong silence about his Caribbean past.

Any identity as a Jew that Hamilton may have had almost certainly died with his mother. A plucky youth like him would have been disinclined to compound his troubles as a dispossessed orphan with a second-class religious status. Had Hamilton still resided on Nevis at this point—with its Jewish community and the Jewish school that educated him—perhaps Rachel’s passing would have been less likely to occasion her son’s disaffiliation from the Jewish faith. But St. Croix was home to far fewer Jews than Nevis. If Hamilton ever laid claim to a Jewish identity, he was now bereft of a family or community that might have kept it alive.

While James Jr. began an apprenticeship with a carpenter, Alexander finally had a moment of luck that allayed his seemingly endless succession of hardships—an affluent merchant named Thomas Stevens agreed to house him. Stevens’s son Edward was, like Hamilton, a precocious youth, and the two boys became lifelong friends. In fact, they looked so similar in appearance that commentators from Hamilton’s day to our own have speculated that Thomas Stevens might have been Hamilton’s biological father.[25]

Hamilton worked as a clerk at the import-export firm of Beekman and Cruger, a job he had begun even before his mother’s death.[26] Although he did not personally travel off St. Croix, Hamilton was now immersed in vast trading networks and exposed to seafaring merchants from across the Atlantic. Given the prominence of Jewish traders in the Caribbean, it is all but certain that Hamilton came into contact with the kinds of Jewish merchants with whom he would later collaborate in America. His time at Beekman and Cruger offered him a practical education in global markets that informed his later stewardship of the Treasury Department. While many other founders of the United States grew up on farms and plantations, and hence were schooled in agrarian life, Hamilton was uniquely prepared to become the visionary of America’s financial future.

The Beekman and Cruger firm trafficked in a wide variety of goods, from rope and rice to brick and bread—and occasionally slaves.[27] Hamilton learned the nuances of accounting, pricing, and inventory. He gained mastery over exchange rates between numerous national currencies. And perhaps most significantly for his later endeavors, he cultivated an advanced understanding of credit.[28]

One of the firm’s partners, Nicholas Cruger, recognized Hamilton’s extraordinary acumen for commerce. When poor health prompted Cruger to return to his native city of New York for five months in 1771, he entrusted the firm to his teenage clerk.[29] Hamilton proved equal to the task, managing the firm’s affairs with remarkable poise for someone so young. After one Captain William Newton arrived with a shipment of subpar mules from South America, Hamilton described to Cruger’s brother “41 mules in such order that I have been obliged to send all of them to pasture, and of which I expect at least a third will die."[30] Hamilton chastised Captain Newton in unequivocal terms: "Reflect continually on the unfortunate voyage you have just made and endeavor to make up for the considerable loss therefrom."[31] Even in correspondence with his employer, Hamilton could be blunt. As he once told Cruger, "Your Philadelphia flour is really very bad, being of a most swarthy complexion and withal very untractable."[32] The confident judgment, swift decision-making, and unvarnished candor that would all define Hamilton's life in America were already on full display at this early stage.

A newly unearthed court transcript from 1771 concerning Cruger's firm demonstrates that Hamilton unquestionably identified as a Christian by this point in his life. But it also raises questions about the recency and extent of Hamilton's church affiliation. He was called as a witness to testify about the delivery of goods in a legal dispute. To determine Hamilton's competence to take an oath on the Bible before testifying, he was asked "how old he was and of what religion, and if he had received the sacrament of the altar [i.e., communion], as well as if he understood the meaning of the oath." Hamilton said that he was seventeen and assured the court that he was "brought up in the Reformed religion as it was observed in the English Established Church [i.e., the Anglican Church]." He conceded, however, that "he had not yet received communion." The lawyers debated whether Hamilton could take the oath; in the end, the court forbade him from so doing. He was permitted to share what he knew about the delivery of the goods in question, albeit in a statement lacking the greater credibility that the oath would have provided.[33]

While there is no reason to doubt Hamilton's claim that he was an Anglican in 1771, his failure to have taken communion suggests that his relationship with the church had not been lifelong. The text governing Anglican rituals—The Book of Common Prayer—specified that the related rites of confirmation and communion were to take place in childhood. Those eligible for confirmation were "children being now come to the years of discretion," defined as youngsters capable of reciting "the Creed, the Lord's Prayer, and the Ten Commandments" and answering some basic questions about Anglican theology. Once confirmed, a child could then take communion. As The Book of Common Prayer stipulated, "there shall none be admitted to the holy Communion, until such time as he be confirmed."[34]

It seems, then, that Hamilton's comment about being "brought up" Anglican had shades of both truth and exaggeration. In all likelihood he was brought up Anglican, at least nominally, in the years that he lived with Thomas Stevens. But Hamilton's choice of words must also be read in the context of the legal case. Seeking to give testimony for the benefit of the man who paid his salary, Hamilton had a clear incentive to puff up his Christian credentials in court. And the fact that Hamilton had not received a sacrament by age seventeen that was expected of Anglican children is consistent with the theory that he came late to Christianity. As we will see, his relationship with Christianity in his American adulthood would be largely ambivalent. Even at the twilight of his life, when a bleeding Hamilton was laid down on his deathbed, he still had never taken communion.

Although Hamilton was of considerable use to his trading firm, he did not thrill to the life of a clerk. Island hierarchy positioned European planters at the top rung, African slaves at the bottom, and clerks somewhere in between. Hamilton bristled at the strictures of a stratified society that afforded little hope for advancement. In a revealing letter to his childhood friend Edward "Ned" Stevens, who was then studying in New York, Hamilton expressed an intense hunger to rise above his modest circumstances: "To confess my weakness, Ned, my ambition is [so] prevalent that I condemn the groveling conditions of a clerk … and would willingly risk my life, though not my character, to exalt my station." He added, "I wish there was a war." Hamilton believed that for someone like him—without an esteemed father or extensive fortune—martial glory was the surest path to respectability.[35]

At the time that he penned these sentiments, in 1769, colonists in both North America and the West Indies were agitating against taxes levied by the British Parliament, but the prospect of a military revolt by any of these colonies against the motherland was not yet imaginable. War was more of an abstract hope rather than a concrete likelihood for Hamilton. Yet war would indeed break out the following decade and present Hamilton with the opportunity for battlefield heroics.

If commerce was a new subject for Hamilton in his St. Croix years, then Hebrew may have been an old one that he revived. Some scholars go so far as to claim that Hamilton was fluent in Hebrew.[36] While his level of proficiency is impossible to ascertain, if he did in fact achieve fluency, the Reverend Hugh Knox may have played some part. Hamilton became friendly with Knox,[37] who not only mastered Hebrew but insisted that it was a "duty" to study the Hebrew Bible in its "mother tongue." In one "discourse" that Knox published, he lamented the failure of English translations to adequately capture the majesty of the Psalms. "Words are too feeble," Knox reflected, "to express that sublimity of sentiment, that grandeur of figure and style, and that pure flame of ardent and rapturous devotion which animate almost every line of these wonderful compositions in the original Hebrew."[38] As a Christian interested in Hebrew, he was not alone. Christian Hebraists on both sides of the Atlantic were keen to read their Old Testament in its original language.[39]

After sundown on August 31, 1772, a catastrophic hurricane brutalized the Leeward Islands. Its eye passed directly over Christiansted. Amid gale-force winds and seventy-foot waves, homes were destroyed, ships hurled inland, and the lives of hundreds of islanders summarily extinguished. Survivors assessed the damage the next morning, uncovering the corpses of their neighbors strewn about the rubble.[40]

The best contemporary description of the storm came from the pen of an eighteen-year-old Alexander Hamilton, whose baroque letter detailing the calamity appeared in the local island paper. “It seemed as if a total dissolution of nature was taking place,” he recounted. “The roaring of the sea and wind, fiery meteors flying about it in the air, the prodigious glare of almost perpetual lightning, the crash of the falling houses, and the ear-piercing shrieks of the distressed, were sufficient to strike astonishment into Angels.” Hamilton’s depiction of the hurricane included the line, “Jesus be merciful!” which is notable for its aberrancy—the name “Jesus” appears nowhere else in the voluminous writings and correspondence that he produced throughout his life.[41]

According to legend, the publication of Hamilton’s letter in the newspaper suddenly and profoundly changed his life’s trajectory because his precocious eloquence inspired islanders to raise money so that he could receive a college education in America.[42] In truth, Hamilton’s patrons almost certainly were already acquainted with his intellectual prowess, and his letter about the hurricane likely confirmed—rather than created—their impression that he merited advanced schooling on the mainland.[43] Soon Hamilton was boarding a ship bound for Boston, with most accounts placing his arrival in the fall of 1772. From there, he journeyed south to the city that would one day be nicknamed Hamiltonopolis: New York.[44]

This initial stay in New York was brief. Although brilliant, Hamilton lacked formal schooling on St. Croix and was not yet ready for college. He used Hugh Knox’s connections to secure a place at the Elizabethtown Academy in New Jersey, where he quickly absorbed the preparatory curriculum.[45] His notebook from the time demonstrates that whatever study of the Hebrew Bible he had begun in Nevis continued in America. Over several pages, Hamilton recorded a verse-by-verse paraphrase of the book of Genesis. He wrote in one column, “1. God created heaven and Earth 2. The earth shapeless and without light/spirit moved on the face of the waters,” and then he scribbled in a second column, “inference that Earth and Sea were mingled together.”[46]

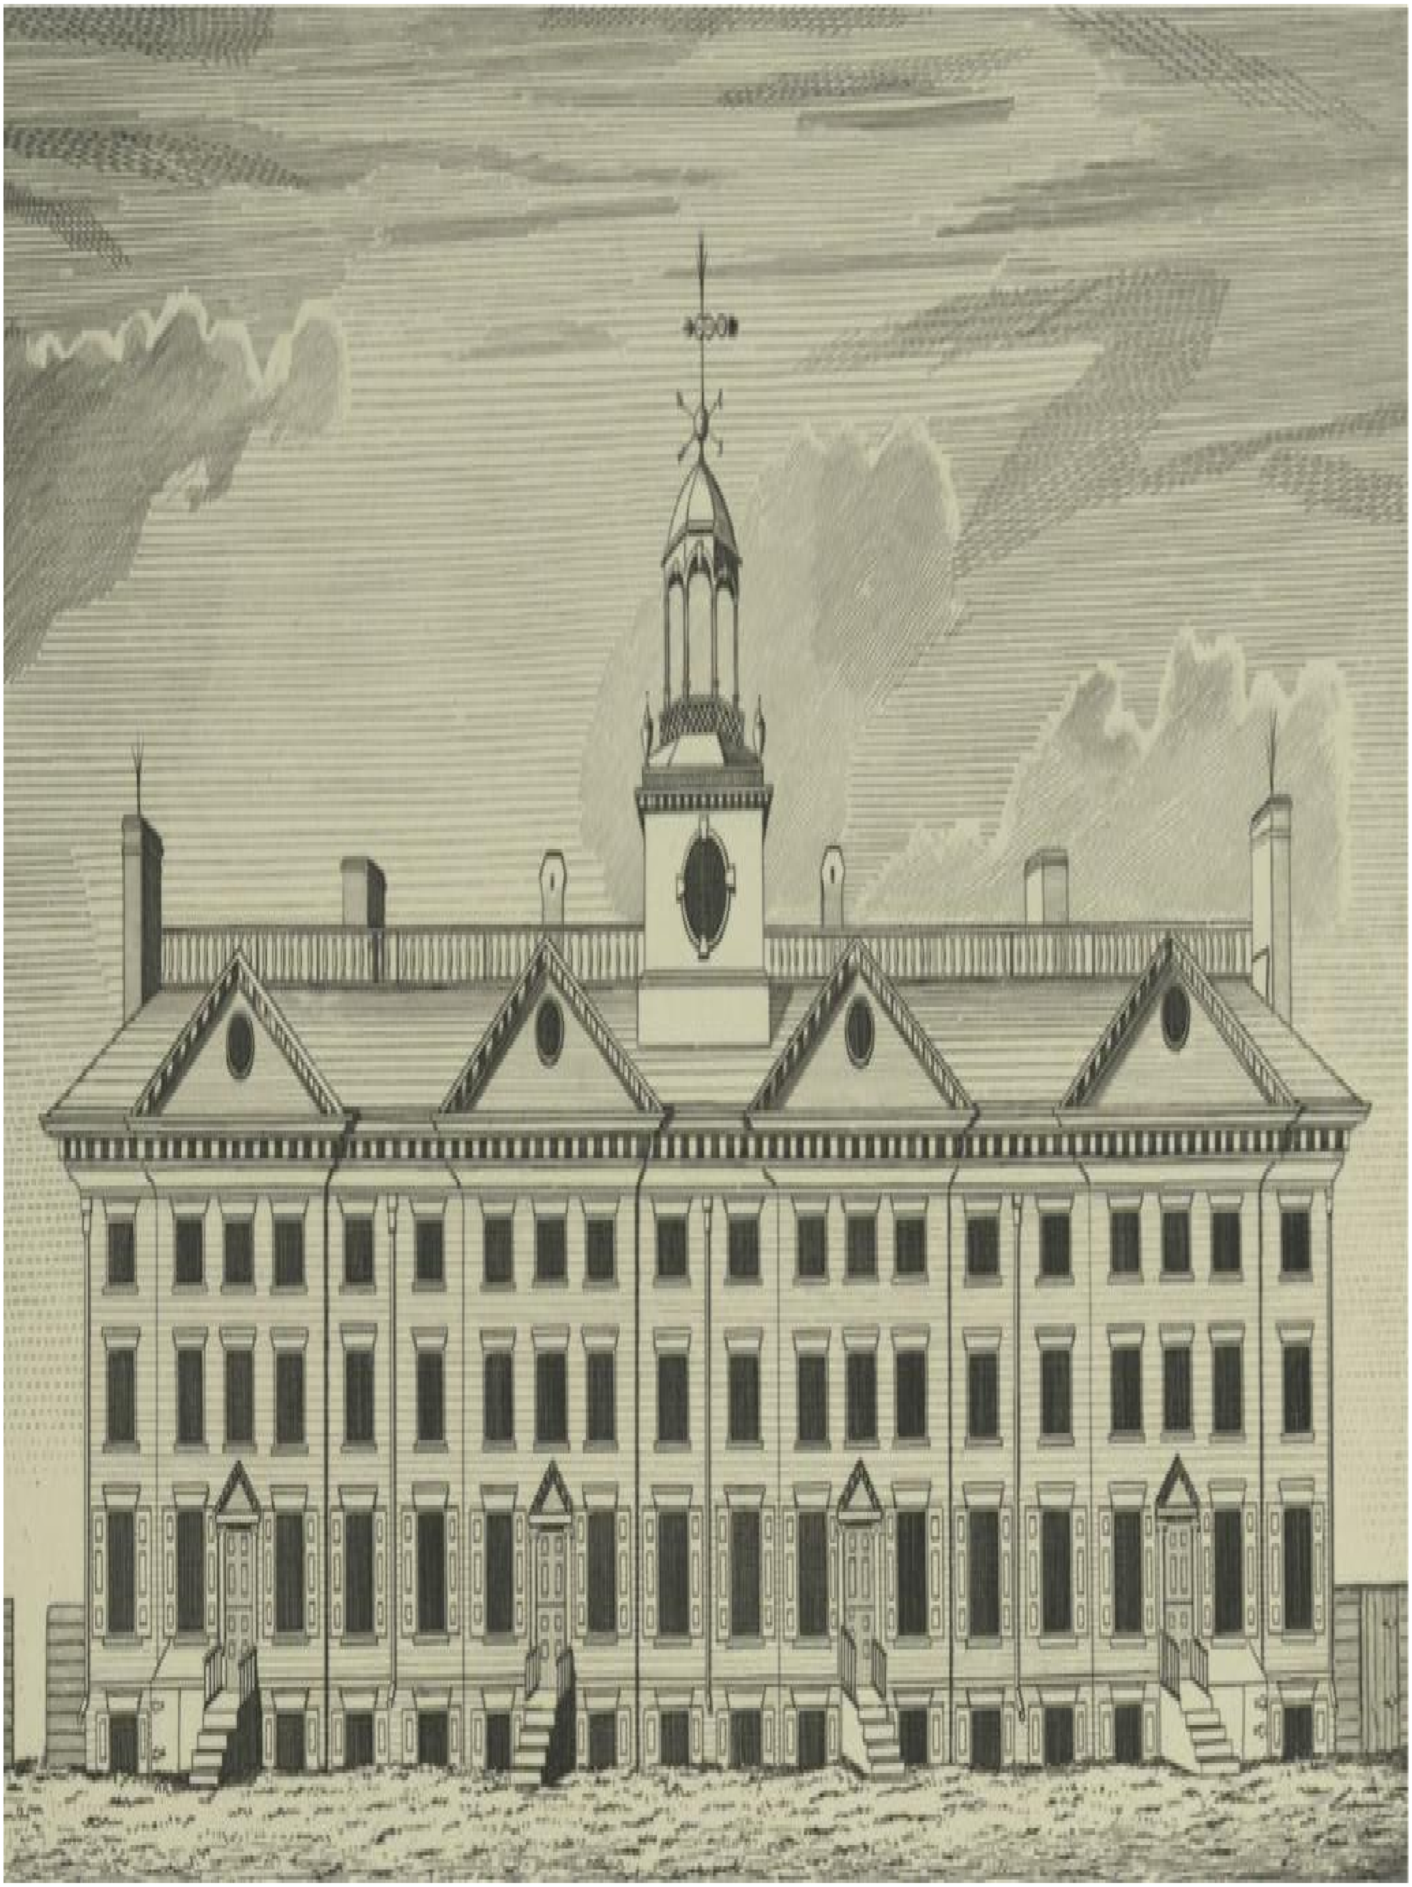
When Hamilton set about to choose a college, he looked for an institution that would allow him to accelerate through the curriculum according to his aptitude rather than force him to follow the standard academic calendar. His eagerness to hurdle through his studies was typical of the constant sense of urgency that would characterize the rest of his life. The College of New Jersey (later Princeton) denied his request, but King’s College (later Columbia) in New York was amenable to Hamilton’s plan.[47]

Hamilton peddled the fiction that he was younger than his real age by some two-and-a-half years, claiming January 11, 1757 as his birthday.[48] Numerous biographers accept at face value the date of birth that Hamilton offered once he appeared in America.[49] Yet all the relevant evidence from the Caribbean debunks this myth and instead aligns with a 1754 birth year. In August of 1771, Hamilton testified in the previously mentioned legal case on St. Croix that he was seventeen years old.[50] Four months earlier, a poem published in the St. Croix newspaper in 1771 by “A. H.”—widely believed to be Hamilton—included a note from the author describing himself as “a youth about seventeen.”[51] This language suggests a sixteen-year-old with an imminent birthday. We can thus infer that Hamilton likely turned seventeen as early as April but no later than

August 1771. This timeline accords with the record of the probate court that handled Rachel Levine's estate, which identified Hamilton as thirteen years old in February 1768.[52] It also harmonizes with documentation from Johan Levine's divorce proceedings from 1759. In that case, a witness recalled that back in 1757, Rachel's youngest child (i.e., Alexander) had been "about" three years old.[53] In sum, every relevant piece of evidence from the West Indies is consistent with a birth date between April and August 1754.

It is unsurprising that Hamilton disguised his true age. King's College skewed younger than other institutions of higher learning; the average incoming student at King's was only fifteen.[54] Aware of his outsider status, Hamilton was surely anxious to fit in with students who were a few years his junior. His small size and boyish face would have made the deception easy to carry out.[55] Having committed himself to a 1757 birth year after he arrived in America, Hamilton then had to maintain this fiction throughout his life for consistency's sake. And he did so without any Caribbean acquaintance ever exposing his falsehood. That Hamilton was able to misrepresent the date of his birth so successfully makes it all the more likely that he could obscure any Jewish origins for the duration of his adulthood without a West Indian contemporary correcting him.

Founded in 1754, King's College was situated in a stately three-story building with a cupola adorning its roof. The college sat atop a hill that gradually descended to the Hudson River.[56] A visiting Scotsman remarked that the setting was "one of the finest situations perhaps of any college in the world."[57] The library, staircases, and student accommodations were all designed on the model of Oxford and Cambridge. A typical day for an undergraduate began with morning prayers in the chapel shortly after dawn, academic study until noon, a ninety-minute break for lunch, additional study until evening prayers, and then time to himself until curfew. Academic gowns were to be worn at all times, even when students ventured into town. The campus was encircled by a fence that (usually) reined in students after nightfall.[58]



King's College was renamed Columbia after the Revolution. Source: View of Columbia College in the City of New York. Miriam and Ira D. Wallach Division of Art, Prints and Photographs: Print Collection, New York Public Library.

The student body at King's was small, consisting of merely thirty-six pupils.[59] Undergraduates were exclusively white and male, and typically from well-to-do Protestant families (although there was a lone Jewish student in the 1770s named Isaac Abrahams). While the students were demographically similar to each other, they shared no common education prior to their arrival at King's. Some had received independent tutoring as children; others, like Hamilton, had attended preparatory academies. All that the college required for admission was sufficient ability in Latin and Greek, and even that standard was leniently applied.[60]

The King's College curriculum, following Oxbridge, emphasized classical civilization. The poetry, history, and philosophy of ancient Greece and Rome were seen as vital fodder for a student's intellectual development. Indeed, classical thought would deeply inform Hamilton's approach to the modern world throughout his career. Students also studied ethics, logic, rhetoric, mathematics, and metaphysics. When not attending lectures, undergraduates kept busy with assigned readings and by memorizing declamations—passages to be read aloud from either classical texts or their own essays.[61]

Given that much of Hamilton's college education was administered in private tutoring, we do not know which subjects he undertook. He may well have resumed his study of Hebrew while an undergraduate. This much is clear—Hamilton's intellect did not tire from the demanding curriculum. He was part of a quintet of classmates who gathered weekly of their own volition to hone their writing and speaking skills.[62]

A King's College education was intended to impart not just knowledge but virtue, and to that end the college banned all sorts of juvenile buffoonery. During Hamilton's time, the college president made use of a notorious "Black Book" that recorded indiscretions. Transgressive behavior ranged from the predictable (skipping classes) to the mischievous (teacup theft) to the downright unseemly (cockfighting). Punishment often entailed paying a fine or translating Latin texts.[63] In his later capacity as a trustee of the college, Hamilton would advise with moderation that a college president should "be of a disposition to maintain discipline without undue austerity."[64]

The academic year began in July and ran for four terms, each concluding with examinations. At the end of their fourth year, seniors had to pass a final evaluation covering the totality of the curriculum to earn the bachelor of arts degree. Routinely graduates then pursued one of the three learned professions of the day: law, medicine, or ministry. Given that King's was in a city rather than the countryside, it is little surprise that just as many alumni took up careers in commerce, finance, or manufacturing.[65]

The matter of Hamilton's relationship to Christianity during his undergraduate days was addressed after his death in a remembrance penned by his former roommate, Robert Troup. According to Troup, Hamilton "was a zealous believer in the fundamental doctrines of Christianity."[66] But there is cause enough to question the credibility of this account. In the only study to date focused exclusively on the topic of Hamilton and the Christian faith, historians Douglass Adair and Marvin Harvey write that his “manifestation of public piety” at King’s was merely “skin-deep” given his postcollege “lapse into complete indifference” toward Christianity. They continue, “One suspects, too, a strong element of opportunism in the early display of conventional orthodoxy. Hamilton was probably paying his devout patrons for his college education with spiritual coin of less than sterling value.”[67] Perhaps the same desire for belonging that led Hamilton to falsify his age also prompted him to make pretenses to religiosity in a college with an avowed Anglican affiliation.

Hamilton biographer Nathan Schachner challenges the accuracy of Troup’s description by pointing out that Troup wrote this testimonial at the request of a clergyman, the Reverend Dr. John Mason. In Schachner’s words, “The whole business has too much the air of having been thrown into the narrative for Dr. Mason’s especial benefit.”[68] That Troup’s account contains other statements about Hamilton’s past that are incorrect lends further doubt to this picture of religious fervor. And aside from Troup’s remembrance, no evidence indicates that Hamilton enthusiastically embraced the Christian faith in his early adulthood. Regardless of Hamilton’s religious practices at King’s, he was largely disengaged from Christianity in the years that followed.

Hamilton’s matriculation at King’s made him not just a college man but, more importantly, a New Yorker. Depending on one’s perspective, visitors to this bustling port encountered either a lively bastion of opportunity or a repugnant pit of vice. Thomas Jefferson condemned the city as a cesspool of “all the depravities of human nature.”[69] John Adams found New York superficially impressive but substantively impoverished. “With all the opulence and splendor of this city, there is very little good breeding to be found,” he griped. “At their entertainments there is no conversation that is agreeable. There is no modesty—no attention to one another. They talk very loud, very fast, and all together. If they ask you a question, before you can utter three words of your answer, they will break out upon you again—and talk away.”[70] While New York may have repelled the genteel southerner and irascible New Englander, it was the ideal stage for a Caribbean orphan with boundless ambition. That city—a magnet for immigrants and transplants, merchants and lawyers, traders and financiers—would prove not merely background scenery but foundational to Hamilton’s meteoric rise.

New York’s population numbered around 25,000 when Hamilton arrived, making it the second-largest urban center in America after Philadelphia, with its 40,000 residents.[71] Little more than the southernmost mile of Manhattan was then settled. Amid the labyrinth of narrow streets were government buildings, houses of worship, and merchant homes.[72] King’s was situated toward the northwestern corner of town. A block to the college’s east was a triangular green expanse called the Common.[73]

Broadway was the widest avenue in the city, originating off Bowling Green park near the island's southern tip and running northward. Bowling Green featured a recently erected statue of King George III on horseback. The other noteworthy statue in town, on Wall Street, was of William Pitt in honor of his outspoken resistance to the Stamp Act, a 1765 piece of parliamentary legislation that had taxed a wide array of colonial goods and provoked riotous opposition from Americans. That New York commissioned both statues in 1770—the one, a symbol of British authority; the other, a celebration of American autonomy—aptly reflects the torn loyalties that characterized the city's political culture. Neither statue would survive the coming revolution intact. The king was ripped apart and remade into bullets by the Americans, while Pitt was decapitated by British soldiers.[74]

Among the churches lining Broadway was St. Paul's, known less for the salvation within its walls than for the sins just beyond them—the neighboring lot was home to 500 prostitutes and subversively called the "Holy Ground." King's College was only two short blocks away. As a visitor remarked, "The entrance to this college is through one of the streets where the most noted prostitutes live. This is certainly a temptation to the youth that have occasion to pass so often that way."[75] It remains unknown whether Hamilton, who had a weakness for women, ever indulged in such carnal pleasures. John Adams, for one, would show limited faith in Hamilton's self-restraint, describing him after his death as a "superabundance of secretions which he could not find whores enough to draw off."[76]

A PLAN OF THE CITY OF
NEW YORK.
Quarter of a Mile.
1 2
Furlongs
NORTH or HUDSON'S RIVER
EAST RIVER OF THE SOUND
Marshy Ground
Mount Pleasant
Fresh Water Pond
Powder Magaz.
Common
the Goal
New Presbyterian Meeting
Jews Burying Ground
Delanceys Square
Division Street
King George Str.
Prince Str.
Vanwater Street
Rutgers
Cherry Str.
Queen Str.
Water Street
Broad Street
BROADWAY STREET
Beaver Str.
Princes Str.
Stone Str.
Bridge Str.
Pearl Str.
Duke Street
Mill Str.
Dock Str.
Wall Street
King Street
William Str.
Nassau Str.
Smith Str.
John Str.
Maiden Lane
Fair Str.
Ann Str.
Gold Str.
Cliff Str.
Ferry Str.
Dyes Street
Cortlandt Street
Crown Str.
Little Queen Str.
Robinsons Street
Murray Str.
Warren Str.
Chambers Str.
Church Street
Catharine
Oliver
St. James
Bowery Lane
Grand Str.
Bayard Str.
Hunters Key
Burnets Key
Murrays Wharf
Cruger's Wharf
P. Hook Ferry
THE FORT
Battery
R. de L'Assom
References.
A. Military Hospital.
B. Governor's House
C. Secretary's Office.
D. Custom House.
E. Fish Market.
F. Old Slip Market.
G. Meal Market.
H. Fly Market.
I. Peck's Market.
K. Oswego Market.
L. Exchange.
M. Dutch Free School.
N. Engine which supplies the City with Fresh Water.
O. St. Paul's.
P. Trinity Church.
Q. St. George's Chapel.
R. Old Dutch Church.
S. New Dutch Church.
T. Lutheran Church.
V. Calvinist Church.
W. French Protestant Church.
X. Quakers Meeting.
Y. Presbyterian Meeting.
Z. Baptist Meeting.
a. Moravian Meeting.
b. New Lutheran Meeting.
c. Jews Synagogue.

Map of New York. Source: Thomas Pownall and Samuel Holland, The provinces of New York and New Jersey; with part of Pensilvania, and the province of Quebec. London: Robt. Sayer & John Bennett, 1776. Library of Congress, Geography and Map Division.

Near the corner of Broadway and Wall Street was City Hall. It housed the collections of the Union Library Society; for thirty shillings in dues, patrons could peruse nearly a thousand volumes.[77] Farther east, at the river's edge, the marketplaces alongside the wharves brimmed with all manner of provisions. A pound of beef ran four pence, the same of butter sixteen pence, and a "good hen" no more than a shilling. Rum, cider, and wine were all affordably priced. Only beer from London, at a steep two shillings a bottle, was relatively costly.[78]

Although New York claimed only 3 percent of the population of London, it still faced the various problems of urban life. The New Gaol prison, at the eastern corner of the Common, was deluged with convicted felons. The city took a number of measures to address rising crime rates, from hiring patrolmen to installing street lamps. Disease ran rampant as well, and a new hospital was under development on the northern fringe of town.[79] Another hazard of a condensed population was that an uncontained fire in a single home could threaten the entire community. To mitigate the risk of a widespread outbreak, the city appointed a number of fire captains and offered a financial reward to whoever among them most promptly summoned his team of men to the flames. Water pumps were also placed at regular intervals throughout the city, although water potable enough for tea had to be hauled in from the suburbs on carts.[80]

If Alexander Hamilton were to head through the college gates, down Broadway past the Common, beyond the Holy Ground, turning left onto Wall Street, then right at City Hall, and left again onto a cramped lane called Mill Street, there he would have beheld a sight he had first encountered as a child in Nevis—a synagogue.

3

Revolution

WHEN THE JEWS OF NEW YORK first formed a congregation, they chose a name rife with messianic significance: “Shearith Israel.” These Hebrew words translate to “remnants of Israel,” reflecting a prophecy that the scattering of the Jewish people was a necessary precondition for the coming of the Messiah and the ultimate reuniting of the dispersed Jewish tribes.[1] Jews had been present on the island of Manhattan since the days of Dutch rule in the seventeenth century, when the city was known as New Amsterdam.[2] The Dutch imposed significant restrictions on Jewish colonists, barring them from running for office, casting ballots, buying land, or worshipping publicly.[3] After the British took control of the city in 1664 and renamed it New York, Jews came to enjoy greater religious and economic freedom.[4] Small concentrations of Jews also appeared in Newport, Philadelphia, Charleston, and Savannah during the era of British colonial rule.[5]

New York Jewry tallied around 250 souls by the late colonial period.[6] With a vibrant congregation and commercial opportunity, the city’s Jewish community highlights the rich possibilities for Jewish life in the New World even before the advent of a revolution waged in the name of equality. Still, European bigotries migrated westward across the Atlantic. New York may have been the most inclusive toward Jews of the thirteen colonies, but toleration there had its limits.

The hub of New York’s Jewish community was the brick synagogue on Mill Street. Jewish donors from as far afield as Boston, Barbados, and Britain had helped fund its construction in 1730. All local Jews were expected to participate in synagogue life, and most lived in close proximity to the house of worship. At the heart of the building was the sanctuary where the congregants prayed. The ark was at the sanctuary’s east end—that is, in the direction of Jerusalem—and housed the Torah scrolls on which the Five Books of Moses were inscribed. A glowing lamp above the ark symbolized the eternal light that had burned in the holy temples of Jerusalem in ancient times. During worship, the men took up the sanctuary's lower level while the women occupied a balcony. The president and vice president of the congregation enjoyed the best seating by the ark. Those who failed to pay sufficient dues were relegated to the least desirable seats.[7]

A Gentile physician who once observed a religious service at Shearith Israel noticed that the men were donning skull caps and prayer shawls—known as kippot and tallitot in Hebrew—but he had only a vague sense of what he was witnessing: "The men wore their hats in the synagogue and had a veil of some white stuff which they sometimes threw over their heads in their devotion." He also remarked that "the women, of whom some were very pretty, stood up in a gallery like a hen coop."[8]

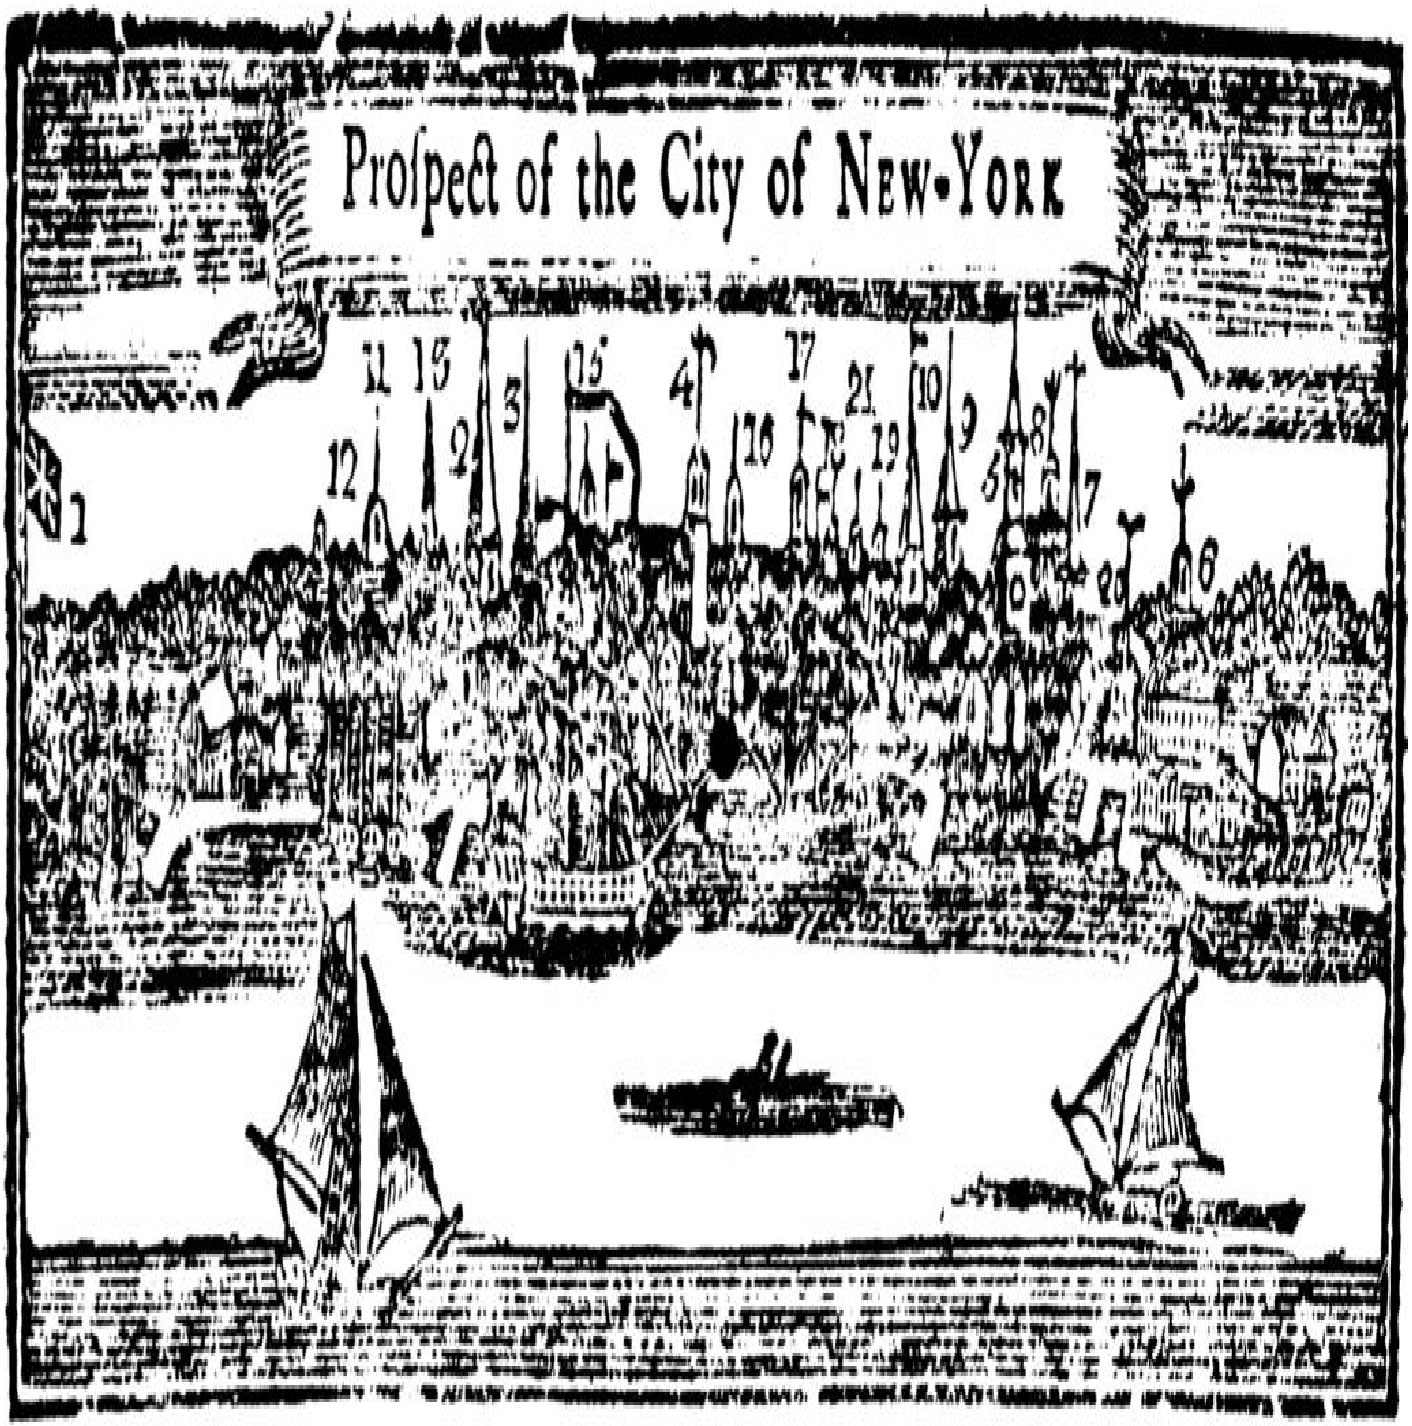
Although Ashkenazi Jews had outnumbered their Sephardic counterparts at Shearith Israel since the 1720s, the congregation's customs continued to bear the distinctive mark of its Sephardic origins. In accordance with Sephardic practice, the leader of the religious services was positioned at the center, rather than the front, of the sanctuary. Hebrew prayers were intoned in the Sephardic style (as they still are to this day at Shearith Israel). And in a tradition that would end with the Revolution, the congregants offered a prayer in Spanish for King George III.[9]

A board of elders selected and counseled the president, a lay leader who received no compensation for his services. Sometimes there were two copresidents. A president's duties included management of the synagogue's finances and arbitration of conflicts between congregants. He also supervised Shearith Israel's salaried employees. Among them was the hazzan, whose function was akin to that of a rabbi. (The synagogue would not have an official rabbi until the 1840s.) He ran religious services twice daily and thrice on the sabbath, Shabbat. The hazzan also circumcised baby boys, trained congregants' sons for their bar mitzvahs, and addressed theological inquiries as they arose. The shamash was the second paid officer and attended to the maintenance of the sanctuary. A third staffer, the shochet, ensured that the meat was kosher. The *shochet'*s diligence in his duties was of concern far beyond Shearith Israel because the kosher meat that he oversaw in New York was exported to Jewish communities throughout North America and the Caribbean. The synagogue also ran a school in a separate building where students learned Hebrew as well as secular subjects.[10] In one congregant's will, £50 annually were bequeathed "for the support of our Hebrew School at said New York to teach poor children the Hebrew tongue."[11]

Tradition formed the bedrock of community life. Observance of Shabbat was paramount, a sacred time of rest from sundown Friday to sundown Saturday. Working and even writing were forbidden.[12] Circumcision of boys was also an important religious tradition, taking place eight days from birth. The infant was given his name after a specially trained mohel performed the circumcision. In a set of instructions for the medical and ritualistic aspects of circumcision, a New York mohel wrote to Rhode Island's Moses Seixas in 1772, "The first and principal thing is, to have a good heart, to perform the operation with courage intermixed with tenderness."[13] As we will see, this was the same Moses Seixas to whom George Washington would address his famous Newport letter of 1790.

Yet another tradition was the bar mitzvah, a rite of passage wherein a thirteen-year-old boy chanted from the Torah. Weddings, too, were important events. If a man sought to wed a woman, his father first approached her family for permission. The presumptive groom then solicited the blessing of the congregation at large, underscoring the collective nature of Jewish life in colonial New York. A wedding contract was drafted consistent with Jewish custom. In the absence of rain, the ceremony took place outdoors; otherwise, the bride's family hosted the affair. Jewish couples tended to enjoy long marriages and averaged five children.[14]

Proſpect of the City of New-York



1 Fort George
2 Trinity Church
3 Presbyter. Meeting
4 North D. Church
5 St. George's Chapel
6 The Priſon.
7 New Brick Meeting
8 King's College
9 St. Paul's Church
10 N. Dutch Cal. Church
11 Old Dutch Church
12 Jew's Synagogue
13 Lutherian Church
14 The French Church
15 New Scot's Meeting
16 Quaker's Meeting
17 Calviniſt Church
18 Anabaptiſt Meeting
19 Moravian Meeting
20 N. Lutheran Church
21 Methodiſt Meeting

This illustration from a 1771 almanac shows the religious diversity of Manhattan in the late colonial period. The synagogue is identified as #12. Source: The New-York Pocket Almanack, for the year 1771 … by Thomas Moore, Philo. New York: Hugh Gaine, 1770.

Although Jews made up less than 1 percent of New York's population, they played an outsized role in the city's economic life. At the top of the Jewish hierarchy was the mercantile elite, comprising businessmen whose success in trade placed them among the colony's most prosperous merchants. They tended to sport fashionable British apparel and enjoyed working relationships with Christians. Beneath this gentry was a middle class of Jewish shopkeepers, vendors, and craftsmen. An underclass of impoverished Jews—including some who spent time in debtors' prison—survived on charity administered through the synagogue.[15]

In percentages consistent with New Yorkers at large, Jews were slave owners. Slavery was less central to life in urban New York than to the agrarian economies of the American South or West Indies. Still, New York had more slaves than any other city in the northern colonies. An affluent merchant—Jew or Gentile—might have claimed upwards of five slaves who cooked, cleaned, and cared for children. Artisans owned fewer slaves, using them to assist in workshops. Numerous other colonists did not own slaves themselves but would rent a given slave's labor from his or her owner. Slaves, of course, occupied the lowest stratum of New York society and offer a grisly reminder of the far superior position of contemporary Jews.[16]

Jewish life in New York had its share of internal conflict. Intermarriage between Sephardic and Ashkenazi Jews sometimes generated tensions at Shearith Israel. Whereas London and Amsterdam boasted large enough Jewish populations to have separate Sephardic and Ashkenazi synagogues, New York Jewry was too small for that kind of segregation.[17] Another fault line at Shearith Israel divided wealthier, established Jews from poorer newcomers. The former feared that their own status in the eyes of Gentiles might be imperiled by the meager appearance and broken English of recent Jewish immigrants.[18]

Sometimes high drama within the Jewish community emerged simply from personality clashes. When an elder rose to read from the Torah on one occasion, a younger man laughed at his unkempt prayer shawl—and a lawsuit was filed. In another disturbance, an aggressive congregant was forcibly escorted from the synagogue as he prepared to brawl with an adversary. And after the synagogue president refused a congregant's request to sermonize at a funeral service, the rejected congregant began to openly curse the president while a second unruly attendee offered a rogue "amen."[19]

Shared traditions and commercial ties bound the Jews of the New World with those in the Old, but American Jewry nevertheless claimed its own unique features. Jews in New York and other American cities came from a diverse array of European countries and Caribbean colonies, and so marriage between Jews of different geographic backgrounds fused together discrete Jewish subcultures and produced children who were a new type of Jew—the American Jew. Back in Europe, religious authority pervaded all realms of Jewish life. Synagogues levied taxes on their members' business dealings, and Jewish courts adjudicated various disputes among congregants. By way of contrast, in New York and elsewhere in the American colonies, Jews partook in commercial and civic affairs without the intervention of synagogue patriarchs. The American Jew kept one foot in the congregational community and another in the outside world. Sometimes these two spheres came into tension; eating kosher and observing Shabbat were especially difficult when traveling on business. Levels of religious adherence could vary widely even within a single Jewish family.[20]

American Jews also enjoyed more security and liberty than their European coreligionists.[21] Jews in British North America never faced banishment or state-sanctioned violence as they had in the Old World. And they found greater ability to achieve prosperity as merchants and shopkeepers than many European nations allowed.[22] New York Jews were the freest of any in the British Empire, and the property-owning among them were nearly on equal legal footing with their Christian neighbors by the eve of the Revolution.[23] The American Jewish community, moreover, confronted less discrimination than other religious minorities, partly because Jews were too few in number to generate as much notice as larger maligned groups. The total Jewish population in the thirteen colonies was around 2,000 in 1776, compared to 25,000 Catholics, who were more conspicuous and thus more likely to encounter intolerance.[24]

For all the advantages Jews in colonial America enjoyed relative to European Jewry, to American Catholics, and of course to slaves, acceptance only went so far. Most of the thirteen colonies barred Jews at various times from all manner of civic life—running for office, electing officials, practicing law, testifying in court, sitting on juries.[25] Even relatively tolerant New York saw its share of prejudice against Jews.

The most egregious incident in colonial New York involved mob violence directed at a Jewish funeral procession in 1743. A throng seized the corpse and subjected it to a mock conversion to Christianity.[26] One Gentile eyewitness, aghast at the spectacle, wrote into the New York Weekly Journal to deplore the "rude unthinking wretches" who formed a "rabble." These agitators were "lost to shame and humanity" as they "insulted the dead in such a vile manner that to mention all would shock a human ear." The bystander lamented, "I've only reason to abhor and despise many who (oh impudence!) dare style themselves Christians."[27]

New York Jewry worried about the desecration of its cemetery. Situated on the northeastern edge of Manhattan's settlement—some twenty minutes by foot from the synagogue—the burial ground was ringed by a wall to thwart intruders. Sister congregations in Newport, Philadelphia, Charleston, and Savannah likewise built walls or fences around their graveyards. Despite these precautions, all five Jewish cemeteries were vandalized.[28]

Old World caricatures of the conniving Jewish merchant resurfaced in New York. In 1765, a visitor from Massachusetts observed that in New York most businessmen "are observed to deal very much upon honor, excepting some Jews." These Jews "sustain no very good character, being many of them selfish and knavish, (and where they have an opportunity), an oppressive and cruel people."[29] Even a compliment about a Jew could unwittingly reveal the extent of antisemitic prejudice. When a respected Gentile lawyer praised a New Yorker as "the honestest Jew that has been in this place," he intimated much about the perceived integrity of Jews in general. The very word "Jew" carried pejorative connotations.[30] As a Gentile trader wrote in a letter, he had been so relentless in his efforts to sell his inventory of sugar that he had "almost turned Jew."[31]

The stubborn stereotype of the deceitful Jewish merchant was not without irony. In reality, Jews in New York and elsewhere achieved prosperity in large part because they could depend on the integrity of their fellow Jews. They cultivated an ethos of collective support among themselves in reaction to the discrimination that they encountered as a group. Jews prospered not because they duped their Gentile counterparts, as was so often alleged, but because they tapped into trusted networks of their coreligionists.[32] But Jewish probity in business was lost on bigots.

It was against this mixed backdrop—religious and economic freedom on the one hand, lingering antisemitism on the other—that New York Jewry questioned its fealty to the Crown as tensions flared between the mother country and her New World colonies. Political tumult in the 1760s and 1770s led many colonists of all faiths, Jews included, to reconsider their allegiance to Britain. A series of unwelcome taxes from Parliament sparked unrest across British North America. Colonists regarded these taxes as tyrannical encroachments on their liberty. After the Townshend Acts of 1767 levied duties on a variety of goods shipped from Britain to America—paper, glass, tea, paint, lead—ten respected Jewish merchants joined their names to a nonimportation agreement against British goods subject to these new duties.[33]

By 1775, colonial resistance to the British had become organized and violent. The first shots of the Revolution were fired in Lexington and Concord in April of that year. The following spring, the Continental Army stunned the British by seizing Boston, and the redcoats then turned their attention to capturing New York. As the British planned their invasion of the city, General George Washington convened his troops at the Common in Manhattan on July 9, 1776, for a public reading of the Declaration of Independence, signed by the Continental Congress five days prior.[34]

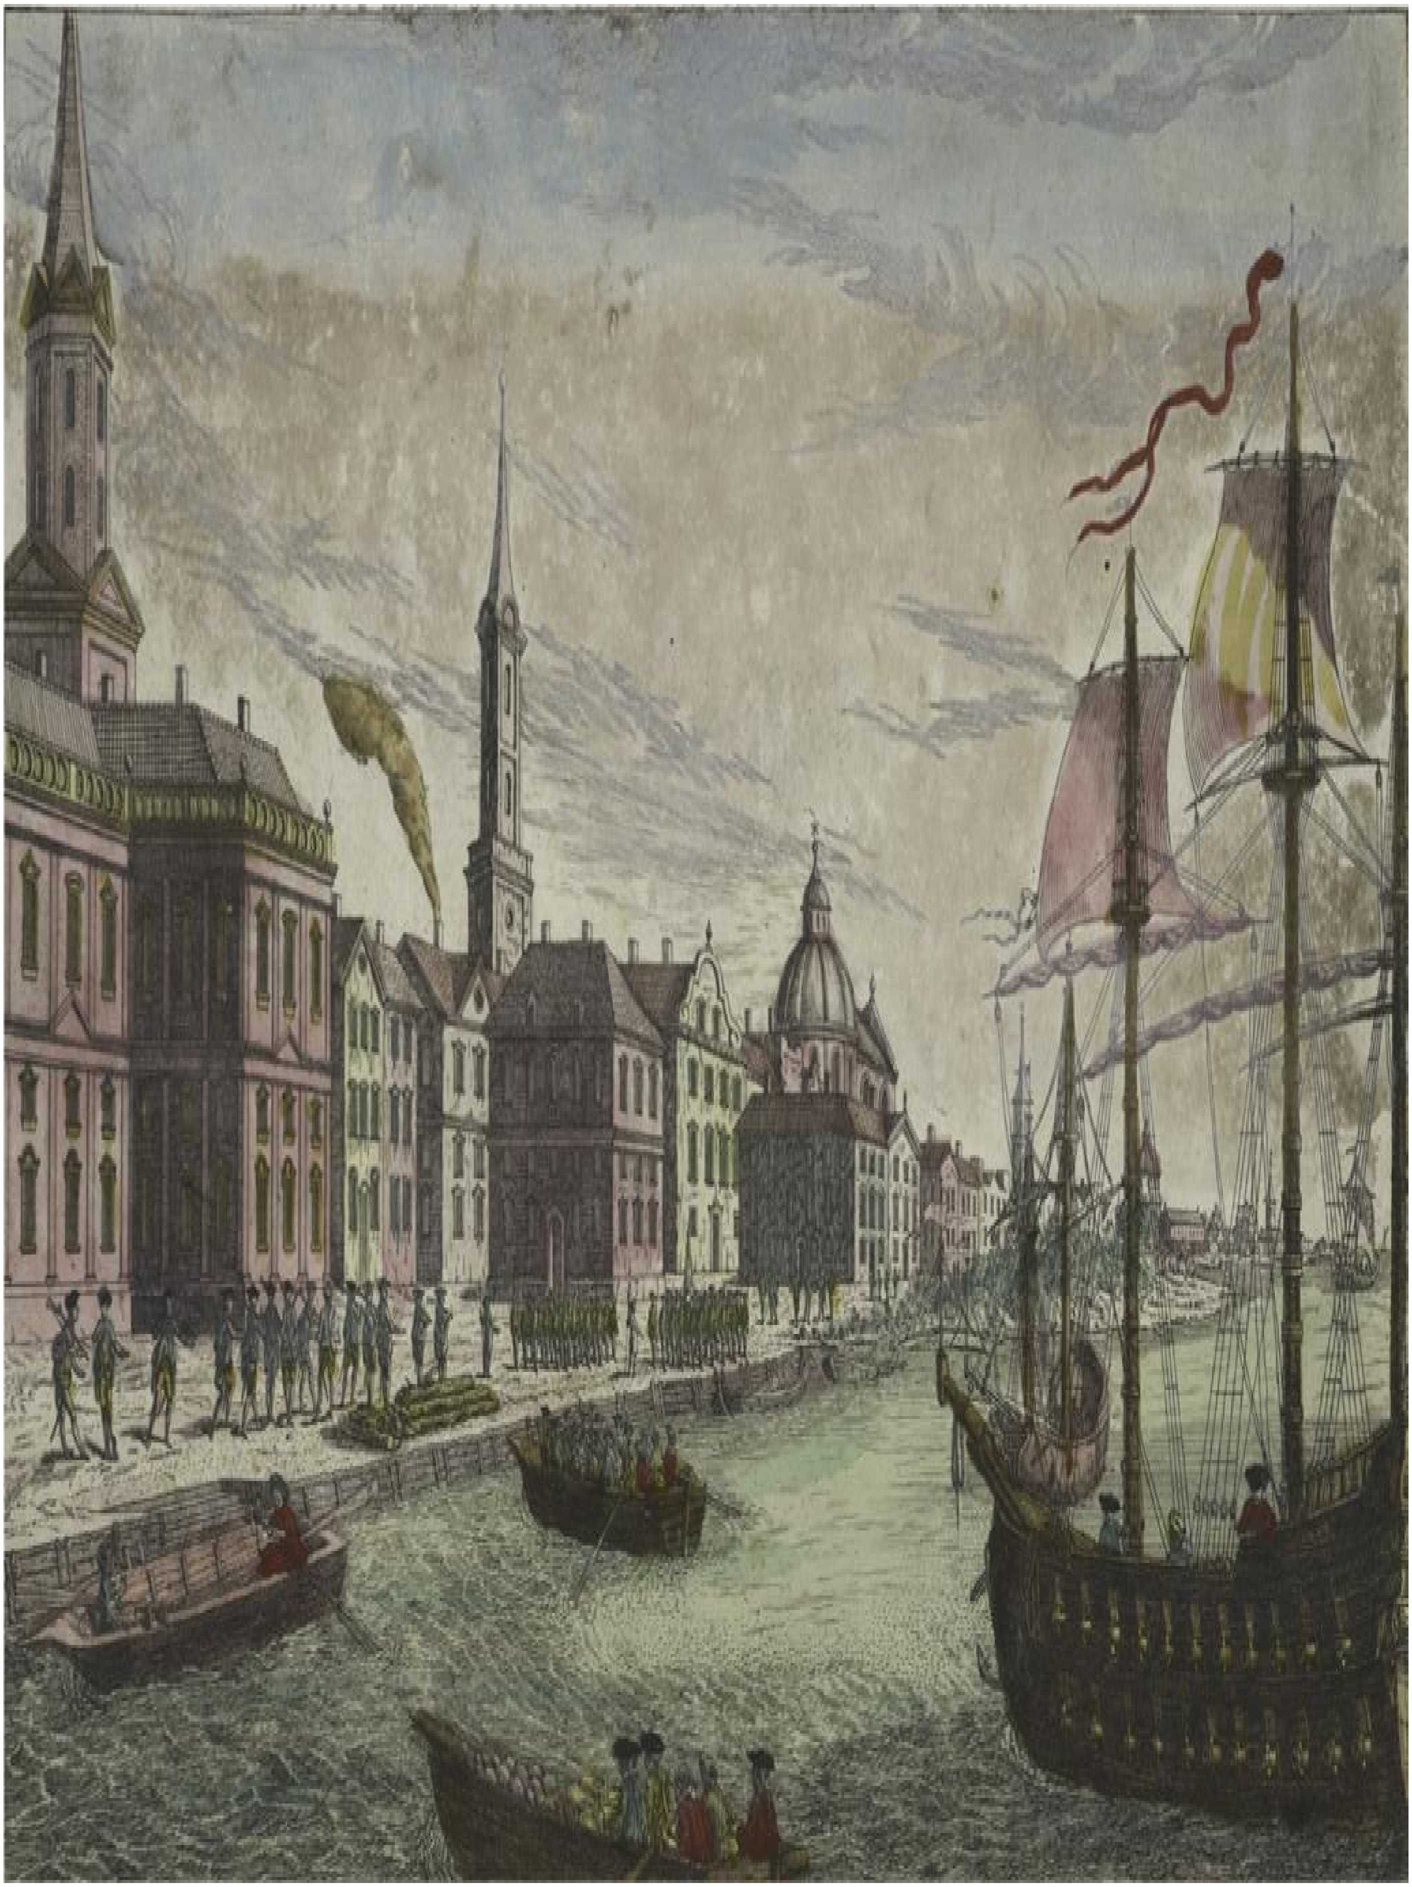
The members of the Jewish community in New York now faced a difficult choice. They could side with the Patriots and flee the city before it fell into British hands, or stay and pledge their loyalty to the Crown. Some feared that their exodus from New York would irreversibly dissolve the oldest Jewish congregation in America, one that had taken generations to develop. Others wanted to leave the city in solidarity with the Patriots.[35] In the end, most of New York's Jews abandoned their homes and aligned themselves with the cause of independence.[36] Their motivations for doing so were a combination of high-minded principles and hard-nosed practicalities. For many Jews, a revolution animated by the radical promise of equality understandably inspired stronger fidelity than did a mother country that relegated its Jews to second-class citizenship.[37] What's more, Jews were heavily involved in the mercantile life of America's port cities and thus had felt the effects of British interference in the colonial economy as directly as any group.[38]

A majority of those Jews who deserted New York that summer fled to Connecticut and later found refuge in Philadelphia. A fair number of New Yorkers counted among the nearly one hundred Jews nationwide who fought the redcoats. Several Jews became officers in the Continental Army, in contrast to the British forces, which limited their officer ranks to professing Christians. And there is at least one known case of a Jewish soldier on the Patriot side who was afforded leave from his sentinel duties on Friday nights so that he could observe Shabbat.[39]

Although Alexander Hamilton did not identify as a Jew at this point in life and his relationships with American Jews would form in earnest only after the Revolution, he shared much in common with New York Jewry in the late colonial era. Like many of the city's Jews, Hamilton was an immigrant who had to rely on his wits, not family fortune, to survive. He too gravitated toward an urban environment that was more receptive than the countryside to cosmopolitan outsiders. And in parallel with the majority of the New York Jewish community, Hamilton cast his lot with the Patriots.

When the conflict in America turned bloody, Hamilton wasted no time in joining the fray. Word of the skirmishes at Lexington and Concord incited a fervor in New York. Hamilton enlisted in a local militia alongside other King's College classmates who ran drills before morning classes. In March 1776, Hamilton was appointed an artillery captain and commanded sixty-eight men. When the British finally did invade New York that September, Hamilton was among the last of the Patriots to retreat. The twenty-two-year-old Hamilton then led his troops into battle in pivotal American victories at Trenton and Princeton.[40]

In these early days of the war, General Washington struggled to keep pace with the volume of his incoming correspondence—Congress, state governments, and, of course, the Continental Army all required his attention. "At present, my time is so much taken up at my desk, that I am obliged to neglect many other essential parts of my duty," he wrote to a lieutenant colonel under his command. "It is absolutely necessary therefore for me to have persons that can think for me, as well as execute orders."[41] In other words, Washington needed a talented ghostwriter, and he soon found one in Hamilton. In early 1777, Hamilton accepted an invitation from Washington to join the general as an aide-de-camp. The new role came with an elevation in rank for Hamilton to lieutenant colonel.[42]



British forces invade Manhattan in September 1776. Source: Franz Xaver Habermann, Debarquement des troupes engloises a nouvelle Yorck [ca. 1775–1796]. Miriam and Ira D. Wallach Division of Art, Prints and Photographs: Print Collection, New York Public Library.

Contemporaries attested to the autonomy that Washington afforded his astute assistant. "Hamilton had to think as well as write for him," an adjutant general wrote of the Hamilton-Washington dynamic.[43] Another officer offered a similar assessment: "The pen of our army was held by Hamilton and for dignity of manner, pith of matter, and elegance of style, General Washington's letters are unrivaled in military annals."[44] Thus began a relationship that would forever alter the trajectory of Hamilton's life.

The American quest to become the first colonies in the hemisphere to successfully secede from a mother country was a blood-soaked crucible—but not so hazardous as to prevent Hamilton from courting various young women in between battles. He put his talent at flirtation to use during elegant balls where military officers mingled with stylish ladies. Although short in stature and slight in frame, Hamilton had a handsome face with magnetic blue eyes. The arrival of Elizabeth Schuyler near the army's encampment in February 1780 brought a hasty end to Hamilton's dalliances with other romantic interests. Known as "Eliza," or sometimes "Betsey," she belonged to the illustrious Schuyler family of Albany. Her father, Philip, was a wealthy statesman who had served as a representative in the New York State Assembly, delegate in the Continental Congress, and general in the Continental Army. An orphan of limited means like Hamilton might not have typically expected to court a daughter of an aristocratic clan. But the turmoil of war shifted the usual course of social relations, and Hamilton's position as Washington's aide-de-camp elevated him to an acceptable standing.[45] Hamilton had mused eleven years earlier as a teenage clerk in St. Croix that military service in wartime could provide him upward mobility in an otherwise stratified world—and his prediction was proving strikingly prescient. He would later remark generally about "great revolutions" that they "serve to bring to light talents and virtues which might otherwise have languished in obscurity."[46]

The twenty-five-year-old Hamilton charmed the twenty-two-year-old object of his affection and her parents. After a two-month courtship, the Schuyler family consented to a marriage. Eliza was intelligent if not quite brilliant, attractive if not quite stunning—it was her virtuous character that set her apart. Her unassuming integrity went hand-in-hand with her religious devotion. One of Hamilton's fellow aides on Washington's military staff called Eliza "the little saint." Her family had Dutch origins and so naturally belonged to the Dutch Reformed Church.[47]

It is somewhat surprising that Hamilton chose a devout wife given his general apathy toward Christianity. Alexander and Eliza would move on divergent tracks in the realm of faith, with the husband keeping a distance from church life that the wife fully embraced.

Hamilton, to be sure, was not the sole husband of the era who showed less commitment to Christian piety than did his wife. Still, most other founders had more engagement with Christianity relative to Hamilton.[48] Only Benjamin Franklin appears to have rivaled Hamilton in ambivalence toward the Christian faith. Franklin acknowledged in his autobiography that he "seldom attended any public worship" and complained that church services were "dry, uninteresting, and unedifying."[49] Maybe church liturgy similarly struck Hamilton as stale. Or perhaps a Jewish upbringing made him resistant to little more than a nominal Christian identity.

Elizabeth Hamilton. Source: Ralph Earl, Portrait of Mrs. Alexander Hamilton [ca. 1787]. Museum of the City of New York. Image courtesy of the Athenaeum.

As the now betrothed Hamilton awaited his wedding, he crossed paths with a prominent Jewish officer, Major David Salisbury Franks, amid the most scandalous moment of the Revolution. Franks was born in Philadelphia around 1740. He relocated in 1774 to Montreal, where he worked as a merchant and assumed the presidency of the local synagogue. Canada was then under British control but retained a significant Francophone population from an earlier day of French colonial rule. Like many fellow Anglophones, Franks felt betrayed by the British in 1774 when Parliament, in a bid to appease French Canadians, instituted French law in civil matters in the province of Quebec. Anglophones bristled at this concession, which they considered an affront to their fundamental liberties. One disaffected Montrealer draped a garland of potatoes around a statue of King George III in the town square. When a French Canadian suggested that the potato culprit should face death, Franks offered a barbed reply. The verbal spat gave way to a fistfight, with Franks besting his opponent. Franks subsequently spent a week in jail for the brawl, affording him plenty of time to ruminate on his animus toward the British.[50]

After American forces captured Montreal early in the war, Franks provided the revolutionaries with supplies and funds. The Americans were later forced to retreat from Canada, and Franks decided to enlist in the Continental Army. Staying in British-occupied Canada would have been dangerous for him given his treason against the Crown.[51] Franks was soon appointed aide-de-camp to General Benedict Arnold.[52] Although Arnold fought valiantly against the British at first, he grew increasingly pessimistic about America's chances of success and struck a secret bargain with the enemy. In exchange for money and the promise of a high rank in the British Army in the future, Arnold would remain in the Continental Army as a spy and furtively notify the redcoats of American troop movements.[53]

Hamilton, Franks, and Arnold all converged on a fateful September day in 1780. Arnold was then the commanding officer at West Point's fort, perched above the Hudson River some fifty miles north of New York City. He dispatched a spy to relay covert information about the fort to the British. Meanwhile, George Washington and a coterie of aides, including Hamilton, were journeying to West Point to see Arnold. Hamilton was sent ahead to the Robinson House—which served as Arnold's headquarters near the fort—to prepare for Washington's arrival later that day.[54] David Franks was on hand when Hamilton appeared.[55]

As Hamilton ate breakfast with Arnold, the traitorous general received a note from a colonel on the Patriot side. The note explained that Patriot soldiers had intercepted a spy and recovered from the spy's boot the secret plans for West Point's fortifications. The colonel who had authored the note was not complicit in the subterfuge; he was informing his superior Arnold of the spy merely as a matter of course. The note had the unintended effect of tipping off Arnold that his scheme had been foiled. Although Arnold himself was not yet implicated, he surmised that his own role in the espionage would likely come to light in short order. Arnold suddenly announced that he needed to check on the fort and would return in an hour. In reality, Arnold made a hasty escape to a British warship.[56]

Washington soon appeared on the scene at the Robinson House, and not long after a messenger came with materials documenting Arnold's treason. The crestfallen Washington lamented, "Arnold has betrayed me. Whom can we trust now?"[57] Not surprisingly, suspicion fell on Franks as well as another Arnold aide, Richard Varick. But exoneration for both men would come almost immediately. On the very day that Arnold absconded, he penned a letter to Washington taking sole responsibility for his treason. Arnold wrote that, "In justice to the gentlemen of my [military] family, Colonel Varick and Major Franks, I think myself in honor bound to declare that they" were "totally ignorant of any transactions of mine" that "were injurious to the public."[58]

Although Washington was wholly convinced of Franks's rectitude, nevertheless Franks pressed for a military tribunal to undertake a full probe so that no one could entertain the slightest misgiving about his commitment to the Patriot cause. Washington acceded to the request. As the case was pending, Franks wrote to Washington to ask that the tribunal expand its purview to include not just the recent treason but also an earlier, unrelated episode in 1779. At that time Arnold had been court-martialed for numerous infractions, including financial malfeasance. Franks—who had given testimony in those proceedings refuting the notion that Arnold was guilty of improper expenditures—was convinced that rumors abounded he had perjured himself to protect Arnold. If the imminent military tribunal would investigate perjury as well as treason, then Franks could clear his names on both counts. In his letter to Washington, Franks bemoaned that they lived in a "world too easily misled by first reports and prejudices."[59]

Hamilton, ghostwriting for Washington, replied to a nervous Franks. He told Franks that while the military tribunal would adjudicate the matter of treason, the question of perjury "is so much of a civil nature that I think you had best procure some sort of civil examination."[60] It is unclear why Hamilton thought an inquiry into possible perjury in a court-martial would be a civil matter. His suggestion may have been a tactical one to spare the pending military tribunal the burden of an investigation beyond its original remit. In any event, the tribunal convened shortly thereafter to consider the question of treason alone. Its final determination was unequivocal: "Every part of Major D. S. Franks' conduct … reflects the highest honor on him as an officer, distinguishes him as a zealous friend to the independence of America, and justly entitles him to the attention and confidence of his countrymen."[61]

Yet Franks was still uneasy. He requested that Washington make public the tribunal's report, fearing that "many people are to this hour inclined to think that my connection with Arnold could not be void of criminality."[62] There is no extant reply from

Washington, but he surely did allow for the report's release, as he had already done the same for Varick, who underwent a similar investigation. Franks also took up Hamilton's advice to undergo a civil inquiry, which further acquitted him of wrongdoing.[63]

Given that no army generals ever doubted Franks's innocence, his hypersensitivity about his reputation is telling. A common antisemitic trope, salient in novels of the time, was the Jew as a shifty operative engaged in espionage.[64] So it would be unsurprising if Franks felt that he, as a Jew, had to take particular care to demonstrate his patriotism. His complaint about a world rife with "prejudices" probably stemmed from a belief that undercurrents of antisemitism were feeding rumors of his alleged treachery.[65] After the war, Franks was rewarded for his loyalty with the opportunity to represent the United States as an envoy to France and Morocco, thereby becoming the first Jewish diplomat in American history.[66]

Once Washington became president, Franks solicited him for a post in the new administration. The president opted not to appoint Franks to a full-time role. Washington did, however, name the Jewish veteran as secretary to a trio of federal commissioners embarking on a two-month assignment in Georgia where they were to negotiate a peace treaty with the Creek Indians. At the conclusion of the undertaking, the entourage returned to the capital—then New York—and shared a meal with Washington.[67] The president recorded in his diary, "The commissioners … dined with me today, as did their secretary Colo. Franks."[68] This was, perhaps, Washington's first and only instance dining with a professing Jew.[69]

As the coda to his long career in public service, Franks took a position in the early 1790s at the Bank of the United States, one of Hamilton's signature endeavors during the Washington administration.[70] But soon thereafter a yellow fever epidemic claimed Franks's life. Washington counted "Colo. Franks" among those "acquaintances [who] have fallen victims to the prevailing malignant fever."[71] This choice of language seems to hint at more than just tangential familiarity, if not quite friendship, between the two men.[72] In all his dealings with Franks, Washington showed a total absence of antisemitic bias, which is in itself notable by the standards of the day. Washington's lack of prejudice against Jews was of a piece with Hamilton's, although the former never developed the extensive ties to Jews that the latter would.

Hamilton also had an important, albeit indirect, connection to the most renowned Jew of the Revolution: Haym Salomon. During the war, the new nation suffered from depreciating currency and ballooning debt.[73] Hamilton set forth a bold proposal for how the embattled United States could bring the war to an end through financial maneuvers—and Salomon's unique skills would prove pivotal in realizing that vision.

Insatiable in his quest for knowledge, Hamilton somehow found time to study economics amid the duress of war. He had first honed his mercantile acumen as a clerk in the Caribbean. Now Hamilton read widely about European financial affairs, taking note that Jews featured prominently in the markets of the Old World. “Prague is the principal city of Bohemia,” he recorded in a notebook, “the principal part of the commerce of which is carried on by the Jews.”[74]

Hamilton’s survey of various financial systems culminated in a lengthy letter to Robert Morris in the spring of 1781. Born in Liverpool, Morris came to America as a fourteen-year-old in the 1740s.[75] He found success as a merchant and, notably, was derided by a critic for being “rich as a Jew.”[76] It is unlikely that his wealth would have provoked an antisemitic slur had Morris been the heir to a large plantation in the countryside (in the manner of a Christian aristocrat) instead of a self-made businessman (in the mold of a Jew). Morris served in the Continental Congress, signed the Declaration of Independence, and—with the nation mired in economic crisis during the Revolution—was nominated by Congress to the newly created position of superintendent of finance of the United States.[77] On the eve of assuming office and inheriting a financial emergency, he received a forty-five-page handwritten letter from the twenty-six-year-old Hamilton, who was never shy about exhibiting his talents to older men in power.[78]

Hamilton’s message conveyed the crucial insight that British credit buttressed the enemy’s army while America’s insufficient credit beleaguered its own. Bolstering American credit could obviate protracted fighting. As he told Morris, “Tis by introducing order into our finances—by restoring public credit—not by gaining battles, that we are finally to gain our object.” Hamilton believed that the best means to address the ongoing “catastrophe” was a national bank that alone could provide the substantial credit required. He then offered a highly detailed blueprint for such a bank. Hamilton’s plan reflected an impressive depth of financial knowledge for someone who had never before worked as a banker, much less designed a national economic strategy.[79]

Morris was humble enough to appreciate Hamilton’s letter, replying, “I have read it with that attention which it justly deserves” and “I esteem myself much your debtor for this piece.” He signaled to Hamilton that future suggestions would be most welcome: “My office is new and I am young in the execution of it. Communications from men of genius and abilities will always be acceptable.”[80] Morris’s words were more than just empty flattery. Less than three weeks after receiving Hamilton’s correspondence, Morris submitted to Congress a plan for a national bank that reflected many of the younger man’s ideas.[81] The success of the endeavor—called the Bank of North America—would hinge not just on financial capital but also human talent. As Hamilton had explained to Morris, “The game we play is a sure game, if we play it with skill.”[82] And Morris managed to find the most skilled player of the era: Haym Salomon.

Born in Poland in 1740, Salomon wandered through Europe as a young man—picking up six foreign tongues along the way—before settling in New York. He was working as a merchant in 1776 when stories filtered down to the city about the troubled American military campaign against the British in Quebec. The revolutionaries were lacking vital supplies, and so the enterprising Salomon headed north with provisions. While en route he encountered a Patriot leader who agreed to furnish him with a letter of introduction to

General Philip Schuyler, Hamilton's future father-in-law. Salomon soon crossed paths with Schuyler himself, whose battered troops had retreated southward from Canada. The letter of introduction endorsed Salomon as a trustworthy businessman, assuring Schuyler, "Mr. Salomon has hitherto sustained the character of being warmly attached to America." Schuyler gladly accepted Salomon's services.[83]

Salomon returned to New York just before the redcoats seized the city in September 1776. He was imprisoned by the British on account of his American sympathies but managed to exploit his German-language skills to win over the Hessian guards who monitored the prison. Following his release, Salomon trafficked in goods for these guards, all the while smuggling out American and French prisoners of war. When a fire erupted in New York, he immediately came under suspicion of arson by British soldiers. They chased him through the city streets, but Salomon evaded capture. Once safely settled in Philadelphia, he wrote to the Continental Congress describing his "great service to the French and American prisoners." Salomon recounted how he had "assisted them with money and helped them off to make their escape." He was "so obnoxious to the British Headquarters" that he had been "pursued by the guards" but "made his happy escape."[84]

After Robert Morris received congressional approval for establishing the Bank of North America in Philadelphia, he quickly tapped Salomon to join the endeavor. Salomon combined a talent for languages with an intimate understanding of foreign currencies. As Morris's broker, he facilitated the exchange of Spanish, French, and Dutch money for American bonds. Salomon himself was among the early investors in the Bank of North America. The willingness of the country's foremost bill broker to dedicate his own resources to the bank prompted other men of means to do the same.[85]

The challenge of stabilizing the nation's finances required not just Salomon's knowledge base but his persuasive abilities as well. Rival brokers, unlike Salomon, did not work for the U.S. government and were thus free to sell bonds below the government's rates. Yet Salomon prevailed upon them to raise their prices to match his own. This would admittedly cost Salomon's rivals some business, but the boon to the country's financial health would lead to victory in the war, he assured them. Salomon also devised a scheme to ensure that banks in London would accept American currency. He convinced British officers that they had to legitimize American bills by signing them in order to aid British prisoners of war who were reliant on the stability of American legal tender for their supplies.[86]

As Salomon generated public funds for the nation, he donated personal funds to the Jewish community. In the early 1780s, he made the largest contribution of any individual to the construction of a synagogue in Philadelphia and paid for a Torah scroll. His generosity was not limited to his coreligionists. Salomon gave loans for little or no interest to several prominent statesmen, and apparently Hamilton was among them. Hamilton's ledger book shows that he repaid Salomon £150 in Pennsylvania currency shortly after the war.[87]

Salomon contracted tuberculosis—known at the time as "consumption"—and died in 1785 at the age of forty-five. He was survived by his young wife, Rachel, and their three children. Although Salomon's estate included large holdings in government securities, they were significantly depreciated, and Rachel was left destitute.[88] Still, his legacy of a national bank, one that Hamilton had envisioned, endured well beyond Salomon's premature demise. Both men illustrate how the financial world of the early republic was particularly accessible to talented outsiders.

As Hamilton handled Washington's correspondence and studied finance in his quieter hours, he hungered to return to the battlefield. His desk work for the general was vital to the war effort, but Hamilton sensed that the musket rather than the pen would earn him the esteem he craved. The headstrong Hamilton was not shy about reminding Washington of his preference for combat, prodding his boss, "I explained to you candidly my feeling with respect to military reputation and how much it was my object to act a conspicuous part in some enterprise that might perhaps raise my character as a soldier above mediocrity." Washington, for his part, had little inclination to risk his gifted aide in the field. A disaffected Hamilton eventually left the general's staff in frustration. But the rupture proved temporary as Washington eventually acceded to Hamilton's request for command of a battalion in the summer of 1781. That October, Hamilton led the charge against the British in the Battle of Yorktown in eastern Virginia. The battle proved decisive in ensuring America's independence and making Hamilton a bona fide military hero. Yorktown would not be the final time that Hamilton hazarded death for honor.[89]

When the guns of the Revolutionary War fell silent, Hamilton set off for his father-in-law's mansion in Albany, where Eliza awaited him, now pregnant with their first child.[90] Just as Hamilton was settling into family life, a ghost from his Caribbean boyhood intruded on his domestic idyll. Recall that after Rachel Levine's death, the Danish probate court on St. Croix awarded the entirety of her estate to her one son born in wedlock, Peter Levine. Alexander and his full brother, James Jr., were left destitute. Now, fourteen years later, Hamilton received word that Peter had died and bequeathed to him little more than a pittance. Hamilton relayed to Eliza the news of "the death of my brother Levine" and the "disagreeable piece of intelligence" that "he dies rich, but has disposed of the bulk of his fortune to strangers."[91] For the second time in his life, Hamilton had been effectively robbed of his mother's estate. This festering wound from his woeful adolescence is just one example of how the adult Hamilton was inescapably informed by his earliest years. His advanced understanding of international trade and preoccupation with military glory were also rooted in his West Indian upbringing. And as we will see, Hamilton would forge relationships with Jews in yet one more illustration of how his Caribbean past echoed in his American adulthood.

4

New York

WITH THE COUNTRY FINALLY AT PEACE, Alexander Hamilton embarked on a legal career that furnished some of his most important links to New York Jewry. The war had prematurely ended Hamilton's collegiate education in 1776 before he and his fellow classmates could graduate. Now, at age twenty-seven, he was far too old to pick up his undergraduate studies, and in any event a bachelor's degree was not a prerequisite for professional success at that time. Hamilton even bypassed the usual clerkship in a law office that most lawyers-in-training undertook. Instead, he delved into a legal curriculum of his own device. There were two kinds of credentials for practicing law in New York at the time—one to become an attorney who prepared cases and another to qualify as a counselor who litigated them in court. After several months of solitary study in Albany, Hamilton earned both credentials by October 1782.[1]

The redcoats, meanwhile, continued to occupy New York until the United States and Britain agreed to the final terms of a peace treaty. Finally, in late 1783, British troops evacuated the city, leaving the triumphant Americans to peacefully reclaim what was violently lost seven years earlier. The war had exacted a severe toll on New York. Homes were in ruins, the streets strewn with garbage, and the wharves corroding with rot. Nevertheless, Hamilton resolved for the second time in his life to make the city his adopted home. Alexander, Eliza, and their baby, Philip, took up residence on the road that would become forever associated with Hamilton: Wall Street.[2]

Evacuation Day. Source: "Evacuation Day" and Washington's Triumphal Entry in New York City, Nov. 25th, 1783. Philadelphia: E. P. & L. Restein. Library of Congress, Prints and Photographs Division.

Hamilton was hardly the only displaced New Yorker to find his way back. Thousands returned to rebuild their lives and their city, including many Jews. They found the synagogue still intact; it had been maintained throughout the war by the Loyalist bloc within the Jewish community that stayed in New York. To the credit of the British Army, two redcoats who desecrated the synagogue during the war were harshly disciplined. Now in peacetime, the Patriot and Loyalist factions of Shearith Israel managed to reunite with minimal discord.[3]

The 1780s were tumultuous for New York's mercantile class as it confronted a new era of Atlantic commerce. The Revolution had upended long-established trade networks, presenting merchants with unprecedented opportunities and novel challenges. On the one hand, they were freed from royal authority; on the other, Britain barred Americans from lucrative business with its Caribbean colonies. Alongside these upheavals in the market were new developments in the legal arena. America had become a sovereign nation, unencumbered by the judicial precedents and legislative statutes of its former mother country. The quickly shifting terrain of both commerce and law meant that the nexus of the two—commercial law—was particularly ripe for a versatile mind like Hamilton's.[4]

He began work as an energetic young lawyer with a client roster that included the city's leading Jewish merchants. Among the first Jews whom Hamilton represented was a prominent figure within Shearith Israel, Solomon Simson. He was the son of Joseph Simson, a Frankfurt native who had come to New York at the age of thirty-two in 1718. In Hamilton's day, Joseph enjoyed status as a revered elder known for recounting firsthand memories of New York as it had existed in the early 1700s, when lower Manhattan consisted largely of orchards.[5] Before the Revolution, Solomon Simson and his brother, Samson—apparently their father had a taste for alliteration—teamed with three other Jews in a candle business. In a bid to co-opt competition, a New England–based candle conglomerate persuaded the Simson brothers and their partners to merge into the combine.[6]

The Simsons were Patriots whose fidelity to the Revolution prompted them to join the Jewish exile from New York as the British prepared to invade Manhattan in 1776. Joseph had been obligated to wear a "Jew badge" in his youth in Frankfurt, a bitter memory that drew him to the American revolutionaries' promise of equality.[7] When Solomon returned to New York after the war, he resumed his professional endeavors as a merchant and his religious leadership in the community. Solomon was elected president of Shearith Israel on multiple occasions. He also corresponded with the far reaches of the Jewish diaspora, penning letters to Jewish congregations in India and China.[8]

Solomon Simson turned to the thirty-year-old Hamilton for help in 1784 in a suit against Ebenezer Jones that was filed in the New York Supreme Court. Hamilton sought for his client compensation of £4,000 in New York currency after Jones had seized "with force and arms" a variety of goods from Simson, including clothing, furniture, and 1,454 bushels of salt. Jones argued that the merchandise had been lawfully taken as the spoils of war because the goods in question were confiscated behind enemy lines before Britain and America negotiated a peace.[9] (The litigation between Simson and Jones would continue into the 1790s, by which point Hamilton had left private legal practice to serve in the Washington administration.)

The case is noteworthy because the lawyer whom Hamilton opposed in the courtroom was the same man he would one day face on the dueling grounds—Aaron Burr. The commonalities between Hamilton and Burr are striking. Born within just two years of each other, both were orphaned as children. Each joined the Patriot cause during the Revolution and served on General Washington's staff. Though diminutive in stature, Burr and Hamilton alike were handsome and flirtatious. They passed the bar in quick succession after the war and moved with their wives to homes on Wall Street. Hamilton and Burr would become giants of the legal profession in New York and ultimately major figures in American politics.[10]

Yet for all the similarities between these two men, their disparities are even more conspicuous. While Hamilton was begotten out of wedlock on a Caribbean island and left a penniless child upon his mother's tragic death, Burr claimed lineage in one of America's most aristocratic families. Whereas Hamilton forged a close relationship with Washington during the war, Burr irritated Washington and remained forever at a remove from the celebrated general. If Hamilton was a man of deeply held principles, then Burr had few convictions. And in contrast to Hamilton's propensity for publicly airing his views, Burr's penchant was for strategic silence.[11]

It was in court that their differences were at their most pronounced. Hamilton delivered grandiose performances that stretched for hours; Burr was at once less evocative and more concise. A New York congressman remarked, "When they were rivals at the bar … Burr would say as much in half an hour as Hamilton in two hours. Burr was terse and convincing, while Hamilton was flowing and rapturous."[12] Their contrasts in the legal arena went beyond style to their most fundamental beliefs about law. Burr held no special reverence for the law, defining it as "whatever is boldly asserted, and plausibly maintained."[13] Hamilton, conversely, celebrated the majesty of the law. For him, devotion to the rule of law was the only means by which America's experiment in self-government could endure. As Hamilton once wrote in an essay, "If it were to be asked, What is the most sacred duty and greatest source of security in a Republic? The answer would be, An inviolable respect for the Constitution and Laws."[14] That which Hamilton held sacrosanct was for Burr merely a game to be won.

Burr and Hamilton faced off against one another in court more often than they collaborated for the same client,[15] but even in the latter instances, their rivalry could flare up. Early in their careers, for example, they were cocounsels in a trial, and protocol dictated that the lead lawyer give the closing argument. The self-assured Hamilton, fashioning himself the lead, proposed that Burr give the opening and he the closing. Piqued at Hamilton's suggestion, Burr slyly acquiesced—only to make all of the points that Hamilton intended to cover. Hamilton was left with nothing to say, and Burr alone received the accolades for the case.[16]

It was in these early years of Hamilton's legal practice that he began a decades-long role as lawyer and trustee for the Jewish trading firm of Moses and Company. The head of the firm was Isaac Moses, one of Shearith Israel's great patriarchs. He was known for his charitable donations to indigent Jews, involvement in synagogue life, and taste for European art.[17] Firmly allied with the revolutionaries, he fled the city in 1776 as the British invaded Manhattan. According to legend, Moses received word of the imminent arrival of redcoats on Shabbat and insisted on escaping by foot rather than wagon so as to adhere to the Sabbath's prohibition on riding. He joined other Jewish Patriots who eventually settled in Philadelphia until the war's conclusion.[18]

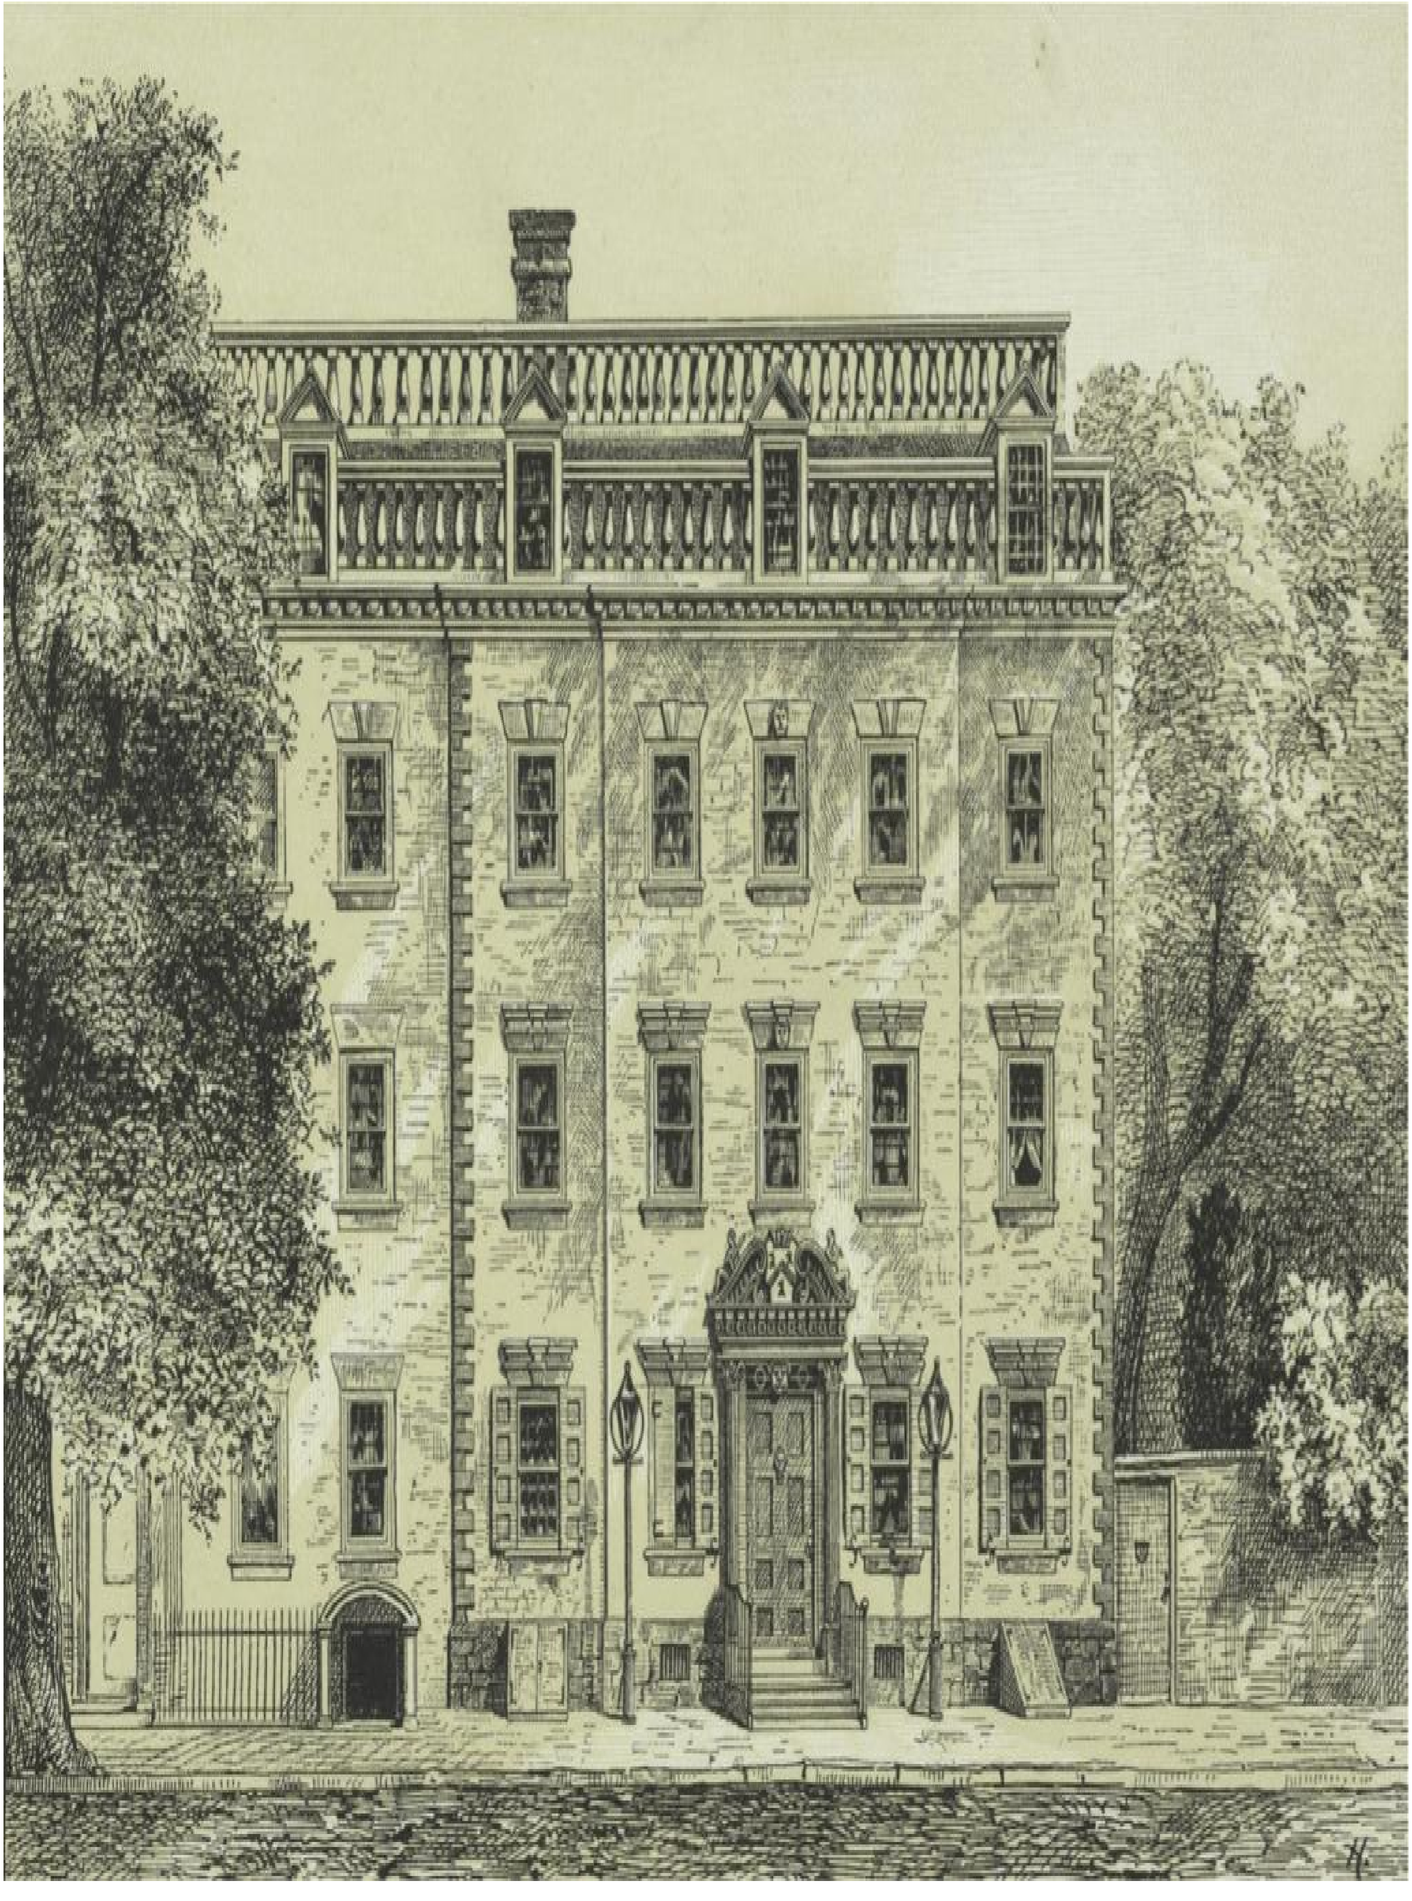
Moses's contributions to the fight for independence were substantial. To establish the credibility of the Continental Congress's paper currency, he helped raise $20,000 in coins that were exchanged for Continental dollars, a service that won him the appreciation of the congressional president, John Hancock. Moses also furnished a £3,000 bond to fund supplies for the army and personally ensured that soldiers had access to scarce commodities.[19] When the Bank of North America was struggling, Haym Salomon sought the aid of Moses (who was related to Salomon through marriage). Moses understood that the Revolution hinged not just on cannons but on currency, and so he drew from his considerable fortune to purchase promissory notes from the bank, which stimulated its cash flow.[20]

Isaac Moses's greatest involvement in the American cause was his role as a privateer—that is, someone whom the government deputized to arm private ships that would attack British vessels on the high seas. He provisioned eight boats, some quite large, like the Marbois with its crew of eighty-five.[21] Among Moses's partners in privateering was the nation's superintendent of finance, Robert Morris.[22] When Moses was unable to secure sufficient gunpowder for a schooner, he petitioned Congress for help. He explained that his search for gunpowder left him "everywhere disappointed" and he was "now under the disagreeable necessity of troubling Your Honors, and to pray that you would be pleased to spare … out of the public stores, two or three hundred weight of powder." Moses touted his "principles as a true Whig [i.e., Patriot] and friend to the liberties of his country" and was confident that it was "needless" to "remind your body of the assistance" he had thus far extended to the Revolution.[23]

While in wartime Philadelphia, Moses assumed the presidency of the local congregation, Mikveh Israel (meaning "Hope of Israel"), a position he had held previously at Shearith Israel in New York. He understood the importance of diplomacy with Philadelphia's Christians. As his congregation prepared to build a synagogue on a particular plot of land, a local church expressed its displeasure at the location, and Moses, in turn, sent a conciliatory note. "Our intention was to build a synagogue and a school-house thereon, for the use of our congregation, not conceiving that we would in the least disturb you," he explained. "To our great surprise we are told that it will." Moses informed the church that although a different location for the synagogue would be both more expensive and less accessible, his congregation would make that sacrifice because "we wish to live in friendship with our neighbors." When construction on the synagogue finally began, Moses was one of four congregants conferred the honor of laying a cornerstone. He may have exhibited tactful deference to Christians but was less measured with his own congregants, chastising them for chatting during religious services. "We now bind ourselves by the strictest ties of honor to behave with decency and decorum," Moses demanded.[24]

Following the British evacuation, Isaac Moses was among those who returned to New York. He became president of Shearith Israel once again and continued to represent the Jewish community to the outside world. Moses counted among three Jews who sent a letter to the governor of New York on behalf of "the Ancient Congregation of Israelites." They claimed that among the various "religious societies," none had "manifested a more zealous attachment to the sacred cause of America in the late war with Great Britain" than the Jews. The governor could rest assured that Jewish law required Jews to "obey our rulers" and that the Jewish community in New York would diligently fulfill "the duties of good citizens." The letter praised the state constitution of 1777, which in its guarantee of the free exercise of faith was "wisely framed to preserve the inestimable blessings of civil and religious liberty."[25] Amid the Revolution, as American colonies-turned-states had set about drafting constitutions for themselves, New York's constitutional convention was the only one in which the question of equality for Jews had been assumed rather than debated.[26] It is notable that the letter sent to the governor referred to Jews as a religious "society." In Europe, Jews were considered a foreign "race" or "nation" unto themselves, whereas Christian denominations were called "societies." Isaac Moses and his cosignatories were thus rejecting the prejudicial language of the Old World and indicating their intent to be counted as equals with their Christian counterparts.[27]

Beyond Isaac Moses's leadership in Shearith Israel, he was also a founding member of the Bank of New York, a thoroughly Hamiltonian institution. Postwar New York was a city with no bank. Several merchants were keen to collectively establish one; they were equally keen to avail themselves of Hamilton's services when he agreed in 1784 to help launch the endeavor. Hamilton wrote the Bank of New York's constitution unilaterally, served as a director, and represented the bank as its lawyer. He was motivated in part by concerns about the volatility of the currency markets. Despite the existence of the dollar as national currency, businesses still advertised goods in pounds, shillings, and pence. Complicating matters further was the fact that individual states printed their own paper money. Meanwhile, foreign bills from European countries circulated widely in New York City. And exchange rates were far from uniform. Hamilton knew that a bank could stabilize the currency market by disseminating its own money and publishing exchange rates. Support from reputable merchants such as Moses was central to the success of the bank, which helped make New York a hub for global finance.[28]



H.

The Bank of New York occupied the Walton House in its early years. Source: Abraham Hosier, The Walton House, Pearl Street. Large Tree on Walk to Left; Garden Wall, Trees, and Shrubs to Right. Miriam and Ira D. Wallach Division of Art, Prints and Photographs: Print Collection, New York Public Library.

At the time that Hamilton became involved in Isaac Moses's shipping firm in 1785, Moses had two business partners who were also Jewish merchants: Moses Myers and Samuel Myers. The two Myerses were unrelated but warm friends who shared much in common besides their surname. Both were New York–born and had served in the Virginia militia.[29] Virginia was one of several states that, despite having almost no Jews prior to the Revolution, boasted a number of Jewish soldiers in their militias during the war.[30] This dispersal of Jews is unsurprising given that British troops managed to occupy for some stretch of time each of the five American port cities that claimed a Jewish community.[31]

Moses and Company ran offices in New York and Amsterdam. The partners exported materials such as lumber, grain, and fur, while importing liquors, spices, and teas. At a time when overland travel was difficult, a given partner in the firm would sometimes journey a grueling 500 miles throughout America in a nine-day span to transact with far-flung clientele.[32]

The 1780s were trying years for merchant shippers like Moses, Myers, and Myers. Not only had Britain cut off Americans from profitable business with its Caribbean islands, but other European powers—including France, Spain, and Portugal—resisted commercial treaties with the United States, which they viewed as a trading rival to be bested. Without foreign markets for their produce, American farmers lacked funds with which to purchase goods from domestic merchants. Oversupplied merchants, in turn, were forced to flood local markets with underpriced wares. Bankruptcy loomed for soil tillers and traders alike.[33]

Compounding these difficulties was the fragmentary nature of economic life under the Articles of Confederation, which had governed America since 1781. The United States was more of a loose collection of thirteen mini-nations than a unified country with a single-minded economic policy. Every state in the Union levied its own tariffs on foreign goods and sometimes even on imports from other American states. Moses Myers spoke for many when he voiced his concern that economic disorder would breed political disorder. Writing to his partner Samuel, he remarked, "For my part, [I] should not be surprised at a civil war taking place on this continent."[34]

Isaac Moses's firm was vulnerable in these troubled times. As its American debtors failed to make payment, Moses and his partners were unable to meet their own debt obligations to creditors in Holland and England. Moses, Myers, and Myers soon owed upwards of £150,000. That they had managed to accrue such a staggering debt betokens their prominence in transatlantic trade.[35]

In April 1785, one of the firm's American creditors, Jeremiah Wadsworth, asked his lawyer—Hamilton—if he and his business partner should be concerned. "I have received very unfavorable accounts respecting Isaac Moses and Co," he reported to

Hamilton, expressing his fear that “we shall be liable to any loss in case of his ruin.”[36] Hamilton replied that he was aware of the firm’s difficulties, as he had already met with Moses personally. “Mr. Moses, who is one of the partners, called upon me to consult me professionally as to the measures I should think it advisable for him to pursue,” Hamilton shared. “I told him … that as I did not think your interest incompatible with his, I should freely give him my counsel.” Hamilton knew that if creditors grew anxious and began demanding payment, the insolvent Moses would face financial downfall. Creditors such as Wadsworth would in turn receive little of what they were owed. So Hamilton urged patience on Wadsworth’s part, and vouched for Moses: “He is very enterprising.”[37]

Wadsworth had good reason to trust Hamilton’s integrity on this count. Wadsworth’s business partner, John Church, was married to Hamilton’s beloved sister-in-law. Church had wedded Eliza’s older sister, Angelica, in 1777 shortly before Hamilton entered the Schuyler family orbit. Angelica and Alexander shared a deep friendship that sometimes edged into flirtation. Whereas Eliza attracted Alexander with her character, Angelica enchanted him with her charisma. The elder sister was whimsical in demeanor, sharp in intellect, and astute in politics.[38] Alexander’s fascination with Angelica was fully reciprocated. As she once needled Eliza, “If you were as generous as the old Romans, you would lend him to me for a little while.… You were a lucky girl to get so clever and so good a companion.”[39] With respect to the debts that Moses owed Jeremiah Wadsworth and John Church, Hamilton surely would not have offered advice that could have harmed the financial stability of his dear Angelica.

Moses and the Myerses could not, in the end, stave off financial collapse amid dire market conditions. On November 25, 1785, their remaining assets were entrusted to the supervision of Hamilton and two businessmen; together these three would serve as trustees for the partners as they proceeded through bankruptcy. Moses and the Myerses—obliged to pay off half their debts—were reduced to selling their furniture and silver. At the behest of Hamilton and the other two trustees, Samuel Myers made an arduous wintertime journey through Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Virginia to collect what monies he could from the firm’s debtors in early 1786. Meanwhile, Hamilton and his cotrustees held a public auction for property that Moses owned in lower Manhattan’s Dock Ward, a district where many of the city’s Jews lived because of its proximity to the synagogue. Some of Moses’s land was purchased at auction by Hamilton’s college roommate.[40]

As might be expected, bankruptcy did little to foster warm relations among the firm’s partners. The Myerses managed to stay close with one another, but Isaac Moses grew estranged from them both. Moses Myers, with little more than £50 to his name and overcome with distress, paid a visit to the home of Shearith Israel’s hazzan. “I laid on the sofa … most of the night reflecting on my situation, bereft of almost everything dear to me,” he recounted in a letter to Samuel. The devout Moses Myers relied on his faith to sustain him, assuring Samuel, “God is great and in him [is] all my trust.” The partners could at least take solace that they had lost only their money and not their reputations. After all, many great trading houses were then failing due to economic circumstances beyond anyone's control. One of the Myerses wrote, "Our firm has been very unfortunate" but "our characters as men of honor remain unsullied." They certainly garnered the respect of the county sheriff; when a creditor initiated a lawsuit against the firm, the sheriff tipped off the Myerses in advance so they could preemptively secure funds for bail and avoid any time in debtors' prison.[41]

Samuel and Moses Myers soon returned to Virginia, where they launched new ventures that met with success. Isaac Moses, for his part, proved just as "enterprising" as Hamilton had promised; he too reversed his misfortunes in the fullness of time.[42] John Church was pleased that he had deferred to the discretion of Angelica's brother-in-law, telling Hamilton, "I think you have done the best with respect to Moses's matters."[43] Hamilton's relationship with Moses, Myers, and Myers prefigured a much deeper involvement with the Jewish merchant class to come in the 1790s.

As Hamilton was establishing himself as one of New York's most skilled lawyers, a missing figure from his enigmatic childhood sent him a letter: his brother, James Hamilton Jr. Recall that James, like Alexander, is unlisted in the surviving baptismal records from Nevis.[44] Whether James too attended the Jewish school on the island is unknown. All that can be said with certainty about James's earliest years is that he apprenticed with a carpenter on St. Croix after his mother's death.[45] Then, in 1785, James wrote to Alexander from the Caribbean island of St. Thomas to solicit money.[46]

Alexander's reply indicates that he was hurt by James's lack of interest in maintaining a relationship, noting, "Your letter of the 31st of May … and one other, are the only letters I have received from you in many years." Still, the orphaned Alexander was so eager to bring James back into his life that he took his brother's self-serving correspondence as an occasion to demonstrate his own fraternal devotion. "Nothing will make me happier than, as far as may be in my power, to contribute to your relief," Alexander informed James. "I will cheerfully pay your draft upon me for fifty pounds sterling." If money was the means by which Alexander could hold on to some vestige of his family of origin, then he would be grateful for even that much. He added, "My affection for you … will not permit me to be inattentive to your welfare, and I hope time will prove to you that I feel all the sentiment of a brother." Alexander then offered to arrange for James to immigrate to the United States and secure him farmland.[47] But James never came to America. He disappears from the historical record for good at that point, leaving behind no hint of his future destiny or religious identity.[48]

By 1787, Hamilton had built a reputation not only as one of the great talents of the New York bar but also as a civic leader. He took an active role in the affairs of his alma mater and served in the New York State Assembly. At the nexus of these two roles, Hamilton partook in the drafting of a new charter for the college that had to meet with the approval of his fellow legislators. The contents of the charter reflect Hamilton's commitment to religious liberty in general and to Jewry in particular.

During the British occupation of New York, King's College had shut down and been repurposed by the redcoats as a military hospital. The state legislature reopened the college in 1784 under the name Columbia; in the wake of a successful revolution against a monarch, the old name would no longer do. But the success of the college was in doubt because of certain "defects" in its charter.[49] Before Alexander Hamilton and John Jay collaborated on the joint endeavor for which they would long be remembered—their defense of the U.S. Constitution in the Federalist Papers—they first served together on a committee in March 1787 to rewrite the charter of their shared alma mater. (Jay had graduated in 1764, ten years before Hamilton matriculated.)[50]

The new charter revived the college's founding charter from 1754 but with several important modifications in the name of religious freedom. Originally, students were obliged to practice Anglican modes of worship. The 1754 charter had mandated that the twice-daily religious services be "constantly performed" in adherence to "the liturgy of the Church of England." In a repudiation of sectarian conformity, the 1787 charter explicitly revoked the power of the administration to "prescribe a form of public prayer to be used in the said college." Moreover, the initial charter had imposed a religious test on the president: "The President of the said College … shall forever hereafter be a member of and in communion with the Church of England." The new charter now abolished any requirements "which render a person ineligible to the office of president of the college on account of his religious tenets."[51] This was no minor reform. By way of contrast, other colleges with colonial roots, such as Brown and Rutgers, did not ban religious tests for their presidencies until the twentieth century.[52] And in a gesture of great significance to New York Jewry, Columbia's 1787 charter also named as a trustee of the college the hazzan of Shearith Israel, Gershom Seixas.[53]

But the new charter was meaningless without a favorable vote from the state legislature, and approval was not a foregone conclusion. The charter provoked opposition from upstate assemblymen who wanted the college under the control of the state rather than its own board of trustees. It was Hamilton, more than any other legislator, who took up the charter's cause and secured its passage in April 1787.[54] Seixas and Hamilton had previously sat together on a board of regents that oversaw education writ large in the state of New York, but now—for the first time since higher education began in America with the founding of Harvard in 1636—a Jew would serve as a trustee of a specific college.[55] Columbia would not have another Jew on its board until 1928.[56] Seixas's appointment at Columbia put him into contact with fellow board members who counted among the city's foremost citizens, including a future U.S. Supreme Court justice, the mayor of New York, and of course the ubiquitous Hamilton.[57] For seventeen years, Seixas and Hamilton would serve alongside one another as trustees.[58]

A Jewish leader of steadfast dignity, the forty-one-year-old Seixas was the ideal choice to represent Jews in this seminal role at Columbia. He was born in New York in 1746 to a Sephardic father from Lisbon and an Ashkenazi mother from London, thus personifying how American Jewry became a melting pot for different European-Jewish subcultures. At the age of twenty-two, Seixas became the first American-born hazzan anywhere in the thirteen colonies. One of his first duties was to travel to Pennsylvania to officiate a Jewish wedding.[59] Seixas's father had doubts if his novice of a son was up to the task and wrote a letter to the bride's father in a bid to manage expectations: "He has never been so far from home, and if you find anything amiss in his behavior, impute it favorably to his want of experience and kindly admonish him for it."[60]

Within a few years, the young hazzan confronted a far more daunting duty than presiding over nuptials: he would have to lead a Jewish community through the hazards of war. Seixas fled New York with many of his congregants in the summer of 1776 as British troops prepared to invade Manhattan. He carried with him Torah scrolls from the synagogue as both a practical matter of ensuring their safety and a symbolic gesture of his belief in the providential blessing for the Patriot cause. Seixas absconded first to Connecticut and then in 1780 to Philadelphia, where he became the hazzan of the local congregation, Mikveh Israel.[61]

He viewed the Revolution as a divine mission and prayed fervently that God would protect George Washington, the members of Congress, and any foreign power allied with America. "May the supreme King of Kings through his infinite mercies, save and prosper the men of these United States, who are gone forth to war," Seixas proclaimed in a sermon.[62] He sent a copy of the address to Hamilton's future client, Isaac Moses. Seixas's commitment to the Patriot cause did not, however, lead him to shun those Jews who stayed in New York and sided with the British. More than once during the war, Seixas risked capture by stealing into New York to conduct weddings for Loyalist Jews (including that of Samuel Lazarus, whose great-granddaughter Emma would write the famous words that appear on the Statue of Liberty: "Give me your tired, your poor, your huddled masses, yearning to breathe free").[63]

As war gave way to peace, and many exiled Jews returned to New York, Seixas was unsure where to build his future. Isaac Moses—whose £115,000 fortune made him the richest Jew in Philadelphia—had bankrolled Seixas's salary during the war. But when Moses left Philadelphia for New York in 1783, Seixas's financial stability went with him. In a letter to the board of Mikveh Israel, Seixas expressed his hope that "your honors will not take it amiss in me applying for some individual security" given Moses' absence.[64]

Meanwhile, the Shearith Israel congregants were keen to see Seixas move back to New York. Seixas, however, had reservations. In a letter written to a friend in December 1783, he voiced several concerns about the prospect of resuming his old post. Despite his Sephardic ancestry, Seixas was "unacquainted with the Spanish and Portuguese languages" used in the synagogue. (It is unclear why this was not an issue for him when he led Shearith Israel prior to the war.) He was also worried about "disunion" among members of the congregation, which he felt undermined their ability "to serve the Deity consonant to our holy law." Finally, the question of sufficient remuneration weighed heavily on him. "As I now have a family to provide for," Seixas explained, "I cannot think of giving up this place till I meet with some encouragement" that "my salary will be made equivalent to what I receive here."[65] His desire for a sound wage was understandable considering that Seixas's growing family was in the process of ballooning to no fewer than sixteen children.[66] In the end, Shearith Israel lured Seixas back to New York in 1784 with the promise of £200 annually, an allotment of hickory wood, and an unspecified amount of matzah.[67]

He delivered a sermon to Shearith Israel in 1784 to mark his return to the congregation. After praising "Almighty Providence" for his "manifold mercies" amid "the course of a perilous and most distressing war," Seixas turned to matters particular to the synagogue. Congregants were engaged in disrespectful behavior, "such as leaving the synagogue in times of prayer" or "talking and laughing" during services.[68] In his role as hazzan, Seixas not only led worship (and scolded babblers) but also raised funds for the synagogue and taught children in the Jewish school. Congregants further called upon him to attend to the milestones of their lives—bar mitzvahs, weddings, funerals. Seixas relied on his skill with a knife to supplement his income, conducting circumcisions and slaughtering animals.[69]

While Jews of the Old World were often relegated to their own ghettos, Seixas mingled easily with Gentiles in New York.[70] His predilection for cultivating relationships beyond Jewish circles positioned him well to sit on the Columbia board alongside Christian leaders. Notably, Seixas used his perch at the college to make the case for Jewish belonging in the United States. He authored a commencement address that touted the role of Jews in the Revolution; the speech was delivered by Sampson Simson, the son of Hamilton's legal client and one of the only Jewish students to attend Columbia in the eighteenth century. "In the year 1776," Seixas wrote, "at the time when the people of this country stood up like one man in the cause of liberty and independence, every Israelite that was among them rose up likewise and united in their efforts to promote the country's peace and prosperity."[71] Seixas was overstating the case, for he well knew that many of his own congregants had stayed loyal to the Crown. But his rendition of Jewish fidelity to the Patriot cause had more truth in it than falsehood, and betokened his fervent desire to write Jews into the American story.

That Seixas—thanks in large part to Hamilton—had been elevated to the Columbia board is rather remarkable given the marginal relationship of Jews to eighteenth-century colleges. Almost every college was originally founded by some Christian denomination. Columbia had enrolled only one Jewish student by the time Seixas was tapped as a trustee. Most American colleges had not graduated any.[72] Because colleges were important institutions whose alumni disproportionately supplied the ranks of the political elite, Jews' limited access to higher education is one indication of their relative subordination to Christians. Seixas's appointment at Columbia thus marked an important, if incremental, step toward the leveling of traditional hierarchies. In a young country caught between egalitarian promises and enduring prejudices, Hamilton's reforms at his alma mater demonstrate his commitment to the revolutionary ideal of equality.

Hamilton's labors in the spring of 1787 to win passage of the college charter met with success, but a much grander challenge lay ahead. During the very same legislative session in which the New York assemblymen approved Columbia's new charter, they chose Hamilton as a delegate to the imminent Constitutional Convention in Philadelphia. In fact, it had been Hamilton himself—with an apparent gift for surfacing at the center of world-historical events—who several months earlier had drafted the official call for a national convention to address the defective Articles of Confederation.[73]

Approved by the Continental Congress in 1777 and ratified by the states in 1781, the Articles of Confederation governed America. And they were failing. They bound together the thirteen states only tenuously. An impotent Congress could neither levy taxes nor compel individual states to abide by treaties it had negotiated with foreign powers. The Articles did not provide for an executive branch to enforce laws or a federal judiciary to adjudicate legal disputes between citizens of different states. What's more, amendments required unanimity among the states to take effect, giving veto power to any one state over the rest of the country. In 1781, for instance, twelve states agreed to an amendment providing for a 5 percent import duty to be funneled directly to the federal government, but tiny Rhode Island withheld approval and unilaterally sank the measure.[74]

These structural problems with the government exacerbated the economic challenges then bedeviling the nation. By 1786, frustration gave way to political violence in what became known as Shays' Rebellion. A Revolutionary War veteran named Daniel Shays formed a ragtag militia in western Massachusetts in response to the imprisonment of farmers who could not afford to pay their debts. Although creditors eventually hired a mercenary army that quelled the insurrection, the inability of the federal government to help maintain the rule of law in Massachusetts threw into high relief the failures of the Articles of Confederation.[75] The colonial experience under British rule had bred a mistrust of centralized power, but Americans overcorrected—their national government was too weak to function. Hamilton and delegates from across the country now embarked for Philadelphia to salvage a republic whose continued existence was mired in doubt. Jews did not likely imagine that these delegates would propose a radical advance for religious liberty, one that would thrust upon the country the fundamental question of whether adherents to Judaism and other marginal faiths should claim the full prerogatives of national citizenship.

5

Constitutions

THE COMMONWEALTH OF PENNSYLVANIA was a fitting tableau in which the delegates to the Constitutional Convention were to shape, among other matters, the course of religious freedom—the state had witnessed fervent antisemitism as well as a remarkable bid by its Jewish residents to grasp for civic equality. Prejudice against Pennsylvania's Jews had first surfaced in the colonial era. Their cemetery in Philadelphia was desecrated in 1751 when some "sportsmen" used it for target practice. A local Jew lamented that they "set up marks, and fired several shots against the fence of the Jewish burying-ground, which not only destroyed the said fence, but also a tomb-stone."[1] It is unclear whether the offenders deliberately sought to vandalize the cemetery or were simply reckless, but the fact remains that no Christian graveyard in colonial times was treated with comparable disrespect.[2] Meanwhile, a woman from an elite Quaker family in Philadelphia concluded in 1759 that Jews were "the scum of the earth" after attending a Jewish religious service.[3] The town of Lancaster, home to a sizable Jewish community, saw its share of shopworn stereotypes about Jews as swindlers. One resident in 1766 derided "the Jew landlords" as "terrible people" who "make false claims."[4] A Lancaster clergyman similarly griped in 1772 that Jews "hesitate not to defraud, when opportunity presents."[5]

It might be tempting to dismiss these comments as anomalous. After all, Jews belonged to Philadelphia's various cultural institutions, like the lending library and the Chestnut Street Theater.[6] Yet when the start of the Revolution prompted Pennsylvanians to write a state constitution, the specter of a Jew or other non-Christian in elected office proved broadly threatening. Pennsylvania's colonial charter had required "faith in Jesus Christ" to vote and run for office.[7] In the summer of 1776, a proposed draft of the state constitution tried moving in a more tolerant direction, only to provoke a backlash. The draft included no religious restriction on suffrage and made monotheism, rather than a belief in Christianity, a prerequisite for legislative office. Under this plan, inductees to the state legislature would have taken an oath that included the phrase: "I do believe in one God, the Creator and Governor of the universe." While falling short of religious liberty for atheists or polytheists, this approach was still relatively enlightened—too much so for many Pennsylvanians.[8]

A contributor to the Pennsylvania Evening Post suggested that if a mere "belief in God" was all that the constitution mandated for state officials, then undesirable religious minorities could seize power and turn the machinery of government against Christians. "Jews or Turks [i.e., Muslims] may become in time not only our greatest landholders," he predicted, "but principal officers in the legislative or executive parts of our government, so as to render it not only uncomfortable but unsafe for Christians." Such fears amounted to unfounded paranoia—Jews constituted a miniscule fraction of Pennsylvania's population and had shown no desire to oppress their Christian neighbors (and any Muslim presence would have comprised enslaved Africans who posed even less of a plausible threat). The editorialist was willing to concede that religious dissenters should be allowed to live in the Commonwealth but maintained that a Christian oath of office would "prevent, as far as possible, our acting as a state contrary to or in opposition to the general doctrines and laws of Christianity in the New Testament."[9]

A still more heated essay appeared in the same newspaper two days later. It cautioned that the proposed constitution's opening of legislative office to "deists, Jews, Mohamedans [i.e., Muslims], and other enemies of Christ" might summon the "Anti-Christ." The writer shuddered at the anticipated reaction of "the Christian states in Europe" if Pennsylvanians were to approve a "frame of government for themselves, by a Convention, by which Jews, Turks, and Heathens may not only be free men of that land but are eligible for Assemblymen." He was, moreover, appalled that "this new constitution mentions not a word of the Bible, Christ or the Christian religion, much less Protestantism." The author invoked the horror of "a mosque, a synagogue, or heathen temple" enjoying "equal privileges" with a "Presbyterian meeting house."[10] Meanwhile, the founding pastor of the local Lutheran church warned in a fit of hyperbole, "It now seems as if a Christian people were [to be] ruled by Jews, Turks, Spinozists, Deists, [and] perverted naturalists."[11] The term "Spinozist" was a double insult, for Baruch Spinoza—the Dutch philosopher—was both a Jew and an alleged atheist.[12]

Despite the democratic promise of the Revolution, these voices of bigotry ultimately triumphed in Pennsylvania. The state constitution in its final form incorporated the following exclusionary language in the oath of office for members of the legislature: "I do acknowledge the Scriptures of the Old and New Testament to be given by Divine inspiration."[13] Only in a place where prejudice against Jews and other minorities was prevalent would opponents of the test clause have ceded such ground.[14] An eminent lawyer living in Philadelphia during these years later recalled that "the Jews were yet a hated and a despised race."[15]

Benjamin Franklin, chair of the state constitutional convention, at first opposed the foregoing religious test. But ultimately he sided with those who favored it. Indeed, it was Franklin himself, at the behest of a Lutheran minister, who introduced the motion for the discriminatory oath to the convention. The historian William Pencak argues that Franklin had sympathy for Jews but “sacrificed the state’s tiny Jewish minority to what he considered the more urgent need of Christians to tolerate each other.” Moreover, Pencak interprets Franklin’s decision to support the oath as a self-serving bid to shore up his credibility with Pennsylvania’s antisemitic majority.[16] Yet even this rendition—in which an instinctively pluralistic Franklin sold out his convictions for the sake of political expediency—is too generous.

Franklin’s initial (and short-lived) resistance to the religious test in the state constitution was hardly rooted in any notion of religious equality for Jews. He was instead motivated by his skepticism about the Jewish faith. In a letter to an English theologian, Franklin explained that his aversion to the oath stemmed from its description of the Hebrew Bible as inspired by God. “There are several things in the Old Testament impossible to be given by divine inspiration,” he insisted. Franklin preferred that the Hebrew Bible be acknowledged as earthly in its origins and consequently disavowed. As he put it, “I should rather suppose it given by inspiration from another quarter, and renounce the whole.” Franklin’s letter raised no objections to the New Testament appearing in the oath.[17]

His concerns about Judaism as a faith were of a piece with his limited regard for Jewry as a people. Franklin repeatedly trafficked in tropes about Jews as money-hungry grifters. He lived in London in the 1760s and there gained membership to the Royal Society, which advanced scientific knowledge. Franklin lamented to a family member that an employee at the Royal Society had been stealing funds. Tellingly, Franklin felt compelled to mention the clerk’s religion. “We have had an ugly affair at the Royal Society lately,” he divulged. “One Dacosta, a Jew, who, as our clerk, was entrusted with collecting our monies, has been so unfaithful as to embezzle near £1300 in four years.”[18] In a letter to a French physicist three months later, Franklin was still bemoaning the clerk’s duplicity while highlighting his Jewish background. “A wicked Jew, entrusted as our clerk and collector, has unobserved run away with our money upon Earth, to the amount of near 1500 pounds,” he reported.[19]

Franklin exhibited similarly stereotypical attitudes toward Jews while serving as a diplomat in Europe in the early 1780s. He was then engaged in negotiations on behalf of the U.S. government with a Dutch Jewish banker named Jean de Neufville. The United States had ordered £50,000 of goods from Neufville and his associates, but they were refusing to convey the goods until they received “the payment of a petty demand for damages,” Franklin relayed in a letter to John Adams. From Franklin’s perspective, the goods should first be delivered and then damages discussed. He derided Neufville’s demand as “not only ungenteel and dishonorable treatment but a monstrous injustice.” Franklin’s letter exclaimed that this disreputable behavior was surprising—even for a Jew—since Neufville had a history of making warm remarks about America. In Franklin’s words, “Though I believe him to be as much a Jew as any in Jerusalem, I did not expect that with so many and such constant professions of friendship for the United States, with which he lards all his letters, he would have attempted to enforce his demands (which I doubt not will be extravagant enough) by a proceeding so abominable."[20] Neufville's Jewish proclivities had won out over his amiable rhetoric, according to Franklin.

Despite Franklin's wishes to be rid of Neufville, there was still other business to be transacted between the two men—the arrangement of a loan for the United States totaling two million Dutch guilders. Neufville drafted an agreement that would require the U.S. government to pledge all of America's land as collateral. While he assured Franklin that such language was entirely "usual" for Dutch loans given to foreign countries, Franklin deemed it "an extravagant security for a trifling sum." Franklin was especially outraged that Neufville had floated the idea that Congress should pass a law, in gratitude to Neufville, making him the exclusive consignee of American produce to be sold in Europe.[21]

Neufville's English was mediocre, so there were language barriers, and likely cultural ones as well, in these negotiations. Yet in Franklin's eyes, it was Neufville's Judaism that accounted for his supposed avarice. Franklin sarcastically suggested to Adams that Neufville was not quite as Jewish as he could be, since the Dutchman had not gone so far as to outright steal American property or take American lives. "I was wrong in supposing J. de Neufville as much a Jew as any in Jerusalem," Franklin sneered, "since Jacob was not content with any percents, but took the whole of his brother Esau's birthright; and his posterity did the same by the Canaanites, and cut their throats [in] the bargain, which in my conscience I do not think Mr. J. de Neufville has the least inclination to do by us,—while he can get anything by our being alive."[22] To Franklin, greed was an inveterate characteristic of Jews.

He was not unconditionally prejudicial toward Jewry. Whenever any religious denomination raised money for the construction of a house of worship in Philadelphia, Franklin donated, including for the local synagogue.[23] And he displayed some esteem for the heritage of biblical Judaism when, as a member of the Continental Congress, he was tasked with designing the Great Seal of the United States in 1776. Franklin chose to depict Moses summoning the waters of the Red Sea to drown Pharaoh (an image that Congress ultimately rejected).[24] Franklin's inconsistent mix of bias and tolerance toward Jews and their faith made him typical of several other founders—and distinct from Alexander Hamilton, whose writings and correspondence reflect no animus against Jewry and Judaism.

Many of Franklin's fellow Pennsylvanians simply saw no conflict between the egalitarian rhetoric of the Revolution and religious discrimination against Jews. In a 1782 issue of the Pennsylvania Gazette, a signer of the Declaration of Independence disparaged Jewish merchants for allegedly rigging their scales: "Is not the gravity which retains Jupiter in his orbit, the same gravity which operates on a grain in the scales of a Jew?"[25] A piece appearing soon thereafter in Philadelphia's Independent Gazetteer called Jews "despisers of Christianity" who were "the bane of all countries wherever they are countenanced." The writer gleefully shared an absurd rumor that an "air balloon" had been arranged to transport "all the Jew brokers to New Scotland [i.e., Nova Scotia], where they will be abundantly more thought of than in Pennsylvania."[26] This allusion to New Scotland was ripe with political meaning. The Canadian province was a haven for Loyalists who had deserted America. Contemporary readers would have readily understood the author's implication that Pennsylvania's Jews were faithful to the British rather than to the Patriots. (In reality, the state's Jewish community had overwhelmingly supported the Revolution.)[27]

Doubts about the commercial integrity and political allegiance of Jews were not new—but the willingness of Jews to challenge their opponents was. Many Jews had abandoned their homes, invested their savings, and even risked their lives to defend a revolution that was waged in the name of equality. They would not now passively accept second-class citizenship. Resistance to antisemitism was arguably more pronounced in Pennsylvania than in any other state during the founding era, and with good reason. New York and Virginia had no religious limitations on elected office, so Jews there did not have specific constitutional clauses to protest. Other states, such as Delaware and Maryland, employed religious tests for public officials but lacked concentrated Jewish populations to take umbrage. And because Jews in Pennsylvania had sided with the Patriot cause almost uniformly, the state's failure to reward Jews' loyalty with equality made its discrimination particularly pernicious.

In 1783, Philadelphia Jewry formed a committee to advocate repeal of the state's religious test for legislative office. Among the committee's five members were Jews who would come into Hamilton's circle, including Haym Salomon and Gershom Seixas. The committee petitioned the Council of Censors, an elected body invested with the power to commence a new state constitutional convention for Pennsylvania. The Jewish "memorialists," as they referred to themselves, pointed out the fundamental hypocrisy of a state constitution that paid lip service to religious liberty but then imposed a civil disability on Jews for exercising that very liberty. On the one hand, the constitution's bill of rights stated without ambiguity, "No man who acknowledges the being of a God can be justly deprived or abridged of any civil rights as a citizen on account of his religious sentiments." On the other, the constitution made a belief in the New Testament a prerequisite for service in the state legislature. The memorialists lamented that "this religious test deprives the Jews of the most eminent rights of free men." The constitution thereby imposed a "stigma" upon the Jewish people.[28]

The petition further assured the Council of Censors that citizens of the Commonwealth had nothing to fear from the prospect of Jews in elected office. "In the religious books of the Jews" were to be found "no such doctrines or principles" that "are inconsistent with the safety and happiness of the people of Pennsylvania." The memorialists also cited the manifold contributions of Jewish Patriots to the war as evidence that Jews would be trustworthy public servants, insisting, “The conduct and behavior of the Jews in this and the neighboring states has always tallied with the great design of the Revolution.” They made a practical appeal as well, one that Hamilton himself would echo in later years: religious freedom would help increase immigration, as “men who live under restraints in another country” would find Pennsylvania “attractive.” In concluding their petition, the memorialists requested that the council convene a constitutional convention for the purpose of untethering the oath of office from Christianity.[29] But the council was unmoved by this bid for full civic equality.[30]

The fight against antisemitism in Pennsylvania continued in 1784 after a Quaker lawyer named Miers Fisher recommended to the state legislature the termination of the Bank of North America, which was based in Philadelphia. The bank—a brainchild of Hamilton—had intimate associations with prominent Jews such as Haym Salomon, who served as the bank’s official broker, and Isaac Moses, who used his fortune to help keep the bank afloat. While Fisher’s speech in its entirety is lost, a surviving excerpt reveals that he resorted to stereotypes about usurious Jews. Fisher declared that “the Jews were the authors of high and unusual interest” at the bank.[31]

In the pages of Philadelphia’s Independent Gazetteer, a contributor under the name “A Jew Broker” (quite likely Salomon himself) issued a scathing castigation of Fisher. The editorial was addressed directly to Fisher and repudiated “the indecent, unjust, inhumane aspersions you cast so indiscriminately on the Jews of this city at large.” According to the author, Fisher’s antisemitism was evidence of his corrupt character: “The attack on the Jews seemed wanton and could only have been premeditated by such a base and degenerate mind as yours.”[32]

During the war, Fisher’s refusal to serve the Patriot cause had led to his expulsion from Pennsylvania to a detention center in Virginia. He may have had genuinely Loyalist sympathies or, like many fellow Quakers, was simply a pacifist who refused to take up arms. In either case, the “Jew Broker” delighted in reminding readers that Fisher was “once exiled and excommunicated by the state.” Jews, in contrast, had sided with the revolutionaries from the war’s inception and “were second to none in our patriotism and attachment to our country!” This vigorous defense of Jews tried to deflect accusations of Jewish disloyalty by suggesting that Quakers rather than Jews were guilty of “avarice” by charging high interest on loans.[33]

The piece is notable not only for its derisive tone but also for its author’s belief that the birth of the United States was a signal moment for Jewry, which had suffered oppression for centuries. “I exult and glory in reflecting that we have the honor to reside in a free country, where, as a people, we have met with the most generous countenance and protection,” gushed the “Jew Broker.” And although the attempt to expunge the language about the New Testament from the state constitution had not yet met with success, he optimistically predicted, “We shall still obtain every other privilege that we aspire to enjoy along with our fellow citizens.”[34] It is telling that in an editorial defending Jewish financiers, the “Jew Broker” saw fit to allude to the exclusionary oath of office; he surely feared that negative stereotypes about Jews in the marketplace were hamstringing Jewish efforts to access the State House.

Pennsylvania was not the only state where Jews challenged their Christian neighbors to realize the Revolution's promise of equality. In 1785, the circulation of an antisemitic pamphlet in Georgia prompted a local Jew to issue a direct rebuke. The pamphlet, entitled Cursory Remarks on Men & Manners in Georgia, invoked the usual clichés about Jews. Under the pen name "Citizen," the author denounced Jews as a greedy people whose "pecuniary interests" were "the life and soul of all their actions." He questioned their fealty to both the country and its republican system, alleging, "If indeed they have any choice as to governments, it must be in favor of a monarchy." He also undertook a survey of Jewish history and concluded, "The Jews always insinuate themselves most into favor among those nations who remain in darkness and in the shadows of death."[35]

At the time, Jews were not on equal footing with a majority of Christians in Georgia—the state constitution limited eligibility for the legislature to Protestants—but the "Citizen" was aghast at the notion of Jewish participation in any form of civic life.[36] His impetus for writing the pamphlet had been a ruling from a state judge that a Jew, Mordecai Sheftall, could not be denied the right to file a lawsuit simply because he was Jewish.[37] The "Citizen" warned that the Jews' quest for civil rights would culminate in their seizing power and crushing Christians: "What are we to expect but to have Christianity enacted into a capital heresy, the synagogue become the established church, and the mildness of the New Testament compelled to give place to the rigor and severity of the Old."[38] There was, of course, no evidence that Georgia's Jewish community aspired to persecute Christians. That Jews constituted less than one-tenth of 1 percent of the state's population makes the author's histrionics that much more absurd.[39]

In the pages of the Georgia Gazette, Mordecai Sheftall's brother, Levi, admonished the prejudiced pamphleteer in a concise response. Levi remarked that the pamphlet had afforded its author little more than "an opportunity to show his hatred" and advised that "he might have employed his time to some better purpose." Referring to Mordecai, whose right to sue was upheld, Levi asked why "the Jew particularly alluded to … should not also be entitled to the rights of citizenship." He concluded the piece by questioning the patriotism of the self-described "Citizen" and signed off, "A Real Citizen." Georgia's Jews had supported the Revolution with near unanimity—and none more fervently than Mordecai Sheftall—providing Levi Sheftall a strong basis for affirming Jewish claims to the prerogatives of full-fledged citizenship.[40]

That Jews in America would petition for their rights and shame their antagonists set them apart from European Jews, who had more to fear from speaking out. While numerous European countries had banished Jews, none of the thirteen states in the Union had done so, either before or after the Revolution. Moreover, European prejudice was often directed squarely at Jews because they commonly comprised the sole religious minority in a given place. In America, by contrast, Jews were joined by the likes of

Quakers and Catholics as dissenters; bigots in the United States usually grouped Jews together with these other undesirables.[41] And perhaps most importantly, Jews in Europe—unlike their American coreligionists—had not hazarded death to establish a republic whose founding document championed equality.[42]

British Jewry offers an instructive counterpoint to the Jewish-American experience. In 1753, Parliament passed the "Jew Bill," which lifted certain economic restrictions on foreign-born Jews living in Britain. Although the Jew Bill was modest in its reforms, it provoked a fiercely antisemitic reaction and was quickly repealed.[43] British Jews had learned the dangers of seeking even a marginal advance in their rights. Thirty years later, the Jewish Board of Deputies—which formally represented Britain's Jews to the Crown—considered sending a letter of congratulations to King George III upon Britain's successful negotiation of a peace treaty with the United States in 1783. Tellingly, the board in the end abstained. As one Jewish deputy explained, "Peace or war being political concerns, addressing [them] would be taking a part in matters we ought to avoid."[44] So at the very historical moment when Philadelphia Jewry was protesting the discriminatory clause in the Pennsylvania constitution, the Jewish Board in London was fearful of sending even a laudatory message to the king.

Although America was less antisemitic than Europe, the Jewish pursuit of equality in the United States still faced significant opposition. Pennsylvania and Georgia were not alone in codifying prejudice into law. Most of the early state constitutions similarly imposed civil limitations on Jews and other defamed religious groups. Delaware mandated for state officials a belief in the Trinity, which left out some Christians and, of course, all non-Christians. New Jersey was less inclusive still, reserving elected office for Protestants solely. One New Jersey newspaper celebrated that the state constitution "justly restricts your votes to persons professing a belief in the faith of any Protestant sect." The governor of New Jersey unironically praised the oath as a "beautiful" expression of religious freedom, presumably because it did not privilege any particular Protestant denomination over the others. Both Carolinas followed New Jersey's lead and made elected office the exclusive preserve of Protestants. Maryland limited not only public office but religious freedom itself to Christians. It took Connecticut more than forty years to replace its colonial charter with a new constitution; in the interim, the state passed "acts of toleration," but none of them granted equal rights to Jews. Rhode Island did not extend civic equality to its Jewish residents until 1843, and New Hampshire failed to do so until 1877. Several states in the early republic had government-subsidized churches that used tax dollars from Jews and Gentiles alike to fund Christian clergy. And most states barred Jews from practicing law.[45]

Even in New York—which had arguably the most enlightened state constitution in the Union and did not ban Jews from elected office—toleration only went so far. The state considered language for its constitution of 1777 that would have promised "free toleration” to “all the denominations of Christians” as well as “all Jews, Turks, and Infidels.”[46] However, this phrasing was ultimately replaced by a less specific clause: “The free exercise and enjoyment of religious profession and worship, without discrimination or preference, shall forever hereafter be allowed.”[47] Jews were to enjoy freedom of worship by tacit default, not explicit affirmation.

Moreover, New York (like many other states) adopted a blue law that disallowed all business activity on the Christian Sabbath. These laws disproportionately burdened Jews, who were compelled to abstain from work on Saturdays by their faith and on Sundays by their state. Accordingly, Jews had one less day each week to earn a living than did Christians. When the New York state legislature considered resurrecting a colonial-era blue law in 1788, one assemblyman warned that it “would lead to intolerance and persecution.” He observed that “a Jew, to be consistent with himself, is obliged to keep holy the 7th day of the week,” and so a blue law would be tantamount to “taxing” him for being Jewish. “This was not equal liberty, one of the boasted blessings of our government,” the assemblyman lamented. But he did not reflect majority sentiment, and the bill passed.[48] New York’s Jews were still better off than Catholics in at least one respect. The same year that New York revived its blue law, the state legislature also banned from public office any Catholic who refused to forswear the pope as a religious authority.[49]

Hamilton’s fellow New Yorker John Jay was typical of most other founding fathers in that he showed some support for Jewry while also harboring antisemitic views. He was among the principal architects of the state constitution, which afforded the free exercise of faith to Jews and other nonconformists.[50] As mentioned in the prior chapter, Jay teamed with Hamilton to implement pluralistic reforms at Columbia. And, we will see, he lobbied Congress on behalf of the Jewish merchant Solomon Simson, a Hamilton legal client, when Simson sought the establishment of a national mint. Jay’s inclusive sensibilities were rooted in his family history. His grandfather was a Huguenot who faced exile from France when he refused to convert from Protestantism to Catholicism. Jay was thus born into a family alive to the perils of religious oppression.[51]

But Jay nevertheless exhibited bias against Jewry. Although Jews could run for office in New York under the constitution he had helped draft, Jay still hoped voters would reject Jewish candidates. “It is the duty as well as the privilege and interest of our Christian nation to select and prefer Christians for their rulers,” he told a fellow politician.[52] Jay’s greatest aspiration for Jews was that they would abandon their faith. As president of the American Bible Society, he remarked in a speech that “individual Jews have, from time to time, been relieved from their blindness, and become Christians.” Jay further explained that for Jews to convert en masse, they must first resume control of the Holy Land—a belief rooted in a Christian prophecy that Jewish reclamation of Judea and conversion to Christianity were critical steps in the return of Jesus. He anticipated that “a time will come when all the twelve tribes [of Israel] shall be restored to their country, and be a praise in the earth,” but until then “their blindness will not be sooner removed" and thus "their conversion is not to be sooner expected."[53] These views were popular not just with Jay but a number of contemporary Christians.

A pamphlet of the era entitled Israel Vindicated denounced this kind of thinking as antisemitic. Its anonymous author sought to rebuke the idea that Jews were a benighted people, dwelling in a Christian America, who might yet embrace the light of Christianity. The pamphleteer inveighed against any depiction of Jews as "degraded and uncultivated" in contrast to their Christian compatriots who fashioned themselves "completely civilized." Such a mentality erroneously proceeded from "the impolitic principle" that the United States was a Christian, rather than nonsectarian, nation. Israel Vindicated acknowledged that such Christians were acting on a prophecy, and scoffed at how "they think they pay us [i.e., Jews] a compliment" when they see a role for Jews, as converts, in Jesus's return.[54] Jay's comments about the necessity of Christian rulers and the defects of Judaism—common enough in his day—never flowed from the pen of Hamilton.

John Adams is yet another founder who assumed a key role in drafting a state constitution and whose liberality toward Jews had its limits. He wrote the Massachusetts constitution, which promised religious liberty in the abstract but discriminated against non-Christians in practice. Prefiguring the Free Exercise Clause in the federal Bill of Rights, the constitution in Massachusetts stipulated that "no subject shall be hurt, molested, or restrained, in his person, liberty, or estate, for worshipping God in the manner and season most agreeable to the dictates of his own conscience." Adams, however, included a religious test for governors and legislators in the form of an exclusionary oath: "I, A.B., do declare that I believe the Christian religion, and have a firm persuasion of its truth." Jews found mere toleration, not civic equality, in Adams's commonwealth.[55]

The mixed picture that Massachusetts's constitution presents was of a piece with Adams's varied views on both Judaism and its adherents. At times, Adams belittled the Jewish faith. He suggested to Thomas Jefferson that the study of Jewish law and Jewish mysticism would take nearly a millennium, time that "would be wasted to very little purpose." Jewish law was worse than just an exercise in squandered effort, Adams claimed—it was demonic. Referring to the two components comprising the Talmud, he lamented, "The demon of hierarchical despotism has been at work both with the Mishna and Gemara."[56] And in a wartime letter to the president of the Continental Congress, Adams unfavorably alluded to biblical Jews. He reported that the British in their arrogance mistakenly assumed that "the People of America will dethrone the Congress and like the Israelites demand a King."[57]

In several instances, Adams derided someone or some group by analogizing them to Jews. He employed the word "Jew" as an insult to demean a Gentile. "Tom is a perfect Viper—a Fiend—a Jew—a Devil," Adams remarked about a disliked relative.[58] During the Revolution, he drew disparaging parallels between Brits and Jews. "Quite as selfish and as blind as the Jews," Adams said of the British, "there is no present probability of their opening their eyes to their true interest and safety."[59] He served as the U.S. minister in the 1780s to the Netherlands, where he bemoaned the greed of Dutch creditors by likening them to Jews. As he grumbled to John Jay, "Five or six people have all the money under their command, and they are as avaricious as any Jews in Jews Quarter."[60] Adams soon issued a similar complaint that Jews and Jew-like Christians throughout Europe were speculating on American currency. "My indignation is roused beyond all patience," he wrote to Jefferson from London, as Americans fell "prey to every robber, pirate and cheat in Europe. Jews and Judaizing Christians are now scheming to buy up all our Continental notes at two or three shillings in a pound, in order to oblige us to pay them at twenty shillings a pound."[61] In casting such aspersions, Adams was trading in well-worn stereotypes about Jewish moneylenders.

He could also be critical of his own country, and once again found in Jewry a useful point of pejorative comparison. As Adams told a fellow signer of the Declaration of Independence, "We are not a chosen people that I know of, or if we are, we deserve it as little as the Jews."[62] His penchant for antisemitic smears even combined with his hatred for Hamilton. Reviving an old canard that Hamilton's true loyalties lied with the Tories (that is, Loyalists) rather than with the Patriots, Adams insisted, "He was followed, by all the Tories on the continent, as false messiahs were always followed by the Jews."[63] Because Jews were often condemned as globetrotting cosmopolitans whose allegiance to the United States was dubious, they constituted a particularly useful group for Adams to invoke as he cast doubt on the fidelity of Hamilton and his supporters to America.

Just like John Jay, Adams endorsed the Jewish reclamation of the Holy Land. "I really wish the Jews [to be] again, in Judea, an independent nation," Adams wrote to the Jewish leader Mordecai Noah. His motivations for the creation of a Jewish state in the Holy Land did not likely resonate with Noah—Adams believed it would help cure Jews of their shortcomings and hasten their conversion to the Christian faith. As he explained, "Once restored to an independent government and no longer persecuted, they would soon wear away some of the asperities and peculiarities of their character and possibly in time become liberal Unitarian Christians."[64] That Adams had been taught Hebrew at Harvard by a Jewish convert to Christianity perhaps informed his hope about the prospects for widespread conversion.[65]

Adams did, however, convey appreciation for Jewry at times. In another letter to Noah, he praised Jewish people as upstanding members of society. The Jews whom Adams had encountered were "men of as liberal minds, [and] as much honor, probity, generosity and good breeding, as any I have known in any sect of religion." Given these commendable traits, he reasoned, Jews were worthy of full-fledged citizenship anywhere on the globe: "I wish your nation may be admitted to all the privileges of citizens in every country of the world."[66] Adams's letter failed to mention that he himself had drafted a constitution for Massachusetts that banned Jews from elected office.

Still, his positive appraisal of the Jewish people was not exclusive to correspondence with a Jew. Writing to a Christian friend, Adams criticized the French philosopher Voltaire for his antisemitic take on Jews. “How is it possible this old fellow should represent the Hebrews in such a contemptible light?” he inquired. “They are the most glorious Nation that ever inhabited this Earth. The Romans and their Empire were but a bauble in comparison of the Jews.” Adams also exalted Judaism for being the first of the three Abrahamic faiths, observing of Jews, “They have given religion to three quarters of the Globe.” His esteem extended to Jews from antiquity to the present, for throughout history Jews “have influenced the affairs of mankind more, and more happily, than any other nation ancient or modern.”[67]

Overall, then, Adams’s attitude toward Jews and their religion was inconsistent. As with other founders, he offers a useful benchmark by which to measure Hamilton. Like Adams, Hamilton expressed admiration for the people and faith of Judaism but, unlike Adams, Hamilton did not mitigate that admiration with bigoted comments. In a world where prejudice toward Jews was commonplace, Hamilton is almost as noteworthy for what he did not say as for what he did.

Exclusionary constitutions, discriminatory statutes, and cultural antisemitism throughout the various states would have been strong reason for Jews to experience anxiety on the eve of the federal Constitutional Convention. In the eleven years since the colonies declared their independence, Americans showed a willingness to tolerate Jewry but resisted fulfilling the promise of equality enshrined in the Declaration of Independence. Precedent would now seem to suggest that a national constitution, to be drafted behind closed doors by an entirely Gentile body of delegates, would likely infringe on Jewish rights. Just a year before the convention, a French diplomat in New York reported back to Paris that the high ideals of the American Revolution had failed to vanquish antisemitism in the United States. “It would be very remarkable if this people, after having suffered the contempt of all ages and nations, should succeed in America in taking part in the affairs of government,” he wrote. “But this revolution is not yet ripe … prejudices are still too strong to enable the Jews to enjoy the privileges accorded to all their fellow-citizens.”[68] It was in the midst of this paradox—a new nation conceived in the name of equality yet riddled with old bigotries—that Hamilton and his fellow delegates convened in Philadelphia in May 1787.

Philadelphia was an energetic but tidy urban center. A Scottish military officer praised “the great and noble city of Philadelphia” as “perhaps one of the wonders of the world.”[69] A traveler from Germany was equally impressed: “The city, if not greatly beyond others in America in wealth and number of houses, far surpasses them all in learning, in the arts, and public spirit.” Indeed, Philadelphia was home to numerous cultural institutions, printing shops, and the University of Pennsylvania.[70]

Stretching west from the Delaware River, Philadelphia had been organized along a grid by William Penn when he founded the colony of Pennsylvania in 1681.[71] Roads parallel to the river that ran north-south were numbered—Second Street, Third Street, and so forth—while east-west avenues typically bore the names of trees such as Chestnut, Spruce, and Pine. In Hamilton's day, the streets were often well maintained by the locals,[72] although one resident griped that "dead animals—horses and cows—are left to putrify on vacant lots."[73] Pedestrians strolling down lamplit sidewalks in the evenings could hear night watchmen announcing the time and weather. Church bells were commonly rung, occasionally thirteen times in a row to honor the states of the Union. "At Philadelphia there is always something to be chimed," remarked a visitor, "so that it seems almost as if it was an Imperial or Popish city."[74]

Houses lining the roads were largely uniform: brick architecture on the outside and English-style décor within. Rooms usually featured a fireplace and, for those able to afford it, mahogany furniture. A garden or courtyard could be found behind each home; during the Constitutional Convention, Benjamin Franklin was known for chatting with Hamilton among other delegates in his courtyard under a mulberry tree. In the eyes of one observer, Philadelphians managed their residences with an ideal balance between the austerity of Amsterdam and pomposity of Paris: "The taste generally is for living in a cleanly and orderly manner, without the continual scrubbing of the Hollanders or the frippery and gilt of the French."[75]

How newcomers experienced Philadelphia often suggested more about the origins of the traveler than about the local inhabitants. A planter from the Virginia countryside found Philadelphians to be pretentious and complained that he was "heartily tired of the etiquette and nonsense so fashionable in this city."[76] But a European visitor, accustomed to the social hierarchies of the Old World, saw in Philadelphia a remarkable spirit of equality: "People think, act, and speak here precisely as it prompts them; the poorest day-laborer on the bank of the Delaware holds it his right to advance his opinion, in religious as well as political matters, with as much freedom as the gentleman or the scholar."[77]

To be sure, Philadelphia had its problems. Crime was a concern; eighteen convicts escaped the municipal prison just two months before the Constitutional Convention. Disease also posed a recurrent threat. The city had already endured several yellow fever epidemics mid-century and would suffer its worst outbreak yet just a few years after the convention.[78] Because doctors and laymen alike mistakenly believed that unpleasant smells caused disease, Philadelphians who lived near the dock, with its noxious odors, were particularly distressed.[79] A petition they submitted to the Pennsylvania General Assembly bemoaned "the stench of mud and putrifying filth" that wafted from the dock, which was not only "offensive to the senses" but supposedly "dangerous and injurious to the health of neighboring inhabitants."[80]

Philadelphia's numerous taverns offered lodging, food, and of course alcohol. These taverns were also important meeting places for political and commercial discussion.[81]

When Hamilton first arrived in the city, he congregated with other delegates to dine at the Indian Queen Tavern around the corner from Fourth Street and Chestnut.[82] Upon entering its luxurious premises, Hamilton may have regretted that he had arranged for a bed elsewhere. One patron described having his bags handled by a servant in extravagant attire, complete with a "blue coat, sleeves and cape red, and buff waistcoat and breeches, the bosom of his shirt ruffled, and hair powdered." Needs were dutifully met at the Indian Queen, whether the guest desired tea, magazines, or even a haircut.[83]

Two blocks away, just off Second Street and Walnut, was another locale popular with convention delegates, City Tavern. It was less glamorous than the Indian Queen. A British antique dealer described having "slept at this house two nights, and met with my old tormentors, the bugs." While the bugs paid this Brit too much attention, the hotel staff gave him too little: "We could get hardly any attendance from the waiters, though we rang the bell incessantly." Nevertheless, City Tavern was a focal point for business in Philadelphia. The tavern kept records of incoming and departing ships, and merchants frequented its coffee house daily.[84] At the summer's end, the convention delegates would have their farewell supper there.[85]

Hamilton lodged at Mrs. Dailey's boardinghouse at the intersection of Third Street and Market Street. Mrs. Dailey's stood at the end of an alfresco market abuzz with shoppers. People poured in from the countryside to hawk their wares and purchase provisions. Among the meats to be found at the market were cuts unknown to European taste buds, from raccoon to possum.[86]

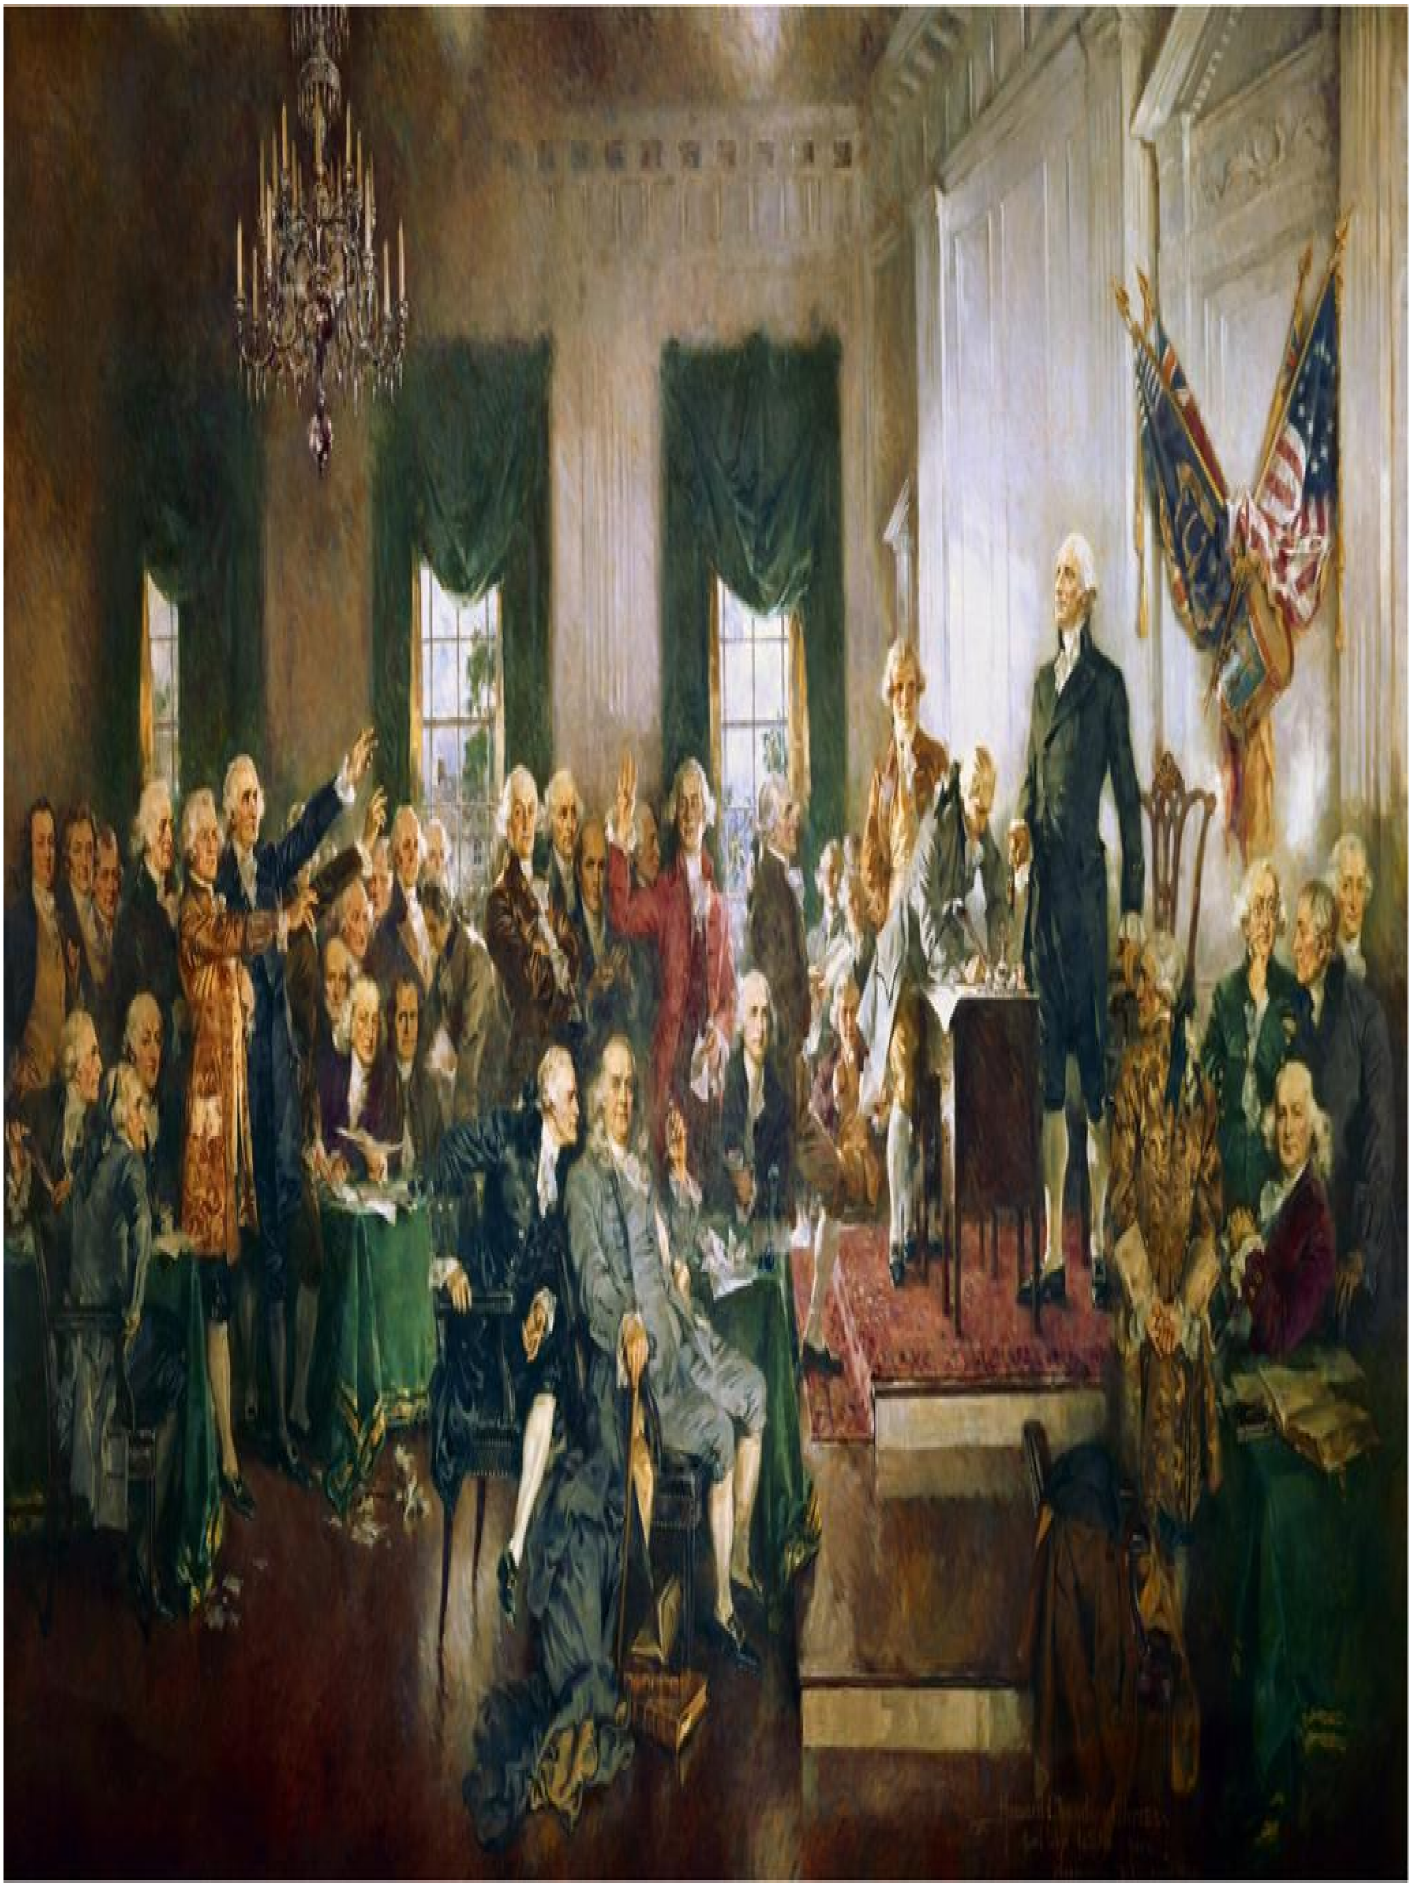
During the convention, Hamilton had a short walk to the State House on Chestnut Street for the delegates' daily deliberations. It was there, eleven years earlier, that the Declaration of Independence had been signed, and the building would in time become known as Independence Hall. The State House was elegant in its simplicity. As a contemporary recorded, "The façade is of tiled brick, with no particular decoration, but in comparison regular and handsome."[87] In the East Room, the delegates sat in rows of wooden chairs facing the president of the convention, George Washington.[88]

Two blocks due east from the State House, and another three up Third Street, on a small lane called Cherry, was the center of Philadelphia Jewry: the Mikveh Israel synagogue.[89] It is a striking fact about the Constitutional Convention that among the nation's more than three million people, the only one to petition the delegates on the topic of religious freedom was a member of Mikveh Israel, Jonas Phillips. A war veteran and former president of the synagogue, Phillips submitted a letter to the convention in its waning days.[90] He described himself as "being one of the people called Jews" and noted with consternation that the Pennsylvania oath of office was "absolutely against the religious principle of a Jew." Phillips decried the distance between the democratic promise of the Revolution and the prejudicial reality of the early republic: "It is well known among all the citizens of the 13 United States that the Jews have been true and faithful Whigs, and during the late contest with England they have been foremost in aiding and assisting the states with their lives and fortunes. They have supported the cause, have bravely fought and bled for liberty which they cannot enjoy.” Phillips emphasized that if the delegates instituted an oath that was free of the kind of exclusionary clause found in the Pennsylvania constitution, “then the Israelites will think themselves happy to live under a government where all religious societies are on equal footing.” In closing, he offered a prayer for George Washington, the convention delegates, and the American people.[91]

Phillips’s petition was unnecessary, as it turns out. Because the convention’s proceedings were strictly confidential, Phillips was unaware that eight days earlier the delegates had already decided to make federal office blind to religion.[92] Article VI, Section 3 of the Constitution contained this radical clause: “No religious test shall ever be required as a qualification to any office or public trust under the United States.” In light of the discriminatory state constitutions, the decision to open federal posts—both elected and appointed—to people of all religious backgrounds was extraordinary. This clause was arguably more significant in expanding religious liberty than would be the First Amendment’s guarantee of free exercise (which was not part of the original Constitution). After all, many state constitutions nominally granted religious freedom yet still imposed civil disabilities on members of minority faiths, thereby demonstrating how an abstract promise of religious liberty could mean very little in practice. The U.S. Constitution’s ban on religious tests was a concrete provision in a way that the Free Exercise Clause was not; the ban extended substantive equality to Jews and other dissenters in the most important realm of American civic life.[93]

While the prohibition on religious tests found favor with most delegates, support was not universal at the convention. North Carolina’s delegates resisted the clause; the delegations from Maryland and Connecticut were both split. The other states approved Article VI, Section 3.[94] One delegate who advocated the ban on religious tests recalled those who did not: “There were some members so unfashionable as to think … in a Christian country, it would be at least decent to hold out some distinction between the professors of Christianity and downright infidelity or paganism.”[95] Little else is known about what the delegates said concerning the merits of Article VI, Section 3 in the summer of 1787. James Madison’s notes make clear that it was Charles Pinckney, a delegate from South Carolina, who moved to bar religious tests. But the historical record is otherwise sparse. Despite the clause’s profound advance for religious freedom, it appears to have prompted scant commentary among the delegates during the convention.[96]

Hamilton did not partake in the discussion about Article VI, Section 3, as he was away in New York on business that week.[97] Nor, if present, would he have been eligible to vote on the measure. His two fellow delegates from New York—aghast at the convention’s push for a stronger national government—had abandoned the proceedings nearly two months earlier, and quorum rules disallowed Hamilton from unilaterally casting New York’s vote on any individual provision of the Constitution. He was, however, afforded the opportunity to lend his signature to the final document that exalted religious equality as a paramount principle, much as the Columbia college charter had done thanks to Hamilton's help earlier that year. With Rhode Island boycotting the convention and Hamilton the sole delegate representing his state, the Constitution was approved by "11 States and Col. Hamilton," as George Washington put it.[98]



In this rendering of the 1787 Constitutional Convention, Hamilton and Franklin in the foreground appear to be sharing a private word. Source: Howard Chandler Christy, Scene at the Signing of the Constitution of the United States, 1940.

On the very day that the delegates to the Constitutional Convention completed their final draft, three vandals desecrated Charleston's synagogue.[99] Antisemitism soon found new expression after the Constitution was made public and came under the consideration of the states for ratification. Proponents of ratification called themselves Federalists and branded their adversaries Anti-Federalists; many in the latter camp abhorred the prospect of Jews and other religious minorities serving in federal office. Madison remarked to Thomas Jefferson that Article VI, Section 3 provided for a measure of equality that some found disconcerting: "One of the objections in New England was that the Constitution, by prohibiting religious tests, opened a door for Jews, Turks and infidels."[100] Indeed, a number of voices in New England did speak out in opposition to the clause. The Worcester Magazine in Massachusetts published an essay that argued "this new constitution is deficient" in part because "there is a door opened for the Jews, Turks and Heathen [sic] to enter into public office and be seated at the head of the government of the United States."[101] At the Massachusetts ratifying convention, one delegate voiced exasperation that "a Turk, a Jew, a Roman Catholic, and what is worse than all, a Universalist, may be the President of the United States."[102] A fellow Massachusetts delegate insisted that "a person could not be a good man without being a good Christian."[103] Meanwhile, the Newport Mercury recorded how an opponent of the Constitution "had observed something in it truly abominable, which was, that they had so contrived the doors that a Turk or a Jew might go in and out like a Christian."[104]

Antisemitic hostility to the Constitution was not limited to New England. At North Carolina's ratifying convention, a delegate cautioned that the Constitution was "an invitation for Jews and pagans of every kind to come among us," which "might endanger the character of the United States."[105] Even in relatively tolerant New York, a local newspaper warned that the military could become a tool of Jewish interests, for the Constitution "gives the command of the whole militia to the President—should he hereafter be a Jew our dear posterity may be ordered to rebuild Jerusalem."[106] Alarm at the possibility of a Jewish president was sufficiently widespread that newspapers in Connecticut, Massachusetts, and New Hampshire saw fit to reprint the foregoing piece from New York.[107] It is difficult to know the extent to which anti-Jewish fearmongering stemmed from sincere bigotry versus a calculation that arousing the bigotry of others would help derail ratification. Both motives were surely at play in many cases.

In proposing a historic expansion of religious liberty, the framers of the Constitution had unwittingly provoked a torrent of vitriol about Jews and other out-groups. To be sure, Anti-Federalists did not predicate their resistance primarily on eligibility for office. They were more concerned about centralized power in general. Still, a pattern had emerged wherein the forces of antisemitism and Anti-Federalism overlapped.[108] It was against this backdrop that the most prolific champion of the Federalist cause, Alexander Hamilton, launched his bid for ratification of the new Constitution.

6

Statesmanship

AS A FIERCE DEBATE erupted in New York over the Constitution, Alexander Hamilton well understood that prejudice against Jews played a role in resistance to ratification in his home state. He pleaded with a prominent Anti-Federalist congressman from Albany, Abraham Yates Jr., to endorse the Constitution, warning that New York's failure to ratify would "divide the Southern from the Northern states and so divide the Union." Unmoved, Yates replied that he would sooner break up the country than "adopt the Constitution" and thereby "risk a government of Jew, Turk, or Infidel."[1] Anti-Federalists in Yates's mold may have been bigoted, but in a sense they were not wrong—the Constitution, if approved, really would benefit Jews by granting them equality in the eyes of the federal government. The Jewish community understood this as fully as the antisemites did. Hamilton and American Jewry thus found themselves aligned on the momentous question of ratification.[2]

Among Hamilton's many contributions to the ratification effort was his primary authorship of what became known as the Federalist Papers. He envisioned a series of essays designed to rally New Yorkers behind the Constitution. To assist in the enterprise, Hamilton first recruited John Jay, who was then the nation's secretary of foreign affairs and had collaborated with Hamilton earlier that year to revise the Columbia charter. They were aided by James Madison, the most influential delegate at the Constitutional Convention and an acquaintance of Hamilton's from the early 1780s when they had both served in Congress. Though Hamilton, Jay, and Madison divided the work and largely wrote independently, they published under a single pseudonym, "Publius," the name of a Roman statesman who helped depose a monarch and establish a republic. Pseudonyms were standard at the time for political debate in print; an essay was supposed to stand on the rigor of its argument rather than rest on the public stature of its author. In the end, the Federalist Papers comprised eighty-five installments, most of which appeared in newspapers between October 1787 and April 1788. Hamilton penned fifty-one of them, churning out his forceful defense of the Constitution at a rate of productivity that was impressive even by his standards.[3]

He also lobbied for the Constitution in less anonymous ways. Hamilton was a delegate at the New York ratifying convention during the summer of 1788 in Poughkeepsie, some seventy miles north of Manhattan. Hostility to ratification in New York was intense; even the chair of the convention was an Anti-Federalist. As the sole delegate in Poughkeepsie to have signed the Constitution in Philadelphia, Hamilton shouldered the primary burden of swaying the state convention toward approval. So impassioned were his pleas that spectators were moved to tears.[4]

Article VII of the Constitution specified that the document would take legal effect if nine of the thirteen states ratified it, and this breakthrough was reached with New Hampshire's approval on June 21, just as New York was beginning its convention.[5] Although the nine-state threshold had been crossed, the ongoing New York convention remained critical. After all, the Constitution would apply only to states that ratified, and given New York's sizable population and geographic centrality, the success of the Union likely hinged on an affirmative vote from the delegates in Poughkeepsie.[6]

As Hamilton labored for ratification in New York, Philadelphia played host to a "Grand Federal Procession," a parade conducted on the Fourth of July to celebrate the nine-state milestone.[7] The event exhibited the Jewish embrace of the Constitution at a time when enthusiasm for the new frame of government was far from universal among Americans. Benjamin Rush—who had been a delegate to the Continental Congress and signer of the Declaration of Independence—marveled at the parade's demonstration of unity across religious divides: "The Rabbi of the Jews, locked in the arms of two ministers of the Gospel, was a most delightful sight." (This "Rabbi" was, in fact, the hazzan of Philadelphia's synagogue.) To Rush, these intertwined religious leaders personified the constitutional prohibition on religious tests. "There could not have been a more happy emblem contrived of that section of the new Constitution, which opens all its powers and offices alike not only to every sect of Christians, but to worthy men of every religion," he reflected.[8] A minister interpreted the same sight as "a complete triumph over religious prejudices. The Jew joined the Christian … arm in arm, exhibiting a proof of brotherly affection and testifying [to] their approbation of the new Constitution."[9] The respect for Jews extended to culinary matters as well. At a feast that concluded the day's fete, the Committee of Provisions for the parade had arranged a kosher table with raisins, crackers, and—according to one Jewish participant—a "full supply of soused salmon."[10]

In a similar parade that Federalists organized in New York City later that month, the political stakes were higher. Philadelphia's Grand Federal Procession celebrated a feat already accomplished, but New York had yet to ratify the Constitution. The Federalists in New York City hoped that their parade would galvanize support for the Constitution in a state deeply divided over ratification.[11]

The parade's Committee of Arrangements had scheduled the procession for July 22, but this conflicted with the Fast of Tammuz, a mournful Jewish holiday marking the date that the Romans breached Jerusalem's walls in the year 70 CE. Remarkably, the parade organizers postponed the event for a day so that the city's Jews could partake. Perhaps the Jew most relieved by this turn of events was the artisan Asher Myers, who would now be available to claim the honor of leading the coppersmiths in the procession.[12] One Gentile explained in a letter to a business associate that the purpose of the delay was "to give the Jews an opportunity to join in the festivals, the 22nd being one of their holidays."[13] And another noted to his brother that the "procession is put off to the 23d," which he thought "a great compliment paid the Jews."[14] Indeed. With the state ratifying convention deadlocked, time was of the essence. What's more, Jews comprised little more than 1 percent of New York City's population.[15] The postponement of the parade underscores the strength of the Jewish alliance with the Federalists; such an extraordinary gesture would not have been made for a religious community whose allegiance to the Constitution was in doubt.

If the timing of the event was a courtesy to the Jews, then the substance of it was an effusive homage to New York's premier proponent of the Constitution: Alexander Hamilton. The central feature of the parade was a model warship called the "Hamilton" that rolled on wheels pulled by a team of ten horses. Though much smaller than an actual warship, the twenty-seven-foot "Hamilton" was still large enough to maintain thirty-two guns and about as many sailors. At various points along its journey through Manhattan, the ship would fire thirteen times to recognize the thirteen states of the Union. The "Hamilton" concluded its journey in Bowling Green near the southern tip of the island, where a crowd of thousands cheered its arrival.[16]

New York's tradesmen, who marched in the parade grouped by profession, considered Alexander Hamilton to be the human embodiment of the Constitution. The sailmakers unfurled a flag with a depiction of Hamilton at its center. Grain measurers, too, displayed a flag, featuring the likeness of Hamilton on one side and of George Washington on the other. As for the candlemakers, they opted to place Hamilton and Washington on the same side of their flag, with the image of thirteen candles between the two civic leaders. Each candle bore the name of a state, with those that had already approved the Constitution sharing a common flame and those yet to ratify featuring singular flames. Meanwhile, the flag of the cartmen offered a poetic tribute to "Hamilton" the warship:

> Behold the Federal ship of fame
> The "Hamilton" we call her name
> To every craft she gives employ
> Sure cartmen have their share of joy.[17]

The day culminated with an interdenominational meal that included representation from several of New York's religious communities: Anglican, Lutheran, Calvinist, Presbyterian, Catholic, and Jewish.[18] Meanwhile, Hamilton—the person—was still procuring votes for ratification in Poughkeepsie. Three days after the parade, New York became the eleventh state to endorse the Constitution. The 30–27 vote was the slimmest majority yet of any state ratifying convention.[19]

With the Constitution duly enacted, the first representatives and senators soon convened in the new Congress, and George Washington ascended to the presidency. Congress formally recommended that Washington decree a countrywide day of thanksgiving, and he chose the fourth Thursday of November in what would eventually become a recurring national holiday. His Thanksgiving Proclamation of 1789 called on the American people to "unite" in expressing gratitude to "Almighty God" for "protection" during the war and "for the peaceable and rational manner, in which we have been enabled to establish constitutions of government … particularly the national one now lately instituted." Washington further gloried in "the civil and religious liberty with which we are blessed."[20]

Among those clergy heeding the president's call was the leader of Shearith Israel, Gershom Seixas, who delivered a Thanksgiving sermon to his congregants in New York. Keenly aware that most state constitutions denied a measure of religious freedom that the national Constitution upheld, Seixas did not share the Anti-Federalist fear that a strong central government posed a threat to individual liberty. Instead, his sermon celebrated the federal government for protecting freedom.[21] Seixas praised the Constitution as a legal charter inspired by God himself that ensured equality for Jews. "We are, through divine goodness, made equal partakers of the benefits of government by the Constitution," he affirmed in an allusion to the ban on religious tests for office. It now fell upon Jews, Seixas maintained, to prove themselves worthy of a government that afforded them first-class citizenship. He asked his congregants to "behave in such a manner as to give strength and stability to the laws entered into by our representatives" and "to support that government which is founded upon the strictest principles of equal liberty and justice."[22]

Hamilton—who served with Seixas on the Columbia board—had recently been tapped to run the Department of the Treasury, and Seixas's sermon called upon the members of Shearith Israel to "consider the burden imposed on those who are appointed to act in the executive department." Then came a benediction for government officials: "May the Supreme King of Kings, through his infinite mercies, preserve them, and grant them life, and deliver them from all manner of trouble and danger." The congregants also chanted the festival morning prayer service and concluded with the singing of Adon Olam, a hymn that had been a staple of Jewish liturgy for centuries.[23]

That the Jewish veneration of the Constitution was genuine and not just politically prudent was manifest in the constitution that Shearith Israel adopted for itself around 1790, which broke from the synagogue's colonial-era conventions. Before the Revolution, power was concentrated in the hands of a few elite congregants, consistent with the hierarchical structure of Sephardic synagogues back in Europe. Shearith Israel's presidents, together with a board of elders, controlled most congregational matters. To the extent that decisions were made beyond this small circle, only those Jews who paid dues were entitled to vote. Sitting presidents in consultation with the elders chose the succeeding presidents, and dues-paying members alone were eligible to serve as president.[24]

The synagogue's constitution of 1790 reflected the influence of the federal Constitution in both style and substance. Its opening lines echoed the famous "We the People …" preamble: "We the members of the K. K. Shearith Israel …" (K. K. was shorthand for Kahal Kadosh, meaning "Holy Congregation"). In contrast to the prewar era, now all men age 21 who adhered to the tenets of the Jewish faith (except indentured servants) "shall be entitled to every right and privilege belonging to this society and are hereby declared to be in every respect on an equality with those now convened." No longer would the board of trustees choose the congregation's presidents. Election of all officers was instead vested in the synagogue members. The new charter was explicit in drawing parallels between the broader political context and Shearith Israel's new mode of self-governance, championing "the principles of equal liberty, civil and religious."[25]

The synagogue's constitution even included a bill of rights animated by the same Enlightenment ideals about sovereignty and liberty that informed the federal Bill of Rights (which the states were still in the process of ratifying). Shearith Israel's version began, "In free states all power originates and is derived from the people, who always retain every right necessary for their well being individually." Among the rights "which ought to be preserved inviolate" for congregants were the prerogative to read from the Torah at services, to have the hazzan present at weddings and funerals, to discuss "any subject whatsoever with decency" in synagogue meetings, and to receive a copy of the Shearith Israel constitution.[26] Hamilton's former client Solomon Simson, then serving as the congregation's president, was the most likely architect of the synagogue's 1790 code.[27]

These developments at Shearith Israel were part of a democratic movement at Jewish congregations throughout the country. In Richmond at newly founded Beth Shalome ("House of Peace"), the synagogue's constitution also drew inspiration from the preamble of the federal Constitution: "We the subscribers of the Israelite religion …" Beth Shalome, too, extended equal standing to all of its adult males. Charleston's Beth Elohim congregation ("House of God") soon followed suit. Farther south, in Savannah, Mickve Israel ("Hope of Israel") formulated a code of laws with the democratic tenet that any three congregants could challenge a decision of the board by presenting the matter to the synagogue's membership at large for its collective consideration.[28] The fact that these synagogues used the word "constitution" to describe their new charters is itself revealing of the influence of democratic values on Jewish life. Congregations traditionally had called their governing codes haskamot, which roughly translates to "covenants," but in postrevolutionary America, synagogues preferred to use the civic term over the religious one.[29]

Unlike these synagogues' constitutions, the U.S. Constitution did not speak to the question of eligibility for suffrage; that matter was the prerogative of each state to determine for itself. Still, it is telling that Jewish congregations looked to the federal Constitution as a model worthy of emulation and simultaneously embraced a relatively democratic system of synagogue governance. This suggests that American Jewry perceived the national Constitution as reflecting the egalitarian ideals of the Revolution, versus the Anti-Federalists who often depicted the Constitution as an elitist scheme that would imperil freedom.[30] George Mason, for instance, was a Virginia delegate to the Constitutional Convention who refused to sign it, predicting that the new frame of government would "produce a monarchy or a corrupt oppressive aristocracy; it will most probably vibrate some years between the two, and then terminate in the one or the other."[31] An Anti-Federalist delegate to South Carolina's ratifying convention employed even more dire language about the Constitution: "It evidently tends to promote the ambitious views of a few able and designing men, and enslave the rest."[32] These kinds of critiques would have sounded erroneous to those Jews who bristled at religious limitations for office at the state level and celebrated the explicit ban on religious tests in the federal Constitution. It was a quintessentially Hamiltonian position for them to believe that an energetic central government could flourish alongside robust individual liberty.[33]

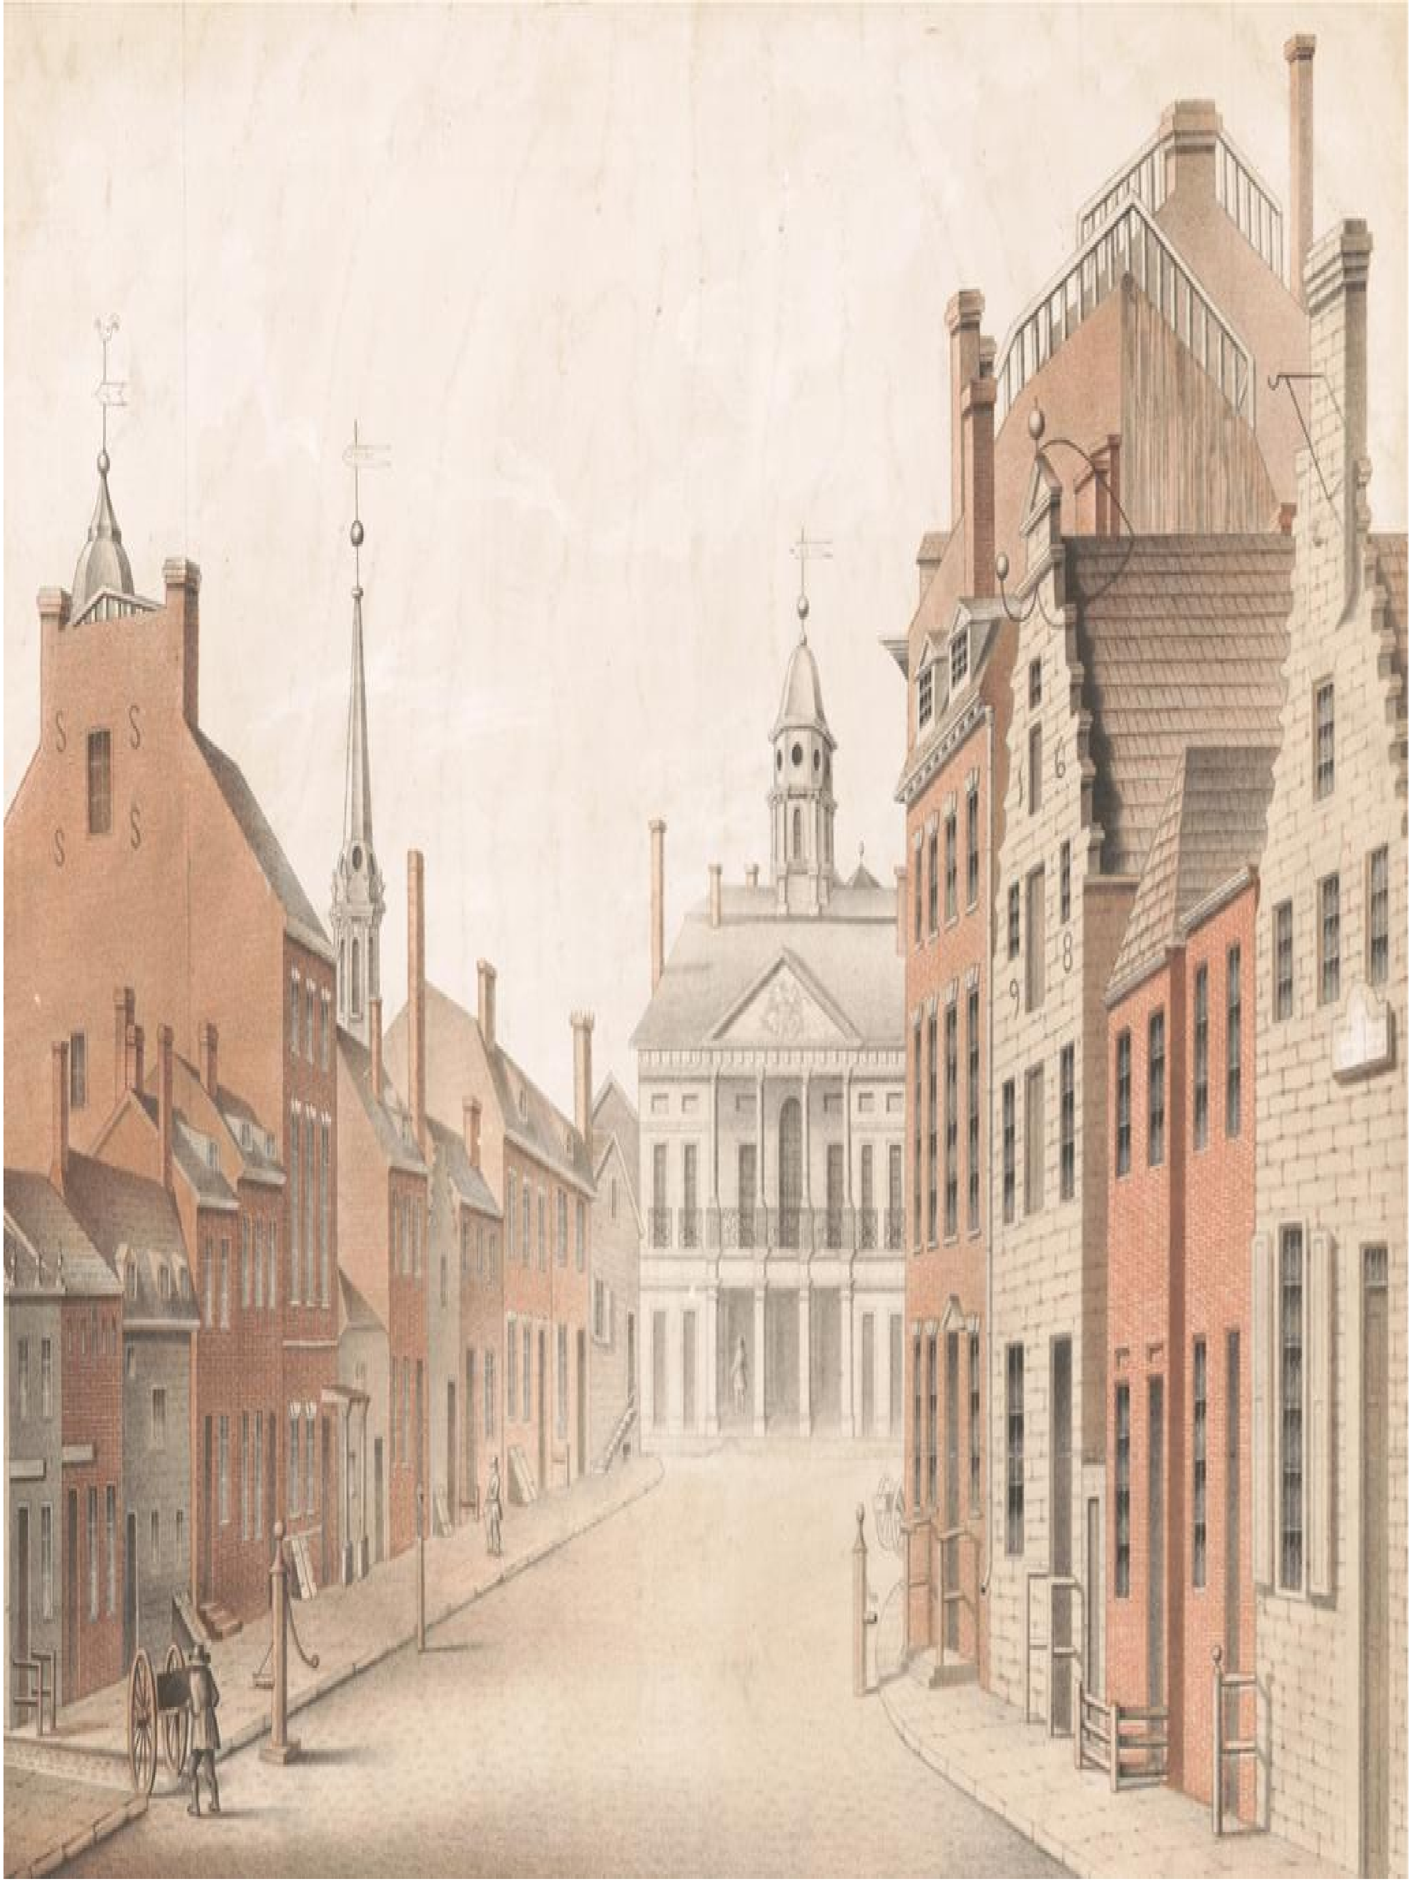
With the U.S. Constitution ratified and the new federal system in effect, Hamilton assumed the role of treasury secretary in September 1789. He took office with a bold economic vision in mind for the young country, one that would prove highly divisive. Hamilton's opponents had already weaponized antisemitism amid the ratification debates, and that tendency only intensified during his tenure at the Treasury. As we will see, tropes about conniving Jewish financiers, bankers, and merchants were sufficiently widespread that they provided ready fodder for those who hoped to derail Hamilton's plans. Motivated by genuine prejudice or a perception that popular antisemitism could be gainfully exploited—or both—a number of his adversaries would repeatedly accuse him of peddling policies to enrich greedy Jews. In all likelihood, no other self-professing Christian in the early republic saw antisemitism invoked against him with greater frequency than did Hamilton.

Reflecting on his appointment to the federal government, Hamilton would later write that he had felt "an obligation to lend my aid towards putting the machine in some regular motion."[34] His modest language belied the enormity of the task that confronted him in those early days of the Washington administration. It was not at all clear that the nation would survive much longer. The political and economic turbulence of the 1780s bred legitimate fears that the country might descend into anarchy. Shays' Rebellion demonstrated in bloody terms that citizens could see violence as a proper remedy for their frustration. Moreover, a sense of a national identity among the citizens was underdeveloped, and civil war between American states seemed a disturbingly real prospect. As the founders were well aware, history was replete with failed attempts to establish republics. The creation of the new central government now offered them a unique, and perhaps final, opportunity to cohere the thirteen states into an enduring union.[35]

Hamilton understood that the fate of the country hinged on the imminent performance of its civic leaders. Shortly after the Constitutional Convention, he predicted that the future depended upon "a wise choice of men to administer the government." While "a good administration will conciliate the confidence and affection of the people," conversely the absence of capable leadership would foment "in the course of a few years" the nation's "dissolution."[36]

Because the government had only recently come into existence and was thus unencumbered by precedent, Hamilton enjoyed enormous latitude to craft policy. This novel occasion to create federal programs from scratch meant that he could succeed on a grand scale—or fail just as spectacularly. A man of towering ambition, Hamilton had the right disposition for the moment. Recall that he had studied monetary and fiscal matters during the war. Now as the steward of the country's finances, Hamilton wasted little time in advancing an audacious agenda to revive the economy.[37]

His sweeping policy prescriptions polarized the American political scene, dividing the cabinet, the Congress, and the country. Resistance to Hamilton was not well organized at first because political parties did not yet exist in the early years of the Washington administration. The Federalists simply thought they were the government; in reality, they were a political faction within the government (granted, the dominant one at that moment). Federalists considered their critics to be seditious traitors rather than members of a loyal opposition.[38]



1
6
9
8

Federal Hall, on Wall Street in lower Manhattan, housed all three branches of the newly instituted national government. Source: George Holland, A View of the Federal Hall of the City of New York, as Appeared in the Year 1797; with the Adjacent Buildings Thereto. New York: H. R. Robinson. Library of Congress, Prints and Photographs Division [1847].

The anti-Hamilton faction included many Anti-Federalists who had unsuccessfully tried to rally their countrymen against the Constitution during the ratification debates. In the wake of their defeat, Anti-Federalist leaders tended to reconcile themselves to the Constitution, run for office, and combat government overreach from within the system. Opposition to Hamilton was not limited to Anti-Federalists. Joining them were erstwhile Federalists who had advocated ratification but grew increasingly alarmed that Hamilton's vision of federal power was far more expansive than their own.[39] Foremost among these figures in Congress was James Madison, Hamilton's onetime collaborator on the Federalist Papers. Hamilton was saddened by what he considered Madison's betrayal of both personal friendship and political principle.[40] Madison had a staunch ally in Washington's cabinet, Secretary of State Thomas Jefferson. Hamilton and Jefferson each suspected that the other, if left unchecked, would destroy the republic. Perhaps never again in American history would cabinet infighting reach such fevered intensity.[41] The anti-Hamiltonians would become known in time as Republicans.

Hamilton spent his first months as treasury secretary drafting a report for Congress on how the nation should remedy its budgetary woes. America's chief fiscal challenge was the colossal public debt. The national and state governments alike had funded the Revolutionary War with borrowed money that now amounted to $54 million for the federal government and a combined $25 million for the states. On January 14, 1790, Hamilton submitted his fifty-one-page Report on Public Credit, a historic blueprint for the country's financial future.[42]

The key insight in the report was that the national debt, when properly managed, could actually become a "national blessing." Hamilton posited that if the country were reliable in its debt payments, then the value of depreciated government bonds would fully recover. Those bonds, in turn, could stimulate the domestic economy by serving as currency. At that time, bartering was commonplace throughout much of the United States, an inefficient practice that hamstrung growth. The report set forth how liquid capital in the form of stable government bonds would allow a nation as rich in entrepreneurial spirit and material resources as America to realize its full potential in trade, manufacturing, and agriculture. Consistent debt payments would also serve to lower interest rates on loans for both the government and private individuals. In addition to suggesting import duties to reduce the debt, the report called for a luxury tax on spirits, wine, coffee, and tea to help ensure the regularity of debt payments.[43]

A centerpiece of Hamilton's scheme was "assumption"—that is, the federal government's assumption of the states' debts into a singular national debt. Hamilton hoped to "cement more closely the union of the states" at a time when the perpetuity of the Constitution was not yet assured and the future unity of the thirteen states remained very much in question.[44] If the nation but not the states were in debt, then creditors would have a significant stake in ensuring the survival of the federal government. It was a deft move on Hamilton's part to leverage an economic problem toward a political goal.[45] Although he was often condemned—in his lifetime and beyond—as a lackey of the moneyed elite, Hamilton's aim was not to exploit the government to advantage the already affluent. Rather, he sought to incentivize those with financial clout to lend their support to the preservation of the republic.

As Congress and the nation debated whether the Report on Public Credit should translate into legislation, many of Hamilton's opponents infused their animosity toward his agenda with antisemitism. They accused Hamilton of crafting policies to favor Jews. A "Farmer" writing for the Pennsylvania Gazette warned of "the dangerous consequences of the Secretary's funding report to the true interests of our country." Hamilton and his allies—the "Farmer" alleged—were overly concerned that "there is not a Jew nor a broker in London or Amsterdam that will ever trust" the United States for failure to pay the debt. In other words, the Hamiltonians would sooner sacrifice the prosperity of genuine patriots than lose credit with Jews. Not coincidentally, London and Amsterdam were two major centers of Jewish banking at the time.[46] Although this "Farmer" expressly mentioned foreign rather than domestic Jews, given the common view of Jewry as a network of border-crossing swindlers, negative depictions of European Jews could only redound to the detriment of their American coreligionists.

One aspect of Hamilton's plan engendered more antisemitism than any other: government bonds. The government had paid veterans of the war in bonds whose worth was severely eroded by the economic and political uncertainties of the 1780s. Some speculators had bought these bonds from veterans for as little as one-seventh of their face value. But now the prospect of invigorated public credit meant that these bonds could rebound. Even the mere anticipation of Hamilton's report spurred a rise in the value of government bonds. If Congress approved Hamilton's proposal, speculators stood to reap windfall profits.[47]

Hamilton understood the problematic optics of speculators prospering off bonds originally conferred to soldiers. In his report he acknowledged the commonplace argument that the original bondholders should be the ones to collect the rewards but insisted that such a scenario was untenable. The financial marketplace could not function in the future if the government voided contracts from the past, Hamilton explained, because markets rested on the foundational principle that when a buyer acquires an asset, that buyer enjoys all future earnings and suffers all future losses. He pointed out that the text of the Constitution itself expressly upheld the validity of transactions predating its ratification. His report further contended that soldiers who willingly sold their bonds in exchange for cash had showed little faith in the country's future, whereas the speculators who purchased these bonds had demonstrated their confidence in America.[48]

According to some of Hamilton's adversaries, the beneficiaries of these inflated government bonds were sure to be Jews and other voracious groups. A piece in the

Poughkeepsie Journal listed “brokers, speculators, Jews, members of Congress, and foreigners” as exploiters of the “dupes” who “are likely to become the victim of the specious artifice.”[49] In the same vein, the pages of the Pennsylvania Gazette featured a satirical verse that referred to Hamilton as “Belcour,” a character in a play who, like Hamilton, was of Caribbean origin:

> “Tax on Tax,” young Belcour cries,
> More imposts and a new excise.
> “A public debt’s a public blessing,
> Which ’tis of course a crime to lessen.”
> Each day a fresh report he broaches,
> That Spies and Jews may ride in coaches.
> Soldiers and Farmers, don’t despair,
> Untax’d as yet, are Earth and Air.[50]

By alluding to Hamilton’s West Indian roots, and by associating spies with Jews, the poet’s unsubtle implication was that Hamilton and his Jewish allies were not true Americans but malevolent foreign agents conspiring to bilk ordinary veterans and soil tillers. This poem was of a piece with novels of the era that frequently depicted Jews as shady operatives in covert international networks. In an age when Americans were anxious about foreign interference in their fledging republic, Jews were often maligned as rootless outsiders whose loyalty to the country was doubtful.[51]

A column in the New York Journal assumed a somewhat different form of antisemitism. It condemned those Christians who were poised to profit off the inflated bonds for acting like Jews. “In our Christians, who tampered with the distress of their fellow soldiers, avarice was the homogenous quality of their souls,” the author fumed. Referring to the character of Shylock in The Merchant of Venice, he remarked, “Shakespeare’s Jew, the character of a vigorous imagination, is surpassed in avarice by the real character of these Christians.” The editorialist suggested that although these greedy Christian speculators still had their foreskins, they were no better in their behavior than circumcised Jews. He used asterisks to denote male genitalia in lamenting, “The  of these people may be unmutilated, and may be in the original Christian state, but their minds are far gone in Israelitish avarice.”[52]

In the face of resistance, Hamilton and his acolytes vigorously lobbied Congress to pass his plan into law. One critic commented that Hamilton’s relentless campaign included “nightly visits—promises—compromises—sacrifices—and threats.”[53] The prospect of federal assumption of states’ debts was proving especially contentious. Those states that had already paid off their war debts decried the notion that other states’ outstanding debts would now become a shared national obligation. In response, Hamilton maintained that the war had been a mutual endeavor, the benefits of freedom were shared by all states, and the debts accrued in the course of winning independence hence comprised a collective responsibility. And at the same time that Congress was torn on the question of assumption, the future location of the country's capital emerged as another controversial issue. The capital was then in New York, and some prominent Virginians were eager to see the locus of federal power migrate considerably southward.[54]

On June 20, 1790, Hamilton sat down for a fateful meal with the two most influential Virginians other than the president: Jefferson, who hosted the meal, and Madison. (There may have been another guest or two.) While Hamilton wanted the capital in New York, he needed assumption, and was willing to trade away the former to ensure congressional approval of the latter. And so—over a decadent meal of stuffed rooster, French pot roast, and, for dessert, cookies and ice cream—these leaders brokered one of the most significant deals in American political history. Hamilton agreed to use his sway in Congress to transfer the capital to Philadelphia for ten years before a permanent move to a site on the banks of the Potomac River, where it would sit adjacent to Virginia. Negotiations along these lines were already afoot between the Virginia and Pennsylvania delegations. Now with Hamilton's backing, a southern capital would be sure to come to fruition. In turn, Jefferson and Madison (while not openly endorsing assumption) lined up sufficient votes for Hamilton's bill to pass. The debt plan that Hamilton dreamed up became codified as the Funding Act of 1790 in August.[55]

The legislation was an extraordinary feat for the thirty-six-year-old treasury secretary. Although he bargained away to the Virginians the seat of government, Hamilton had won the more important concession on the reach of government. He understood far better than Jefferson and Madison that his funding system would irreversibly consolidate power in the federal state.[56] Hamilton—haunted by the specter of anarchy—had forged a national government potent enough to ensure its own survival. And the Funding Act was merely the beginning of his grander vision.

In December 1790, just four months after the Funding Act garnered approval, Hamilton submitted a second major treatise to Congress, his Report on a National Bank. He set forth, in typical Hamiltonian fashion, a deluge of arguments for why America needed a central bank. The country still suffered from a shortage of sound currency; such a bank could increase the money supply by printing paper currency based on deposits of gold and silver. Another advantage of a bank was that it would retain a repository of funds from which the government could draw during emergencies. Tax collection would also become more effective because the bank could loan money to individuals who were otherwise unable to meet their tax obligations and because the proliferation of paper currency would obviate the onerous practice of paying taxes in coin. The bank would be a joint public-private enterprise. Individual investors would hold most of the bank's stock, while the government would become a minority shareholder—albeit one with sufficient weight to influence the bank's course of business. Hamilton noted that the Bank of North America, which he conceived a decade earlier and Robert Morris made a reality, was now operating under a new charter from Pennsylvania that rendered the bank more local than national in character. Hamilton's plan hence required an entirely new bank whose operations extended beyond the limited remit of the Bank of North America.[57]

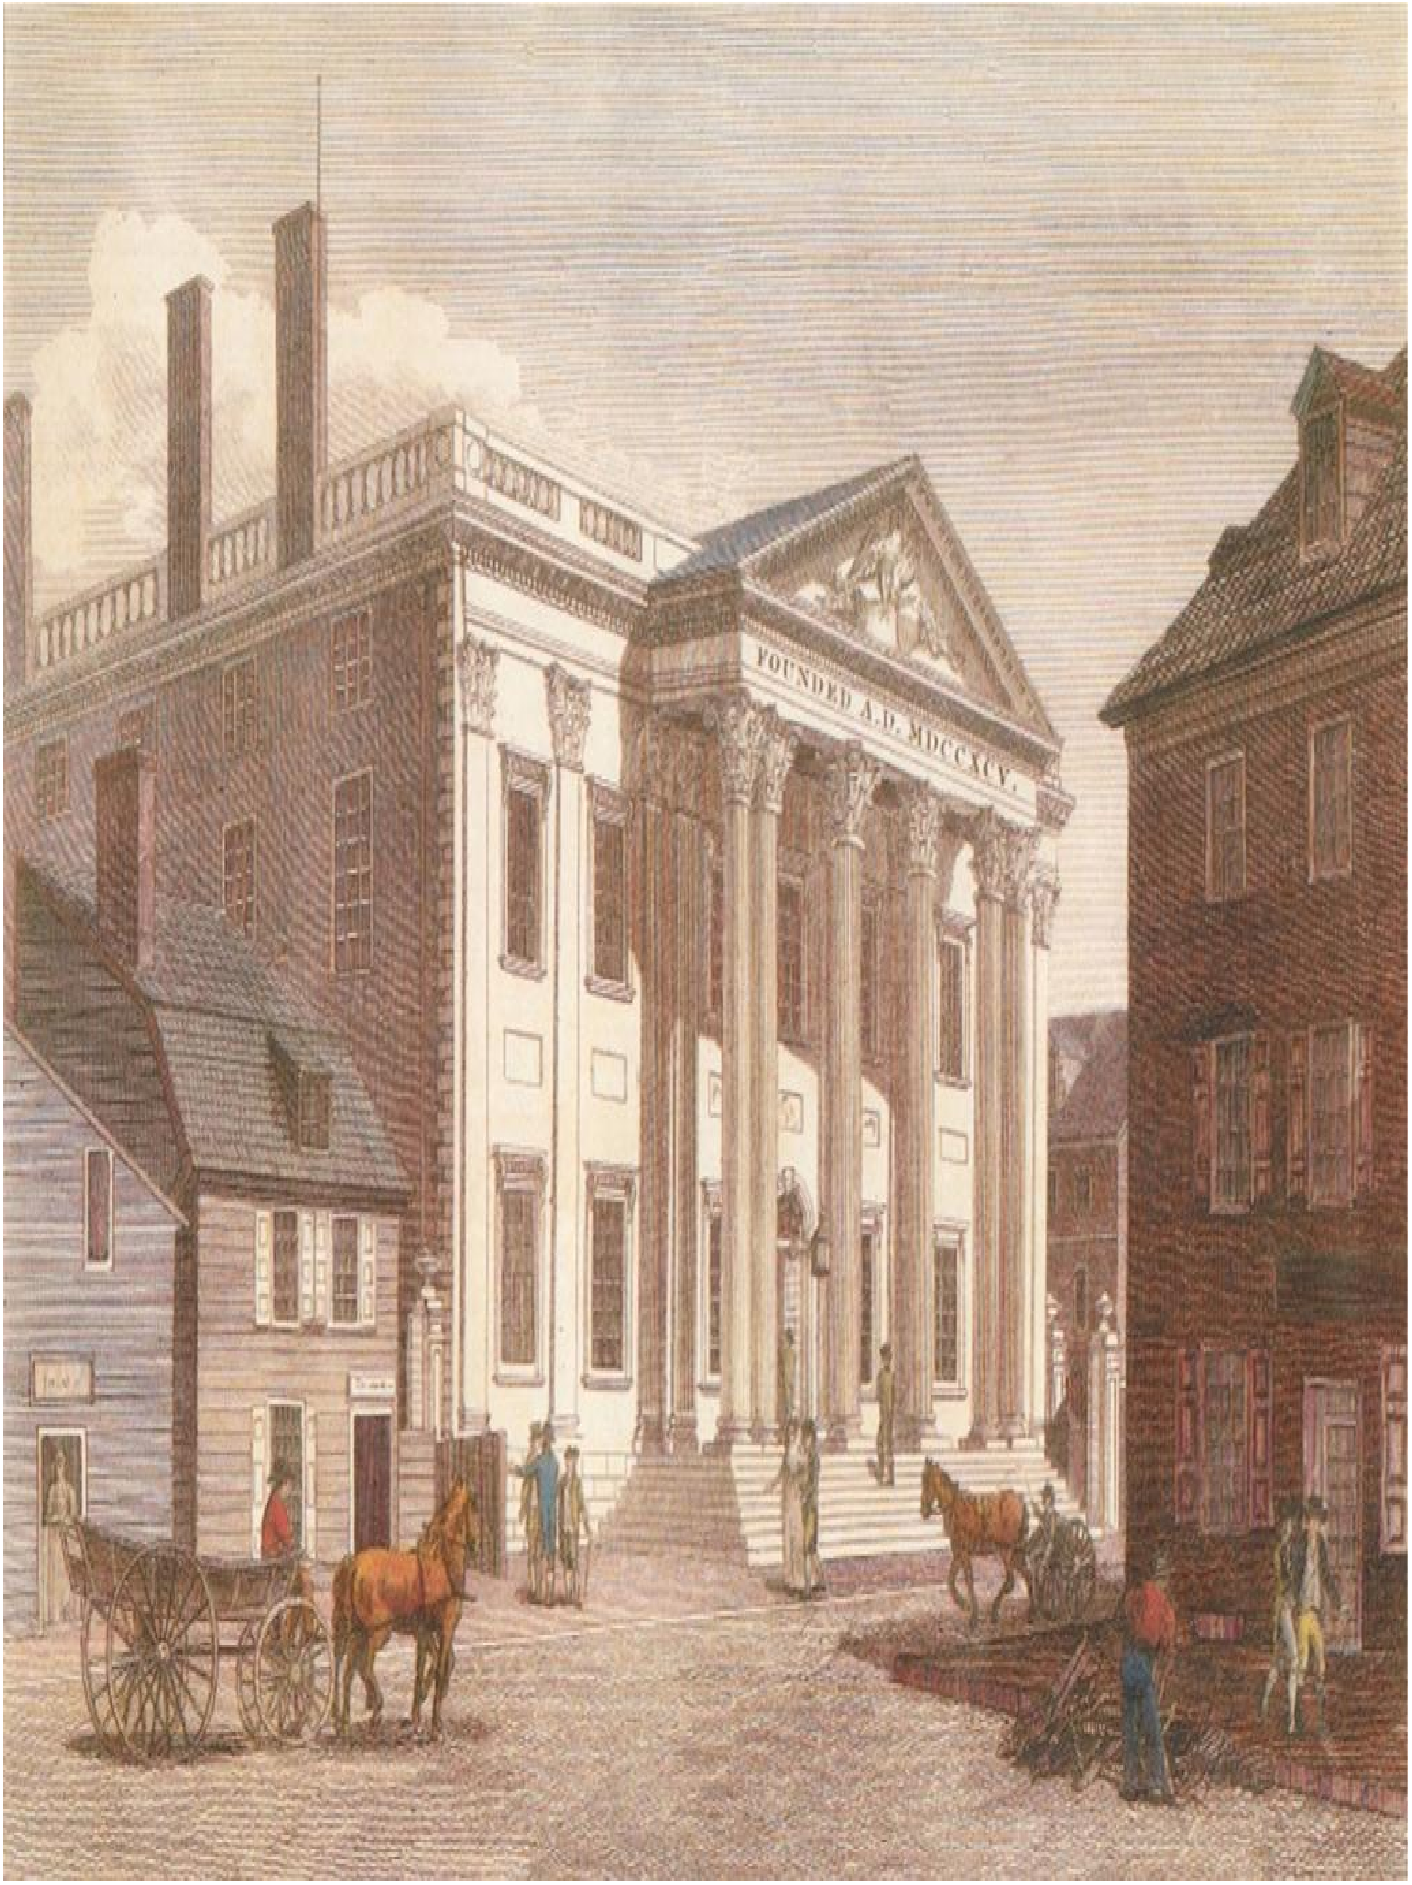
Jefferson and Madison once again emerged as Hamilton's principal adversaries, fearing that his scheme privileged northern mercantile interests over southern agrarian ones. When Congress passed legislation for the Bank of the United States in early 1791, the Virginians had one recourse left—persuade the president to veto the bill.[58] Jefferson wrote to Washington that establishing the bank was unconstitutional. Article I, Section 8 of the Constitution enumerates several financial powers that belong to Congress: "borrow money," "regulate commerce," and "coin money." Section 8 additionally stipulates that Congress can "make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers."[59] Whether a central bank was a necessary instrument for facilitating the enumerated powers hinged on the meaning of "necessary." To Jefferson, any justification for the bank would require a tortured reading of that word. "The constitution allows only the means which are 'necessary,' not those which are merely 'convenient' for effecting the enumerated powers," he opined. Jefferson warned that a loose construction of "necessary" would expand federal authority beyond constitutional limits.[60]

Hamilton issued a forceful rebuttal with characteristic verbosity—a handwritten draft extended fifty-eight pages—for Washington's consideration.[61] "So erroneous a conception of the meaning of the word necessary should be exploded," maintained Hamilton. "Necessary often means no more than needful, requisite, incidental, useful, or conducive to." He further insisted that the delegates' intent at the Constitutional Convention was not to unduly debilitate the government with a restrictive reading of "necessary."[62]

Jefferson and Hamilton construed the Constitution differently because they were plagued by different anxieties. Whereas Jefferson dreaded a government of boundless power, Hamilton feared a government too feeble to function. Their battle over the bank set the terms of a larger debate over how to interpret the Constitution—narrowly or broadly—that would engage every successive generation. In 1791, it was the Hamiltonian approach that won over Washington.[63] When the Bank of the United States opened on the Fourth of July of that year, aspiring investors rushed the building, and stock subscriptions were sold out in under an hour.[64]

Yet again, some of Hamilton's antagonists saw in his design a plot to fill Jewish coffers. A contributor to the Philadelphia General Advertiser bemoaned, "The only infallible way to wealth in our country is to be neither honest nor industrious.… The late sudden subscriptions to the national bank are ample proofs." He suggested "Amsterdam Jews" were among those lacking in "honesty or industry" who profited from the bank.[65] The piece was signed with the symbolic pseudonym "Square Toes." This reference to thrifty wooden shoes intended to convey to readers that the author counted himself among the honorable poor whom rapacious Jews and other elites supposedly victimized.[66] His association of Jews with the Hamiltonian agenda resonated beyond Pennsylvania, as several newspapers in other states reprinted his commentary.[67]

Even before Congress approved Hamilton’s bank in February 1791, he managed to produce yet another exhaustive treatise on economic matters: his Report on the Mint, tendered to Congress in late January. Hamilton was distressed at the condition of coinage. Coins had no uniform value across states. Merchants were hesitant to accept gold and silver coins, which were often alloyed with cheaper metals that debased their value. Counterfeit coins circulated widely.[68]



FOUNDED A.D. MDCCXCV.

Bank of the United States. Source: The City of Philadelphia, in the State of Pennsylvania, North America; as It Appeared in the Year 1800 consisting of 28 Plates Drawn and Engraved by W. Birch and Son. Published by W. Birch, Springland Cot, near Neshaminy Bridge on the Bristol Road, Pennsylvania, December 31, 1800.

As early as 1781, Robert Morris had discussed the prospect of a mint with Benjamin Franklin, and the following year Congress approved a plan for one. But the endeavor stalled and no mint came to fruition.[69] The Jewish merchant Solomon Simson, a legal client of Hamilton's, sought to revive congressional interest in a national mint in 1785. By that point in time, Hamilton's tenure in Congress had come to an end, and Simson turned to the like-minded John Jay, then serving as the country's secretary for foreign affairs, to forward his blueprint for a mint to lawmakers. While the text of Simson's plan no longer exists, Jay's covering letter to the head of Congress still does: "At the request of Mr. Simson, who sustains the character of a Whig citizen and an honest man, I take the liberty of transmitting to your Excellency, herewith enclosed, a paper containing proposals for establishing a mint."[70] It is difficult to say what, if any, credit is due Simson for spurring Congress to action, but the following year, Congress did pass another law providing for a mint. Yet once again, no mint actually materialized.[71]

Hamilton resuscitated the cause with his Report on the Mint, where he lamented the "immense disorder" of coinage in the United States and advised that the creation of a mint would benefit "trade and industry, the value of all property, [and] the whole income both of the State and of individuals."[72] The report was consummately Hamiltonian in its fine-grained detail; he had well-informed thoughts on such matters as the ideal thickness and breadth of coins. It also reflected the systematic thinking of a man who carefully designed his various programs to work in tandem. He explained how a national mint would help facilitate key goals outlined in his earlier reports, such as fortifying public credit.[73]

In 1792, Congress heeded Hamilton's call and passed the Coinage Act, which authorized a mint and instituted the silver dollar as the official unit of lawful currency.[74] Although coin manufacturing would have naturally fit within the purview of the Treasury, the mint was instead placed under the auspices of the Department of State to appease Thomas Jefferson, who had long nursed an interest in coinage.[75] Jefferson stepped down as secretary of state the following year, but the mint remained at the State Department, much to Hamilton's chagrin. Even on Hamilton's final day as treasury secretary in January 1795, he was trying, unsuccessfully, to persuade Washington that the mint ought to relocate to his own department.[76]

Hamilton had greater luck in vouching for a Jewish merchant, Jacob Mark, who sought to furnish copper for the mint. Mark, along with some business partners, had acquired the rights to a copper mine in New Jersey. In 1794, they reached out to Hamilton in the hopes of securing a government contract.[77] "If you have not already ordered the quantity which is required for the mint," Jacob Mark and Company wrote to Hamilton, "we beg to be favored with the preference of your commands."[78] Because coinage fell within the remit of the State Department, Hamilton took up the matter on

Mark's behalf with then–Secretary of State Edmund Randolph, assuring Randolph, "the copper from that mine has always had the reputation of being particularly good."[79] Randolph, in turn, requested that Hamilton investigate "whether the contract can be punctually filled." If so, then Hamilton was free to "enter into an engagement [on] behalf of the United States, at a price not exceeding that of imported copper."[80] In a letter to Hamilton, Jacob Mark and Company confirmed that its mine could indeed expeditiously fill the order for eighty tons of copper and, at an affordable 36 cents per pound, Mark's copper would cost "very considerably less than it can be imported for."[81] Hamilton forwarded this message to Randolph and explained that his own involvement in the transaction could legally go no further, as Congress had reserved to the mint director the power to purchase copper for coinage.[82]

Hamilton's vast financial system succeeded brilliantly, even as antisemitic critics remained stubbornly blind to its merits.[83] In 1793, with the benefits of Hamilton's programs accruing, an obstinate "American Farmer" writing for the National Gazette claimed that the nation's debt enriched Jews and passed the burden to future generations. "Borrowing money from the bankers and Jews of Europe" served to "mortgage the labor of posterity to discharge debts thus contracted," he alleged.[84] But in reality, Hamilton had always considered it incumbent on the present generation to reduce the debt. The reliability of payment to the country's creditors was a centerpiece of his plan, and in practice it produced just the tonic effects he predicted. America had been bankrupt when Hamilton became treasury secretary; by the end of his tenure in that office, the United States would boast a credit rating on par with the world's greatest powers.[85]

That Hamilton's opponents often employed antisemitism against his agenda speaks to the persistence of Old World bigotries in the early republic. It also serves as a testament to the Hamiltonian-Jewish alliance. After all, the Jewish mercantile class did stand to gain from Hamilton's far-reaching economic vision—but not owing to some nefarious ruse, as his opponents sometimes alleged. Rather, Jews found themselves by virtue of their marginality in the very sectors of the economy that attracted Hamilton's attention. Jewish prominence in trade and banking was a reality rooted partly in the want of access to other professions. Jews could not easily pursue many other careers—attorney, legislator, professor—owing to legal prohibitions and cultural prejudices. In contrast, the financial and commercial spheres that Hamilton invigorated did provide opportunities to industrious outsiders, Jews and Gentiles alike. To deride Hamilton as elitist is to ignore that the marketplace of his day was more of a meritocracy than the courtroom, statehouse, or college.

Hamilton, to be sure, was not a populist crusader. He feared mob rule, as did most of the founders. But his concerns about populism hardly meant that he was endeared to the prospect of a self-contained oligarchy.[86] Hamilton saw danger in both populism and elitism, warning his fellow delegates at the Constitutional Convention, "Give all power to the many, they will oppress the few. Give all power to the few, they will oppress the many."[87] He championed meritocratic principles, unsurprisingly so given his own humble origins. As Hamilton wrote in the Federalist Papers, "There are strong minds in every walk of life that will rise superior to the disadvantages of situation, and will command the tribute due to their merit."[88] Any movement away from hereditary hierarchy and toward meritocracy would tend to improve the condition of talented immigrants—a reality that Hamilton and any number of his Jewish compatriots well understood.

While many Jews were favorably positioned to reap rewards from Hamilton's financial programs under Washington, economic opportunity for Jews was not singular to the United States. Jews had found a measure of material success in other tolerant nations. It was in the realm of civic equality more than commercial prosperity where the Washington administration would take an unprecedented step in the history of the Jewish people.

7

Church and State

WHEN GEORGE WASHINGTON first assumed the presidency, the question of Jews' political rights was still unsettled. The U.S. Constitution's ban on religious tests for office seemed to indicate that national citizenship would be independent of religious identity. Yet the Constitution as it was ratified in 1788 remained silent about the free exercise of faith. Nor did it mention government establishment of religion—that is, whether the federal state could sponsor an official church. Theoretically, the national government could mitigate Jewish gains by encroaching on free exercise or requiring Jews to contribute tax dollars to a state-sanctioned religion. The proposed Bill of Rights promised to preclude those prejudicial outcomes by protecting free exercise and prohibiting an established church. But the process of ratifying the Bill of Rights had ground to a halt in the early days of the Washington administration. It was unclear whether free exercise and disestablishment would ever achieve constitutional status.[1]

George Mason had been the first to advocate a bill of rights, recommending in the closing days of the Constitutional Convention that one be included in the Constitution's original text. Mason's fellow delegates, however, proved resistant for numerous reasons. Having toiled over constitutional language amid the heat of a long Philadelphia summer, they were understandably anxious to return home. Moreover, they feared that drafting a bill of rights would take longer than the few hours Mason anticipated, and that debate over the specifics of such a bill might jeopardize tenuous compromises forged earlier in the convention. Opponents of a bill of rights also believed it was unnecessary, as the Constitution provided for a government of limited power with no authority to infringe on essential freedoms. Some delegates worried that enumerating fundamental rights might, counterintuitively, curb liberty because a finite list of rights could wrongly imply that other unlisted rights were subject to government encroachment.[2] Alexander Hamilton stood among those who were concerned that a bill of rights might unwittingly limit freedom.[3]

In rebuffing Mason, the framers failed to foresee that most people, upon reading the product of the convention, would want their most vital liberties enshrined in a bill of rights. The Constitution was ratified with the common understanding that a bill of rights would soon follow. In 1789, Congress approved the Bill of Rights, and the president sent the proposed amendments to the states for their consideration. Yet despite widespread enthusiasm, hopes for ratification soon began to dim. Amendments required approval of three-fourths of the states to take effect. Georgia, Connecticut, and Massachusetts had not ratified the Bill of Rights. The determining vote thus fell to the Virginia General Assembly, where the push for ratification became mired in protracted wrangling between the legislature's upper and lower houses.[4] Meanwhile, religious discrimination persisted at the state level. Most states denied Jews either the right to vote, hold office, or practice law—or some combination thereof.[5]

Jewish-Americans thus had just cause to be anxious about their civil status and eager for affirmation from the country's first president. Soon, leaders of America's various synagogues began discussing how to convey to George Washington their support for him and their aspirations for the Jewish people in the country he now led.[6] The effort began on June 20, 1790, with a circular that Shearith Israel in New York sent to sister congregations in Newport, Philadelphia, Richmond, and Charleston to collect their thoughts on a possible joint letter to Washington. Two of Hamilton's legal clients, Isaac Moses and Solomon Simson, authored the circular.[7] Shearith Israel explained, "We are desirous of addressing the President of the United States in one general address, comprehending all the congregations professing our holy religion in America, as we are led to understand that mode will be less irksome to the president than troubling him to reply to every individual address." In truth, Shearith Israel meant all the congregations save one—the Jews of Savannah had already sent their own letter to the president, and Washington had written a gracious response. Shearith Israel's circular reflected its frustration with the Savannah congregation, bemoaning, "We do not, by any means, conceive ourselves well treated by the Georgians," whose failure to give Shearith Israel any "previous notice" of their solo missive was "hurtful to our feelings."[8]

Washington had already taken his oath of office nearly fourteen months earlier, and in its circular Shearith Israel insisted that it would have contacted the other synagogues sooner about a collective letter but mitigating circumstances intervened. Just what those circumstances were is unclear; the circular vaguely alluded to a "situation" which for "some time past prevented us" from taking timely action. Shearith Israel now requested that the other congregations suggest language for a letter that would then be combined into a single address.[9]

Moses Seixas was the warden of the Touro Synagogue (also known as Yeshuat Israel, meaning "Salvation of Israel") in Newport, and he issued his response to Shearith Israel on July 2. His home state of Rhode Island had ratified the Constitution only weeks earlier. Not even the Rhode Island General Assembly and other important bodies in the state had found opportunity to write to Washington yet. Seixas feared that it would entail "a great degree of indelicacy for us to address the President of the United States previous to any of them and therefore from motives of diffidence, and an ardent desire to avoid giving umbrage, [we] would wish to decline at present."[10]

While the Newport synagogue had ample reason for having delayed an address to Washington, Shearith Israel had none, in Seixas's view. After all, Shearith Israel was situated in New York, a state that had ratified the Constitution two years prior and thus been properly in the Union for the entirety of Washington's presidency. According to Seixas, Shearith Israel's delay was all the more egregious given its status as the first Jewish congregation in America and its location in a city that was, at the time, the national capital. "What plea you can now make to him for your apparent neglect, which almost amounts to disrespect, we cannot conceive," scolded Seixas.[11]

Not only did Seixas reprimand Shearith Israel, but he defended the Savannah Jews for having unilaterally sent a message to Washington. "We do not blame the conduct of the Georgians, they had an undoubted right to do as they did" after Shearith Israel had opted to "procrastinate," he protested.[12] That Moses Sexias's brother, Gershom, was the hazzan of Shearith Israel makes Moses's caustic attitude surprising at first glance. Then again, the authors of Shearith Israel's circular were on the board of trustees, a board that had routinely frustrated Gershom Seixas in negotiations over his salary. Moses Seixas's pique may have been a testament to, rather than betrayal of, brotherly loyalty.[13]

Toward the end of the letter, Seixas tempered his tone somewhat. He reserved the possibility that Shearith Israel had deliberately waited until Rhode Island's ratification of the Constitution because New York Jewry wanted to include their Newport coreligionists in a letter to Washington. If that were indeed the case, then the Touro Synagogue would sign on, Seixas offered. Still, he would not accede to Shearith Israel's request that his congregation draft a letter to the president for Shearith Israel's review. Sexias instead directed Shearith Israel to furnish him with a draft so that the Newport congregants could respond with "our opinion thereon in a few hours after we have perused it." In closing, he conceded that some of his diction was perhaps too heated: "You'll excuse my language."[14]

Meanwhile, the Beth Elohim congregation in Charleston was similarly irked by Shearith Israel. Beth Elohim had sent a draft letter on July 15 for Shearith Israel to incorporate into a joint address. When Shearith Israel failed to acknowledge receipt in due time, Beth Elohim complained, "We are left in the dark."[15]

As the first synagogue in America, Shearith Israel was the foundational congregation that had served as a model for—and provided money to—Jewish communities along the Atlantic seaboard. But the congregations in Savannah, Newport, and Charleston illustrate how Shearith Israel did not enjoy blind deference from other synagogues. An aversion to hierarchy was part of what made American Jews distinct from their coreligionists in Europe and the Middle East, where Jewish authority was not so decentralized.[16]

With Shearith Israel's attempt at a collective letter showing little momentum, the Touro Synagogue of Newport received news that prompted Moses Seixas to begin writing his own address to the president, independent of the other synagogues—George Washington was coming to Rhode Island. The president was slated to visit Newport, the state's capital city, where Seixas would be afforded an opportunity to read aloud a letter on behalf of his congregation in Washington's presence.

It is not without irony that this event, which would prove of great historical significance owing to the famous reply it elicited from Washington, came at an otherwise trying time for Newport and its Jews. The war had resulted in the evacuation of much of the city's population, especially of Jews faithful to the Patriot cause. British troops had destroyed many buildings, and postwar recovery was slow in coming to Newport. In 1790, the Jewish community, like the city at large, was still a poor imitation of its earlier self.[17]

Washington chose to make a celebratory trip because Rhode Island finally had ratified the Constitution. That Rhode Island became the last of the original thirteen states to do so was unsurprising. The state was something of a problem child in the early republic. Under the Articles of Confederation, which required unanimity among the states for amendments, Rhode Island sank more than one endeavor that otherwise enjoyed broad support. In so doing, the state unwittingly illustrated the shortcomings of the Articles and inadvertently helped hasten the call for the Constitutional Convention. Rhode Island was the only state that declined to send delegates to Philadelphia in the summer of 1787.[18] And even though in 1788 the Constitution garnered the approval of enough states to take effect, Rhode Island refused to ratify for another two years. Dubbed "Rogue's Island" by its critics,[19] the state had a unique political culture and economic system that made it fiercely protective of its autonomy.[20] But faced with the prospect of being treated as a foreign country, and thus subject to import duties, Rhode Island belatedly ratified the Constitution in May 1790.[21]

Washington left New York by boat on August 15 and headed east through Long Island Sound toward Newport.[22] A number of dignitaries joined the president on his excursion, including a U.S. Supreme Court justice, the governor of New York, two congressmen, and Hamilton's rival in the cabinet, Thomas Jefferson.[23] On the morning of August 17, expectant Newport residents spotted the ship approaching the harbor. The townsfolk quickly went into motion, raising the state flag, ringing bells, and firing thirteen cannons in honor of the states of the Union.[24]

Washington and his cohort were greeted at the wharf by a committee of leading citizens.[25] During his ensuing tour of Newport, the president was almost certainly shown the local synagogue, as it was the best preserved building in a city otherwise ravaged by war.[26] A contemporary magazine noted of Newport, "The whole appearance of the place is shattered and out of repair" and its "churches have not much of the beauties of architecture to boast of." However, "the Jews' synagogue is the most ornamented of them all," with a "rich and elegant" interior featuring impressive brasswork.[27]

While in Newport, Washington met an elderly but entrepreneurial Jewish resident named Jacob Isaacks. The septuagenarian Isaacks had pioneered a technique for desalinating ocean water, thereby making it safe “for all common and culinary purposes,” according to the Newport Herald. Isaacks gifted a fresh bottle of his water to the president, who was reportedly “pleased to express himself highly satisfied therewith.”[28] Lest Washington entertain any doubts about the potability of the bottle’s contents, Isaacks also handed him two certificates from local townsmen vouching for his purification process.[29]

A formal banquet with eighty attendees commenced at 5:00 p.m. in the State House.[30] As these were years of scarcity for this once bustling seaport, local families had to volunteer tableware from their homes so that every dish, goblet, and pitcher at the supper would be silver.[31] Thirteen toasts followed the meal, as was the tradition in that era. Participants raised their glasses to such admired subjects as the U.S. Constitution, the fallen soldiers of the Revolution, and the women of America. “May the last be the first,” rang one toast, expressing the hope that the last state to ratify the Constitution would be the first in its defense. A local federal judge, Henry Marchant, offered the evening’s final toast to “the man we love,” and those present stood up in Washington’s honor.[32] The president and his contingent retired after dinner to an upscale boardinghouse, where they slept two or more men to a room, except for Washington, who enjoyed private quarters. He slumbered under a blue quilt made of silk (which no subsequent guest would be allowed to use until another president, Rutherford B. Hayes, visited Newport eighty-nine years later).[33]

Touro Synagogue. Source: Samuel Adams Drake, Nooks and Corners of the New England Coast. New York: Harper, 1875.

The next morning, the community organized a series of orations to commemorate the occasion. Judge Marchant was scheduled to speak first, but he became overwhelmed by the moment and someone else stepped in to give his remarks. An address from the Christian clergy was then read aloud. Finally, Moses Seixas delivered not one but two speeches, the first in his capacity as master of the local Masonic fraternity known as King David's Lodge—Washington was himself a Mason—and the second as warden of the Touro Synagogue.[34]

Amid all their ritual and secrecy, Masonic lodges were foremost social gatherings where men found respite from their professional and familial obligations. That Seixas was Jewish and an officer at a lodge named after a legendary Israelite king was not coincidental; Jewish colonists had established King David's Lodge some twenty years earlier. There were Jewish masons on both sides of the Atlantic. Unlike religious institutions, Masonic lodges were open to Jews and Gentiles alike, thereby providing a unique space where a Jew could retain his religious identity while cultivating ties with those Christian neighbors who were amenable to interfaith friendship.[35] Seixas's address from King David's Lodge to Washington comprised a short series of pleasant platitudes, praising the president's "exemplary virtues and emanations of goodness."[36]

He then turned to his second oration of the day, this one on behalf of the Jewish community to Washington. "Permit the children of the Stock of Abraham to approach you with the most cordial affection," Seixas opened. After celebrating that the "God of Israel" had "shielded your head in the day of battle," he contrasted the denial of rights for Jews in the past with the commitment to political equality that the Constitution seemed to promise: "Deprived as we heretofore have been of the invaluable rights of free citizens, we now … behold a Government, erected by the majesty of the People—a Government, which to bigotry gives no sanction, to persecution no assistance—but generously affording to all liberty of conscience, and immunities of citizenship."[37] Seixas's remarks were, in some sense, aspirational. Although the Constitution's explicit repudiation of religious tests for office suggested that Jews (and other religious minorities) were in fact entitled to first-class citizenship, the political climate remained worrisome, with most state constitutions discriminating against Jews and ratification of the federal Bill of Rights still languishing. Seixas's speech embodied the Jewish hope that their national government did indeed see them as full-fledged citizens.

Following Seixas's address, the president and his coterie headed toward the wharf, as they were due to sail to Providence. Washington passed a store during this walk and sent an aide inside to purchase a pair of gloves. The shopkeeper stood at the window, mesmerized by the sight of the nation's first head of state on her street. She was unaware that the man requesting to see her stock of gloves did so on Washington's behalf and refused to serve him, fixated as she was on the president outside. The failure of the aide to speedily return prompted Washington to enter the store himself. Gloves were quickly furnished. No one else had such a hold on the American people; as Jews like Moses Seixas understood, no one else could lend greater prestige to the principle of religious liberty.[38]

After Washington and his travel companions boarded their boat, a final salute of thirteen cannons thundered as they passed Newport's fort.[39] Their ensuing visit to Providence was brief, for pressing business awaited the president—the relocation of the capital from New York to Philadelphia.[40] But despite the claims on Washington's attention in the aftermath of his trip, he found time to issue a response to the Touro Synagogue. The president had a critical opportunity to give voice to his belief in civic equality for Jews. Washington well understood that his words would reach far more people than just Moses Seixas and his fellow congregants. Presidential replies to constituents were often reprinted in newspapers and thus an essential means by which Washington communicated the policy of his administration to the country.[41] The message that he crafted to Newport's Jews would become among the most important in the annals of religious freedom.

Washington mixed his own wording with language borrowed from Seixas's oration, affirming, "All possess alike liberty of conscience and immunities of citizenship."[42] This marked the first time in world history that the head of a modern state recognized Jews as citizens.[43] He continued in the letter's most famous passage: "It is now no more that toleration is spoken of, as if it was by the indulgence of one class of people that another enjoyed the exercise of their inherent natural rights. For happily the Government of the United States, which gives to bigotry no sanction, to persecution no assistance, requires only that they who live under its protection should demean themselves as good citizens."[44] That the president lifted this phrasing nearly verbatim from Seixas's speech could leave the Jews of Newport with no doubt that their aspiration and the position of the Washington administration were one and the same.[45]

The letter's distinction between mere religious toleration and genuine religious liberty is significant. Toleration is probationary; liberty is permanent. The process of Jewish "emancipation"—that is, the granting of citizenship—in Europe illustrates the precarious nature of toleration. When European nations gradually emancipated their Jews (beginning with France in 1791 and culminating with Romania in 1923), the measures were often provisional. The specter of reversal loomed. Citizenship was indeed an indulgence.[46] In the Newport letter, by contrast, Washington exalted religious liberty as an inherent natural right, signaling to Jews that the free exercise of their faith was not simply tolerable for the moment—it was an inviolable element of life in the American republic. The Newport letter stands as close to a formal emancipation of Jews as can be found in the history of the presidency.[47]

Washington closed his message to the Touro Synagogue with language from his favorite verse in the Hebrew Bible. He assured Newport's Jews that in this new nation, "everyone shall sit in safety under his own vine and fig-tree, and there shall be none to make him afraid."[48] The "vine and fig-tree" reference, from Micah 4:4, appears no fewer than thirty-seven times in Washington's writings.[49] Invoking a line from the Hebrew Bible doubtlessly helped the Christian president identify common ground with his Jewish correspondents. The Newport letter reached a broad readership, appearing in newspapers in Massachusetts, Connecticut, New York, Maryland, Virginia, South Carolina, and, of course, Rhode Island.[50]

In some respects, Washington's authorship of what is arguably the most important document in American Jewish history may seem surprising. He had not been especially engaged with Judaism or Jewry. Unlike other founders, Washington drew no parallels between Americans and ancient Jews, offered little comment on Jewish suffering, and had sparse contact with Jewish people.[51] But if discussion of Jews or their faith is strikingly absent from Washington's writings, then so too is any hint of the religious prejudice that mars the records of so many other founders. At the close of the Revolution, he had voiced his aspiration that America would serve as "an asylum for the poor and oppressed of all nations and religions."[52] And Washington showed fidelity to that sentiment in his private life. In one of his only references to "Jews" in his correspondence, he asked an aide to seek out the services of a pair of tradesmen and was explicit that neither national origin nor religious identity should raise any bar to hiring someone with talent. "If they are good workmen, they may be of Asia, Africa, or Europe," Washington stipulated. "They may be Mahometans, Jews, or Christian[s] of any sect—or they may be Atheists."[53] The Newport letter embodied that same characteristic broad-mindedness.

Historians speculate about who in Washington's circle most likely influenced his views in the Newport letter.[54] While scholars have not previously considered Hamilton, he is a compelling candidate for several reasons. No one else in the president's orbit could claim closer ties to the people and faith of Judaism. Hamilton also had a preexisting relationship with the Seixas family, having served alongside Moses's brother, Gershom, on the Columbia board.[55]

What's more, the crucial point in the Newport letter that bare tolerance of minority faiths falls short of genuine religious freedom was a distinction to which Hamilton himself was sensitive. In a government report from 1791, he praised "a perfect equality of religious privileges" as "far more precious than mere religious toleration." Hamilton predicted that people would "flock from Europe to the United States" in part to enjoy the kind of true religious liberty unknown in the Old World.[56] Indeed, he personally knew a number of Jewish immigrants to America who fit that very description.

The Newport letter also spoke directly to the notion of Jewry no longer living in fear—"there shall be none to make him afraid"—which would have been particularly meaningful to Jews given their long history of persecution. It was a history familiar to Hamilton. He marveled at Jewry's improbable continuity through the millennia, observing in an essay that the "progress of the Jews … from their earliest history to the present time has been and is entirely out of the ordinary course of human affairs. Is it not then a fair conclusion that the cause also is an extraordinary one—in other words, that it is the effect of some great providential plan?"[57] To Hamilton, the Jews' unlikely survival was a sure sign of God's favor.

In the months following the Newport letter, the synagogues of New York, Richmond, Charleston, and Philadelphia persevered in their efforts to formulate a joint address to Washington. Finally, they produced one. With the president in the new capital of Philadelphia, a local Jew named Manuel Josephson found occasion to read aloud this collective letter to Washington on December 13, 1790. The missive reflected the esteem with which Jews held both the president and the Constitution he had helped shepherd into existence. As the "Leader of the American Armies," Washington had "opened the way to the reign of freedom, but never was it perfectly secure, till your hand gave birth to the federal Constitution, and you renounced the joys of retirement to seal by your administration in peace, what you had achieved in war."[58] The following day, Josephson sent word to Shearith Israel that Washington took no umbrage at New York Jewry on account of their delay in addressing him. "I made it a point to inform the President verbally, the reasons of your Congregation's seeming remissness in not having paid their respects before," relayed Josephson, "and he appeared perfectly satisfied."[59]

In Washington's written reply—given to Mikveh Israel but addressed to all the congregations that signed the joint letter—he imputed to the American people his own embrace of pluralism: "The liberality of sentiment toward each other, which marks every political and religious denomination of men in this country, stands unparalleled in the history of nations." Given the enduring bigotry against Jews and other dissenters, the president's statement was perhaps more hopeful than literal. Washington closed his response by conveying his wish to the Jews that "eternal blessings" would "rest upon your congregations."[60] Newspapers in multiple states published the president's reply.[61] With this letter, in tandem with the earlier missives to Savannah and Newport, Washington had addressed every synagogue in the United States. His embrace of a religiously diverse America—one that he expressly extended to the country's Jews—created a model for inclusivity in the critical early years of the republic when the power of precedent was at its zenith.

Notwithstanding these synagogues' initial bickering over a joint letter and a culture of decentralized religious authority, it is revealing that several congregations spread out across the country chose to speak with a single voice. The Jews of New York, Philadelphia, Richmond, and Charleston consciously presented themselves as a national religious community to the national government. Massachusetts was founded by and for Puritans, Pennsylvania by and for Quakers, Maryland by and for Catholics—but the Jews had no colony of their own. With the Revolution, colonies turned into states, many of which continued the colonial tradition of protecting the rights of their majorities while excluding minorities like Jews from the full prerogatives of citizenship. It is only natural, then, that Jewish loyalties would principally lie with the federal government that bestowed the very equality so often denied by the states. At a time when many citizens felt an allegiance to their individual state first and the country second, the Jews generally maintained a nationalistic orientation consistent with that of Hamilton, who fervently believed that domestic needs had to supersede local ones for the American experiment to succeed.[62]

The Newport letter stands as Washington's most vivid expression of religious pluralism, and his accepting attitude toward Jews was certainly of a piece with Hamilton's own. In the abstract, it might seem that those who showed the most sympathy for minority faiths would have favored the separation of church and state.[63] Yet Washington and Hamilton upend that assumption. Fully committed to religious liberty for all, they also believed that faith could be a boon to the civic health of the republic. It was in Washington's canonical Farewell Address of 1796—which Hamilton ghostwrote—that we find their most explicit articulation of that view.[64]

Washington originally considered stepping down after one term as president, having grown weary of partisan squabbles and feeling the effects of ill health. In 1792, he tapped James Madison to write an address for him commemorating his departure from office. But several presidential aides, Hamilton included, persuaded Washington that only his continued service as head of state could stave off the rupture of a still fragile republic. And so Washington agreed to stay on for a second and final term; Madison's manuscript was shelved for the time being.[65]

Four years later, in February 1796, the president first indicated to Hamilton—by then a private citizen practicing law—that his help was needed in preparing what would become known as the Farewell Address.[66] Washington's decision to solicit Hamilton is unsurprising, not only because the president had recently fallen out with Madison but also because Washington had long leaned on Hamilton to draft written communications.[67] In the course of the Revolutionary War, Hamilton was an invaluable ghostwriter for Washington. Hamilton continued to pen documents for him during his administration, including diplomatic letters, speeches to Congress, and official proclamations.[68] Both as aide-de-camp in the 1770s and as presidential advisor in the 1790s, Hamilton enjoyed substantial leeway in shaping the content and tenor of Washington's language. Washington had the humility to recognize Hamilton's intellectual talent and to see that talent as an asset rather than a threat.

After Washington made a few alterations to the Madison draft from 1792, he sent that updated version to Hamilton to use as a starting point. Hamilton, naturally, wanted to discard Madison's words and compose his own. But he was diplomatic enough to produce two versions of an address for Washington's consideration—the first, entirely his own creation; the second, a revised draft of the Madison text.[69] Eliza Hamilton would later pridefully recall of her husband, "The whole or nearly all the 'Address,' was read to me by him as he wrote it and a greater part if not all was written by him in my presence."[70]

Hamilton first submitted his wholly original address to Washington and waited several weeks before forwarding his Madison rewrite. This was probably an intentional tactic to ensure that Washington would have time to fully assimilate Hamilton's own draft into his thinking; the president would thus be more likely to dismiss the Madisonian alternative when it finally reached his desk. Indeed, Washington ultimately did conclude that the Hamilton draft was "more dignified." As was typical when Washington received a ghostwritten document from an aide, he removed some wording, added new thoughts, and refined the diction. Over the next several weeks, the president and his former treasury secretary continued to exchange drafts. The Farewell Address is a consummate example of the collaborative dynamic between the two men.[71]

Notably, Madison's draft from 1792 made no mention of religion. In 1796, by contrast, Hamilton crafted language exhibiting a clear conviction that faith was crucial to the civic vitality of the country: "To all those dispositions which promote political happiness, religion and morality are essential props." His draft asked rhetorically, "Can we in prudence suppose that national morality can be maintained in exclusion of religious principles? Does it not require the aid of a generally received and divinely authoritative religion?"[72]

The foregoing passage was one of many where Washington tweaked Hamilton's phrasing. In its final form, the Farewell Address—printed in newspapers rather than read aloud—differed slightly from its original version: "Of all the dispositions and habits which lead to political prosperity, religion and morality are indispensable supports." The rhetorical questions became declarative statements. "Let us with caution indulge the supposition that morality can be maintained without religion," the Farewell Address warned. "Reason and experience both forbid us to expect that national morality can prevail in exclusion of religious principle."[73]

Hamilton's introduction of this passage on religion was not an anomalous contribution from someone otherwise unconcerned with matters of faith. Elsewhere, he decried the French Revolution as a "volcano of atheism."[74] Hamilton also lauded Americans for their "just reverence for religion."[75] To be sure, he was not especially invested in the practice of Christianity—despite the piety of his wife, Hamilton never joined a church[76]—but his lack of interest in the Christian faith should not be mistaken for ambivalence toward religion generally.[77]

Hamilton's language in the Farewell Address touted the role of religion in advancing civic goals but did not go so far as to endorse the reverse: government support for faith. Washington, however, had already taken that step. More than a decade earlier, he demonstrated how religious pluralism might coincide with state funding of religious institutions.[78] In 1785, the Virginia General Assembly debated a bill that would have used public dollars to bankroll Christian education. Washington proved amenable to this kind of legislation—but only if Jews, Muslims, and other dissenters were exempt from taxation that would subsidize Christian teachers. In his words, “I am not amongst the number of those who are so much alarmed at the thoughts of making people pay towards the support of that which they profess, if of the denominations of Christians, or declare themselves Jews, Mahomitans or otherwise, and thereby obtain proper relief.”[79] The bill, ultimately, did not pass into law.[80] We should be wary of projecting Washington’s views in their totality onto Hamilton. Both men were pluralists, and both saw religion as key to civic well-being, but Washington alone expressed comfort with public monies subsidizing Christian institutions.

The Hamiltonian and Washingtonian models of church-state relations were similar, then, if not quite identical. Neither approach was necessarily at odds with the Establishment Clause in the federal Bill of Rights. The First Amendment begins, “Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion …” Americans in the founding era agreed that this language plainly prohibits the federal government from recognizing any particular denomination as an official state faith. Consistent with that common understanding, neither Washington nor Hamilton ever endorsed the idea of a state-sanctioned religion. There was no uniform opinion in their day on any additional meaning that might be wrung from the Establishment Clause. While a number of commentators in the early republic maintained that the text wholly divorces church and state, that interpretation would not become dominant until the twentieth century.[81] Another reading of the Establishment Clause, one in conformity with the Farewell Address, holds that religion can indeed bolster civic life so long as the federal government does not establish a church.

Some Republicans sought to exploit antisemitic sentiment in their bid to oppose Hamilton and the Federalist Party on the issue of church-state relations. They argued, erroneously, that Federalists favored a total unity of church and state; these Republicans further claimed that such an approach was a nefarious revival of the ancient Israelite government, wherein the same officials had been invested with power over religious and civil matters alike. A Republican pamphleteer, Abraham Bishop, traced a supposed lineage beginning with ancient Jews, continuing with the Catholic Church, and culminating with leading Federalists of his own day. “Federalism passed by another name among the Jews and Catholics” but “has always been found in a union of church and state,” he insisted. Bishop maintained that this Federalist agenda was used to justify one of Hamilton’s signature policies—the national assumption of states’ debts—by falsely lending it the imprimatur of religion: “Church and state has taught the blessedness of a national debt.” According to Bishop, Federalists also conferred upon Hamilton himself an aura of religious credibility by gushing over the “resemblance between General Hamilton and his army and Michael and his angels,” an allusion to Hamilton’s stint as a general during the Adams administration.[82]

The Baptist clergyman Nehemiah Dodge resorted to similarly anti-Jewish polemics. In an address about the alleged Israelite origins of Federalist policy, he referred to Federalists as “those Federal gentleman, who are fond of blending church and state in this nation because they were one in the Jewish nation.” Dodge suggested that proponents of such church-state blending were “most likely to promote rulers, and laws, favorable to their Jewish plan.”[83]

Both Bishop and Dodge were distorting the Federalist position. Whatever ideological diversity existed within Federalist circles, no faction of the party supported a theocratic government.[84] And Hamilton, for his part, never endorsed a “union” or “blending” of church and state. Rather, he took the much more moderate stance that religious rectitude was important to the nation’s welfare. It is a testament to the lingering antisemitism of the early republic that Hamilton’s opponents believed they could score political points by conflating him and his party with ancient Jews.[85]

Hamilton did once allude to the Hebrew Bible to make a constitutional argument, but it was in defense of the separation of powers, not church-state unity. In an 1802 piece in the New-York Evening Post, a paper that Hamilton founded, he affirmed as a “fundamental maxim of free government” that “the three departments of power, ought to be separate and distinct.” Drawing on biblical imagery, he continued, “In a representative republic, the legislative department is the ‘Aaron’s Rod’ most likely to swallow up the rest.” His symbolism here was drawn from Exodus 7:10: “Aaron cast down his rod before Pharaoh and before his servants, and it became a serpent.”[86] As the most widely disseminated text of the era, the Bible offered a singularly useful reference point for readers.[87]

The Hamiltonian and Washingtonian models were not the only approaches to church-state relations in the early republic, nor would they win out in the course of American constitutional history.[88] Jefferson and Madison adopted a different philosophy that sought to keep government and religion mutually exclusive. And just as Hamilton and Washington illustrate that sympathizers with minority faiths could see a role for religion in civic affairs, Jefferson and Madison reveal how advocates of the separation of church and state could be tainted by antisemitic bias.

For Jefferson, religious freedom could only flourish in the absence of government involvement in faith.[89] “Religion is a matter which lies solely between Man and his God,” he insisted. “He owes account to none other for his faith or his worship.” Fearing that state engagement with faith would inevitably lead to the coercion of religious belief, Jefferson declared, “The legitimate powers of government reach actions only, and not opinions.”[90] The Hamiltonian notion of a harmony between the religious and the civic had no place in the Jeffersonian worldview.

As politicians are apt to do, Jefferson saw in the Constitution a vindication of his preferred ideology. He penned a letter to a Baptist association—more than a decade after the First Amendment was ratified—in which he maintained that the Establishment Clause had constructed “a wall of separation between Church and State.” Jefferson thereby coined the phrase that only much later would become synonymous with the actual text appearing in the First Amendment. To be sure, Jefferson’s interpretation of the Establishment Clause resonated with some people in his age, Madison among them, but it did not garner universal acceptance.[91]

Although Jefferson is celebrated today as a champion of religious liberty, his attitudes about Judaism and Jewry were more complicated than popular memory of him might suggest. Much of his private correspondence with non-Jews exhibits a measure of hostility toward the Jewish faith and its people. Jefferson told a Christian protégé of his that the Jewish priesthood in antiquity comprised a “bloodthirsty race” that was “cruel and remorseless.” These priests peddled “superstition” under the false guise of divine revelation. “The whole religion of the Jews” was based on “the fumes of the most disordered imaginations” masquerading as “special communications of the Deity.” These myths, as Jefferson saw them, not only corrupted biblical Judaism but had “preserved their credit with the Jews of all subsequent times.”[92] Jefferson similarly remarked to the former secretary of the Continental Congress that ancient Jews had “vicious ethics.”[93] And in a letter to Benjamin Rush, Jefferson derided the Jewish understanding of God in the Bible as “degrading and injurious.”[94] His lack of respect for Judaism was of a piece with his concerns about organized religion generally.[95]

Jefferson also analogized his political nemeses to Jews. Writing to a fellow Republican about the Federalists, he commented, “They are marked, like the Jews, with such a peculiarity of character.”[96] And in a letter to the French hero of the American Revolution, Marquis de Lafayette, Jefferson claimed that Quakers and Jews alike had failed to embrace an American identity; instead, the Quakers were “dispersed, as the Jews” and “they still form, as those [Jews] do, one nation, foreign to the land they live in.”[97]

To be fair, during Jefferson’s tenure as president, he appointed a Jew to serve as the U.S. marshal in Maryland, a significant federal law enforcement post.[98] And whatever skepticism Jefferson expressed about Judaism and Jewry in private correspondence with Christians did not resurface in his personal interactions with Jews. Indeed, Jefferson’s letters to Jews indicated an awareness of the persecution that their people had long endured. After the Jewish leader Mordecai Noah sent Jefferson a speech he had given, Jefferson thanked him for sharing “valuable facts in Jewish history” and acknowledged of the Jewish people, “Your sect, by its sufferings, has furnished a remarkable proof of the universal spirit of religious intolerance, inherent in every sect, disclaimed by all while feeble, and practiced by all when in power.”[99] And upon receiving a similar missive from a Jewish doctor in Georgia, Jefferson replied that he was “happy in the restoration of the Jews particularly to their social rights.” He further expressed his “hopes they will be seen taking their seats on the benches of science, as preparatory to their doing the same at the board of government.”[100] This latter sentiment, while intended as a compliment, implied that Jews were not yet sufficiently cultivated for political leadership.[101]

Despite some misgivings about the religion and people of Judaism, Jefferson believed that everyone—Jews included—deserved to practice their faith freely. In a bid to attract immigration to Virginia in 1776, he sponsored an unsuccessful bill that would have extended citizenship in the state to foreigners, including members of minority faiths.[102] Jefferson scribbled "Jews advantageous" on the back of a copy of the bill.[103] He considered among his greatest achievements his authorship of the Virginia Statute for Religious Freedom, which protected the free exercise of faith and made the state government blind to religion. In the words of the statute, "All men shall be free to profess, and by argument to maintain, their opinions in matters of religion, and that the same shall in no wise diminish, enlarge, or affect their civil capacities." While free exercise was commonplace across the United States, the language about protecting "civil capacities" differentiated Virginia from a number of other states where Jews could practice their faith but, for doing so, faced disqualification from the ballot box, state legislature, and legal profession. Jefferson later affirmed in his autobiography that the statute was "meant to comprehend, within the mantle of its protection, the Jew and the Gentile, the Christian and Mahometan, the Hindu, and infidel of every denomination."[104] If Jefferson was an important defender of Jews' right to religious freedom, it was a role he played despite his dim view of Judaism and mixed take on its practitioners.

James Madison, too, flatly rejected the Hamiltonian position that religion is an essential element of civic prosperity. Madison was aware of those who felt that without an integration of "religious and civil polity, neither could be supported," and he condemned such a conceit as an "error so long rooted in the unenlightened minds of well meaning Christians, as well as in the corrupt hearts of persecuting usurpers."[105] That Madison and Washington sharply diverged on the politics of faith may help explain why Madison, who looms so large in the history of church-state relations, offered no comment whatsoever on religion in the ultimately discarded 1792 Farewell Address.

As with Jefferson, Madison's commitment to the separation of church and state did not mean that he was free of antisemitism. A glaring episode from Madison's presidential history marks the limit of his religious tolerance. The central player in this saga was the aforementioned Mordecai Noah, a Jewish journalist and playwright in Charleston who aspired to a diplomatic post. During the Madison administration, he petitioned the Department of State for an appointment to an American consulate in any of the Barbary states, which consisted of Morocco, Algiers, Tunis, and Tripoli.

Noah well understood that his identity as a Jew could be a strategic advantage in North Africa. Jews were considered impartial intermediaries between Christian and Muslim states; both Britain and the Netherlands had made use of Jewish envoys to that region. And the Barbary was home to powerful Jewish communities whose local clout could be leveraged by a Jewish-American consul to the benefit of his home country. Noah explained to the State Department that “it would be a favorable circumstance in sending a member of the Hebrew nation to the Barbary Powers … supported as I would be with the wealth and influence of forty thousand [Jewish] residents.” He anticipated still other advantages if Madison elevated him to such a position. Wealthy Jews in any number of nations would see the appointment as a reflection of America’s devotion to religious freedom and thereby entice them to immigrate to the United States. It would also send a strong message to other countries about American values. “I wish to prove to foreign powers,” Noah wrote, “that our government is not regulated in the appointment of their officers by religious distinction.” Madison would prove just the opposite in the end.[106]

Noah was appointed the consul to Tunis in 1813. As he prepared to leave for the Barbary, the administration gave him a secret mission to execute on his voyage. Algiers had abducted the American crew of a merchant ship. Secretary of State James Monroe instructed Noah to pay a ransom of up to $3,000 ($50,000 today) for each of the twelve captives. Noah was to engage in these negotiations under the false premise that he acted on behalf of the crew’s friends rather than the U.S. government.[107] Monroe surely feared that any indication the administration was paying for the captives would only incentivize further abductions.

An unexpectedly serpentine path across the Atlantic and through Europe found Noah in Cádiz, Spain, where he came across the American expatriate Richard Keene. The two discussed the clandestine negotiations that Noah intended to initiate in Algiers. Keene told Noah that he could, for a finder’s fee, travel there on Noah’s behalf and settle the matter. After the American consul to Cádiz fulsomely vouched for Keene, Noah enlisted him for the cause. Noah had little idea that Keene was a notorious figure, with a scandal-ridden past, whom Madison profoundly distrusted.[108]

Once in Algiers, Keene managed to secure the release of only two of the twelve seamen in question, and, in a twist, he paid ransom for another four hostages who were supposedly from Louisiana and whose captivity was unbeknown to the U.S. government. Noah billed the State Department for the ransom, Keene’s fee, the cost of returning the captives stateside, and Noah’s own expenses, plus interest—a total of $25,910 ($436,000 today). With this, Noah continued onward to Tunis to assume his duties as consul.[109]

News of the affair and Noah’s sizable bill were both met with frustration back in Washington. The State Department was displeased with Noah for several reasons. Not only did he hire an agent to complete a covert assignment that he had been expected to undertake himself, but he tapped none other than the disreputable Keene for the job. Moreover, the rescue of the Louisianans was beyond Noah’s remit. And he proved loose-lipped, divulging to Keene and others that he operated at the behest of the Madison administration. Although Noah had indeed been indiscreet, not all of these charges were fair. Monroe never expressly forbade Noah from using a proxy, and Noah acted on the advice of America's own consul in Spain in selecting Keene. Nevertheless, the mission was largely a failure, and Noah was to take the blame.[110]

That Madison would fire Noah from his diplomatic post was inevitable; the question remained what the stated rationale would be. It was at this point that Noah's status as a Jew became injected into a diplomatic imbroglio that otherwise bore no connection to his religious identity. In discussing Noah's imminent recall, Monroe relayed to Madison the opinion of an American naval captain who "says that the Turks and other people on the Barbary coast believe that every Jew who dies turns into a jackass, and that the Christians mount and ride them instantly, and directly, to the Devil. If this is the impression, the reason for removing him [i.e., Noah] is the stronger."[111] By Monroe's lights, purported antisemitism in the Barbary states made the case for discharging Noah all the more compelling.

Madison proceeded to predicate Noah's ouster squarely on his Jewish background, with no mention of the Algiers fiasco. "In recalling Noah," the president instructed Monroe, "it may be well to rest the measure pretty much on the ascertained prejudices of the Turks against his religion."[112] Monroe, in turn, penned a letter of dismissal and entrusted it to an American squadron bound for the Barbary to deliver to Noah. The letter notified Noah that his Jewish faith posed an insurmountable hurdle to his continued public service, explaining, "At the time of your appointment, as Consul at Tunis, it was not known that the religion which you profess would form any obstacle to the exercise of your consular functions. Recent information, however, on which entire reliance may be placed, proves that it would produce a very unfavorable effect."[113]

Perhaps Madison was genuine in ridding the consulate of Noah because he was a Jew. Or maybe the president exploited ostensible bigotry against Jews as a convenient pretext for the dismissal, thereby avoiding commentary on a furtive operation to which the U.S. government was supposed to be officially unconnected. Either way, antisemitism played a part. Madison had thus changed the terms of the affair from concern about Noah's mismanagement of the mission to a far weightier question about the role of religious discrimination in American statecraft. Noah was eager to defend himself and his faith. He produced a pamphlet about the Algiers affair that criticized the Madison administration and extolled the patriotism of Jews in the United States. Although Noah did not formally publish the pamphlet, it circulated widely enough that Jewish-American leaders, along with Gentiles at home and abroad, sent letters to the State Department in his support.[114]

He pressed the issue further with Madison shortly after the latter's tenure as president had come to an end. The ex-consul wanted to impress upon Madison that his Jewish faith had not at all undermined his capacity to fulfill his diplomatic duties. "No injury arose in Barbary to the public service from my religion as relating to myself," Noah assured Madison. "On the contrary, my influence and standing abroad was highly creditable." He went on to share his worry that Madison had established a dangerous norm at the State Department by making religious identity a valid cause for dismissal. Noah requested that the letter recalling him from the consulate—one that “refers solely to my religion” as the grounds for removal—either “be erased from the books of the Department of State” or at least have some “explanations” attached to his file so as to “prevent any evils arising from the precedent.”[115]

Madison’s response flatly denied that Judaism played any factor in Noah’s expulsion from Tunis and, in so doing, simply ignored that the letter of dismissal had unequivocally stated otherwise. He told Noah, “Your religious profession was well known at the time you received your commission; and that in itself it could not be a motive for your recall.” To address Noah’s unease about the State Department records, Madison suggested that James Monroe, who had succeeded him in the White House, would surely permit an addendum. This concession, however, was somewhat backhanded. Whereas Noah had asked for “explanations” to be appended to the annals for the sake of safeguarding future Jewish diplomats, Madison intimated that Noah’s real concern was his own reputation. As Madison put it, “An official preservation will be readily allowed to explanations necessary to protect your character.”[116] Madison was likely irked at the accusation that his administration had set a precedent for prejudice. After all, at the twilight of his presidency, he had appointed a Jewish consul to Scotland, a move that was perhaps sufficient in Madison’s eyes to rectify any earlier damage wrought to Jews.[117]

Noah was apparently underwhelmed by Madison’s letter because the following year he published a travelogue about his experiences abroad that included a devastating critique of Madison’s role in the Algiers affair. He chastised the ex-president for forgetting “that the religion of a citizen is not a legitimate object of official notice from the government.” According to Noah, Madison’s reference to antisemitism in the Barbary as the justification for his removal did not square with reality; North African Jews were respected figures who served in important diplomatic and domestic positions for their countries. Noah revealed that Madison had been confronted with allegations “that my religion would produce injurious effects, and the President, instead of closing the door on such interdicted subjects, had listened and concurred.” And even if—Noah reasoned hypothetically—the Barbary did suffer from endemic animus toward Jews, the United States should never abandon its principles to accommodate the hatred of others. “Are we prepared to yield up the admirable and just institutions of our country at the shrine of foreign bigotry and superstition?” he asked. “Are we prepared to disenfranchise one of our citizens to gratify the intolerant views of the Bey of Tunis?” Noah deplored how Madison had effectively signaled to foreign powers that they were entitled to determine the faith of American diplomats. He also voiced anxiety about the fate of the Jewish people, for if Jews who “fought and bled for American Independence” could not have their rights secured by the U.S. government, then “what nation may not oppress them?”[118] Noah’s travelogue was so popular that it sold out.[119]

To be sure, Madison had other experiences with Jews that cast him in a more favorable light. While he lacked sustained exposure to Jewish individuals, Madison did borrow money from Haym Salomon, the adroit bill broker who helped the superintendent of finance remedy America's financial woes in the 1780s. An entry in Madison's ledger shows a £100 loan from Salomon in 1782 when Madison was serving as a congressional delegate in Philadelphia.[120] Madison then solicited funds from a fellow Virginian, Edmund Randolph, to avoid staying in hock to Salomon: "I cannot in any way make you more sensible of the importance of your kind attention to pecuniary remittances for me than by informing you that I have for some time past been a pensioner on the favor of H. S. Haym Solomon, a Jew Broker."[121]

Madison's aversion to remaining in Salomon's debt had nothing to do with the broker's Jewish identity; rather, Madison was discomfited by the excessive generosity of Salomon, who refused to charge interest. In a subsequent letter to Randolph, Madison referred to Salomon as "our little friend in Front Street" who provided a "fund which will preserve me from extremities, but I never resort to it without great mortification, as he obstinately rejects all recompense." Madison added that Salomon's benevolence stemmed from the latter's distaste for all-too-common "usurious" creditors. Salomon undoubtedly saw his interest-free loans as opportunities to subvert stereotypes about Jewish moneylenders.[122] At the twilight of Madison's life, he received a letter from Salomon's son looking for details about his long-deceased father. Madison replied that a number of congressmen had borrowed money from Salomon, and assured the son that "we regarded him as upright, intelligent, and friendly in his transactions with us."[123] Tropes about predatory Jewish financiers, so common in the writings of Franklin and Adams, were conspicuously absent from Madison's pen.

While Madison was not focused on religious liberty for Jews specifically, he was instrumental in the passage of laws that protected minority faith groups generally. Notably, Madison shepherded the Virginia Statute for Religious Freedom through the state legislature. He also endorsed the U.S. Constitution's ban on religious tests. And the federal Bill of Rights, which included the Free Exercise Clause, was Madison's handiwork.

After a Jewish leader in Savannah sent Madison a copy of a speech he had delivered on Jewish-American history in 1820, Madison responded that the "good citizenship" of domestic Jews was a vindication of the nation's noble experiment in religious liberty that had begun in its early years. The Jewish community provided a "happy illustration of the safety and success of this experiment of a just and benignant policy." Although Jews were "distrusted and oppressed elsewhere" around the world, in the United States they enjoyed with all others "the perfect equality of rights." Madison's missive was not quite accurate—civil disabilities on Jews persisted in a number of states—but nevertheless it reflected his own fidelity to religious freedom. His letter also expressed gratitude for the speech on the Jewish past, observing that "the history of the Jews must forever be interesting" and "every ray of light on the subject has its value."[124] Madison's words were not just empty flattery. When Jefferson asked him which books he would suggest for the library at the University of Virginia, Madison included on his list the works of Flavius Josephus, a first-century Jewish scholar who recorded Jewish history.[125]

The Madisonian-Jewish relationship, then, presents a complex picture. Madison helped institute legal regimes in Virginia and nationally that extended religious protections to all people, Jews included. And his limited interactions with individual Jews were largely respectful. Still, Madison’s dismissal of an American diplomat on the basis of his Jewish identity is a significant blemish.

Hamilton, Washington, Jefferson, and Madison taken together illustrate a counterintuitive reality. Among the foregoing founders, the two who did not advocate the separation of church and state were unmarred by antisemitism, while the two who did were tainted by incidents of bias against Jews and Judaism. It is with deliberate intent that the preceding pages have avoided recommending or rejecting the Hamiltonian approach to church-state relations. His model—which endorsed both religious pluralism and religious support for civic life—should not necessarily guide us today. Current proponents of the separation of church and state argue that their position is the most beneficial for religious minorities. They fear that in the absence of separation, the majority will exploit its power to favor its faith at the expense of other denominations. A consideration of such concerns is beyond the scope of this chapter. The aim here is, instead, to sound a cautionary note against projecting the logic of our modern politics backward onto the past.

8

Law and Politics

AS TREASURY SECRETARY, Alexander Hamilton helped create the economic foundations on which the American republic could endure. But his focus on the country's finances led him to neglect his own. A cabinet member's salary was simply too modest to provide for his five children and pay off personal debts that he had accrued. By reviving his legal practice, Hamilton could triple or even quadruple his earnings. And so, in February 1795, not even halfway through George Washington's second term, he resigned his government post, returning to Manhattan and the New York bar.[1] It was a professional move that immersed Hamilton in the Jewish merchant class to an even greater degree than his first stint in law had prior to his service in the Washington administration.

Hamilton was a polarizing figure to the country at large, but New Yorkers saw him as their champion. The Chamber of Commerce celebrated his homecoming by holding a dinner in his honor. Among the luminaries on the 200-person guest list were the president of Columbia, the speaker of the New York State Assembly, and many of the city's businessmen. At the meal, Hamilton paid homage to "the merchants of New York, may they never cease to have honor for their commander, skill for their pilot, and success for their port," a toast that elicited nine cheers from the crowd.[2]

The 1790s were years of expanding trade for America in general and New York in particular. Thanks to the Constitution that Hamilton helped write and ratify, the federal government was empowered to stimulate economic growth with unprecedented efficacy. The United States also benefited from an ongoing war between Britain and France, which increased the importance of neutral American shippers in the global marketplace. New York fared especially well, outpacing both Boston and Philadelphia in exports by 1797. The economic boom in New York went hand-in-hand with a population boom; the city nearly doubled its census count from about 33,000 to 60,000 over the last decade of the eighteenth century.[3]

Business in New York was often transacted in taverns or coffeehouses. The Tontine coffeehouse on Wall Street was famous for its lively mix of traders, brokers, and financiers. At the base of the Tontine steps, auctioneers would stand atop barrels of rum or bales of cotton, taking bids shouted down from a balcony. “Everything was in motion; all was life, bustle, and activity,” one British visitor recorded.[4]

The kinds of disputes that inevitably resulted from commercial enterprise demanded the talents of lawyers such as Hamilton. His sweeping knowledge of law, relentless work ethic, and flair for courtroom oratory made him arguably the city’s preeminent litigator. He threw himself into his cases with his typical fervor. As a French diplomat in New York remarked of Hamilton, “I have seen a man who made the fortune of a nation laboring all night to support his family.”[5]

Jews were important players in Hamilton’s legal career as both witnesses and clients. Indeed, the witness stand was a critical site in the Jewish battle for equality. The integrity of Jews under oath had long been questioned in Europe and America. During medieval times, Jews who dared to give testimony in court were regularly subjected to degrading rituals. Jewish witnesses in Byzantium, for instance, had to wear a loincloth made of thorns. Meanwhile, Jews testifying in southern France were lacerated with thorns while forced to invoke upon themselves curses from the Hebrew Bible. And a law in Silesia (in modern-day Poland) mandated that any Jewish litigant balance himself on a stool during his testimony; he was subjected to a fine the first three times he fell off and automatically lost his case in the fourth instance.[6]

Antisemites had long justified such perverse treatment of Jewish witnesses by erroneously alleging that Judaism actually encouraged its adherents to lie in court. This invidious stereotype about Jews was rooted in a severe misrepresentation of the Kol Nidre prayer, which opens religious services on Yom Kippur, the Day of Atonement. Kol Nidre means “all vows,” and the prayer includes this language: “All vows, obligations, oaths … or whereby we may be bound, from this Day of Atonement until the next (whose happy coming we await), we do repent. May they be deemed absolved, forgiven, annulled, and void, and made of no effect; they shall not bind us nor have power over us.” Rabbis consistently interpreted this prayer to apply only to vows that a Jew made to himself or to God, and not to oaths taken in court. Nevertheless, those seeking to discredit Jewish witnesses ignored these rabbinic explanations and invoked Kol Nidre as evidence of Jews’ dishonesty.[7]

Doubts about Jewish integrity on the witness stand sometimes resurfaced in the New World. Even New York—the most religiously tolerant of Britain’s thirteen American colonies—was not wholly immune to this particular prejudice. Amid legal proceedings that pertained to a contested election in 1737, the General Assembly in New York categorically excluded testimony from Jews, declaring that “it was the opinion of the House that none of the Jewish profession could be admitted in evidence, in the controversy now depending.”[8] Unease about Jewish witnesses persisted long past the era of colonial rule. Not until 1846 would New York adopt a new state constitution that definitively settled the question of religious tests for giving sworn testimony: “No person shall be rendered incompetent to be a witness on account of his opinions on matters of religious belief." As late as 1871, a court in Georgia was still considering whether a Jew could testify.[9]

It was a case concerning the trustworthiness of Jewish testimony that provided Hamilton a platform for the most fervent rebuke of antisemitism to be found in the annals of the American founders. His client, Louis Le Guen, was a Gentile merchant accused of fraud. Le Guen also hailed from a French nation that was then embroiled in a quasi-war against the United States on the high seas.[10] This suit promised to be particularly challenging for Hamilton. Although the allegations against Le Guen were without merit, a foreign merchant purportedly engaged in swindling—and from a hostile power no less—was not the most sympathetic of litigants whom Hamilton could have represented. What's more, Hamilton's cocounsel was a man for whom he had little regard: Aaron Burr.[11] Compounding these difficulties, the opposing party comprised two of New York's most highly reputed businessmen, Isaac Gouverneur and Peter Kemble. And, perhaps most vexing of all for Hamilton, his principal witnesses were Jews.

The controversy began in 1794, when Le Guen arrived in New York as "a perfect stranger," in his words. He carried with him a cargo of indigo and cotton from a French island in the Indian Ocean, and entered into a financial arrangement with Gouverneur and Kemble to serve as agents for the sale of his inventory. Despite numerous advertisements in a local paper, buyers failed to appear. Le Guen, Gouverneur, and Kemble began to strategize about overseas markets.[12]

They resolved to partner with three traders who would arrange for the distribution of Le Guen's goods in Europe. Under the care of one of these traders, Isaac Gomez, the freight was loaded onto a vessel called the White Fox in May 1795 and headed east. Five weeks later, Gomez sent word from the northern coast of France that demand there was no better than it had been in New York. "The cotton and indigo has come to a most miserable market," he reported. From Hamburg, Gomez conveyed similarly disappointing news the following month: "Markets being in a most miserable situation in France, induced me to bring the cotton and indigo here, which proves as bad, as it will not yield the amount of invoice and expenses thereon attending, by a loss of sixty percent." Reaching England in the fall, Gomez relinquished the cargo to London-based agents for Gouverneur and Kemble, who then sold it for a considerable shortfall.[13]

Le Guen was miffed. He insisted that the clearance of his inventory in London violated the terms of his partnership with Gouverneur and Kemble; their contract had specified a higher sale price. When Le Guen looked to the courts to recover damages, Gouverneur and Kemble in turn accused Le Guen of bamboozling them with inferior goods. Le Guen had the facts on his side—after all, Gomez's letters plainly indicated that the failure to realize a profit stemmed from market conditions rather than the quality of the cotton and indigo. But Gouverneur and Kemble were intractable. Two of the key witnesses for Le Guen were Sephardic Jews: a trader who helped facilitate the transport of the freight, and a merchant who examined Le Guen's inventory and vouched for its caliber.[14]

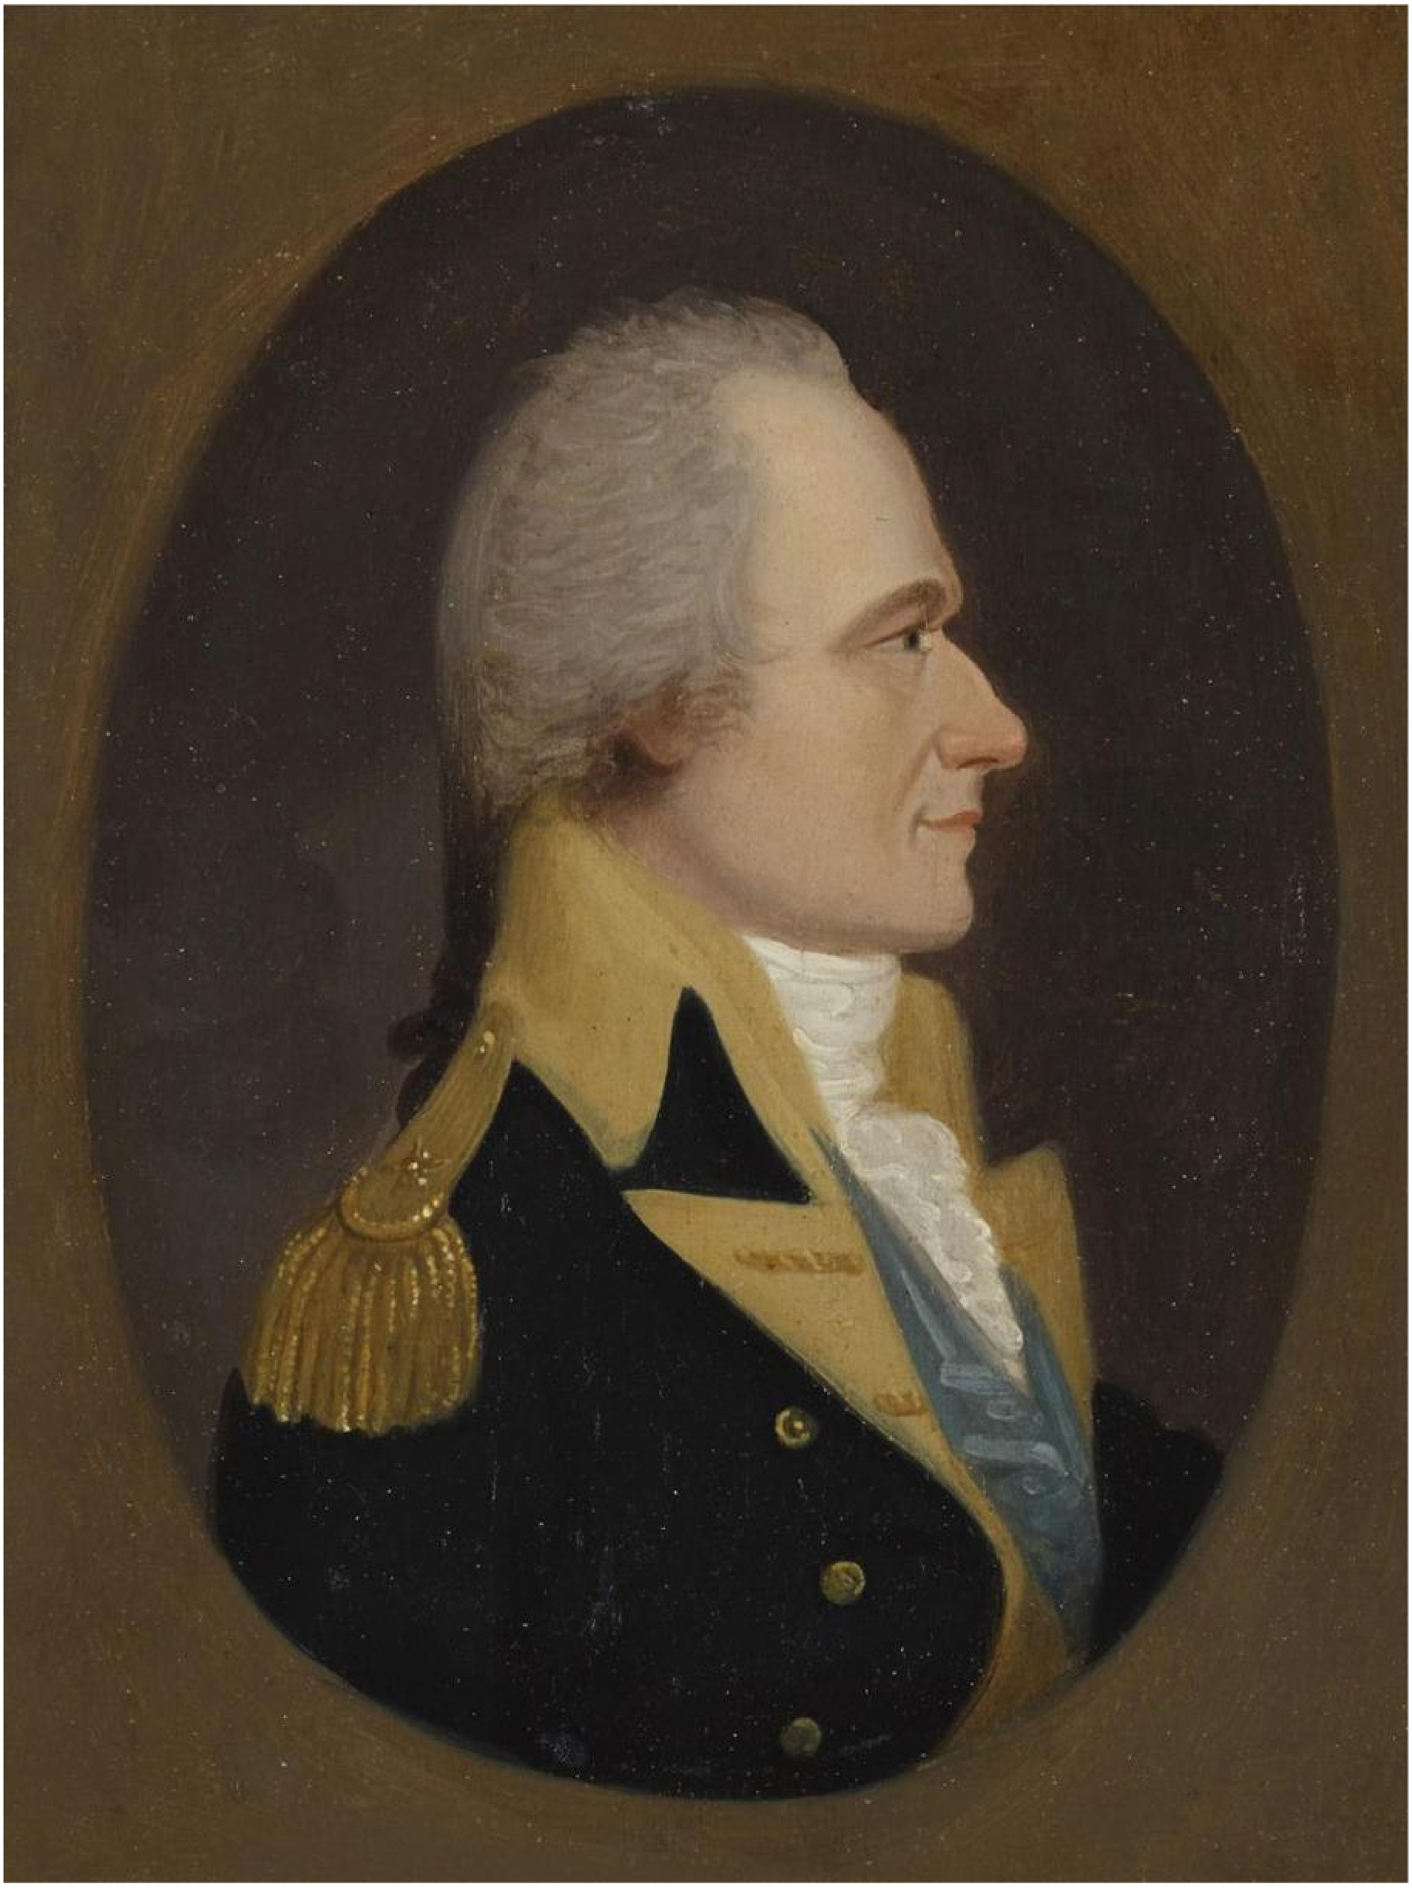
The litigation, which would stretch on for years, became noteworthy less for the obscure legal questions it raised than for the eminent lawyers involved in the case, their spirited performances in court, and the sheer hostility that the suit fomented between the two sides. Hamilton's general tendency to polarize those around him was on full display in this case; the intense devotion to Le Guen's cause that inspired admiration from Hamilton's supporters also led his detractors to malign him as an extremist who would too readily sacrifice civility for victory.

After winning only nominal damages in an initial trial for Le Guen in the spring of 1797, Hamilton successfully moved for a new trial that was scheduled for the following fall.[15] Gouverneur and Kemble were frustrated that the proceedings would drag out but exceedingly confident in their case. As Gouverneur wrote in a letter that summer, "Nothing have we yet been able to finish with that troublesome Mssr Le Guen who has got himself involved in a ridiculous lawsuit, which will take of a handsome slice of his property."[16] In another missive, Gouverneur expressed the same combination of resentment and optimism. He complained of being mired "in the same unpleasant situation with Le Guen, who prefers to be wandering in law than to settle his affairs" but predicted that "the lawyers will get more than he shall and may cost him yet a few years in the pursuit."[17] Le Guen was no less sanguine than his opponents, assuring Hamilton, "Your talents, your zeal, and the integrity of those who must be my judges … will make me get a favorable judgment."[18]

Then in October, with the trial just days away, Le Guen took the unusual step of printing a public letter in a New York newspaper deploring how the accusations of fraud had incited "prejudice against me" in the community at large. "These cruel surmises tend no less to obstruct the impartial course of justice than to injure my reputation," he lamented, adding that they were utterly "unfounded." Le Guen further noted that Gomez's letters exonerated him from wrongdoing—they "manifest great distress at the expectation of a loss, to the extent of 60 percent, but ascribe it solely to the declension and badness of the market, without the least allusion to any defect or mistake of quality" of the cargo.[19]

In the same newspaper appeared an anonymous editorial that summarized the reaction of Gouverneur and Kemble to Le Guen's letter. The author informed readers that Gouverneur and Kemble were outraged by "the recent unwarrantable attempt of Mr. Le Guen to prejudice the public mind, and that of the jury" on "the eve of a trial." Although piqued at what they considered a bid to pervert the due process of law, Gouverneur and Kemble reportedly took solace that "there is too much good sense in this community, to be imposed upon by so shallow an artifice." Le Guen then issued a swift rebuttal, maintaining that the allegation of fraud was bogus and thus extraneous to the real matter: the contractual agreement stipulating an acceptable sale price for the goods. Thus, his initial letter in the newspaper had not indulged in the "impropriety" of "bringing into discussion, before the public, the merits of a controversy, which is depending before the tribunal of justice." If anything, Le Guen had sought "studiously to avoid" litigating the matter in the press, and merely wanted "to obviate suggestions collateral and foreign to the merits" of the case.[20]

The trial commenced on October 24, and three days later, the jury awarded Le Guen the staggering sum of $119,302.47 (more than $2.6 million today). Given the cocksure attitude on the part of Gouverneur and Kemble, the verdict came as an abrupt shock. Brockholst Livingston, a lawyer for Gouverneur (and future U.S. Supreme Court justice), confessed to his client his own bewilderment that Hamilton managed to rob them of certain victory. "No event in the course of my professional career," Livingston exclaimed, "has ever given me more concern or excited so much astonishment as the influence of Mr. Hamilton with the Court."[21]



This portrait of Alexander Hamilton was originally owned by his childhood friend from St. Croix, Edward Stevens. Source: William J. Weaver, Alexander Hamilton. Indianapolis Museum of Art [ca. 1806].

The court still had to decide whether to approve the jury's verdict, with the judgment from a five-man bench to come down in late January.[22] Meanwhile, Gouverneur turned to the press to air his grievances against Hamilton. In the Commercial Advertiser, Gouverneur addressed Hamilton directly, imploring him to "act with more caution in committing yourself with a mistaken opinion" and advising that "it would also be more becoming in the practice, to be less abusive." Gouverneur felt "extremely hurt" by Hamilton's courtroom performance that had challenged Gouverneur's integrity. Apparently, at trial Hamilton had tried to turn an antisemitic trope on its head by referring to the Jewish villain, Shylock, who inhumanely demands a pound of flesh for an unpaid debt in Shakespeare's The Merchant of Venice. It seems that Hamilton insisted it was not Le Guen—whose central witnesses were Jews—but rather Gouverneur whose behavior approximated Shakespeare's loathsome caricature of a Jewish moneylender. Hamilton's mention of Shylock is known through Gouverneur's retelling, and no extant trial transcript exists with the original wording, so it is difficult to discern with certainty the context or meaning of Hamilton's remark.[23] Although the invocation of "Shylock" usually would have indicated antipathy toward Jews by the speaker, in this instance it was the speaker whose case relied upon Jewish testimony.

On the very day that Gouverneur published his broadside against Hamilton, an anonymous letter—likely from Hamilton himself—appeared in the New-York Gazette and General Advertiser. Signed under the pen name "Fair Play," the author showed little inclination to rein in the heated rhetoric that had thus far prevailed: "If intrigue and artifice can ensure success in a suit at law, Mr. Gouverneur, in his controversy with Mr. Le Guen, will not fail to have it."[24]

Notwithstanding their lawyer's consternation, Gouverneur and Kemble were still convinced that the jury's verdict against them was an anomaly and that they would ultimately be vindicated by the court. In a letter to an associate, they wrote of Le Guen, "You may take our word for it, he is wasting both time and property."[25] Once again, their assumptions proved faulty. The judges upheld the jury's verdict in a three-to-two vote.[26]

Gouverneur and Kemble pressed on with further appeals for another two years until the Court of Errors—the highest tribunal in the state of New York—agreed to hear the case in Albany. The Court of Errors was a unique legal body that combined all three branches of state government, comprising the lieutenant governor, the members of the senate, the justices of the supreme court, and New York's highest ranking judicial officer, the chancellor.[27] With the trial set for February 1800, a lawyer for Gouverneur and Kemble named Robert Troup wrote to a friend on January 25 that he anticipated high drama. "The cause of Gouverneur and Kemble with Le Guen is beginning to excite attention," Troup observed. He predicted "that some of the counsel will have their passions much excited" and knew firsthand that Hamilton in particular was prone to fervor. Invoking Hamilton's military title, Troup offered by way of metaphor, "With my moderation of temper, I hope to escape the General's pistols as well as his sword." Troup did not detect any insecurities on Hamilton's part, inferring, "General Hamilton is very confident of success."[28]

Although Troup was intimately acquainted with Hamilton—they had been roommates at King's College[29]—his estimation of Hamilton's optimism was mistaken in this instance. "Today the hearing of Le Guen's cause began," Hamilton wrote to his wife, Eliza, from Albany. "I fear prepossessions are strongly against us. But we must try to overcome them."[30] He seemed to brace for the worst, adding, "If I should lose my cause I must console myself with finding my friends. With the utmost eagerness I will fly to them."[31]

Troup may have misjudged Hamilton's faith in his case, but the prediction of Hamilton's ardor in court was wholly on the mark. "Hamilton has pushed this cause to the utmost extremity, and in my opinion with the utmost animosity and cruelty against Gouverneur and Kemble," Troup wrote to a New York merchant after opening arguments. "He has attacked the whole body of witnesses on the part of Gouverneur and Kemble." Troup expected that "the manner of his treating the witnesses and persecuting poor Gouverneur" would not play well with the court. Despite Hamilton's earlier triumphs in the case, still, reported Troup, "Mr. Gouverneur himself is very confident of success and is in good spirits," a laudable feat for Gouverneur "considering the treatment Hamilton has given him." Troup concluded, "You can scarcely conceive the public attention which the cause of Gouverneur and Kemble has excited!"[32]

Already a spectacle, the trial's sensationalism was further heightened by the arrival of a political giant of the era, Gouverneur Morris, who joined Isaac Gouverneur and Peter Kemble's legal team. Morris had served in the Continental Congress during the war, drafted the Constitution's famous preamble in 1787, and been named the American ambassador to France under Washington. The Le Guen suit marked Morris's return to law after a hiatus of twelve years.[33] Hamilton and Morris were themselves friends, but whatever affinity they had for one another did not mitigate each man's vigorous commitment to his duty in court.[34]

That Hamilton's legal expertise and rigor surpassed Morris's was indisputable. But when it came to oratorical ability, Morris stood among the very few who could rival Hamilton. James Kent, a New York Supreme Court justice, observed, "If the one [Hamilton] was the superior in logic and law learning, the other [Morris] was presumed to be his equal in eloquence, imagination, and wit." Morris cut a "commanding" figure, Kent recalled. "His noble head, his majestic mien, the dignity of his deportment were all impressive."[35]

After Hamilton delivered a forceful closing argument spanning six hours, Morris knew he could not compete with Hamilton on legal grounds. Instead, Morris told the court that he had no intention of referencing law books and alternatively would "appeal to the principles written on the heart of man."[36] Morris's flowery address soon degenerated into a base attack on Hamilton's two witnesses of the Jewish faith.[37]

Alluding to them as “these Jew witnesses,” Morris sought to impugn their credibility on the basis of their religion.[38] “Jews are not to be believed upon oath,” he insisted bluntly.[39]

Hamilton had already given his closing remarks, but he could not leave such slander unanswered. He rose to his feet and asked the court if it would allow him a rebuttal; the court acceded to his request and announced that time would be allotted the following day. Upon leaving to prepare his rejoinder, Hamilton spoke to a law clerk about Morris’s address:

“This speech has made a great impression, has it not?”

“It had,” the clerk conceded.

“How then do you think it should be met?”

“In the same manner.”[40]

A large crowd gathered in court the next day to see how Hamilton, ever the relentless fighter, would respond. This case had become about something more than a mere legal dispute between merchants. At issue was the momentous question of whether American justice would be blind to religion. The Revolution had rested on a radical promise of equality. That a figure as esteemed as Morris believed antisemitism would be an effective tactic with the court suggested that the egalitarian rationale for the war had perhaps yielded to entrenched prejudice. Hamilton understood the stakes for both Jewry and the country, and he resolved to defend the former to realize his vision for the latter.

Referencing Morris’s attack on the Jews, Hamilton asked the court, “Has he forgotten, what this race once were, when, under the immediate government of God himself, they were selected as the witnesses of his miracles, and charged with the spirit of prophecy?” Hamilton moved from a discussion of the Jews as the Chosen People to the sordid history of their suffering. He decried how, as “remnants of scattered tribes,” adherents of Judaism were “the degraded, persecuted, reviled subjects of Rome,” an empire that oppressed Jews “in all her resistless power, and pride, and pagan pomp.” Roman rule had left Jewry “an isolated, tributary, friendless people.” Hamilton’s message was clear—Morris was perpetuating a dark history of antisemitism that had plagued Jews since antiquity.

For Hamilton, Le Guen’s Jewish witnesses were righteous heirs to a divinely ordained religion. “Were not the witnesses of that pure and holy, happy and Heaven-approved faith?” he inquired rhetorically. Hamilton proclaimed that Lady Justice would judge no people because of the manner in which they worshipped: “Be the injured party … Jew, or Gentile, or Christian, or Pagan, Foreign or Native, she clothes him with her mantle, in whose presence all differences of faiths or births, of passions or of prejudices—all are called to acknowledge and revere her supremacy.”[41] Jews had suffered oppression for nearly two millennia at the hands of European powers; now an icon of American civic life was declaring that Jew and Gentile must stand equal before the law. In a young republic caught between Old World hierarchies and New World hopes, Hamilton's defense of equality for Jews was a powerful vindication of revolutionary ideals.

Although rarely lacking in confidence, Hamilton had been circumspect about Le Guen's chances for success. Yet Le Guen emerged victorious in the Court of Errors by a 28-to-6 vote.[42] Burr, for his part, had skillfully argued portions of the case; even Morris conceded in his diary, "Burr is very able and has, I see, made [a] considerable impression."[43] It was, however, Hamilton's eloquent appeal for equal justice that moved the members of the court. Justice Kent was unequivocal in identifying the determining factor in Le Guen's unlikely win: "the overbearing weight and influence of General Hamilton's talents."[44] Le Guen, by his own account, was "deeply moved" and "full of gratitude" to Hamilton and Burr alike, offering both lawyers substantial sums for their efforts. To Le Guen's disappointment, Hamilton refused a penny above $1,500 ($32,000 today); Burr accepted nearly three times that amount.[45]

Hamilton was generally renowned for the verve of his legal performances, but he demonstrated an emotional investment in Le Guen's case that exceeded even his usual standards. Justice Kent later recollected that among the countless trials Hamilton litigated with "energy and fervor," there was at most one other—involving freedom of the press—in which his zeal was so "strikingly displayed."[46] Opposing counsel Troup drew similar conclusions. In a letter to the American ambassador to Great Britain, Troup relayed the details of the Le Guen trial and observed, "Our friend Hamilton never appeared to have his passions so warmly engaged in any cause."[47] It was readily apparent that the case touched Hamilton personally. No other American founder ever denounced antisemitism with such conviction.

Hamilton not only relied on Jewish witnesses for his Gentile clients, but he also served as a prominent advocate in court for the interests of Jewish parties.[48] One of the most notable cases featured Aaron Burr, though as a litigant rather than lawyer; Solomon Myers Cohen, a well-known Jew; and the meaning of the Fourth of July. In 1795, the retired general Roger Enos issued a promissory note to the politician Francis Lewis for $3,500 ($75,000 today), redeemable on July 1. Aaron Burr also endorsed the note, rendering Burr liable for that sum in the event that General Enos failed to make payment. Enos was out of town at the beginning of July, and so Lewis turned to his Jewish agent, Cohen, to retrieve the $3,500 from Burr.[49] Cohen wrote to Burr in the hopes of an uncontentious transaction: "As General Enos is not in town and his note with your endorsement for 3500 dollars is payable … the holder desired me to give you this notice, that he looks to you for payment of the same.… I hope my conduct in this business will meet with your approbation."[50]

Normally, the endorser of a promissory note had a three-day grace period to fulfill the obligation, but Cohen made his request on July 3, only two days into the grace period. Burr accordingly refused to produce the $3,500. Cohen had opted not to wait until the customary third day because that third day happened to fall on the Fourth of July, the anniversary of America’s secession from the British Empire. In a nation too new to have many public holidays, the Fourth of July was a revered day indeed. The outcome of the case would hinge on whether the special status of July 4 meant that Burr was liable to Lewis for the promissory note on July 3.[51] That Francis Lewis had been a signer of the Declaration of Independence made the case almost poetic in its symbolism.

Hamilton, representing Lewis, began collecting evidence to prove that financial institutions regularly executed transactions due on July 4 one day prior to the holiday. He obtained letters from bank cashiers who confirmed that “our practice is to demand payment of notes which fall due on the 4th [of] July, the day before, as in [the] case of Sundays and Christmas days.”[52] In court documents, Hamilton’s language suggested that he saw in Burr’s behavior not an honest error but a lack of character. Burr “faithfully promised” to cover the $3,500, but “Aaron Burr in no way regard[ed] his said promises and undertakings.” Instead, Burr sought “craftily and subtly to deceive and defraud the said Francis Lewis.” Hamilton derided Burr as “contriving.”[53] The jury favored Hamilton’s side, finding that “the anniversary day of the Declaration of Independence of these United States of America” is “generally observed by the citizens of this state of New York as a public festival.” Accordingly, the promissory note was payable on July 3.[54]

In the New York Supreme Court, Hamilton emerged victorious again as the justices upheld the jurors’ verdict. The court noted that the custom of honoring the Fourth of July by requiring that debts be paid the preceding day was a “generally known” convention and “all contracts” were to “be interpreted and governed by it.” Therefore, the bench concluded “that the note in question is to be adjudged as having fallen due on the 3d day of July, the second day of grace, and, consequently, that the plaintiff is entitled to recover.”[55] This judgment against Burr surely stoked his growing resentment toward Hamilton. Four years earlier, Hamilton had been instrumental in quashing Burr’s bid for the governorship of New York. Now he bested Burr in court. And Hamilton’s most intolerable acts of sabotage, as Burr would perceive them, still lay ahead.

The same year as the foregoing case, Hamilton’s services were solicited for a dispute involving Jews on all sides. His client in this suit was Isaac Gomez, a Sephardic Jew who sat on the board of Shearith Israel (the very same Isaac Gomez who struggled to find European buyers for Le Guen’s cargo). In 1794, Gomez and another Sephardi named Moses Lopez established a commercial partnership whose terms specified that for seven years neither of them could unilaterally transact business outside the partnership to the detriment of their shared enterprise. In the words of their legal agreement, “Neither of the said parties should, during the said term … carry on any private trade for and on his account to the prejudice of the said joint business.” Before the seven years expired, Gomez and Lopez created a three-man partnership with yet another Sephardic trader, Abraham Rods Rivera. This arrangement proceeded on terms whose exact meaning became a source of controversy: “No contract, dealing, purchase, or other business shall be entered into on account of the said copartnership by either of the said parties without the previous consent and approbation of them.” This wording left two matters ambiguous. For one, the tripartite contract did not clarify whether it existed in tandem with or superseded the earlier bilateral agreement between Gomez and Lopez. Moreover, it failed to stipulate whether any two or all three partners had to agree to a given business deal.[56]

With Hamilton as his legal counsel, Gomez sued Lopez for £3,000 on the basis that Lopez had engaged in private business outside the terms of their first agreement. Lopez, in turn, maintained that this business had been transacted with Rivera’s consent and thus was consistent with the language of their second agreement. Hamilton persuaded the court that there was a legitimate cause of action against Lopez, and the defendant accordingly was sent to jail while awaiting trial. The parties were able to settle out of court before the trial date.[57]

Little is known about the merchant Isaac Roget other than that he was Jewish and a Hamilton client.[58] In a complex case involving 220 barrels of flour, Roget tapped Hamilton to represent him before the New York Supreme Court. Roget had agreed in early 1800 to purchase the flour in exchange for a note endorsed by one Joseph Lyon for $2,250 ($48,000 today). When the suppliers of the flour discovered that Lyon was insolvent and the note thereby worthless, they refused to turn over the flour. Roget then filed suit against the suppliers.[59]

The case hinged on two legal intricacies. First, the agreement had been signed by only one of the parties, not both. Whereas counsel for the suppliers insisted that the contract was accordingly void, Hamilton contended, “If one sign and deliver [the contract] over, it is enough” to make that contract enforceable. The second point of controversy centered on who shouldered responsibility for the note. Hamilton here proffered some clever logic: once the parties had agreed in writing to exchange the note for flour, the suppliers assumed the risk that the note might be unredeemable, just as Roget took the risk that the flour he had bought could be mediocre. In Hamilton’s reasoning, “a note was to be given for the flour, not money to be paid; therefore, the loss from the note’s proving bad [was] to be borne by the defendants.” The suppliers’ legal team vigorously challenged Hamilton’s arguments as unsupported by the law and the facts of the case.[60]

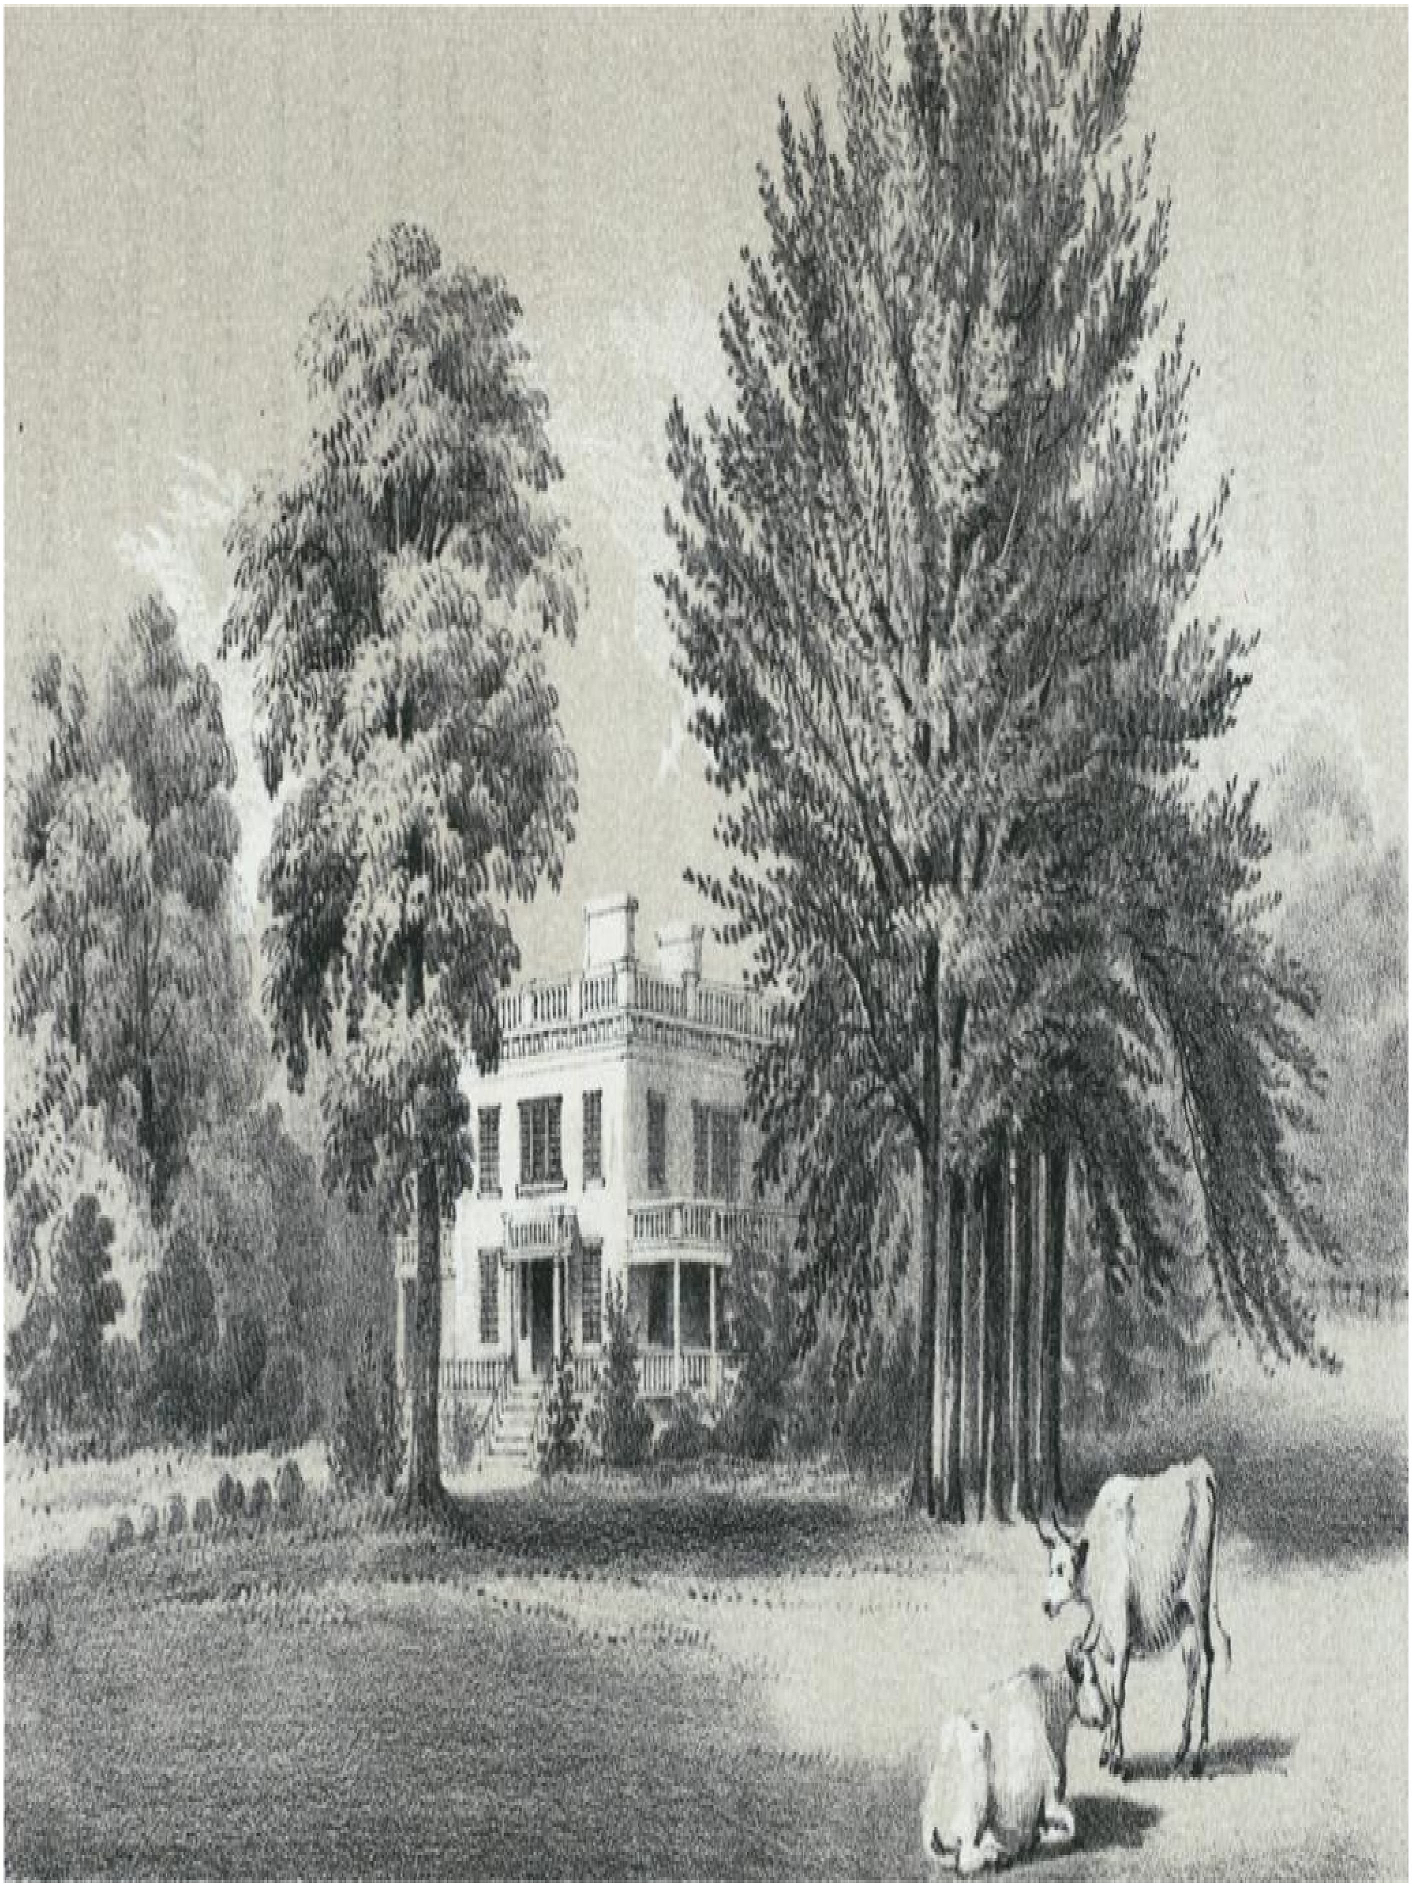
When the state supreme court issued its decision, the justices found that Hamilton had been persuasive on the first matter—a contract signed by merely one party was not necessarily void. “If there are acts to be done by both parties,” wrote the court, “and the one who is to perform a principal part (as here the delivery of the flour) sign, and it is accepted by the other party, there can exist no doubt … that such contract would be mutually obligatory.” However, on the question of whether the suppliers bore the risk for the note, Hamilton's logic was too clever by half. The court concluded, "The offer by the plaintiff to pay in the note of a bankrupt was not an offer of payment," and ruled in favor of the suppliers.[61]

Among the most notable Jewish additions to Hamilton's client roster was Alexander Zuntz. A native of Germany, Zuntz arrived in New York during the Revolution as a sutler selling goods to Hessian mercenaries who worked for the British. Zuntz joined the handful of Loyalist Jews in New York who kept Shearith Israel functioning through wartime. He became the de facto head of the synagogue in those years and helped convince the British not to repurpose their house of worship as a hospital.[62] Gershom Seixas, though allied with the Patriots, stole into the city in 1779 to officiate Zuntz's wedding.[63]

After the war, Zuntz decided to stay in New York and opened a factory for starch and hair powder. He advertised that his "starch is equal to any from Europe but can be prepared of inferior quality if required." Although that enterprise foundered, Zuntz later met with success by opening a broker's office on Little Dock Street near the synagogue. His leadership in Jewish life continued into the 1790s. He served three terms as president of Shearith Israel, donated funds to the synagogue, and held the special honor of leading the morning service on Yom Kippur every year.[64] Hamilton's ledger suggests that he did not litigate on Zuntz's behalf but rather offered him legal advice.[65]

The income from Hamilton's law practice allowed him to fulfill a long-standing dream—he could finally afford a plot of land on which to build a country residence for his family.[66] The site that Hamilton chose was in upper Manhattan, then comprised of unspoiled woods and river views. It was common for New Yorkers with sufficient means to seek relief from the congestion and disease of lower Manhattan by retreating to uptown country estates. Although Hamilton enlisted New York's most celebrated architect to design the house, he was not content to defer entirely to the discretion of the expert. Hamilton poured himself into the architectural plans with characteristic intensity.[67]

The result was a graceful and dignified home of yellow paneling with white trim. Visitors stepping through the front doors would encounter, tellingly before anything else, Hamilton's study. Even at this stage of his life, in which he was more dedicated to family than ever before, Hamilton's legal work remained a priority. There were bedrooms aplenty for his children, who now numbered seven. Various touches in the home betokened Hamilton's cosmopolitan tastes: the parlor featured French furniture, and the fireplaces were crafted from Italian marble. But there could be no question that this worldly immigrant was foremost an American—a giant portrait of George Washington hung in the foyer. In a quiet allusion to his Caribbean past, Hamilton called the property, “The Grange,” the name of the plantation on St. Croix where his mother was buried.[68] Here, then, is another reminder that although Hamilton did not speak of his childhood, neither did he forget.



The Grange, where Hamilton resided with his family in his later years. Source: The Grange, Kingsbridge Road, the Residence of Alexander Hamilton. Miriam and Ira D. Wallach Division of Art, Prints and Photographs: Picture Collection, New York Public Library.

As Hamilton defended the credibility of Jewish testimony, represented Jewish citizens in the courts, and continued his tenure alongside Gershom Seixas on the Columbia board, some of his fellow Federalists forsook the party's earlier commitment to Jewish rights. Recall that it had been Anti-Federalists who sought to exploit religious bigotry during the ratification debates; similar tactics were then employed by some in the anti-Hamilton contingent that opposed the sweeping legislative reforms passed by the first Congress under the new Constitution. But as the French Revolution echoed across the Atlantic, it altered the role of antisemitism in the American political landscape.

Initially, the revolution in France, which began in 1789, elicited widespread enthusiasm in the United States. French revolutionaries were seen as heirs to the same values that had animated America's War of Independence. Jewish-Americans had additional cause to champion the French Revolution once France granted political equality to its Jews in 1791. By the following year, however, the French Revolution was less uniformly embraced throughout the United States. Reports of massacres and anarchy in France disturbed many Federalists, who began renouncing the French Revolution. Political factions in the United States were then becoming organized political parties, and a significant portion of American Jewry shifted to the Republican camp because of Republicans' continued endorsement of the French revolutionaries.[69]

Several Federalists, in turn, started peddling the kind of antisemitism that formerly had been the preserve of their opponents. In 1795, for instance, a Federalist printer took aim at a Republican group in New York that had named a Jew as its vice president (none other than Hamilton's former legal client, Solomon Simson). The printer sought to taint the entire organization as a cabal of Jews with stereotypically Jewish features, physical and otherwise: "This itinerant gang will easily be known by their physiognomy; they all seem to be, like their Vice-President, of the tribe of Shylock: they have that leering underlook, and malicious grin, that seem to say to the honest man—approach me not."[70] This sneer managed to compress multiple antisemitic clichés into a single sentence: Jews were rootless in geography, unsettling in appearance, and immoral in character.

Similar prejudice surfaced in Pennsylvania two years later when a state senate race resulted in a narrow win for a Republican politician who, though born and raised Christian, had a Jewish father. A Federalist newspaper in Philadelphia considered the politician a Jew all the same, warning, "Since the Jews obtained such a complete triumph over the Gentiles, it is said they have conceived the idea of imposing on us a general circumcision."[71] The myth that Jews secretly plotted to circumcise Gentiles was an anti-Jewish trope dating back centuries.[72]

Still, it would go too far to suggest that Federalists and Republicans entirely reversed in their respective attitudes toward Jewry. There were Republicans who continued to malign Jews into the early nineteenth century. A Republican piece from 1803 appearing in a Hartford newspaper unfavorably associated Federalists with ancient Judaism, which the writer considered a debased religion. He argued that the Federalists in Connecticut spuriously professed to govern the state in the name of freedom, just as Jews in antiquity had falsely claimed to serve the Almighty. In his words, "The system of policy here was as distant from the principles of liberty as the Jewish washings and oblations were from the law of God."[73] Evidently, casual antisemitism still had traction in Republican circles.

Some Federalists were quick to condemn Republican animus against Jews. An 1802 column in the New-England Palladium, a Federalist organ, derided Thomas Jefferson and his "adherents" for their "bitter, vindictive spirit" toward those who had bought government securities under Hamilton's economic scheme. The author deplored how such purchasers "have been denounced as speculators, usurers, and Jews, and held up as objects so odious, that to cheat them would almost be deemed a virtue."[74] Yet again, Republicans were contemptuously linking the Hamiltonian agenda to Jewry.

A number of Federalists disavowed anti-Jewish bigotry within their own ranks as well. In 1802, for instance, a Federalist paper in rural Pennsylvania leveled an antisemitic attack on a Republican editor who had one Jewish grandparent; Federalists in nearby Pittsburgh organized a gathering to disaffiliate themselves from that kind of religious intolerance.[75] They further announced in the Pittsburgh Gazette their "abhorrence of the vile calumnies, falsehood, and slander which have so frequently appeared in certain newspapers disgracing the name of liberty."[76] Hamilton, too, was willing to criticize a fellow Federalist for antisemitism—his adversary in the Le Guen case, Gouverneur Morris, was a prominent member of the Federalist Party.

Hamilton was hardly a devout Christian, but there were isolated instances when he sought to instrumentalize Christianity for political ends. As French-American relations deteriorated in 1797 and anxieties about a possible war increased, he wrote a message to a congressman that touted the prospect of a "national appeal to Heaven for protection." Hamilton made plain that his rationale was rooted in utility, not theology: "The politician will consider this as an important means of influencing opinion."[77] A year later, Hamilton attempted to use religion to sway public sentiment, publishing an essay in a New York paper that vilified "the disgusting spectacle of the French revolution" for exhibiting "animosity to the Christian system."[78] He was not wrong on the facts—revolutionaries in France had confiscated church property and even executed nuns.[79]

The election of 1800 then saw the Federalists lose control of both the presidency and Congress, prompting Hamilton to propose as a political tonic a Christian Constitutional Society. This was a passing thought that he mentioned once in a letter to an ally in Congress. Hamilton never broached the topic again, much less brought it to fruition. Moreover, the tenor of the letter makes clear that he was motivated by partisan strategy rather than religious conviction. In Hamilton's view, the Republicans understood the advantage of appealing to the heart over the head. The Federalists, on the other hand, were overly reliant on the "reason of men" and insufficiently attuned to the "impulse of passion." To win back "popular favor," the Federalist Party ought to appeal to Christian voters in religious terms, he explained.[80]

Hamilton did not discuss Christianity in his personal correspondence, with one exception—letters to his pious wife, Eliza. Yet even those allusions to Christianity were sporadic, occasioned only by the illness or death of someone in Eliza's family. At those trying times, Hamilton would urge his wife to find resolve in either "Christian fortitude" or "Christian resignation."[81] He also rented a pew for her in Trinity Church in Manhattan, where their children were baptized,[82] and he expected his eldest son, Philip, to attend church.[83] Hamilton and his law partner, Richard Harison, even provided Trinity Church with pro bono legal counsel, although that likely owed much to the fact that Harison was a vestryman at Trinity.[84] Hamilton was not himself a member of the church.[85] Trinity's surviving communion book from that time period shows Eliza's name, while her husband's is conspicuously absent.[86] Indeed, Hamilton did not belong to any church, meaning that in the eyes of some denominations, he simply was not a Christian at all.[87]

In the few instances when Hamilton discussed God, he described God as an engaged participant in world events. Hamilton credited "the blessing of providence" with having staved off "national bankruptcy" under the feeble Articles of Confederation.[88] During John Adams's presidency, Hamilton grew frustrated with the administration's foreign policy and told Washington, "My trust in Providence, which has so often interposed in our favor, is my only consolation."[89] And in an 1803 essay in the New-York Evening Post, Hamilton attributed "the kind interpositions of an over-ruling Providence" for both America's victory in the Revolution and its purchase of the Louisiana Territory from France.[90] Because of Hamilton's distance from Christian practice, historians have at times described him as a deist,[91] but his belief in an activist God was directly at odds with deism's conception of divinity as noninterventionist.

The developments leading up to the coda of Hamilton's life—his notorious duel—offer some additional insight into his complicated relationship with religion. Although he was a private citizen in the early 1800s, Hamilton still managed to exploit his residual clout to foil Aaron Burr's political ambitions. Hamilton believed that Burr answered to nothing beyond his own ego. "His public principles have no other spring or aim than his own aggrandizement," Hamilton once scoffed.[92] He helped derail Burr's designs on both the presidency in 1800 and the New York governorship four years later.[93]

Tensions between them reached dangerous proportions after Hamilton openly maligned Burr at a dinner in Albany around the time of the 1804 gubernatorial election. One of the supper companions recounted Hamilton's disparaging remarks in a letter that was reprinted in a newspaper.[94] Diminished by Hamilton in the courtroom, the political arena, and now the press, Burr would suffer his antagonist no longer. He asked Hamilton to either disavow the alleged insults or own them outright.[95] Hamilton well understood that taking the former path meant a truce and the latter a duel. But he could not bring himself to offer concessions to a man for whom he had so little respect.[96]

As he prepared for his encounter with Burr, Hamilton penned a statement to be made public afterward in which he explained the balance of factors that informed his tortured decision to step onto the dueling grounds. Hamilton acknowledged a number of reasons not to partake in a potentially fatal duel. For one, there was Eliza and their brood to think of: "My wife and children are extremely dear to me." Hamilton also recognized that dueling was an illicit practice that undermined the very rule of law to which he dedicated his career. He worried, too, about his creditors. The man who had consolidated the nation's debt was steeped in his own; his death would leave his creditors partially repaid at best. And, notably, Hamilton entertained religious objections. "My religious and moral principles are strongly opposed to the practice of dueling," he stressed.[97] Hamilton was not alone in having reservations about duels. Numerous ministers, newspapers, and scholars across the country deprecated dueling as a barbaric relic.[98]

Yet dueling still enjoyed a certain prestige in American culture, especially among soldiers and politicians—and Hamilton fell into both categories.[99] He typified many contemporary duelists who, despite misgivings, were nonetheless in thrall to the honor code.[100] They fashioned themselves gentlemen whose stature and self-worth were predicated on their willingness to hazard their lives in defense of their honor.[101] As Hamilton's statement put it, "All the considerations which constitute what men of the world denominate honor, impressed on me (as I thought) a peculiar necessity not to decline the call."[102]

Hamilton went on to explain that only if he stood his ground against Burr could he maintain, in the eyes of his fellow citizens, the credibility needed to help the nation navigate future "crises of our public affairs." Plainly, Hamilton had not abandoned hope that he might one day reclaim the reins of state power. Yet he was also mindful that dueling was not uniformly embraced by Americans. And so Hamilton added that he was determined, if "it pleases God to give me the opportunity, to reserve and throw away my first fire"—that is, he would aim his pistol away from Burr.[103] While Hamilton's participation in the duel was a gesture to those who commended the practice, his pledge to "throw away" his bullet was a nod to those who condemned it. This was a deft exercise in political optics that promised to preserve his standing with the greatest number of people whether he lived or died.

By his own admission, Hamilton was driven to duel by outward concerns about his public reputation, but his motives were likely rooted as well in a lifelong inward struggle to grapple with his harrowing past. The honor code would have appealed to Hamilton not just as a former soldier and statesman but as a Caribbean orphan forever plagued by anxiety about his status in the world.[104] Despite Hamilton's heroics in battle and achievements in government, he remained overly sensitive to slights. One of his allies observed of Hamilton, “No man, not the Roman Cato himself, was more inflexible on every point that touched … integrity and honor.”[105] Perhaps only glory in death would provide him what the feats of a lifetime could not.

Hamilton’s insistence that he owed a duty to God to direct his gun away from Burr appears to be not solely opportunistic but also heartfelt. The night before the duel, a confidant urged Hamilton to fire at Burr and thereby increase his chances for survival. Hamilton, however, was immovable. “My friend, it is the effect of a religious scruple, and does not admit of reasoning,” he explained. “It is useless to say more on the subject, as my purpose is definitely fixed.”[106]

Both in the statement that he prepared for public consumption and in his foregoing remark to his friend, Hamilton spoke of faith in broad terms with no specific references to Christianity. But he also authored a secret letter to Eliza, to be delivered to her only in the event of his death, which framed the occasion in Christian terms that would have been meaningful to her. Hamilton assured her that he would not discharge his weapon at Burr owing to the “scruples of a Christian” and offered these final instructions: “I charge you to remember that you are a Christian.”[107] Eliza was unaware of the imminent duel as her husband steeled himself for this final mission, one whose tragic aftermath raises questions anew about the authenticity of his Christian bona fides.

Epilogue

AT DAWN ON JULY 11, 1804, on a stony ledge above the Hudson River, Aaron Burr and Alexander Hamilton broke the morning calm with the sounds of gunfire. A bullet tore into Hamilton's spine, and he sprang up on his toes for a moment before collapsing to the ground.[1] He knew straight away that the wound would be fatal. "I am a dead man," Hamilton declared.[2] The surgeon on the scene was equally certain of his mortal fate, later recalling, "His countenance of death I shall never forget."[3] Burr stood unharmed. Hamilton's bullet had hit a tree branch more than twelve feet from Burr; either Hamilton shot first and did so, as promised, without an intent to kill, or he pulled his trigger merely as a reflexive muscle spasm when his body absorbed Burr's bullet.[4]

Hamilton was quickly rowed from the dueling grounds in Weehawken, New Jersey, to lower Manhattan for urgent medical care and conveyed to a bedroom in the house of the director of the Bank of New York. As word spread through the streets that Hamilton was on his deathbed, the usual bustle of the city gave way to a stunned stillness.[5] Crowds gathered outside the home where Hamilton rested.[6] Though paralyzed, he was still lucid in mind and intelligible in speech. Hamilton asked first that his wife be sent for, and then that a bishop give him communion.[7]

Maybe a man who had exhibited relative indifference toward Christianity for decades suddenly accepted Jesus. But there is another explanation more consistent with the rest of Hamilton's life. Eliza took Christian rites seriously, and she would soon be at her husband's deathbed. Hamilton no doubt understood that if he were to finally take communion, it could provide Eliza with a measure of solace amid the grief about to envelop her life.

Bishop Benjamin Moore came to Hamilton's side but refused to administer communion. For one, Moore condemned dueling as a "barbarous custom." And it seems that the bishop also entertained doubts about the sincerity of someone who neither belonged to a church nor previously had taken communion, for Hamilton felt compelled to plead that his request for an eleventh-hour communion did not spring from a sudden impulse but was actually a long-standing desire. He tried to reassure Moore: "It has for some time past been the wish of my heart, and it was my intention to take an early opportunity of uniting myself to the church by the reception of that holy ordinance." The bishop eventually acceded to his wishes.[8] When Eliza arrived, Hamilton invoked her faith: "Remember, my Eliza, you are a Christian."[9]

With steady doses of opiate, Hamilton persisted through the night under the watchful gaze of his wife and friends. Bearing witness to the slow and painful death of the man they all loved was almost insufferable. The next day, as Hamilton grew weaker, his seven children were brought to his bed so that he could gaze upon them a final time. His rivals—Jefferson, Madison, Adams—would live into their golden years. But on the afternoon of July 12, 1804, Alexander Hamilton, no older than fifty, took his last breath.[10]

Contemporary commentary on Hamilton's deathbed communion is revealing of his apathy toward Christianity prior to the duel. The Daily Advertiser newspaper wrote of Hamilton that by "receiving in attestation of his faith the sacrament of the Lord's Supper" in "his last hours," he "has not left the world to doubt of his faith." The article thus intimated that without such a display of religiosity at the end, his Christianity would otherwise have been in doubt. Similarly, a pastor in Albany insisted of Hamilton's communion, "This last act, more than any other, sheds glory on his character. Everything else death effaces. Religion alone abides with him on his deathbed. He dies a Christian."[11] To stress how Hamilton died a Christian was to concede that he did not live as one. Had Hamilton practiced Christianity before the duel, there would be little impetus for the pastor to proclaim that death effaced all else in his life.

Hamilton's enemies also took note of his last-minute Christian awakening but were unmoved. A remorseless Burr (who would spend years in exile avoiding criminal charges for the duel) complained to a friend that Hamilton's "last hours … appear to have been devoted to malevolence and hypocrisy."[12] John Adams, who had been publicly besmirched by Hamilton,[13] wrote in his autobiography that he would not "suffer my character to lie under infamous calumnies, because the author of them, with a pistol bullet through his spinal marrow, died a penitent."[14] And so Hamilton's admirers and adversaries alike considered his communion an anomalous departure from his usual lack of Christian piety. These accounts from the time of Hamilton's passing—as well as Hamilton's own deathbed acknowledgment that he wished to, but had not yet, united himself to the church—serve to cast doubt on a claim made by his son fully sixty years later that Alexander had espoused Eliza's faith well before the duel.[15]

As tolling bells announced Hamilton's death, a dark cloud of bereavement engulfed New York.[16] One of the best surviving descriptions of the scene comes from Rebecca Gratz, a twenty-three-year-old Jew from Pennsylvania renowned for her philanthropic work and striking beauty.[17] "The whole city of New York is in a state of consternation.

You can have no idea of the general mourning here," she shared with her sister.[18] For Gratz, the grief was personal. Her family members had long been political devotees of Hamilton, and she herself had grown up as a friend to Hamilton's children when he lived in Philadelphia as treasury secretary.[19] That Hamilton allowed the sons and daughters of Jews to play with his own stands as further testament to his personal comfort with Jewish people.

A founding father, still in his prime, gunned down on the field of honor was a tragedy of devastating proportions, and the grandeur of Hamilton's funeral befitted the gravity of the loss. Shopkeepers closed their businesses, flags were lowered to half-staff, and throngs packed the route of his funeral procession. Only the death of George Washington had occasioned public grief of this magnitude. Hamilton's corpse wound through the streets of lower Manhattan to the sounds of chiming bells and firing cannons. Spectators mounted rooftops and scaled trees to see above the heads of the tear-drenched crowds below. The slow-moving cortege took two hours to reach Eliza's church, where Hamilton was eulogized before his burial there.[20] The following day Rebecca Gratz recorded, "Yesterday was a day of sorrow and lamentation. I never witnessed so distressing a scene. The procession was conducted with the utmost solemnity and [in] every countenance might be traced the heart's affliction."[21] Alexander Hamilton had come to New York an anonymous immigrant. He died there its greatest citizen.

Among the founders, Hamilton has always cut a unique figure—his Caribbean origins, financial ingenuity, and dramatic death all distinguish him from the other icons of his era. Hamilton's ties to the people and faith of Judaism make him that much more singular. In all probability he had a Jewish identity in childhood, and in all certainty he attended a Jewish school. Though not a Jew in his American years, the adult Hamilton expressed deep reverence for Judaism and demonstrated sensitivity to the age-old oppression of its adherents. He also cultivated numerous connections to the Jewish community in the United States. As a famed lawyer, Hamilton advocated for Jewish citizens in the courts. As an influential alumnus, he proved critical in making Jews eligible for the Columbia presidency and placing the first Jew on the college's board. As a far-sighted treasury secretary, he willed into existence a financial system that created opportunities for Jews who were excluded from other professions. Hamilton's efforts to build a society where Jew and Gentile would partake as equals underscore the democratic possibilities of the young nation, even as the persistence of antisemitism meant that the radical promise of the Declaration of Independence would remain only partially realized for the Jews of the early republic.

Indeed, Hamilton was distinct from other founders in part because his relationship to Jewry was unsullied by antisemitic bias. If Jefferson and Hamilton both defended civic equality for Jews, Jefferson alone described them as heirs to a corrupt religion. If Jay and Hamilton both claimed credit for Jewish-friendly reforms at Columbia, Jay alone advocated the mass conversion of Jews to Christianity. If Madison and Hamilton both acknowledged the long history of Jewish persecution, Madison alone relied on antisemitism as a rationale for firing a government official. If Adams and Hamilton both conveyed great respect for Judaism, Adams alone invoked the word "Jew" as a slur. To be sure, Washington matched Hamilton in the absence of prejudice toward Jews, and the Newport letter marked a seminal moment in Jewish history; still, Washington's exposure to Jews was minimal compared to Hamilton's.

What's more, no founder aside from Hamilton saw antisemitic sentiment mobilized against his goals with such regularity. He tirelessly promoted the Constitution, whose ratification was resisted by a number of Anti-Federalists because it opened federal office to Jews. At trial, opposing counsel slandered Hamilton's witnesses as liars whose testimony ought to be discounted purely on the basis of their Jewish faith. Hamilton's economic policy in particular unleashed a torrent of anti-Jewish vitriol. According to his detractors, the treasury secretary was forming an unholy alliance with rapacious Jews. It was alleged that he would sell out his countrymen to Jewish creditors. Hamilton and his Jewish accomplices, critics claimed, did not produce wealth through honest work on farms; they reaped their profits from the dark arts of finance. Common soldiers and soil tillers were supposedly the innocent victims of Hamilton's collusion with Jews. Unlike the other founding fathers, he had not been born in the original thirteen colonies, and so Hamilton was conveniently smeared as an outsider whose loyalty was as suspect as the border-crossing Jews with whom he purportedly conspired.

Hamilton's antagonists were peddling a pernicious breed of bigotry. And yet, in many respects, the embattled Hamilton and his Jewish compatriots were outsiders. In a world that was largely rural, they flocked to city life. At a time when agriculture predominated, they engaged in trade and banking. Amid a society where many feared centralized power, Hamilton and his Jewish supporters embraced the new federal Constitution with its strong national government. Their very status as outsiders turned them into consummate modernizers.[22]

It is little coincidence, then, that the forces arrayed against Hamilton were often the very same that sought to relegate Jews to the margins of American life. Fear of Hamilton's agenda and fear of Jews were commonly conflated because they were both, ultimately, fears about modernization. The cosmopolitan marketplace that provided fresh opportunity to talented strivers was to many others a symbol of an ominous fate that threatened their way of life. Hamilton envisioned a future that belonged not to the sons of plantation aristocrats but to the itinerant, the enterprising, the urban—in other words, to people like him and his Jewish allies. While Jews were not fully accepted in the America of Hamilton's day, they surely could be in the America of Hamilton's dream.

ABBREVIATIONS

Archives

AHP	Alexander Hamilton Papers, Library of Congress, Washington, DC.
AJA	Jacob Rader Marcus Center of the American Jewish Archives, Cincinnati.
AJHS	American Jewish Historical Society, New York and Boston.
GKP	Gouverneur and Kemble Papers, New York Public Library.
GWP	George Washington Papers, Library of Congress, Washington, DC.
NHCS	Nevis Historical and Conservation Society, Charlestown, Nevis.
NYSA	New York State Archives, Albany, NY.
RBML	Rare Book and Manuscript Library, Columbia University in the City of New York.
RIGS	Rigsarkivet (Danish National Archives, Copenhagen), Vestindisk-guineiske kompagni, Bogholderen på St. Croix, Mandtalslister og matrikler (scanned version).
YIVO	YIVO Institute for Jewish Research Archives, New York.

Collected and Published Works

DHRC	The Documentary History of the Ratification of the Constitution Digital Edition. Edited by John P. Kaminski, Gaspare J. Saladino, Richard Leffler, Charles H. Schoenleber, and Margaret A. Hogan. Charlottesville: University of Virginia Press, 2009.
LPAH	The Law Practice of Alexander Hamilton: Documents and Commentary. Edited by Julius Goebel et al. 5 vols. New York: Columbia University Press, 1969–1981.
PAH	The Papers of Alexander Hamilton Digital Edition. Edited by Harold C. Syrett. Charlottesville: University of Virginia Press, Rotunda, 2011.
PAJHS	Publications of the American Jewish Historical Society.
PBF	The Papers of Benjamin Franklin. Edited by Leonard W. Labaree et al. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1959–.
PGWC	The Papers of George Washington Digital Edition—Confederation Series.

INTRODUCTION

"I wish I had a little Jew in me," Theodore Roosevelt once mused to a friend. Mere wishing would indeed mark the limits of Roosevelt's claim to Jewish ancestry—not a drop of Jewish blood coursed through his veins. If anything, he was the ultimate insider of the Protestant elite that had long dominated American life. His father descended from a wealthy family whose eminence in Manhattan dated back generations. His mother was a Southern belle from Georgia whose lineage included a delegate to the Continental Congress. Theodore lived a life consistent with his patrician pedigree, enrolling at Harvard, serving as a military officer, and seizing the grandest prize of all: the Oval Office.[1]

This silver-spooned statesman who had grown up in the fashionable neighborhood of Gramercy Park in New York had little in common with the Yiddish-speaking immigrants moistening their brows in the sweatshops of the Lower East Side just a short walk away. Roosevelt's privileged path was even further removed from the dreadful subsistence of Jews struggling to survive in Eastern Europe. And yet, for all the differences between Roosevelt and embattled Jews on both sides of the Atlantic, their causes became pivotal to his presidency. He would help shape their lives—and they, in turn, his legacy.

When an assassin's bullet felled William McKinley and catapulted Vice President Roosevelt to the White House in 1901, few could have imagined the central role that Jewish issues would play in TR's administration. But those issues would make front-page headlines, feature in State of the Union messages, and become rallying cries in political campaigns. It is striking, then, how little ink historians have spilled on the Jewish dimensions of his presidential tenure. Many excellent volumes do comprehensively cover other aspects of Roosevelt's statecraft. Yet his Jewish affairs—diplomatic and domestic—have never before received book-length treatment. This study offers the first, surfacing numerous historical sources that were previously unexplored in the vast canon of Roosevelt scholarship.

* * *

Notwithstanding Roosevelt's blue-blooded background, arguably no predecessor of his would have arrived at the White House better prepared to address antisemitism abroad and its ripple effects at home. He served as New York's enterprising police commissioner in the mid-1890s, becoming a conspicuous presence on the Lower East Side. Nowhere else in America did Eastern European Jewish immigrants concentrate in such immense numbers. To New Yorkers, it was simply "the East Side." Jewish crowds crammed into local venues to hear Commissioner Roosevelt espouse his egalitarian ethos. He also sought to undermine antisemitic tropes about Jewish frailty by encouraging the neighborhood's brawny Jews to join his police force. And at East Side nuptials, Roosevelt even escorted Jewish brides to their wedding receptions.[2]

Soon TR was famously leading the Rough Riders into battle, where Jewish volunteers joined their mustachioed colonel in facing down Spanish snipers amid the Cuban hills. He took great pride in those Jewish soldiers, especially one nicknamed "Pork Chop." Roosevelt quickly translated his military renown into a successful gubernatorial race in New York. From the governor's mansion, he descended into the bowels of the East Side tenements to see for himself the Jewish garment workers slaving over sewing machines in hazardous conditions for paltry wages. TR consequently rallied the state legislature to implement major reforms.[3]

Roosevelt's deep history with the Jewish community would lend him insight and credibility when he seized the reins of presidential power at the record age of forty-two and confronted a vexing series of Jewish issues. Yet his past experiences with Jewry only took him so far in forging a better future for Jews. With each challenge, he found himself navigating dueling demands. The opposing forces acting on Roosevelt at any given moment were often impossible to reconcile. This book argues that the combustion of those forces resulted in two Theodore Roosevelts. One inspired his Jewish constituents; the other disappointed them. One spoke up for persecuted Jews overseas; the other kept a studied silence. One roundly repudiated Jew-hatred; the other indulged in antisemitic tropes. One warmly embraced Jewish immigrants; the other sought to limit their admission. One called on Jewish newcomers to honor their heritage; the other expected their homogenized assimilation. One advanced Jewish causes selflessly for humane principles; the other did so self-servingly for electoral politics. In short, Roosevelt personified the contradictions and complexities of the nation that elected him.

* * *

The thorniest dilemma involved crafting an American response to Russia's barbarous breed of Jew-baiting. From the czar's throne in the capital of St. Petersburg, Nicholas II ruled over half the world's Jews. They endured debilitating restrictions: schools instituted quotas on Jewish students, professional guilds curbed Jewish membership, and huge swaths of Russian territory excluded Jewish residents. As severe as these strictures were, no one yet knew when the twentieth century dawned that Russian Jewry was on the eve of its greatest crisis yet.[4]

Roosevelt's tenure in office happened to coincide with an appalling wave of mob attacks against Russia's Jews known as pogroms—a Russian term meaning "devastation." For three horrifying years, marauding gangs of ordinary Russians routinely slaughtered their Jewish neighbors. Sometimes Russian authorities passively watched the butchery; other times they actively encouraged it. Never before in the dark history of that empire had Jewish blood flowed so freely. Most Russian Jews lacked the means to flee the corpse-strewn rubble of their communities, where they lived under the omnipresent threat of the next massacre. These catastrophic circumstances prompted Roosevelt to engage in an ongoing calculus about how to stanch the Jewish bloodbath.[5]

Certainly, Russia wasn't the only country whose antisemitism begged Roosevelt's attention. So did Romania and Morocco. Roosevelt felt relatively emboldened in confronting those weaker states over their anti-Jewish bigotry. But Russia had far more power than these other nations. It also had far more Jews. Nowhere else were the risks—and the stakes—of Roosevelt's Jewish diplomacy so high. America was just then emerging as a major player in the global arena, and Jews the world over anxiously waited to see whether Roosevelt would use his nation's newfound stature to advance a humanitarian vision in the czar's dominions.[6]

As Roosevelt contemplated his options, several variables weighed in favor of a diplomatic intervention on behalf of Russian Jewry. TR harbored a longstanding affinity for the Jewish people and genuinely abhorred the atrocities visited upon them. He was also drawn to the idea of America as a moral lodestar in the world. Many of his constituents felt the same way. They were aghast at the gruesome details of Russian-Jewish life—men savagely beaten, women serially violated, children tragically orphaned. Across the United States, mass protests of Jews and Gentiles pleaded for their president to intercede. They imagined that if Roosevelt forcefully spoke out, his words would affirm America's high-minded ideals and shame Russia into reversing its repression.[7]

But countervailing considerations advised against a rebuke of Russia. European officials were unnerved that Roosevelt would potentially flout a strong diplomatic norm that forbade one country from meddling in another's domestic affairs. Roosevelt's own State Department was similarly alarmed at that prospect. Rumors flew—with more validity than the president realized—that his secretary of state might resign over TR's possible intervention.[8] And any American remonstrance of Russia would carry substantial risks. It could alienate the czarist regime, which would resist the perception that St. Petersburg took orders from Washington. The Russians could retaliate by closing prized ports to U.S. trade or, even worse, severing diplomatic ties entirely. Roosevelt also fretted that issuing public denunciations of pogroms might actually exacerbate problems for Russia's Jews. Although he didn't specify what problems he foresaw, undoubtedly his fear was that Russian Gentiles who resented America's bid to shame them might reassert their pride by further lashing out at their Jewish neighbors. Complicating matters was America's own scourge of mob violence directed at a marginalized minority—if Roosevelt admonished Russia over its Jewish carnage, he risked provoking an embarrassing censure from St. Petersburg about the ruthless lynching of Blacks in the United States. Perhaps most significantly, no other head of state in the world had dared to confront Russia over the pogroms. Roosevelt would be going it alone.[9] These fraught factors underscore an exasperating truth about international affairs: evil in the world may be unambiguous, but determining the optimal diplomatic response is rarely straightforward. Amid profound uncertainties and competing exigencies, Roosevelt pursued an ever-changing foreign policy with Russia.

At times, Roosevelt defied both the czar and international custom by emphatically championing the cause of Russia's Jews. He insisted the United States had a "manifest duty" to condemn the brutality that pogromists inflicted on Jewish victims. Grateful Jews in America celebrated him for his rhetorical defense of their coreligionists abroad. Roosevelt's approach at such moments should suggest a reappraisal of his famous maxim, "Speak softly and carry a big stick," by which he meant backstopping diplomacy with armed force. That aphorism did fairly describe Roosevelt's imperial disposition toward Latin America. But in his willingness to challenge Russia absent any military threat, we see a striking illustration of the reverse: Roosevelt spoke loudly with no stick at all.[10]

In other instances, however, he opted for public silence. Conditions periodically required him to promote Russian-Jewish interests covertly and thereby forgo popular credit. Sometimes he deemed it prudent to abstain from even private entreaties to St. Petersburg, especially when Russian society at large began to spiral into a violent abyss. Despite his compassion for oppressed Jews, Roosevelt harbored significant doubts about America's ability to police the world. His calculated reserve at such times frustrated his Jewish supporters at home. But it should also serve to complicate accusations of "cowboy diplomacy" that his critics leveled against him in his day and thereafter. Roosevelt has often been derided for applying a Wild West approach to global affairs and violently thrashing about the world stage.[11] To be sure, he oversaw an aggressive expansion of American influence in the Western Hemisphere. But declassified records from Roosevelt's Jewish diplomacy reveal his keen sensitivity to shifting context. We find in that version of Roosevelt not so much cowboy bravado as careful calibration.[12]

Another noteworthy feature of Roosevelt's foreign relations was his tendency to relocate decision-making on Jewish matters away from the State Department and toward an inner circle of Jewish allies. Only one of his Jewish confidants even worked for his administration. Roosevelt was perfectly content to resolve key questions of Jewish diplomacy through, say, a freewheeling conversation over lunch at his summer house with a handful of informal Jewish advisors. The State Department often found itself reduced to executing orders instead of driving policy. And Roosevelt's Jewish associates didn't merely guide his thinking on Jewish issues. They also pursued their own shadow diplomacy, directly beseeching foreign officials to alleviate Jewish suffering. In Roosevelt, these Jewish leaders found a partner willing to discreetly augment their efforts through his own channels.[13]

The composition of Roosevelt's Jewish brain trust reflects a schism in Jewish life in that era. His Jewish foreign policy concerned the great mass of Eastern European Jews who subsisted on meager earnings and Orthodox pieties. Yet Roosevelt didn't consult immigrants who had freshly fled that benighted world. Instead, he relied on the counsel of elite American Jews whose profiles were very different from their persecuted coreligionists overseas—his advisors were Central European in their origin, rich in their resources, and Reform in their Judaism. They lived in Upper East Side townhomes, not Lower East Side tenements. For all Roosevelt's handshaking and speechifying in Jewish slums, behind closed doors he depended on the kind of assimilated Jew he might have once met amid the verdant quads of Harvard Yard or at a posh party in an uptown brownstone.[14]

* * *

Antisemitism posed problems not just beyond America's borders but also within them. Roosevelt well knew that Jew-hatred had significant purchase on his own country. After all, many of his best friends were antisemites. The elites who populated his social stratum were often aghast at the specter of their summer resorts and prep schools becoming overrun with affluent Jews. Nor did these genteel Anglo-Saxons thrill to the immiserated Jewish immigrants flooding their city streets.[15]

Roosevelt may have hobnobbed with bigots, but that didn't mean he let their prejudice stand unanswered. Shortly after his college graduation, Roosevelt castigated fellow members of a Republican club who wanted to reject a Jewish applicant on religious grounds.[16] Likewise, a Roosevelt companion once claimed in print that no Jew should become a military officer, prompting TR to press him, "Don't you think this criticism was unjust?"[17] And after hosting a novelist for an afternoon at the Harvard Club, Roosevelt noticed that the writer's newest short story featured a Jewish antagonist but exclusively Gentile protagonists. "There ought also to be a Jew among them!" urged Roosevelt.[18] The best indicator of TR's goodwill toward Jews wasn't his vocal defense of Jews in public, where he stood to score points with Jewish constituencies. It was, rather, his willingness in private moments to risk alienating friends over their intolerance of Jews when he had nothing to gain.

American antisemitism was hardly limited to Anglo-Saxon aristocrats who knocked back champagne flutes at Newport parties while scoffing about Jewish bankers. Heartland farmers and urban slum-dwellers also engaged in their share of Judeophobia. All manner of stereotypes gained traction across these varied segments of society: Jews were puppet masters manipulating Gentiles; Jews were perverted seducers of Christian girls; Jews were rapacious capitalists bamboozling the common people. But America wasn't uniformly prejudiced toward Jewry. The nation had a philosemitic streak that cherished the Jewish community. Many Gentiles extended a helpful hand to Jewish immigrants and denounced Jew-hatred in its many forms.[19]

Roosevelt embodied that very contradiction. He repeatedly repudiated antisemitism, and yet Roosevelt himself periodically peddled the kind of prejudice he condemned from others. TR once derided a Jewish journalist as a “circumcised skunk.” And in a letter to a friend, Roosevelt employed the antisemitic epithet “sheeny” to describe a Jewish politician. The word “sheeny” was sufficiently offensive by the standards of TR’s own era that his friend doctored Roosevelt’s letter before it appeared in a published collection of their correspondence. Roosevelt also occasionally suffered from delusions that furtive Jewish machinations lay behind troubling global developments.[20]

His antisemitism and philosemitism didn’t always sit in tension; they sometimes fused together in unexpected ways. As police commissioner, he wanted to gather Jewish officers for an important opportunity, but Roosevelt engaged in stereotyping by instructing a subordinate to identify Jewish policemen based solely on their facial features: “the stronger their ancestral marking, the better,” Roosevelt insisted. During his presidency, he made a historic appointment of a Jew to a major office; however, TR indelicately suggested that younger Jews should look up to that appointee as the “ideal of the successful man rather than some crooked Jew money-maker.” And after his administration, Roosevelt praised Jewish children for outpacing their Gentile counterparts in school, yet by asserting that “the Jewish children are very much brighter than the American,” he implied that Jewish students were somehow not quite American.[21]

In paradoxically melding philosemitic and antisemitic sentiments, Roosevelt was actually typical of innumerable American Gentiles. One historian of Jew-hatred has perceptively observed, “A stereotype may express ambivalent emotions. It may blend affection and contempt.… Many Americans were both pro- and anti-Jewish at the same time.”[22] Roosevelt’s own mixture of benevolence and bias toward Jews does not appear to have damaged his standing with his Jewish constituents—perhaps because Jews themselves sometimes advanced Jewish interests by relying on antisemitic stereotypes. For example, the czar’s regime genuinely believed that Jews manufactured public opinion in the United States, and Roosevelt’s Jewish-

American allies were more than happy to leverage that unfounded paranoia in their shadow diplomacy with Russian officials.[23]

* * *

Roosevelt’s views about Jewish immigration were similarly conflicted. From colonial times until McKinley’s death—a period stretching a quarter-millennium—America had amassed a Jewish population of one million. It took only the seven-and-a-half years of Roosevelt’s presidency to nearly double that figure, as Jewish survivors of persecution packed the docks at American ports. This unprecedented crush of Jewish refugees raised hard questions for the nation, both practical and moral. Indigent Jews overwhelmed city slums and saturated the labor market. Whether to receive these desperate souls in unlimited numbers was a difficult quandary. Certainly, Jews weren’t the only immigrant group whose inflow generated controversy. But American antisemitism made Jewish migration especially charged.[24] Rival imperatives over immigration led to two Theodore Roosevelts: one who earned the devotion of his Jewish constituents and another who elicited their distress.

The first Roosevelt spoke movingly of Jewish immigrant contributions to American life. His administration openly celebrated the idea of the United States as an asylum for the world’s downtrodden. Acutely aware that turning back Jewish arrivals often meant consigning them to a grim fate in their lands of origin, TR chastised the Ellis Island commissioner over his questionable deportation of Jews. Roosevelt even made a dramatic visit to that symbolic speck of land in New York harbor to announce a special committee—with Jewish representation—that would expose prejudicial practices. Most strikingly of all, Roosevelt entrusted the oversight of immigration law to a foreign-born Jew, an audacious move in an era when many “old stock” Americans were in thrall to xenophobia.[25]

But Roosevelt aggrieved his Jewish friends by backing a congressional bill that threatened to close the gates to the most marginal Jewish immigrants. The bill sought to make literacy in any language a prerequisite for admission into the country. Although neutral on its face, the bill would disproportionately reject Eastern European Jews, whose literacy rates were much lower than newcomers from the likes of England or Denmark. Roosevelt's intentions weren't sinister in endorsing the bill. He worried that immigrants who had already settled stateside would struggle to overcome poverty if their wages and living conditions were perpetually suppressed by an unrestricted deluge of foreign labor. A literacy test, Roosevelt maintained, could check industries that were taking unfair advantage of mass migration.[26]

Even so, Roosevelt's position alienated his Jewish allies. They rightly fretted that a literacy test would pose an existential threat for countless Jews seeking to escape habitual bouts of butchery overseas. And Roosevelt's support for the bill placed him on the same side as prominent xenophobes—or "nativists"—who wanted to attenuate Jewish immigration for fear it was corrupting the nation's racial purity. The bill ultimately failed to pass, but no thanks to the president.[27]

His odd confluence with nativists on the literacy test wasn't the only strange dynamic that immigration engendered in American political life. Recent Jewish arrivals, who favored an open door on immigration, found themselves aligned with the very industrial interests that exploited them. Meanwhile, some antisemitic nativists joined American Jewry in demanding pro-Jewish reforms in Russia. These nativists hoped that improved circumstances for the czar's Jewish subjects would stem the succession of steamships filled with Russian Jews clutching one-way tickets to Ellis Island.[28]

In perhaps the most counterintuitive development, Roosevelt's closest Jewish advisor—who usually embraced Jewish immigration—encouraged TR to officially lament the Jewish influx from Romania. The origins of this peculiar tactic resulted from the diplomatic protocol that discouraged a given country from criticizing another's internal affairs, even on humanitarian grounds. Roosevelt's Jewish aide prevailed upon him to adopt the following pretextual argument: because Romanian antisemitism prompted a Jewish exodus to American shores that purportedly burdened the United States, Romania's Jew-hatred was an international issue and thus susceptible to American reproach.[29]

In truth, Roosevelt had no qualms about admitting Romanian-Jewish refugees—they then numbered fewer than seven thousand annually—but he understood the merit of posturing as if he did. By citing America’s self-interest in reducing immigration, the Roosevelt administration was able to issue a rebuke of Romanian bigotry while paying heed to diplomatic norms. This episode runs counter to the commonplace judgment that America’s foreign policy has repeatedly used the language of altruism to camouflage a self-serving agenda. To be sure, that critique does fairly describe numerous incidents in the nation’s history. But the Roosevelt administration’s censure of Romania offers a stunning example of the opposite: America’s disingenuous invocation of its self-interest to justify what was actually a humanitarian endeavor.[30]

* * *

It doesn’t follow, however, that Roosevelt’s intentions in his Jewish diplomacy were purely magnanimous. His international statecraft bore an intimate relationship to his pursuit of the Jewish vote at home. Roosevelt was a political animal whose ascent began in New York City, where the booming Jewish population enjoyed increasing clout with each new campaign season. Even as Roosevelt reached the national stage, he remained ever mindful of newly naturalized Jews who flocked to polling stations on election days. His Jewish diplomacy became his central pitch to these voters.

Roosevelt made sure that his resistance to antisemitism abroad featured in his party platform, his nomination acceptance, and surrogate speeches. So attuned was Roosevelt to the Jewish vote that he even let his electoral ambitions dictate certain foreign policy decisions. Amid the height of his reelection bid in 1904, for instance, Roosevelt empowered the chairman of the Republican National Committee to opportunistically declassify State Department records that would reveal a recent clandestine effort by TR on behalf of Jews. And during another election cycle, Roosevelt appeased Jewish voters by placing incessant pressure on his secretary of state to reverse an extradition ruling that would have returned a Russian émigré to the bear's claws. It would go too far to suggest that Roosevelt's Jewish diplomacy was exclusively a tool of his electioneering—after all, he sometimes secretly advanced Jewish causes overseas without any intent or attempt to later garner public credit. But it would be obtuse to ignore his willingness, whenever November grew near in even-numbered years, to make foreign policy the handmaiden of domestic politics.[31]

Given his vast remit as president, Roosevelt's granular attention to the Jewish vote is rather remarkable. One might think that a sitting head of state—responsible for a breathtaking array of challenges—wouldn't have time to peruse obscure Jewish periodicals. But when a Jewish college student published an article endorsing Roosevelt's reelection in a monthly magazine called Menorah, TR gushed about the piece to a friend. Nor did Roosevelt's presidential duties preclude him from keeping a close eye on municipal Jewish politics back in New York City. He was indignant when the local Republican Party put forward a slate of judicial nominees for the city bench that featured merely a secular Jew and not also an Orthodox candidate. Indeed, Roosevelt personally intervened to remedy the omission.[32]

Roosevelt's consistent focus on the Jewish electorate paid dividends at the ballot box. Naturally, he found favor with assimilated Jews who conventionally voted Republican; the genuinely striking feature of Roosevelt's electoral success is that he fared so well with Democratic-leaning Jewish immigrants. It is a testament to his popularity with the latter set of Jews that Roosevelt pulled off an extraordinary coup for a Republican presidential nominee: he actually won the Lower East Side. In another measure of his Jewish support, Roosevelt outran every last down-ballot Republican at East Side polling stations. TR's astounding performance with Jewish constituents demonstrates that their appreciation of his boldest actions in Jewish diplomacy far outweighed their frustration with his more cautious moments.

* * *

Roosevelt's pitch to Jewish voters was, like nearly all else, riddled with contradiction. He often decried identity politics, insisting that he paid Jews in the United States the respect of treating them as simply Americans. Roosevelt esteemed the notion of civic life as a realm where common citizenship, not ethnic identity, mattered. But that was a pleasing fiction. Ethnic issues resonated with ethnic voters, Jews among them; politicians responded accordingly, Roosevelt among them. Whether touting his defiance of the czar or lining up Jewish surrogates to barnstorm the East Side, the reality is that Roosevelt routinely courted Jews as Jews.[33]

This tension between identity-neutral and identity-centric politics frequently surfaced when Roosevelt exercised his power of appointment. He regularly espoused the importance of religious diversity in his hiring. But Roosevelt was equally attracted to a competing conceit: the government workforce as an identity-agnostic sphere where talent alone counted. These dueling strains in his thought led to a fair degree of incoherence—in one breath he would remark on the need to deliberately include Jews in American governance, and in the next he would deny that religion played any factor in his selection of Jewish appointees. Roosevelt never was able to resolve the conflict between the identity-driven ideal of inclusivity and the identity-free ideal of meritocracy.[34]

Ambivalence about the pertinence of Jewish identity also characterized his checkered approach to Jewish assimilation. Sometimes Roosevelt emphasized a kind of uniform Americanism that called on Jewish immigrants to leave behind their Old Country ways. The version of Roosevelt who preferred homogenizing assimilation was most pronounced in his enthusiasm for the controversial play The Melting Pot. It tells the improbable love story of two young Russian immigrants in New York: a Jewish man whose family was slaughtered in a pogrom, and a Gentile woman whose father perpetrated that very pogrom. Across the United States, Jews panned The Melting Pot for effectively expecting them to abandon their heritage and intermarry their way into self-erasure. But Roosevelt saw in the play's storyline the promise of a unified America freed from Old World enmities. He considered The Melting Pot one of the greatest influences on his life.[35]

There was, however, a pluralistic Roosevelt who believed that Jews could integrate into the United States by honoring, not disowning, their culture. He praised Jewish Americans for remaining admirably “loyal to their faith and their race traditions.” And the Jewish tradition that Roosevelt most venerated was the heroism of the Maccabee warriors. He upheld those ancient Jewish rebels as a model for American men of Jewish faith. TR saw Maccabee lore as a useful antidote to the antisemitic trope that male Jews were feckless cowards. In Roosevelt’s estimation, Jewish men needn’t shed their heritage to shed that stereotype—to the contrary, they should embrace their own proud legacy of Maccabean valor.[36] When Roosevelt once said he wished he had a little Jewish blood in him, he surely meant this archetype of the American Maccabee.

* * *

Writing presidential history is often a fraught exercise, Jewish history even more so. The nexus might well be combustible. Some caveats here will hopefully mitigate the risk of readers misinterpreting the book’s goals.

In recovering the underappreciated role of Jewish people and Jewish issues to Roosevelt’s life, this study doesn’t intend to imply that his days comprised an endless succession of Jewish matters. His attention was divided across many other concerns, which have received ample treatment from other scholars. In other words, I seek to enrich our already robust understanding of a multifaceted leader. Precisely because Roosevelt’s presidential portfolio was so extensive, he regularly entrusted Jewish allies with the daily management of his Jewish affairs, and he would weigh in at crucial moments—accordingly, some chapters that follow tell their story even more than his. This investigation, moreover, circumscribes its scope to Jewish causes, so it could give the misimpression that Roosevelt engaged those Jewish allies exclusively on Jewish topics; the reality is that he leaned on them for all manner of advice. Another important disclaimer: this volume does refer passingly to other ethnic groups for context, but as every work of scholarship must mark its limits somewhere, a comprehensive discussion of non-Jewish communities lies beyond my ambit here.

When a new book appears on an American president, it is a natural instinct for many readers to reassess that president’s reputation—for better or worse—in light of fresh findings. The ensuing chapters may burnish Roosevelt's reputation in some eyes and tarnish it in others. Whether readers close the covers of this book thinking better or worse of the twenty-sixth president is their prerogative. But neither outcome is the author's aim. The sole ambition of this study is to reckon with the historical record in its full complexity.

* * *

The Jewish issues that preoccupied Roosevelt were significant—making front-page headlines, featuring in State of the Union messages, turning up in campaign speeches—because they weren't of consequence to Jews alone. Indeed, they implicated paramount questions of American life. Would the United States become an ascendant voice for moral clarity on the global stage? Would the country serve as a refuge for huddled masses from foreign lands? Would recent arrivals to American shores find that abandoning their heritage was the cost of acceptance? At stake in all these questions was nothing less than America's self-definition. That Roosevelt's answers were so conflicted reflected a nation struggling to know its own soul; that these questions remain contentious still today lends the story of Theodore Roosevelt and the Jews a timeless urgency.

OceanofPDF.com

1

ASCENT

When the novelist Henry James visited the Lower East Side at the dawn of the twentieth century, he encountered "a Jewry that had burst all bounds."[1] A guidebook for tourists more flatteringly portrayed the neighborhood as home to a "wondrously preserved Semitic people."[2] In his famous exposé of New York's slums in the 1890s, How the Other Half Lives, the Danish-American reformer Jacob Riis described entering the Lower East Side from Bayard Street. "No need of asking here where we are," he reflected. Yiddish signs, Eastern European kaftans, and bearded men with yarmulkes all gave the unmistakable indication that Riis was now in "Jewtown."[3]

The sheer density of "the East Side" was arresting. "Nowhere in the world are so many people crowded together on a square mile as here," Riis reported.[4] The concentration of these people far exceeded the infrastructure, rendering filth and odor all but inevitable. One journalist recounted how residents venturing into the streets encountered "a thousand stenches of their own and others' making."[5] Amid the cramped blocks and side alleys was a chaotic mix of pushcarts, horses, and human beings. Traffic lights and stop signs were nowhere to be found—carriages and wagons moved in all directions at once.[6]

Six days of the week, commerce was the lifeblood of the Lower East Side. Along the sidewalks were storefronts of bakers, grocers, and clothiers.[7] And the streets were open-air markets where most of life's necessaries could be procured for pennies from peddlers. For centuries, European Jews had sold their wares from pushcarts—the time-trusted trade of the peddler was thus a natural default for many Jewish immigrants in the New World. Renting a pushcart on the East Side cost ten cents daily (almost four dollars today); some enterprising peddlers simply refashioned baby strollers.[8]

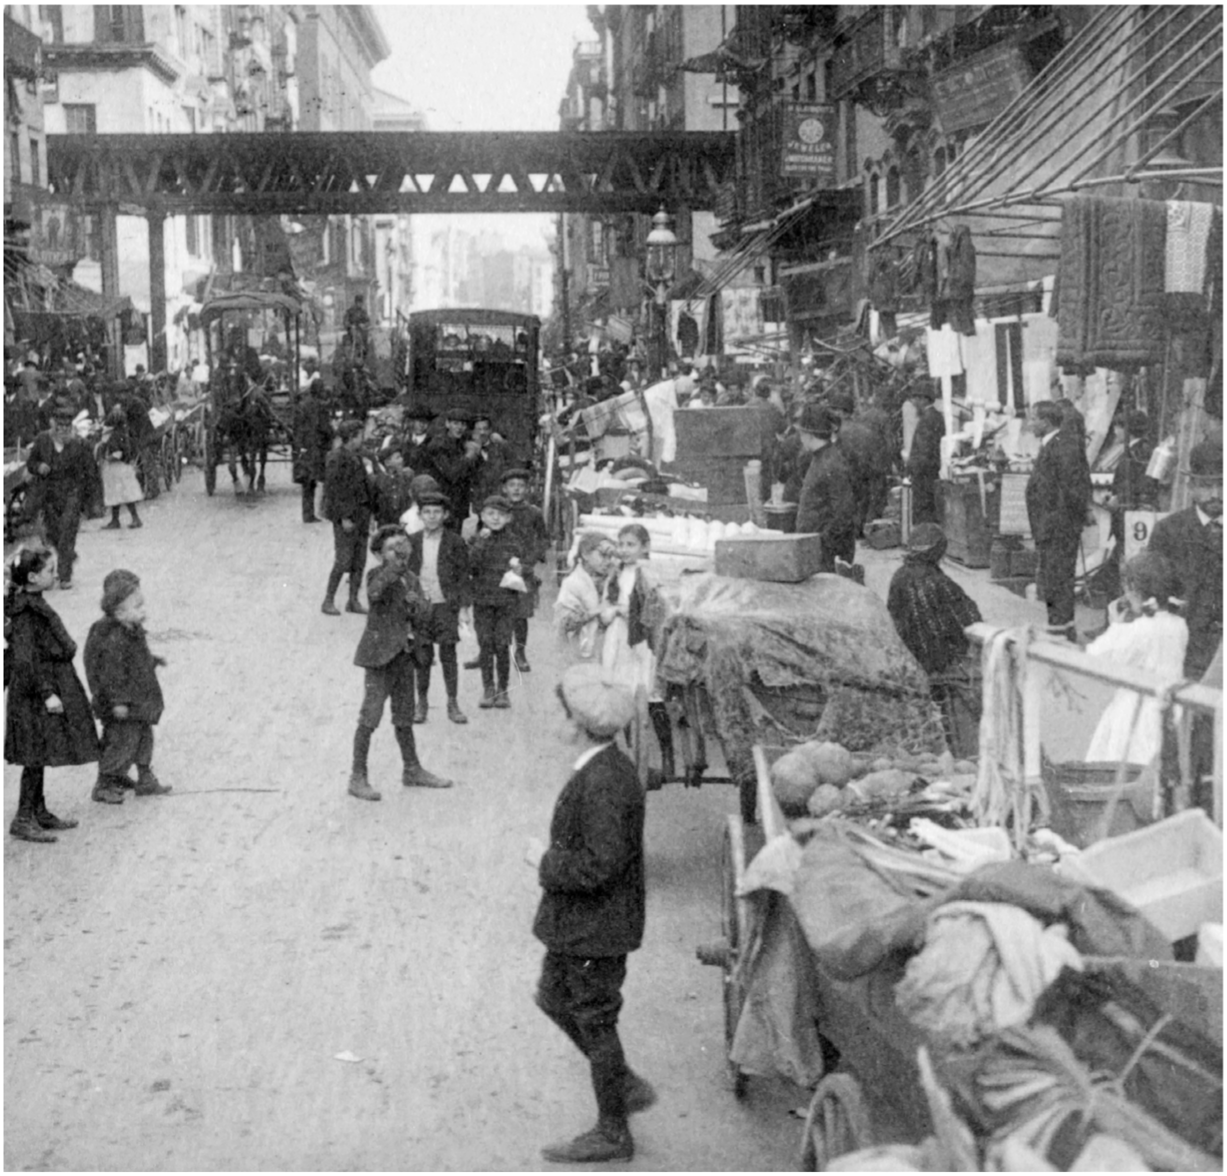

FIGURE 1.1. “How the other half lives” in a crowded Hebrew district, Lower East Side, New York City. Source: Library of Congress, Prints and Photographs Division.

The weekly heyday for peddlers took place on Fridays on Hester Street at the ironically named “Pig Market,” where everything but pork was for sale. “There is scarcely anything else that can be hawked from a wagon that is not to be found,” Jacob Riis noted, “and at ridiculously low prices.” Vendors and buyers haggled loudly over all imaginable goods—spectacles and suspenders, cups and candlesticks, pants and pickles. Fowl on offer for Shabbat dinner had, of course, been slaughtered according to kosher law. Five peaches cost a penny; broken eggs might be given away for a song. Even by the standards of the East Side, the Pig Market was congested. Riis marveled at “the crowds that jostle each other at the wagons and about the sidewalk shops.… Pushing, struggling, babbling, and shouting in foreign tongues, a veritable Babel of confusion.”[9]

Two short blocks from the heart of the Pig Market, Hester Street intersected with Allen Street, home to a notorious red-light district. Jewish prostitutes placed red lamps in their windows to signal their trade. One renowned prostitute always took leave from work on the High Holy Days, explaining to a journalist matter-of-factly, “I go to shul.”[10] On nearby Forsyth Street, Synagogue Beth Israel shared a wall with a brothel; praying congregants competed with paying customers for vocal supremacy.[11] It was hardly atypical to find sanctity and sin comingling in turn-of-the-century New York.

Forsyth Street ran parallel to Orchard Street with its many restaurants. Diners willing to part with thirteen cents (about five dollars today) could enjoy a veritable feast: stew, pie, bread, soup, pickles, and a beer.[12] Or they could turn right onto Houston Street and try the salami at a beloved deli—known today as Katz’s—that was a well-known haunt for performers in the Yiddish theaters.[13] Sometimes those theaters staged original content; other times they would adapt a Shakespearean classic with a Jewish twist. Lower East Side audiences were probably unaware that the original version of Hamlet did not involve a subplot where the titular character trains to become a rabbi.[14]

A six-minute stroll west on Houston Street landed you at the base of Second Avenue. That street featured so many cafés serving knishes—a hot doughy snack favored by Ashkenazi Jews—that it became known as “Knish Alley.” These cafés formed the intellectual nexus of the Lower East Side, as patrons engaged in boisterous debates or otherwise channeled their competitive instincts into chess matches. Turning right from Second Avenue, East Siders took refuge from the neighborhood’s grime at the Tenth Street Baths (still open today). Here was one of dozens of Jewish bathhouses that offered a hot shvitz—or sweat bath—followed by a cold shower. Bathhouses were essential because in-home tubs were rare and washing before Shabbat was a sacred obligation. Reprieve from the street might also be sought in the barbershops, where locals forgot their workaday troubles amid conversation and card games. Candy stores, too, were popular gathering places. Many customers came for the “egg creams,” a flavored fizzy drink made with neither egg nor cream. Other candy store regulars discreetly gambled; illicit betting was curiously commonplace at the confectionaries dotting the neighborhood.[15]

Roaring above Allen Street was the elevated train. The pandemonium that prevailed in the train was every bit as frenetic as life below. Price Collier, a Midwesterner visiting New York in the 1890s, described the train cars as “gymnasiums on wheels.” Merely sitting down could be a Herculean feat. As an exasperated Collier explained, “People bending to sit down, as the car starts, place their posteriors anywhere but where they intended, and not infrequently in a space already occupied by another.” Standing passengers firmly gripped the leather straps suspended from the ceiling, a necessary precaution when the train rounded bends at a New York pace. Enduring the ride required not just physical dexterity but mental focus. “A second’s inattention, a moment’s respite from the dangling leather which hangs from the roof, and you are shot into somebody’s back, bosom, or belly,” warned Collier. He was impressed by New Yorkers’ equanimity amid the anarchy, for “no one seems disturbed or greatly put out by this involuntary riot which takes place every few seconds.”[16]

* * *

The elevated train afforded a grisly view into the dark heart of the Lower East Side: the tenements.[17] At all hours, passengers could glimpse into the open windows of these brick buildings—ordinarily five to eight stories tall—crammed with impoverished Jewish families.[18] “The architecture seemed to sweat humanity at every window and door,” a British writer remarked. “The thought of the hidden interiors was terrifying.”[19] This particular Englishman may not have summoned the nerve to venture inside these hellish buildings, but those who did would first brave narrow stairwells in the dark. From the kitchens wafted the scent of fish, cabbage, and onions. Yet neither smell nor taste was the dominant sensation of the tenements; it was sound. Because tenement units often doubled as living spaces and sweatshops, the buildings radiated with “the whir of a thousand sewing-machines,” Riis recounted, “worked at high pressure from earliest dawn, till mind and muscle give out together.”[20] More East Side Jews worked in the garment industry than in all other occupations combined.[21]

Today the term “sweatshop” generally denotes a factory—and indeed some East Siders did labor in garment factories—but most Jews in the “rag business” toiled in the cramped confines of the tenements. They took fabric cuts from manufacturers and turned them into whatever article of clothing they specialized in, perhaps trousers or coats.[22] The daily drudgery of work could stretch to eighteen hours in unfathomably tight quarters.[23] “It is not unusual to find a dozen persons—men, women, and children—at work in a single small room,” Riis detailed.[24] Close proximity and poor ventilation made the tenement stifling, especially amid the humidity of the summer.[25]

Overcrowding in the buildings meant that residents were forced to take turns sleeping. People commonly stole to the roofs for their evening slumber in the warmer months, hoping to escape the congestion, the heat, and the bedbugs in the apartments below. To offset living expenses, a family could further compress its limited space by taking in Jewish boarders. Some boarders were single, having made the trip to America solo, while others had wives and children back in the Old Country. Individual apartments lacked running water; at best, a building might have a communal faucet in the hallway. Tenement life was gloomy—literally. Most rooms were deprived of natural light, and the gas employed to illuminate them was used sparingly to reduce costs. Dim lighting made it all the easier for vermin to scurry undetected, especially if the rats took cover under the piles of fabric typically blanketing the sweatshop floors.[26]

The bleakest units in a given tenement were in the basement. Riis recalled meeting a trio of peddlers who shared a cellar apartment where “the feeblest ray of daylight never found its way.” Standing on their muddied floor, he held up his candlelight to find three “sallow faces look[ing] more like hideous ghosts than living men.”[27] For many tenement residents, the only hiatus from their crowded quarters was a half-hour’s leisure separating a long day from a short sleep. These buildings seemed to embody the muted despair of their inhabitants. In Riis’s elegiac words, “The thousands of lighted windows in the tenements glow like dull red eyes.”[28]

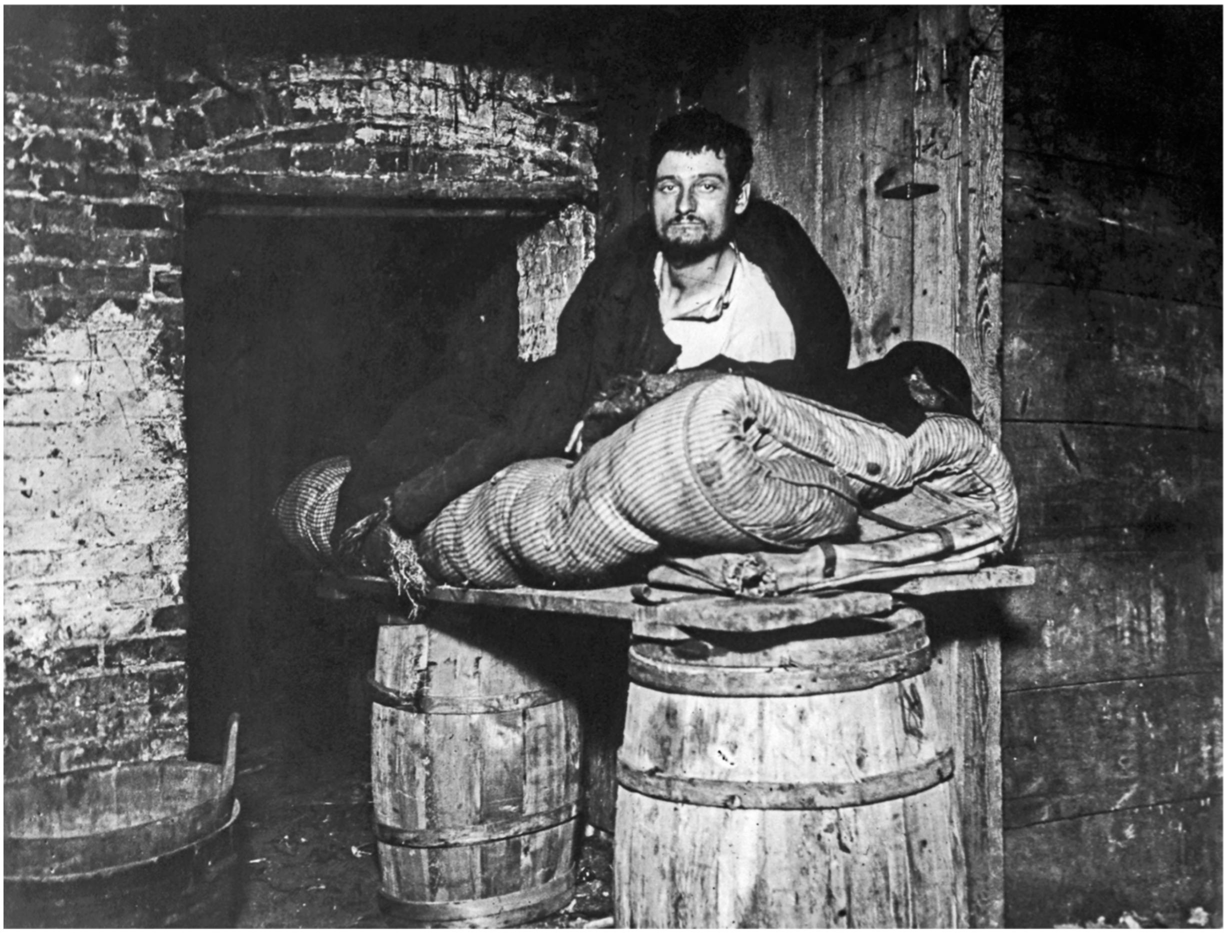

FIGURE 1.2. A peddler next to his bedroll in an East Side cellar on Ludlow Street. Credit: Jacob Riis. Source: Smithsonian American Art Museum, Museum purchase through the Luisita L. and Franz H. Denghausen Endowment.

Befouled conditions on the Lower East Side facilitated the spread of disease. Epidemics were tragically common.[29] New York health officials gruesomely dubbed one subsection of the East Side the “suicide ward” owing to rampant deaths from typhus. Exacerbating matters, many sick Jews avoided the hospitals for fear they would be butchered there—surely a residual trauma from the Old World where Jewish lives counted for little.[30]

Although some Jewish immigrants managed to secure an education stateside and join the learned professions, the great majority remained laborers.[31] Many did not have time to learn English, much less become doctors or lawyers in their new Anglophone homeland.[32] Their hopes thus rested with their children’s future. Jewish youths typically attended local public schools during the day and then, before supper, received some supplemental Jewish instruction in tenement schools.[33] The public schools were nearly as Jewish in composition as the religious ones; for every twenty pupils in an East Side public school, nineteen were Jews. Public schools emphasized American civics, U.S. history, and above all the English language. The availability of free schooling and the Jewish premium on education proved a powerful combination. Jewish families enjoyed remarkable upward mobility, with the children of immigrants achieving a degree of success that their parents rarely imagined for themselves. “America is a land of gold,” one mother told her son. “There is no gold in the streets. The gold is in your head.” And yet many other desperate families opted to use their children in sweatshops rather than send them to school; child labor mitigated today’s burdens, even as it minimized tomorrow’s opportunities.[34]

School hours aside, children were a ubiquitous sight on the East Side. An observer remarked, “The sidewalks swarm with children, and the air rings with their clamor, as they fly back and forth at play.”[35] The most scholastic among them could be found at the Chatham Square Library, waiting to check out books in a long line that often wound its way down two stories and spilled onto the street. Other youths found less educational ways of passing time, like putting an infant sibling in a basket and letting her float along the grungy waters that lined the gutters. Still other children might pet horses in the street, sharing lollipop licks with the grateful animals.[36]

A Yiddish newspaper described the Lower East Side as a "city within a city." But even that description glossed over its multiplicity of Jewish subcultures.[37] Russian, Hungarian, Romanian, and Galician Jews all had their own enclaves within the neighborhood. And those enclaves were divided even further, with a given synagogue designated for immigrants hailing from the same town in the Old Country.[38] "Hometown societies" sprang up that helped organize life for newcomers, who could fraternize with and lean on fellow Jews from their specific place of origin.[39]

If a brief stroll through the Lower East Side was a tour of Eastern Europe, then a marginally longer stroll just beyond "Jewtown" was a tour of the world. A few blocks in any given direction might mean broaching the Irish neighborhood with its tough-minded gangs, or Chinatown where a penny would fetch a sugarcane stick, or Little Italy, which felt indistinguishable from Naples.[40] These ethnic districts served as reminders that Jews weren't the only ones enduring hardscrabble lives in urban slums.

* * *

Despite the challenges facing Jewish immigrants, the New World still marked a meaningful improvement over the perilous conditions they had fled in Eastern Europe. On the eve of the great Jewish migration to America, which began in the 1880s, about half the world's Jews lived in a region known as the "Pale of Settlement" within the Russian Empire. "Pale" refers to a stake in the ground that denotes the boundaries of a territory. The Pale of Settlement extended well beyond modern Russian borders, including parts of present-day Ukraine, Poland, Lithuania, and Latvia, and all of Moldova and Belarus.[41] (This book uses the term "Russian Jews" broadly as a referent to all Jews within the Russian Empire.) Russian law required that Jews, with few exceptions, reside in the Pale.

After the assassination of Czar Alexander II in 1881, conditions for Russia's Jews worsened. They became scapegoated by the masses and the state alike for the czar's murder even though all four assassins were Gentiles. Between 1881 and 1882, over two hundred Jewish communities were subjected to pogroms that claimed Jewish lives and destroyed Jewish property. Extralegal violence was compounded by official action. The so-called May Laws imposed harsh constraints on Jews. Their right to settle in various locales grew limited, even within the Pale, as was their ability to travel between communities. Jewish artisans who had been granted exceptions to live outside the Pale suddenly found themselves obligated to relocate within it. Jews faced quotas in high schools, at universities, and amid the professions.[42]

As antisemitism in its sundry cultural and legal forms made life ever more intolerable, many Jews began to cast their eyes westward toward America. They thrilled to the prospect of religious liberty and economic opportunity in the United States. A reprieve from prejudice and poverty seemed to await them just across the Atlantic. And thanks to steamships, an overseas journey that had once spanned three months now only took a week or two.[43]

The Pale wasn't the only place in Europe prompting a Jewish exodus to America in the latter years of the nineteenth century. Many Jews left their homes in Romania and Austria-Hungary, with a smaller stream coming from Western European nations. Sephardic Jews from Greece and Turkey also found their way to the United States.[44] The diversity of Jewish immigrants notwithstanding, it was Ashkenazi Jews from the Pale of Settlement who would increasingly predominate in American Jewish life.[45]

Even as unprecedented legions of Jews depleted their meager savings on one-way tickets to the New World, more stayed in the Pale than left during the latter decades of the nineteenth century. Their reasons for remaining were partly financial. Pricey bribes were required to secure the necessary paperwork to leave Russia. And the trip itself was expensive, costing more than the typical Jew's yearly income. Devout Jews often preferred to suffer the indignities of life in the Pale rather than expose their sacred faith to the irreligious materialism that was supposedly corrupting the United States.[46] Ultimately, circumstances for Jews of the Pale would worsen so severely that even the reluctant among them took their chances on America in growing numbers.

For those who decided to cast their lot on the Lower East Side—and in similar Jewish enclaves in Chicago, Baltimore, Boston, and Philadelphia—

they found that the anxieties of the pious souls back home weren't wholly unfounded. The religious strictures of the Eastern European shtetl, or Jewish village, gave way to that most quintessential of American values: choice. Some Jewish immigrants flocked to socialism and its skepticism of religion. Others fell in with the anarchists, who flouted Yom Kippur by hosting dances. Individual Jews were free to engage with their heritage on their own terms, if at all. For most East Side Jews, that meant choosing to sustain the faith of their ancestors. They kept kosher and maintained Shabbat as natural extensions of their observant upbringings in the Old Country. New York was home to hundreds of synagogues that formed the backbone of communal life.[47] The ancient sanctity that infused the East Side was perhaps most evident in a shiva house, where the recently buried were grieved. "A visit to a Jewish house of mourning is like bridging the gap of two thousand years," Jacob Riis memorably wrote. "The inexpressibly sad and sorrowful wail for the dead … comes back from the ages like a mournful echo."[48]

Here, then, was America's largest Jewish neighborhood. Old World traditions and New World temptations, grinding poverty and novel opportunity, collective belonging and individual freedom, Yiddish and English, piety and vice—all condensed into a couple square miles of teeming humanity. Slum life on the East Side may have been rife with hazard, but it was also rich with hope. No quota limited the number of Jews who could join a given profession. No edict precluded Jewish children from attending school. No pogrom ransacked Jewish businesses or shed Jewish blood. Rather than relegated to second-class citizenship, an impoverished Jew could cast a ballot that tallied just the same as the wealthiest Gentile's. But the Lower East Side wasn't only the starting point for so many Jews grasping at the American Dream. Amid its swarming streets, in the summer of 1895, a young police commissioner began chasing a dream of his own.

* * *

Theodore Roosevelt's ascension to the head of the New York Police Department was of great consequence—for him and for the city alike. He had spent the better part of a decade in a substantive but obscure role as leader of the Civil Service Commission in Washington.[49] During those years, his hometown would have offered limited opportunities for a Republican such as himself. New York City was dominated by Tammany Hall, a Democratic organization that had perfected the art of machine politics. The Tammany bosses knew how to manufacture votes from impoverished immigrants but did not fundamentally improve their lives. Little was done by the machine to meaningfully address the perilous conditions in ethnic slums—the long hours, the unhygienic apartments, the scant municipal services. However, Tammany did welcome foreigners bewildered by their adopted homeland, furnishing them with some basic necessities like food and clothing. Tammany district captains surfaced at important events on their assigned turf; in the Jewish neighborhoods, that could mean attending a constituent's bar mitzvah, gift in hand. Some immigrants who displayed their loyalty and value to the machine might even get rewarded with a low-level post in municipal government. Come election day, Tammany reaped the benefits of these efforts.[50]

If Tammany was effective at engineering ethnic votes, it was also corrupt. The police department under Tammany rule was particularly unscrupulous. From furtive kickbacks to gratuitous violence, many officers exacerbated rather than mitigated the rampant crime prevailing in the city. The shortcomings of crooked governance became particularly pronounced amid the alarming economic conditions of 1894. New York City suffered from the same high unemployment and labor strikes that were plaguing the country at large. Voters were finally ready to loosen Tammany's grip on power.[51]

A wave election that year ushered reform-minded Republicans into office nationwide, including the mayor's office in New York.[52] And the thirty-six-year-old Theodore Roosevelt was just the kind of zealot that the new mayor needed to clean up the police department—and, in turn, the city itself. Roosevelt became police commissioner in May of 1895, serving as president of the four-member Police Board.[53] He embodied the ethos of the inchoate progressive movement that would redefine American politics for the next twenty years and give this period its name: the Progressive Era.

Although progressivism was not a monolith, its adherents tended to coalesce around some broadly shared goals. For one, they sought to uproot the spoils system that doled out government jobs to unqualified lackeys. Progressives wanted power entrusted to highly trained professionals whose management of public affairs was apolitical and efficient. Roosevelt had already stood at the forefront of demanding greater accountability from municipal government—as a young state legislator in 1884, he had chaired an investigatory committee that exposed widespread graft under the Tammany regime.[54] He would later laud the 1894 election as a triumph not for Republicans per se but for integrity in civic life. “The victory had been won, not on party lines,” he insisted, “but as a fight for decent government, and for the non-partisan administration of municipal affairs.”[55] In his new role as police commissioner, he could personally remake the force to better reflect his own premium on professionalism and probity.[56]

Progressives like Roosevelt didn’t merely aim to address corruption in civic life—they wanted to remake a society in the throes of an ever-accelerating industrial revolution. To be sure, a modern economy had brought a host of benefits, from technological wonders to affordable goods. But it also led to overpopulated cities whose immigrant workers spent interminable days in dangerous factories for pitiful wages. Progressives did not wish to dismantle industrial capitalism so much as attenuate its excesses through labor reforms.[57] “We must protect the crushable elements at the base of our present industrial structure,” Roosevelt once declared in a speech.[58]

Alongside their economic agenda, many progressives nurtured a strong moralistic ethic. The movement’s leaders hoped to eradicate behavior they deemed sinful—prostitution, drinking, and gambling. Theirs was a vision rooted in the Social Gospel, a mode of Protestantism that created a religious justification for reformers to impose, in top-down fashion, their own middle-class values on others, including recent immigrants. Social Gospel enthusiasts felt a benevolent obligation to help these newcomers and a paternalistic obligation to mold them.[59]

Roosevelt emerged from this action-oriented strain of American Christianity. In his boyhood, the family’s pastor was a renowned Social

Gospel clergyman.[60] Then, as a teenager, Roosevelt told a minister that he wanted to be a "doer," to operationalize his faith through deeds.[61] As he brought his moralizing instincts into his police duties, his admirers saw Roosevelt as a principled change agent. Yet others, even in his own party, grew concerned that his righteousness was making him problematically inflexible. Roosevelt insisted, for instance, on stringently enforcing a previously moribund blue law that empowered him to shut down saloons on Sundays; some Republican leaders feared a backlash by a hard-drinking electorate.[62]

The progressive movement had a complicated relationship with the political party system. In New York City at this time, where Democrats had long practiced machine politics, progressives unsurprisingly leaned Republican. But nationally the major parties found within their ranks both proponents and critics of progressivism. The progressives on both sides of the aisle would gain in strength over the course of Roosevelt's lifetime.

* * *

As Roosevelt waged his two-front war—reforming the police on the one hand, policing the city on the other—he was hardly content to remain behind a desk at his headquarters. TR took to the streets. Block by block, he barnstormed the city, giving speeches about his meritocratic approach to municipal affairs. Roosevelt became a fixture in "Jewtown" that summer, as East Side audiences squeezed into various venues to hear from the new police commissioner. His barrel-chested build gestured toward his physicality, his thick spectacles toward his intellectuality, and his dapper attire toward his gentility.[63]

Roosevelt proudly told the East Side crowds that an immigrant Jew who was poorly connected but richly talented would confront no obstacle to gainful employment in the police department. In one speech, he recounted weighing two candidates for a health inspector post, which fell under the police department's purview. One applicant had a profile that would have all but ensured his appointment under Tammany reign: born in America, educated at Columbia University, and backed by an alderman. He was the type of person readily recognized as a “good fellow,” Roosevelt explained. The other contender for the job was a Russian-Jewish immigrant who “certainly hadn’t an influential friend.” But that Jewish candidate impressed Roosevelt by having “worked his way by the hardest kind of study” to earn a position on the Tenement House Commission, which the state legislature had formed the year before to investigate those buildings’ bleak conditions. “Under the old system, that Russian Jew wouldn’t have had a show,” Roosevelt declared. “Nobody would have attempted to have appointed him under the system of practical politics; the man with social standing, the man who was a good fellow, who had the alderman back of him … should have gotten it as a matter of course.” Then came the punch line: “We appointed the Russian Jew.”[64]

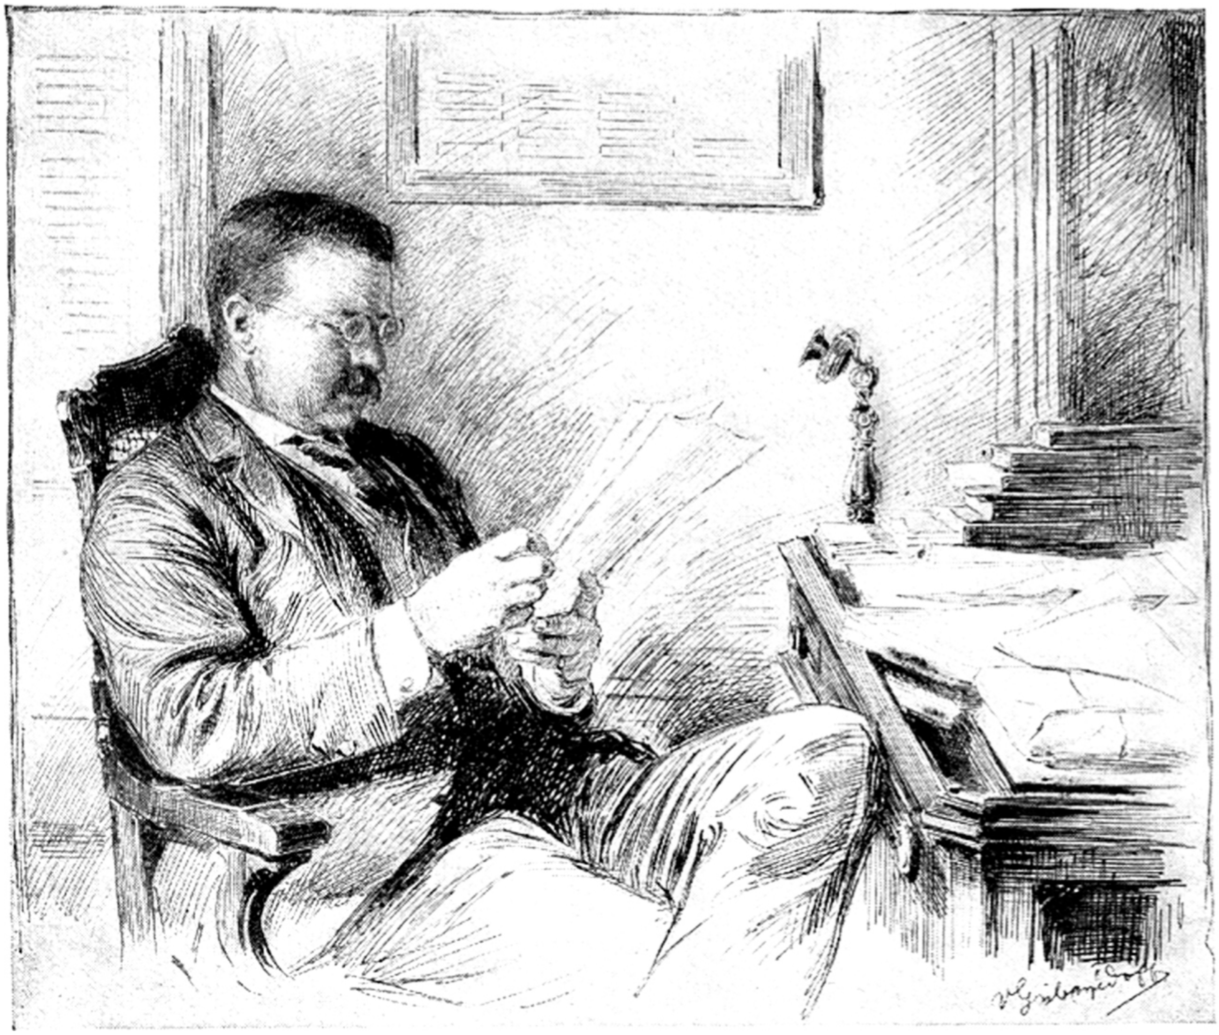

FIGURE 1.3. Theodore Roosevelt, circa 1895. Source: The Miriam and Ira D. Wallach Division of Art, Prints and Photographs: Print Collection, The New York Public Library.

TR relished the opportunity to carry his meritocratic message directly to these people. “The crowded East Side audiences of Second Avenue and Avenue ‘A’ greet me with an enthusiasm I never anticipated,” he marveled in a letter to his friend, U.S. Senator Henry Cabot Lodge. Roosevelt then hedged, “Of course there is much hostility shown too”—to be expected, given that this was conventionally Democratic terrain—“but the wonder is that I should have so strong a following among them.” The atmosphere at his speeches was boisterous. As Roosevelt elaborated, “I have spoken again and again in packed halls on the East Side during the summer with the temperature at [the] boiling point, both as regards the weather and the audience.” Sometimes a contrarian spectator would heckle Roosevelt, who would then invite the heckler to take the stage alongside him for a debate. At such moments, “I have never failed to carry the house with me at the end,” Roosevelt boasted to Lodge, observing, “It has been in some respects like a campaign.”[65]

In light of Democratic strength on the East Side, the police commissioner’s growing popularity there was striking indeed. Two Republican figures affiliated with the Excise Board—which granted and revoked liquor licenses—were overjoyed by Roosevelt’s inroads on the neighborhood: one was Joe Murray, the board’s Irish Catholic president; the other was Julius Mayer, the board’s Jewish lawyer.[66] As Roosevelt relayed to Lodge, “Joe Murray and the counsel of the Excise Board (a very honest little East Side Jew) are in ecstasies, and insist that my course is making a big gain for the Republican Party.”[67] TR may have felt compelled to stress the Jewish lawyer’s integrity given that Lodge had a dim view of Jewish immigrants and might have otherwise assumed the worst.[68] Roosevelt’s insistence on sober Sundays, which chafed many New Yorkers, wasn’t a liability with Jewish voters, as Jews tended to abstain from saloons.[69] “I cannot now recall ever having known a Jewish drunkard,” mused Jacob Riis.[70]

Elections for the New York state legislature were pending that November. Although Roosevelt was preaching nonpartisanship to these crowds, that very message was itself partisan—after all, Republicans had employed it to great effect against Tammany the prior fall. Roosevelt’s law-and-order commitment to shutting down saloons on Sundays also had a patina of neutrality that obscured a partisan bite: many saloons were de facto clubhouses for the Tammany faithful.[71] For the remainder of Roosevelt’s career in public life, lofty principles and electoral considerations would often bleed into one another.

TR was too shrewd a politician to be naïve about GOP prospects in New York City that November. After the prior year’s wave, in which Republicans vastly outperformed their typical showing, a regression to the city’s Democratic mean seemed all but inevitable. But Republicans still enjoyed an advantage among upstate voters, and Roosevelt held out hope that GOP victories there would ensure the statehouse stayed in Republican hands. “If we keep the legislature, even though Tammany gets the City, we shall have held our own,” he wrote Lodge.[72] On election day, the results accorded with Roosevelt’s clear-eyed expectations: Tammany candidates did well in New York City, but Republicans, thanks to upstate support, retained control of both legislative chambers in Albany.[73]

* * *

Roosevelt was proud of the Jewish representation on the New York Police Department. Writing in Munsey Magazine, he observed that “few people have any idea” of the “large number of Jewish policemen on the New York force.” Not all Jews, however, were fit for police work. Roosevelt thought that the majority of Jewish immigrants from Eastern Europe required more time in America to overcome the malnourishment of their Old World lives. As his Munsey article put it, “The great bulk of the Jewish population, especially the immigrants from Russia and Poland, are of weak physique and have not yet gotten far enough away from their centuries of oppression and degradation to make good policemen.” But there were still Jews aplenty whose physical prowess made them ideal candidates. “The outdoor Jew who has been a gripman, or the driver of an express-wagon, or a guard on the Elevated [train], or the indoor Jew of fine bodily powers who has taken to boxing, wrestling and the like, offers excellent material for the force,” Roosevelt assured readers.[74]

His article detailed that many Jews on the force were promoted for “conspicuous gallantry.” Roosevelt stressed that Jews who ascended the career ladder did so purely on the basis of merit. “I should positively refuse to ‘recognize’ any creed, or any nationality, or anything else except fitness,” he insisted. “If there were ten promotions, and the best ten candidates were Jews, they would secure all the prizes, but if they were not the best, then none of them would be promoted.”[75] That he articulated similar sentiments in private correspondence suggests the sincerity of his views here.[76] If Roosevelt championed merit in hiring and promotion, he also wanted diversity. Years later, in his autobiography, he celebrated that “the New York police force is a body thoroughly representative of the great city itself."[77] Merit and diversity would uneasily coexist as competing ideals throughout Roosevelt's political career.[78]

For New York's Jewish newcomers, the sight of a fellow Jew sporting a police uniform was a stirring symbol of American possibility.[79] Policemen back in Russia enforced discriminatory laws against Jews, and during the outbreak of pogroms, they had passively watched as mobs mercilessly beat Jewish victims.[80] Given that grisly context, Jewish membership in the New York Police Department threw into high relief the differences between Old World hazards and New World hopes.

The archetype of the Jewish policeman challenged not only Jewish assumptions that police were crooked but also Gentile assumptions that Jews were anemic. An American health official writing in Popular Science Monthly reflected boilerplate attitudes about Jews in this respect. "In physique they rank below all other immigrants, and few seem capable of hard physical labor," he reported. "They seem to have no muscular development, and are prematurely old at an age when a German or a Scandinavian is still in his prime." Similarly, a retired Harvard professor sneered, "The Jew's weak point is always physical cowardice." In the face of such antisemitic stereotyping, many Jews sought to prove their manhood. Increasing numbers of Jewish men flocked to boxing gyms. And some became policemen on Roosevelt's force. In so doing, they proved that Jews were more than enfeebled survivors of the shtetl. They could become commanding figures, defenders of the people and the law.[81]

Roosevelt may have nursed a particular affinity for his Jewish officers because he had traveled a similar path from frailty to fortitude. In childhood, Roosevelt suffered from a litany of medical issues. His lungs labored under the strain of asthma, his stomach endured the discomforts of nausea, and his bowels were afflicted with nervous diarrhea. "I feel badly," the young Roosevelt once told his mother. "I have a toothache in my stomach." His father instilled in him a conviction that overcoming ailments was a matter of sheer grit, advising his ailing son, "Theodore, you have the mind but you have not the body.… You must make your body." Roosevelt developed an obsession with masculine physicality, exercising diligently in the home gym that his father had installed. In the fullness of time, Roosevelt came to master his maladies. He emerged as a decent boxer in his Harvard days, mirroring the Jewish proclivity for pugilism.[82] And in his twenties, Roosevelt roughed it as a rancher in Badlands of the Dakota Territory.[83] He carried this premium on rugged machismo into his role as police commissioner, valuing Jews and Gentiles on his force who shared his ethic of manly courage.

When Roosevelt proudly recalled the vitality of his Jewish policemen, he did so with notable reference to Jewish antiquity. Roosevelt wanted his "officers of Jewish extraction" to embody "the Maccabee type" who showed "nerve and hardihood."[84] Here, he was alluding to the ancient Jewish warriors known as the Maccabees, famous for revolting against Greek persecution and establishing Jewish control of Judea. His interest in Maccabee lore likely stemmed from personal experience. As an adolescent in 1873, Roosevelt sailed with his family to the Holy Land and alighted from their ship in Jaffa, an important site in the Maccabean rebellion. The Books of the Maccabees related how upwards of two hundred Jews were deliberately drowned in Jaffa, prompting the Maccabees to avenge those deaths by setting fire to Jaffa's harbor.[85] Roosevelt almost certainly learned something of this history during his visit.

His description of Jewish policemen as Maccabees also gestures toward a pluralistic strand in his thinking. Roosevelt rejected the commonplace notion that Jewishness and weakness were of a piece. Instead, Jews could live up to his masculine ideal by honoring, rather than effacing, their Jewish heritage. Reflecting on his time as police commissioner, he remarked in a private letter that the Jewish cultivation of Maccabean instincts would serve to blunt antisemitism by showcasing that Jews could be brawny and not just brainy. "I made up my mind it would be a particularly good thing for men of the Jewish race to develop that side of them which I might call the Maccabee or fighting Jewish type," Roosevelt shared. Gentiles would then see that Jews were not only "successful and thrifty businessmen and high-minded philanthropists, but also able to do their part in the rough manly work, which is no less necessary." In so doing, Jews could "put a stop to the unreasoning prejudice against them."[86] TR wasn't denigrating intellectual achievement but valorizing physical mettle as a complementary value. Roosevelt himself combined the cerebral and corporeal in his daily life—even as he did the gritty work of policing New York, he somehow managed to finish writing his multivolume historical study of the American West that he had begun years earlier.[87]

Of all the Maccabee types on the police force, one always stood out in Roosevelt's eyes: Otto Raphael. He was, in Roosevelt's words, a "genuine East Sider."[88] The Raphael family had emigrated from Russia and opened a struggling meat market on Allen Street, where Otto Raphael helped out. He was roused one evening in 1895 by the scent of smoke when a nearby tenement became engulfed in flames. Raphael knew firsthand how dangerous the tenements could be, even under the best of conditions; his mother had died a few years earlier when she tripped into a cellar apartment. On the fateful night of the fire, Raphael—in his mid-twenties and full of vigor—ran into the burning building multiple times to rescue people trapped inside.[89] His bravery was all the more noteworthy given that fires in overcrowded tenements could be extremely lethal. As Jacob Riis recounted in macabre terms, "A fire-panic at night in a tenement … is a horror that has few parallels in human experience."[90]

Later that year, Raphael attended a talk by Roosevelt at a YMCA downtown. The philanthropist who had invited Roosevelt to speak insisted that TR meet the local hero who had saved numerous lives from an inferno. Roosevelt sized up Raphael as "a powerful fellow, with [a] good-humored intelligent face." The new police commissioner encouraged Raphael to take the police exam and try to earn a spot on the force.[91] Raphael made the cut, reportedly ranking tenth out of 380 applicants for mental aptitude and first for physical ability.[92] Joining the police was a source of great pride for Raphael—and of great practicality. His salary enabled him to educate his younger siblings and to send for other family members who had been left behind in Russia.[93]

As it turned out, Raphael had a skill set of keen interest to Roosevelt. The Jewish policeman had some amateur boxing titles to his name and became Roosevelt's sparring partner. Their friendship, cultivated in the ring, would last a lifetime. Roosevelt came to know Raphael's entire family, and after TR’s rise to the presidency, Raphael would visit him at the White House.[94] Later, Roosevelt made a point of writing affectionately about Raphael in his autobiography. For all the differences between them, Roosevelt emphasized the similarities: “He and I were both ‘straight New York’ to use the vernacular of our native city.”[95]

* * *

Roosevelt brought to the police department a reformer’s ardor, and in so doing he found common cause with many of the progressive pioneers who were engaged in humanitarian work on the East Side. Some were Jews; others were Gentiles. Most notable among the latter was Jacob Riis himself. The Danish immigrant’s pathbreaking book How the Other Half Lives had stirred the national conscience with its searing depictions of life in “Jewtown” and other New York slums. Riis thereby helped catalyze an era of journalistic “muckraking” (a term that Roosevelt popularized). This mode of exposé reportage offered advocacy as much as description, and its practitioners were highly comfortable forging alliances with likeminded politicians.[96]

Just after the 1890 debut of How the Other Half Lives, Roosevelt was so struck on turning its pages that he headed over to Riis’s office at the Evening Sun newspaper to find the author. But Riis was absent, prompting Roosevelt to leave his calling card with a succinct message scribbled on the back: “I have read your book and I have come to help.”[97] Roosevelt would finally make good on that promise five years later when he took over the police department. Riis became the new commissioner’s personal tour guide of the city, giving Roosevelt a firsthand introduction to the onerous conditions plaguing New York’s immigrant enclaves—including the Lower East Side.[98]

That a native New Yorker like Roosevelt needed an outsider to show him his own city suggests much about the class divide in contemporary New York.[99] Roosevelt’s rarefied upbringing in the genteel neighborhood of Gramercy Park made him a stranger to the dismal poverty mere blocks away. “It is a fairy-land of contrasts,” one observer remarked of New York

City. “One moment you are tumbled through streets full of ruts and holes; the next … you dine off gold plates and drink out of crystal vessels.”[100] Roosevelt knew more of the gold than the ruts, but he was eager to learn from Riis about the indigent New Yorkers whose health and safety were now his responsibility.[101]

FIGURE 1.4. Jacob Riis. Credit: Frances Benjamin Johnston. Source: Library of Congress, Prints and Photographs Division.

TR grew acquainted with leaders of the settlement house movement who were then training their energies on the Lower East Side. Settlement houses were iconic Progressive Era institutions, to be found in several American cities, which helped immigrants adapt to their new environment and ascend out of poverty. The term "settlement" derived from the practice of reformers personally settling in the neighborhoods they served. One such settlement on the East Side was the Educational Alliance—nicknamed the "Palace of Immigrants"—which offered classes thirteen hours a day. Instruction ranged from etiquette to English. For newcomers still limited to their mother tongue, Yiddish copies of the Declaration of Independence were made available. The Educational Alliance also sponsored performances and lectures. Literary luminaries from the novelist Mark Twain to the playwright Sholem Aleichem presented there.[102]

Among Roosevelt's closest collaborators in the settlement house movement was Lillian Wald, the twenty-eight-year-old founder of the Henry Street Settlement on the East Side. She was the daughter of an affluent German-Jewish family in Cincinnati who had opted out of her life of privilege to take up nursing in New York City.[103] At Wald's behest, Roosevelt became an honorary inductee to her settlement's American Hero Club, dedicated to the study of great figures from U.S. history. He must have been the only mustachioed member of the group; the other participants were local boys no older than twelve.[104] The club was precisely the kind of endeavor that appealed to Roosevelt, whose general approach toward immigrants was to extend a hand while also expecting them to become patriotic Americans.

Roosevelt's involvement with Wald and her settlement, which would become a lifelong connection for him, speaks to the complexity of his professional attitude toward women. On the one hand, he subscribed to a highly conventional view of gender roles. His ethic of roughhewn masculinity rested on a patriarchal worldview that would have women relegated to the domestic sphere.[105] "The greatest thing for any woman is to be a good wife and mother," he once told a female writer.[106] And yet

Roosevelt increasingly developed warm working relationships with women who were active outside the home—journalists, novelists, and reformers. As one historian has astutely observed, “It is ironic that the sort of woman most deplored by Roosevelt became his natural political ally.”[107] A number of these women, like Wald, were Jewish.[108]

Her settlement house was bankrolled by Jacob Schiff, a successful financier and philanthropist of Jewish faith. If the East Siders who relied on Wald’s services represented one segment of New York Jewry (“downtown Jews”), her benefactor personified the other (“uptown Jews”). Uptown Jews luxuriated in expensive townhouses on fashionable streets; downtown Jews crowded into East Side tenements. Uptown Jews originated from Central Europe, often Germany; downtown Jews came from Eastern Europe, typically Russia. Uptown Jews practiced Reform Judaism; downtown Jews gravitated toward Orthodoxy. Uptown Jews had migrated to America in the middle decades of the nineteenth century; downtown Jews were fresh arrivals. Uptown Jews were Americanized; downtown Jews were still learning the ways of their adopted homeland. Uptown Jews met with success in banking and law; downtown Jews subsisted in sweatshops and hawked goods from pushcarts. Of course, exceptions abounded to the neat divisions enumerated above.[109] But the general patterns distinguishing uptown and downtown Jews were real—and could be found in other American cities that likewise had a divide between established Jews and their not-yet-assimilated coreligionists.[110]

Uptown Jews wanted to help their downtown counterparts who had fled dire circumstances abroad and who were now enduring the indignities of tenement life. After all, many established Jews weren’t far removed from their own impecunious beginnings in America. They too had hustled on the Lower East Side before moving upward—in social standing and in street number. Their considerable philanthropy subsidized schools, hospitals, and settlement houses for recent Jewish immigrants. But these wealthier Jews had mixed motives for funneling their resources downtown. They feared their own stature in society might be imperiled if their coreligionists from Eastern Europe failed to better their station and quickly Americanize. As a German-born rabbi on the Upper East Side fretted, “Will the Russian or Romanian Jew—now an object of pity owing to his defective education, his lack of culture, his pauperism, his utter helplessness—drag American Judaism down from the honorable position it has attained?" The townhouse Jew and the tenement Jew shared a common faith; they were destined to also share a common reputation in Gentile eyes.[111]

Prior to Roosevelt's tenure in the police department, his exposure to Jews had been of the uptown variety, as might be expected of a patrician Gentile. Among his college friends was a Jewish boy who hailed from a wealthy family and had studied at a prestigious academy on the Upper West Side before attending Harvard with TR.[112] When Roosevelt launched his political career as a state legislator in the early 1880s, he affiliated with elite Jews in New York City's Republican circles.[113] He even appeared at an uptown Purim party in 1883.[114] But now, as police commissioner, Roosevelt was gaining his first sustained exposure to Eastern European Jewry. His entrée into their world was sufficiently well received that he became a distinguished guest at Jewish weddings, often bestowed the honor of escorting the bride or her mother to the banquet following the ceremony.[115]

TR cultivated ties to Protestant reformers who were teaming with the likes of Lillian Wald to ameliorate the dire conditions of the Lower East Side. At a supper that Wald hosted at the Henry Street Settlement, for instance, Roosevelt dined with William Dean Howells, a literary giant of the age.[116] Howells soon thereafter published an essay about the neighborhood called "An East-Side Ramble," prompting an enthusiastic response from Roosevelt. "That was a very remarkable study of the life of the East Side Jew; I enjoyed it much," the police commissioner wrote, inviting Howells to a meal at his home.[117] Roosevelt also prevailed upon the Protestant matron of the illustrious Van Rensselaer family to provide funds for a girls' library on the Lower East Side.[118] TR came to know yet another Protestant reformer named James Bronson Reynolds, who ran an East Side settlement house.[119] Reynolds made the mistake of permitting Christian missionaries to try proselytizing the Jews who frequented his settlement. These conversion attempts ceased after the intervention of Jacob Schiff, who was helping underwrite not just Wald's operation but Reynolds's as well.[120]

Roosevelt also regularly showed up at a public school on Houston Street whose students—or "scholars" as TR called them—were largely Jewish. He was "immensely interested" in the school, which was a vital means of upward mobility for the children of Jewish immigrants.[121] Education was a battleground for church-state relations, and Roosevelt thought it vital to separate the two. For him, that meant keeping public schools nonsectarian and withholding state funds from religious schools. Roosevelt would later explain that although he was personally comfortable with Bible recitations in public schools, wherever "Jews may object to its being read" he would "openly stand against reading the Bible."[122] As Roosevelt saw firsthand on the East Side, public school classrooms full of Jews were often led by Christian teachers, and he was sensitive to the delicacy of that dynamic.

* * *

Many Gentiles may have joined Roosevelt in building bridges to the Jewish community, but others chafed at the idea. A significant faction of the patrician class—typically native-born Americans who were abundant in resources and Northern European in descent—found Jews unacceptable. In New York City and elsewhere, reactionary elites grew alarmed at the newfound prominence of uptown Jews. Old Money gentry were generally fearful of becoming displaced by the New Money crowd born of industrial capitalism. Uptown Jews, successfully riding the wave of a modern economy, seemed to exemplify this threat.[123] Anxieties about a Jewish takeover were, of course, wildly overblown; the silk-stocking Anglo-Saxons still enjoyed outsized control of American society.

Henry Adams epitomized elite paranoia about Jewish domination. He was a scion of the Adams presidential dynasty and perhaps the most virulent antisemite of the upper classes. "We are in the hands of the Jews," Adams lamented to a British politician. "They can do what they please with our values."[124] Despite Adams's immensely privileged life, he nevertheless insisted to a senator's wife, "In a society of Jews and brokers, a world made up of maniacs wild for gold, I have no place."[125] The likes of Adams helped ensure that well-heeled Jews were often blackballed from institutions—private schools, social clubs, summer resorts—that were de rigueur for blue-blooded Gentiles.[126] Roosevelt befriended Adams and his ilk, but TR himself wasn't complicit in excluding Jews. In fact, as a twenty-something beginning his involvement in New York politics, Roosevelt threatened to terminate his membership in a Republican club after some participants sought to refuse a Jewish applicant. Roosevelt's defiant stand against antisemitism resulted in that applicant's admission.[127]

A prominent Reform rabbi in New York voiced exasperation that the Jew who did assimilate was regarded as menacing but the Jew who did not was derided as clannish: "How singular that, when the Jews attempts to … mix freely with his neighbors, he is repelled and unceremoniously shown back to his own tribe; and if he keeps there, he is accused of hereditary and ancestral pride."[128] Such was the illogic of Jew hatred.

The antisemites of "polite society" were distressed not only by the Jewish nouveau riche.[129] Highborn hate was also directed at the impoverished Jewish immigrants then flooding American ports. Henry Adams shuddered at the "Polish Jew fresh from Warsaw or Kraków … a furtive Yacoob or Ysaac still reeking of the Ghetto, snarling a weird Yiddish to the officers of the customs."[130] Arguably the most institutionalized expression of genteel antisemitism was the Immigration Restriction League, founded in the mid-1890s by three young Harvard grads of Anglo-Saxon descent. They hoped to suppress the influx of Jews as well as other "undesirables" from Southern and Eastern Europe. "Shall we permit these inferior races to dilute the thrifty, capable Yankee blood?" asked one of the league's founders in the Boston Herald.[131]

The gentry wasn't the only social class in America giving vent to Judeophobia. Farmers in the heartland could not grasp the complex interplay of global forces that were increasing their costs and reducing their profits. Instead, they gravitated toward the simplicity of a scapegoat: the Jew. Rural populists saw Jews as shifty financiers who didn't produce goods of value but merely served as middle men, transferring funds and taking an unjust cut.[132] Many hapless agrarians were sure their misery came at the hands of Jewish bankers in coastal cities.[133] Disaffected farmers banded together to form a third party, the Populist Party, in the 1890s.

During the party's national gathering in 1896, the Associated Press reported, "One of the striking things about the Populist convention … is the extraordinary hatred of the Jewish race. It is not possible to go into any hotel in the city without hearing the most bitter denunciation of the Jewish race as a class and of particular Jews who happen to have prospered in the world."[134] Although these bigoted soil tillers shared little in common with the moneyed patricians of the East Coast, both groups reacted to the disorientation of modernity by lashing out at Jews.[135]

Yet another demographic contributed to the age's antisemitism: urban immigrants. In several American cities, other ethnic enclaves—Irish, Italian, Polish—abutted Jewish neighborhoods. Close proximity amid dire living conditions didn't always make for warm relations between immigrant groups. Jewish peddlers were subjected to jeering, stone-throwing, and beard-pulling. At worst, street gangs beat up innocent Jews for sport. Police assistance was no guarantee in many municipalities, and so Jews took to forming their own protective associations.[136]

Even as American antisemitism was a reaction to recent developments—from industrial capitalism to global migration—it was also grounded in older prejudices. The trope of the dishonest Jewish swindler, which applied as readily to the pushcart peddler as to the Wall Street banker, had deep roots in world history. For centuries, diasporic Jews had been bereft of their own homeland. They resided in various societies as outsiders whose opportunities to earn a livelihood were often legally limited to trade and finance. Even as Jews were shunted into particular fields of commerce, they were resented for their prominence in those very fields. This paradox of prejudice endured into Roosevelt's era. The age of industrial capitalism placed a rising premium on the commercial expertise that Jews had long cultivated. In other words, Jews were well positioned to navigate a modern economy precisely because of their fraught history. Their success predictably gave fresh life to timeworn stereotypes about deceitful Hebrews.[137]

Christian teachings inflected American antisemitism as well. The Jews, after all, were culpable for Jesus's death—at least according to some interpretations of the New Testament. Many Christians were bound to feel hostility toward a people who were allegedly responsible for deicide.[138] The Christian basis for antisemitism was hardly lost on American Jews of Roosevelt's day. The Jewish Messenger, a New York–based paper, suggested that "the religious training of the Christian" was the principal factor in "the persistency of popular prejudice against the Jew." The paper elaborated, "As most Christians have capacity to understand only the material elements in the crucifixion, they take a grim religious pleasure—a sense of duty done—in crucifying the Jew."[139] For some Christians, the New Testament also seemed to provide a Biblical basis for stereotypes about Jewish avarice, as Jesus angrily confronted Jews who were desecrating the Temple by using it as a forum for money changing.[140]

It is unsurprising, then, that many of the era's most strident Jew-baiters were Christian clergymen. A reverend in Baltimore preached from the pulpit that the Jew is "merciless, tricky, vengeful—a veritable Shylock who loses every sentiment of humanity in his greed. Of all the creatures who have befouled the earth, the Jew is the slimiest."[141] Christianity, however, was not monolithic; mainstream clergy in America eschewed antisemitism.[142] Indeed, many of the nation's most outspoken critics of Jew-hatred were men of the cloth. But to the extent that Judeophobia did have purchase on American life, the blame lay with ancient prejudices as much as modern conditions.

* * *

Theodore Roosevelt had a conspicuous confrontation with antisemitism during Hanukkah in his first year as police commissioner. A vicious Jew-hater from Germany, Hermann Ahlwardt, was planning a trip to New York City to spread his invidious message. He was cartoonishly villainous. In the late 1880s, Ahlwardt was sacked as a school headmaster after the revelation that he had stolen funds designated for the children's Christmas party. The disgraced Ahlwardt sought public redemption through antisemitism, publishing bigoted screeds at a prolific rate. It then surfaced that he had forged documents to promote his anti-Jewish conspiracy theories, and Ahlwardt was consequently sentenced to prison. His four months behind bars did little to dampen his ardor for hate-mongering. Upon his release, Ahlwardt won a seat in the German parliament by persuading farmers in a rural district that Jews had secretly orchestrated the global downturn in crop prices. His election afforded him legal immunity from prosecution for peddling falsehoods.[143]

When Ahlwardt set his sights on an American speaking tour—including a planned lecture on the Lower East Side—anxious Jews approached Commissioner Roosevelt. They asked TR to bar Ahlwardt from speaking or at least to deny him police protection. But Roosevelt could not grant their request without violating the principle of free speech. And even absent that constitutional right, he believed that government censorship would only serve to turn Ahlwardt into a martyr. Roosevelt would later recall feeling that "the proper thing to do was to make him ridiculous." To that end, TR devised an exceedingly clever scheme: he would provide Ahlwardt a police detail comprised entirely of Jewish officers.[144]

Roosevelt summoned a subordinate on his force and instructed him, "I wish a list made of thirty good, trusty, intelligent men, all Jews." It was crucial to Roosevelt that these officers look unmistakably Jewish. As he told the subordinate, "Don't bother yourself to hunt up their religious antecedents; take those who have the most pronounced Hebrew physiognomy—the stronger their ancestral marking, the better." The Jewish policemen selected for duty were brought to the commissioner for inspection. With his blue eyes and golden glasses, Roosevelt surveyed the assemblage. One of his associates later marveled, "A more Hebraic group of Hebrews probably never were gathered in one small room."[145]

Roosevelt informed these officers of the unusual and vital duty ahead of them. "Now, I am going to assign you men to the most honorable service you have ever done—the protection of an enemy and the defense of religious liberty and free speech in the chief city of the United States," he announced. "You all know who and what Dr. Ahlwardt is. I am going to put you in charge of the hall where he lectures, and hold you responsible for perfect good order there throughout the evening." Roosevelt explained that their safeguarding Ahlwardt did not, of course, proceed from any affinity they had for his views. Rather, they would be defending the very constitutional liberties that American Jews held dear. In Roosevelt's words, "I have no more sympathy with Jew-baiting than you have. But this is a country where your people are free to think and speak and act as they choose in religious matters, as long as you do not interfere with the peace and comfort of your neighbors, and Dr. Ahlwardt is entitled to the same privilege." He added, "It should be your pride to see that he is protected.… That will be the finest way of showing your appreciation of the liberty you yourselves enjoy under the American flag."[146]

On the second night of Hanukkah, around 150 people gathered at Cooper Union—an iconic venue on the Lower East Side—to hear Ahlwardt's much-anticipated speech. The press estimated that fully a third of the spectators were policemen and detectives, another third were Jews who had come in protest, and the last third consisted of Gentiles of varying nationalities who were presumably amenable to the speaker's agenda. Ahlwardt took the stage at eight that evening, met by a mix of scattered applause and shouts of disapproval. His remarks inevitably veered into antisemitism, and the Jewish civilians in the crowd taunted him in turn with "a perfect Niagara of hisses and cries," the New York Times reported. Despite the heckling, the galling grin plastered on Ahlwardt's face remained unbroken. The night's greatest drama unfolded when Ahlwardt denounced the Jews for their "odious peculiarities," prompting an East Sider named Louis Silverman to cock his arm, egg in hand. "A nice white egg performed a graceful parabola through the air in the direction of Herr Ahlwardt's smiling face," the Times recounted. "He danced aside, with a degree of agility not indicated by his [portly] form, and the egg smashed and spluttered on the chair behind him." Two more eggs were launched before officers seized Silverman and dragged him to the nearby police station on Fifth Street.[147]

The episode would become part of Roosevelt's lore with the Jewish community. With great pride he routinely recalled how "Ahlwardt delivered his violent harangues against the men of Hebrew faith, owing his safety to the fact that he was scrupulously protected by men of the very race which he was denouncing."[148] Roosevelt understood that the sight of Jewish policemen selflessly guarding the German Jew-hater did far more to undermine Ahlwardt’s repugnant ideas than preemptive censorship ever could have. Reflecting on the incident years later in his autobiography, Roosevelt remarked, “It was an object-lesson to our people, whose greatest need it is to learn that there must be no division by class hatred, whether … of creed against creed, nationality against nationality, section against section.”[149] This was merely the first of Roosevelt’s confrontations with European antisemitism.

* * *

Notwithstanding TR’s adroit handling of the Ahlwardt affair, Roosevelt himself sometimes traded in antisemitic tropes during these years. One such instance transpired in the wake of the 1896 presidential election, which saw Republican William McKinley wrest the White House from Democratic hands. The victory was doubly sweet for Jews working in New York’s financial industry. For one, the incoming Republican president aligned with their preference for keeping the U.S. dollar on the gold standard. And the GOP win also marked a triumph over religious prejudice against Jews, given that the antisemitic Populist Party had opted to back the Democratic nominee.[150]

“The victorious Republican leaders have taken to feasting themselves,” Roosevelt told his older sister, Bamie. He explained that he had attended a number of these opulent celebrations. “One was a huge lunch by the Seligmans”—one of the nation’s most prominent Jewish families who enjoyed warm relations with Roosevelt—“where at least half the guests were Jew bankers.” Referring to Henry Adams’s brother Brooks (who shared Henry’s antisemitism), Roosevelt joked, “I felt as if I was personally realizing all of Brooks Adams’s gloomiest anticipations of our gold-ridden, capitalist-bestridden, usurer-mastered future.”[151] TR was partly mocking Brooks Adams’s paranoia but partly reinforcing tropes about the Jewish overlords of world finance.

That checkered statement aside, one of Roosevelt’s private remarks from his police days stands out for the unalloyed nature of its prejudice. After a prominent Jewish Republican—fearful that the police commissioner’s crusade against drinking would backfire at the polls—tried to marginalize Roosevelt politically, TR derided him as a "graceless sheeny" in a letter to Senator Lodge. "Sheeny" is an epithet for a Jew.[152] The slur was so offensive that when Lodge produced a published edition of their correspondence, the senator bowdlerized TR's letter so that it read "graceless person."[153]

* * *

The incoming McKinley regime meant new opportunities for Republicans on the make, Roosevelt among them. He was favored with a plum post: Assistant Secretary of the Navy. Roosevelt's interest in the Navy dated back to his Harvard days, when he first began writing a book entitled The Naval War of 1812.[154] It elicited favorable reviews upon publication in 1882; historians today still regard it as a classic in the field.[155] With this new appointment in the McKinley administration, Roosevelt would transition from chronicler of naval affairs to practitioner of them. And he took advantage of his naval office to help push America into a war in the Caribbean—one with important consequences for his relationship with Jewry.[156]

Cuban rebels were then engaged in a lethal struggle for independence against the island's European colonizer, Spain. The Spanish had subjected Cuba to autocratic rule and extracted wealth from the island for their own benefit for years. Like most Americans, Roosevelt's sympathies lay with the guerilla fighters. The United States, after all, had once been an emergent nation in the Western Hemisphere that freed itself from a European monarchy. The Cuban rebels also benefited from a successful propaganda campaign in America—they even opened a public relations office in New York—as stateside newspapers dutifully whipped up support for the Cuban independence movement. While Spain's human rights abuses against Cuban civilians during the conflict were very real, American journalists glibly exaggerated the depths of Cuban suffering.[157]

Roosevelt fervently wanted U.S. forces to help the rebels break their stalemate against the Spanish troops. He believed that military intervention in Cuba would allow the United States to project its own power in the hemisphere and thereby deter other European powers from entertaining designs on America's backyard.[158] But Roosevelt's eagerness for conflict with Spain wasn't just about his vision for an expanding sphere of American influence. He and other pro-war "jingoes" saw the battlefield as the ultimate arena for manly courage.[159] American men could find in the crucible of war an antidote to the crass consumerism that was seen as eroding national morality.[160] Roosevelt in particular had contempt for a certain kind of "effeminate" man who was "over-civilized, over-sensitive, [and] over-refined."[161] With war against Spain possibly on the horizon, he was desperate to personally serve on the front lines.

The Cuban rebels had first launched their military campaign in 1895, stirring hopes in the newly minted police commissioner that America would join the cause. Roosevelt told the New York governor that he would like to serve as a captain if the state raised a volunteer regiment. But no such regiment materialized as the United States remained on the sidelines.[162] Two years later, with Roosevelt now in the Navy and still hoping for American intervention, he conveyed to President McKinley that he would want to engage in combat in the event of war against Spain. Perhaps Roosevelt's lust for battle was rooted in a sense of shame about his father's decision to hire a substitute to fight in his place during the Civil War. Or maybe Roosevelt had a death wish, a romantic yearning to perish with honor on the field of battle.[163] By his own telling, Roosevelt felt that he would be guilty of hypocrisy should he fail to wield a weapon in wartime after spouting "jingo doctrines." He was referring here not just to his bellicose rhetoric about Spain specifically but his longstanding tendency to praise the virtues of military service generally.[164] From his perch at the Navy, Roosevelt tried to cajole McKinley into war, but the president was resistant.[165] McKinley knew too intimately the horrors of war—he had served as a private in the Union Army—and he did not wish to see "the dead piled up" once more.[166]

Roosevelt sent a strikingly candid letter to a Navy captain in the fall of 1897 accusing French-Jewish financiers of profiting off Spain's counterinsurgency against the Cuban rebels. "The Jew moneylenders in Paris, plus one or two big commercial companies in Spain, are trying to keep up the war," he alleged.[167] In reality, Roosevelt had it backwards. French investors—Jew and Gentile alike—actually wanted the conflict to end. Precisely because numerous French citizens and banks owned Spanish bonds, they didn't want to see Spain bankrupt itself in a costly struggle against the Cubans.[168] It is telling that Roosevelt felt compelled to identify the French investors as "Jew moneylenders" and to erroneously assume the worst of them; plainly, he was susceptible to defamatory tropes about Jews in finance, even as he himself cultivated warm relationships with Jewish bankers in America.

* * *

Events soon conspired to hasten the declaration of war that Roosevelt had long craved. First, in early February 1898, rebels intercepted and leaked to the press a private letter in which the Spanish ambassador in Washington ridiculed McKinley as feckless. Americans deemed the letter an outrage to national honor.[169] And then, just six days later, came a seismic development: the U.S.S. Maine, which had dropped anchor in Havana's harbor, suddenly exploded. The blast was so violent that it could be felt throughout the Cuban capital. While some on board the Maine died instantly in the blast, most either drowned or burned alive. Around 260 souls lost their lives in all.[170]

Naturally, an American public already primed for war presumed that Spain was culpable for the disaster.[171] The Spanish disclaimed any responsibility.[172] A few lone voices at the time suggested that the explosion was likely the result of an accidental fire, a view that would gain some traction among later generations of experts.[173] Whatever the truth, the American press seized on the Maine tragedy to rally the people behind military action in Cuba. "Remember the Maine, to Hell with Spain" became a ubiquitous slogan.[174] McKinley still wanted to find a peaceful path forward. It would take two months for the reluctant president to acquiesce to the war fervor sweeping the country—in April, he finally solicited and received congressional approval to dispatch troops.[175]

To be sure, America was home to prominent anti-imperialists who decried the imminent war. They cringed as the United States prepared to flex its muscle abroad. Even as they recognized that Spain maltreated the Cuban people, the anti-imperialists marshaled an array of arguments against intervention. For one, they feared that a new generation of American leaders—who had come of age after the Civil War and thus were untouched by its blood-tinged lessons—were recklessly plunging the country into a violent confrontation. The anti-imperialists also observed that repression in Cuba, while regrettable, wasn't unique globally and thus did not warrant exceptional involvement from the United States. They further counseled their fellow citizens to address humanitarian challenges at home—such as anti-Black lynching and rampant poverty—before seeking out crises abroad.[176] And although pro-war Americans viewed their impending incursion into Cuba as a natural extension of George Washington's fight against an Old World empire, the anti-imperialists offered a very different interpretation: an American nation founded in defiance of European colonialism was now ready to join the European scramble for control of foreign territories or at least outsized influence over them.[177]

A renowned Harvard professor, Charles Eliot Norton, pithily captured the anti-imperialist mood in an iconic speech in Cambridge. "A generation has grown up that has known nothing of war.… And now [all] of a sudden, without cool deliberation, without prudent preparation, the nation is hurried into war, and America—she who more than any other land was pledged to peace and goodwill on earth—unsheathes her sword," Norton lamented. "She has been forced to turn back from the way of civilization to the way of barbarism, to renounce for the time her own ideals."[178] Those who shared Norton's fears would become increasingly alarmed as America soon set its sights not just on Cuba but also Hawaii, Guam, Puerto Rico, and the Philippines. From the anti-imperialist perspective, the United States seemed less of a liberator than a colonizer.[179]

TR had no such qualms at the prospect of an American empire stretching beyond its shores. He imagined the United States as a benevolent influence on other lands.[180] So did most of his fellow citizens, as the anti-imperialists found themselves decidedly in the minority.[181] Despite the profound differences between the interventionists and the anti-imperialists, each camp touted itself as standing up for humanity abroad.

* * *

Having long fantasized about martial glory, Roosevelt finally had his chance. He was named lieutenant colonel of the First Volunteer Cavalry, better known as the “Rough Riders” and led by Colonel Leonard Wood. TR’s first task was helping select from some twenty-three thousand applicants the one thousand men who would brave Spanish bullets alongside him.[182] Roosevelt took satisfaction in assembling a heterogenous group, from Princeton alums and rugged cowboys to polo players and Cherokee Indians. He would proudly reminisce, “All—Easterners and Westerners, Northerners and Southerners, officers and men, cowboys and college graduates, wherever they came from, and whatever their social position—possessed in common the traits of hardihood and a thirst for adventure.”[183] Given the life-and-death circumstances, the composition of the Rough Riders offers perhaps the best evidence that Roosevelt’s long insistence on the benefits of diversity wasn’t merely optical.

Among his recruits were Jews. Many Jews were ineligible, despite their physical prowess, because they lacked experience on horseback. When his old friend from the police force Otto Raphael offered his services, Roosevelt responded with disappointing news. “My dear Officer Raphael: I should like to take you with me, but I am very much afraid I won’t be able to,” Roosevelt informed him. “You see, we only want men who ride well, and I don’t think you have ever done any riding.”[184] Even though a champion boxer like Raphael did not fit the profile of a Rough Rider, about eight Jews did make the cut, many from the West.[185]

Their reasons for enlisting are not difficult to imagine. As with non-Jewish volunteers, they surely felt a sense of civic duty at a moment when patriotic zeal was galvanizing the nation. They were also undoubtedly aware that fellow Jews had counted among those servicemen lost in the U.S.S. Maine explosion.[186] And the opportunity to fight Spain would have held special appeal for Jews—the Spanish Inquisition was a relatively fresh memory, having officially ended only sixty years earlier. Rabbis around the country reminded their congregants that America's enemy was the self-same that had perpetrated a historic genocide of the Jewish people. At Sinai Temple in Chicago, a sermonizer juxtaposed Spain's tradition of persecution with America's commitment to freedom. "The civilization of the inquisition and the civilization of religious tolerance stand at opposite poles," he asserted.[187] Meanwhile, the Jewish press depicted the war in Biblical terms by analogizing the Spanish king to Pharaoh, the Caribbean Sea to the Red Sea, and the American troops to the Chosen People.[188]

As the Rough Riders began their training in San Antonio, the men gave each other ironic nicknames. An unworldly cowpuncher became "Metropolitan Bill," a soldier of tender heart and few words was called "Hell Roarer," and an especially strident recruit picked up the sobriquet "Prayerful James." Two of the nicknames had Jewish inflections. A decidedly non-Jewish Irishman was designated "Sheeny Solomon." And, as Roosevelt recalled, "A young Jew who developed into one of the best fighters in the regiment accepted, with entire equanimity, the name of 'Pork Chop.' "[189] Soon this hodgepodge of volunteers would follow Roosevelt into mortal danger.

When the Rough Riders landed on Cuban shores in late June, they were beset with hazards: scorching sun, torrential downpours, punishing marches, muddy terrain, and mosquito swarms. Some of those insects carried a deadly virus known as "the black vomit," which induced its human victims to puke up their own intestines. And Mother Nature's perils were compounded by the lethal threat of Spanish snipers hiding amid the thick jungle foliage.[190] Naturally, Roosevelt endured these fraught conditions in a custom uniform he had ordered for himself from Brooks Brothers.[191]

The ultimate goal was the capture of a key city, Santiago. But the Rough Riders, alongside other American regiments, would first have to fight their way through the San Juan Heights—a series of hills manned by Spanish infantry. Just before the Americans launched their offensive, Rough Rider commander Leonard Wood was suddenly reassigned to fill in for a general who had taken ill. Roosevelt accordingly was promoted to colonel and given full command of the Rough Riders. On the morning of July 1, they began their assault. TR was fearless in the face of the death. “He’s a perfect devil in action,” one of his men remarked. “He’s always ahead, waving on the men with his sword in one hand and a big revolver in the other, and yelling all the while like a garret full of cats let loose.”[192]

A Jewish Rough Rider named Sam Greenwald sent a letter from the front to his father. “We have been since the 1st fighting our way into Santiago and some of it was pretty hot fighting,” Greenwald recounted. Although he had none of Roosevelt’s romanticism about military conflict—“I tell you war is a terrible thing”—Greenwald showed courage under fire. As he pridefully relayed in his letter, “I have been made a lieutenant and, the beauty of it, I won it on the field.”[193] Roosevelt himself had personally promoted Greenwald for “gallantry” in battle.[194] Yet another Jew, Sam Goldberg, caught a bullet in the hip and still soldiered onward.[195] These efforts were not in vain—the Rough Riders together with other American regiments seized the hills, and within a matter of days, Santiago itself was theirs. A defeated Spain quickly signaled to Washington it was prepared to broker terms, and a peace conference was scheduled for Paris that fall.[196]

FIGURE 1.5. Colonel Roosevelt. Source: Library of Congress, Prints and Photographs Division.

* * *

The Jewish press gloried all summer in stories about the heroism of Roosevelt’s Jewish troops. These tales of Jewish bravery challenged various stereotypes about Jewish men as weak in body, disloyal to the country, and more likely to profit off a war than to fight in one.[197] San Francisco’s Jewish newspaper Emanu-El declared, “The Jewish volunteers fight not as Jews, but as Americans who love and honor the flag that rouses the Maccabean blood in them.” This comment reflected a certain tension within American Jewry. On the one hand, Emanu-El wanted these Jewish soldiers to be seen as purely American, “not as Jews”—the paper liked to imagine the Rough Riders as a faith-neutral body whose Jews and Gentiles stood upon an equality precisely because religious identity was immaterial. On the other hand, the reference to “Maccabean blood” betokened a desire to emphasize a specifically Jewish heritage.[198]

As the victorious American troops in Santiago waited for the military to orchestrate their return home, they were visited by Joseph Krauskopf, a prominent rabbi from Philadelphia. He journeyed to Cuba in his capacity as a leader of the National Relief Commission, an interfaith charitable organization that tended to wounded and ill soldiers. When Krauskopf arrived in Santiago, the presiding officer sent orders to have Jewish soldiers from the various regiments summoned so that the rabbi could greet them. Never one to miss out on anything, Roosevelt insisted on joining his Jewish troops. He had met Krauskopf once before and now boasted to the rabbi about the exploits of his Jewish Rough Riders. Krauskopf reconstructed his conversation with Roosevelt in a report that was widely reprinted in the Jewish and mainstream press alike.[199]

In mid-August, the Rough Riders were transported to Montauk, Long Island, where they would spend the next month convalescing before mustering out. The troops were welcomed in Montauk with an enthusiastic reception from grateful citizens. Upon arrival, Roosevelt spoke to the press and touted his regiment’s religious diversity: “Of the last five promotions I recommended from the ranks to the grade of Second Lieutenant, one was a Jew, one a Catholic, and two Protestants.”[200]

The Rough Riders’ demography was less representative when it came to race. Military policy segregated Black servicemen into their own regiments. These so-called Buffalo Soldiers served valiantly in the Spanish-American War, fighting side-by-side with Roosevelt’s men in taking the San Juan Heights. The Buffalo Soldiers earned high praise for their valor. As a private under Roosevelt’s command remarked, “There is not a man in the Rough Riders but takes off his hat to the negroes."[201] Roosevelt himself was less gracious. In both public statements and private letters, he minimized the contributions of the Buffalo Soldiers and thereby amplified the role his own regiment played.[202]

Indeed, Roosevelt's instinct for inclusivity would often extend to Jews far more than to Blacks throughout his career, especially in military matters. The "Brownsville affair" during his presidency stands out as an especially notorious moment in Roosevelt's attitude toward Blacks. In the Texas border town of Brownsville, mysterious men arbitrarily fired shots into houses and shops one evening. White townsfolk were quick to cast blame on a battalion of Black soldiers stationed at a nearby fort. But no evidence linked the shootings to anyone in the battalion. Instead of exonerating the Black troops accordingly, military investigators chose to assume that the battalion was engaged in a "conspiracy of silence" wherein innocent soldiers were supposedly covering up for whoever was guilty among them. Those investigators advised TR to summarily discharge the entire battalion "without honor," and Roosevelt obliged. One scholar notes, "This remains the only instance of mass punishment without trial in the history of the U.S. military." Generations later, the military would reopen its inquiry and posthumously absolve the discharged troops.[203]

To be sure, Roosevelt wasn't uniformly hostile toward Blacks. He famously took political heat, for instance, after hosting the Black leader Booker T. Washington at the White House.[204] But with respect to Brownsville, it is hard to imagine TR having a comparably unfair reaction had the episode involved accusations against Jewish servicemen.

* * *

Roosevelt's feats in Cuba earned him a cover story in Harper's Weekly and favorable headlines nationwide. He was, arguably, the most popular person in America. His overnight celebrity came at a particularly auspicious moment in state politics. New York's Republican governor was embroiled in scandal; the party would need a new candidate if it hoped to keep the governor's mansion in GOP hands.[205] Merely two weeks after disbanding the Rough Riders in mid-September, Roosevelt claimed the Republican nomination for the state's top office.[206]

He kept a keen eye on Jewish voters as election season kicked off. His premium on religious equality among the Rough Riders promised to redound to his benefit in Jewish enclaves. In Roosevelt's very first stump speech of the campaign, he highlighted the egalitarian culture of his regiment, wherein every soldier, "whether Protestant or Catholic, Jew or Gentile … was treated on his merits as a man." He saw fit in this opening address to mention by name one of the Jewish war heroes he had promoted, Sam Greenwald.[207] Some supporters at his events dressed as Rough Riders, not to be confused with actual Rough Riders who also showed up to support their colonel.[208]

Two days into his role as a gubernatorial candidate, TR wrote to Abraham Wolbarst—a young Jewish doctor and local Republican politico—to inquire about the Roosevelt campaign's prospects in the East Side's fourth district. Wolbarst was decidedly optimistic, provided that Roosevelt put in the effort. "With an honest, energetic, and aggressive campaign, the district will give you a handsome vote," replied Wolbarst. "This district is largely Jewish and can be depended upon to support you heartily. You have many friends among the downtown Jews, who have always admired an honest public official." The moment was ripe for Roosevelt to capitalize on the goodwill he had cultivated with Jewish immigrants during his tenure as police commissioner. Wolbarst advised, "As the campaign advances, it would be well to interest the East Side peddlers in a body on your behalf. They will never forget the noble treatment received at your hands while in the Police Department."[209] Given Tammany's conventional strength with immigrants, Wolbarst's remarks were overly rosy. Democrats were destined to prevail in New York City, including on the East Side. The crucial question was whether Roosevelt could narrow the Democratic margin of victory in the city and then make up the difference upstate.

An astute politician, Roosevelt took no votes for granted. He wrote to a New York City congressman, Lemuel Quigg, about the campaign's need to incorporate more grassroots figures of the Wolbarst variety. "It seems to me that there should be an immediate effort to arrange—especially in the German, Jewish, and Scandinavian communities—meetings" with "men like Dr. Wolbarst, and the local leaders in each Assembly district," Roosevelt insisted. He was growing anxious about turnout, warning Quigg, "The registration does not look as well as it should, and no stone should be left unturned."[210]

Five days later, an apprehensive Roosevelt sent Quigg a follow-up letter about two Lower East Side districts. "I am told that in both the 4th and 8th Assembly districts, very little is being done," he relayed. TR urged action and recommended they turn to an old ally: "Jacob Riis of the Sun wants to give all the help he can" with "the East Side people." Roosevelt also sought to ensure that Republican leaders were properly supporting the Blaine Club, an organization for Jewish Republicans on the Lower East Side. "Some financial aid should be given to the Blaine Club," Roosevelt suggested, telling Quigg that the Blaine Club members "are, I think, sincerely for me; but they are very poor, and they have to have a little aid to enable them to hold meetings or get out banners." He floated some other names with credibility on the East Side who could be leaned upon to promote the Republican cause. "Can't Meyer Isaacs be asked to speak?" Roosevelt asked, alluding to a Jewish lawyer who was well connected in GOP circles. And in case Congressman Quigg missed the letter's earlier reference to Jacob Riis, Roosevelt anxiously signed off, "Can't you see Riis?" and then added in a postscript, "Do send for Riis."[211]

Soon the Republican State Committee was inundating the Lower East Side with Yiddish flyers, which depicted the American victory over Spain as righteous vengeance against a wicked nation that had shed Jewish blood during the Inquisition. "Spain now lies punished for all her sins," the flyer proclaimed, crediting Theodore Roosevelt and President McKinley. "Every vote for the Colonel of the Rough Riders is approval of McKinley and the War. Every vote for Roosevelt's opponent is a vote for Spain.… Vote to express your approval of Spain's defeat." The Republicans plainly believed—probably correctly—that the emotional symbolism of a historic victory over Spain loomed larger than local issues for a great many Jewish constituents.[212]

An enterprising candidate like Roosevelt wouldn't leave it entirely to deputies and flyers to do his bidding; he resolved to barnstorm the East Side himself. Roosevelt took a grand tour of the neighborhood in early November, stopping at various spots to give speeches. As a horse-drawn carriage carried him through the streets, a small army of cheering boys accompanied the candidate.[213] Adults surfaced too—some standing on tenement roofs, others peering through factory windows, still more congregating on street corners—to catch a glimpse of Roosevelt. The streets were festooned with streamers and bunting for the occasion, and portraits of TR hung from fire escapes. When exuberant crowds chanted his name, it sounded like these native Yiddish speakers were saying "Meester Rosenfeldt." One journalist reported that this Judaic pronunciation was "every bit as cordially received [by Roosevelt] as though the candidate really spelled his name in the East Side way."[214]

Notwithstanding these signs of approbation, some unsavory characters who opposed Roosevelt were prepared for mischief. "It might have been called an unmixed political triumph," the New York Times commented, "had not the enemies of the Republican candidate been awaiting his coming with sticks and stones and the kind of dead cat known to the boys of the East Side as 'sun birds.' "[215] The term "sun bird" was presumably an allusion to the fact that these deceased animals became aerial when hurled at a given target.

In a race that attracted national attention, Roosevelt emerged victorious on election day. His popularity with upstate voters sealed his win. And although Roosevelt expectedly lost the Democratic stronghold of New York City, he notably outran the rest of the GOP ticket there. The Boston Evening Journal attributed "his strength among the Hebrews" as a key factor in his relative success at the polls.[216]

* * *

The newly inaugurated governor harbored grave concerns about the unsanitary sweatshops so prevalent in the tenements. Roosevelt was not far removed from his days as police commissioner, when Jacob Riis had first introduced him to the perils of slum life during late-night strolls. There was a state law on the books promulgating numerous regulations for tenements to improve health and prevent overcrowding: strictly hygienic apartments, only one family per unit, no labor performed in bedrooms. But merely passing a law is different from actually implementing it. Roosevelt doubted that state inspectors were rigorously applying the statute, and he turned once more to Riis as an advisor. “I think that perhaps if I looked through the sweatshops myself with the inspectors, as well as looked over their work,” Roosevelt wrote Riis, “we might be in a condition to put things on a new basis, just as they were put on a new basis in the police department after you and I began our midnight tours.”[217]

The governor tapped Riis to personally orchestrate a visit to the sweatshops. Riis vividly recalled the outing, noting that the oppressive heat barely registered with the inexhaustible Roosevelt: “It was one of the hottest days of early summer, and it wore me completely out.… Him it only gave a better appetite for dinner.” They diligently examined twenty of the East Side’s most squalid tenements. Roosevelt was bitterly disappointed. He minced no words in dressing down the district’s inspector who had joined them. “I do not think you quite understand what I mean by enforcing a law,” the governor began. “I don’t want it made as easy as possible for the manufacturer. I want you to refuse to license anybody in a tenement that does not come up to the top notch of your own requirements.” Roosevelt admonished the inspector to put not just manufacturers but the building proprietors on notice: profiting off lax standards would no longer be tolerated.[218]

The problem, Roosevelt believed, wasn’t just enforcement but the inadequacy of the law itself. Accordingly, he called for legislation that would, in Riis’s words, fight back against “the mercenary hostility of the slum landlord.”[219] The governor pleaded with lawmakers in Albany to fund a special commission that would conduct a thoroughgoing investigation and recommend statutory reforms. When the statehouse failed to demonstrate a Rooseveltian sense of urgency on the matter, he sent legislators an emergency message stressing the unprecedented opportunity before them. Perhaps never before in state history—Roosevelt declared—had lawmakers contemplated “a measure of more real importance to the welfare of those who are least able to protect themselves and whom we should especially guard from … the rapacity of those who would prey upon them.” The legislature ultimately acceded to his request, and Roosevelt stacked the new commission with reformers who shared his outlook. They proposed statutory provisions to address a host of ills in the tenements, from fire hazards to rampant filth. Unsurprisingly, the Jewish press took a keen interest in these developments given the stakes for untold Jewish immigrants. The commission’s work ultimately culminated in the passage of the Tenement House Act, which would take effect shortly after Roosevelt’s departure from the governor’s mansion.[220]

* * *

Among the perquisites of gubernatorial office is the power of appointment, and Roosevelt placed a number of Jews in important positions. These ranged from a seat on the Court of Appeals to executive posts like the State Gas Meter Inspector.[221] Roosevelt also named a Jewish woman in Syracuse, Etta Falker, to the Board of Managers for a women’s prison. According to the press, she was the first Jewish woman to receive an appointment from a New York governor.[222] Nor was it easy to find a comparable figure beyond New York’s borders. The Hebrew Standard newspaper mused, “Probably no other Jewish lady in the United States occupies such an important social and official position.”[223]

As governor, Roosevelt was dogged by a philosophical contradiction with respect to hiring and promotion: he valued Jewish participation in government, but he also espoused a meritocratic ideal that paid faith no heed. In a private letter to a Gentile, Roosevelt emphasized his deliberate efforts to ensure religious diversity in his appointments. “On the State Board of Charities,” he wrote, “I thought it was right to see that the different creeds had representation, and I think that the Jews whom I appointed … were as fine a body of American citizens as have ever been put on such a board.” And yet, in that very same letter, Roosevelt denied that the religious identity of prospective appointees informed his decisions about whom to name for various offices. “When I appointed Judge Hirschberg of Newburg on the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, I did so not because he was a Jew but because I thought he was the best judge for promotion,” TR insisted. The rest of the letter oscillated between the ideals of intentional pluralism and faith-blind merit. In one sentence, Roosevelt explained that he recruited Jews to his police force, in part, to counter negative stereotypes about Jewish weakness. But in another sentence, he celebrated that his promotion of a Jewish Rough Rider to lieutenant bore no relationship to the soldier’s religious background.[224] TR would prove just as inconsistent on this issue during his presidency.

Governor Roosevelt’s interest in Jewish appointees wasn’t limited to his own state. When he caught wind that antisemitic forces were trying to stymie a Jewish candidate under consideration for a federal post, TR personally intervened with President McKinley. “I have seen a good deal of Mr. [Israel] Fischer and am very strongly prepossessed in his favor,” Roosevelt shared. “He is a public man of high character—a man who in every way comes up to the standard of qualifications you have a right to demand.” TR then confronted the question of religious bigotry directly, acknowledging, “I have been informed that some opposition has been expressed to you because of Mr. Fischer’s faith, he being a Jew, but I know that it is absolutely needless for me to say anything whatsoever on this score, for I know that you are incapable of so much as considering whether a man is Jew or Gentile, Catholic or Protestant, so long as he is a good American and a good citizen, and both of these Mr. Fischer is.”[225] Fischer received his appointment.

* * *

During his governorship, Roosevelt had occasion to address anti-Jewish prejudice not just at home but overseas as well. The world over was then paying close attention to France’s most notorious episode of antisemitism: the Dreyfus Affair. Alfred Dreyfus was a Jewish captain in the French army who had been wrongly convicted of divulging state secrets to the Germans. Although the charges were bogus, they dovetailed with long-running stereotypes found in many countries that Jews were disloyal citizens. Now Dreyfus was serving a life sentence on Devil's Island, a French penal colony off the South American coast. French animus against Jews made it difficult for the imprisoned Dreyfus to secure a fair appeals process by which he might clear his name and regain his liberty.[226]

As France's baseless persecution of Dreyfus drew international condemnation, the inveterate antisemite Henry Adams saw the global clamor as yet more evidence that Jews were secretly pulling the strings of world affairs. Adams's paranoia earned him the ridicule of his friend John Hay, who was then serving as the American ambassador to the United Kingdom and would later become Roosevelt's secretary of state. In a personal letter to a fellow diplomat, Hay mocked Adams for becoming "clean daft over the Dreyfus affair." It seemed to Hay that Adams believed "the Jews are all the press, all the cabinets, all the gods and all weather. I was amazed to see so sensible a man so wild." In a similar vein two months later, Hay joked to a senator's wife that Adams—still exasperated by worldwide advocacy for Dreyfus—was liable to blame Jews for the eruption of Italy's most notorious volcano: "When he saw Vesuvius reddening the midnight air, he searched the horizon to find a Jew stoking the fire."[227]

The irony here is that the Jewish reaction to the Dreyfus Affair was fairly reserved. To be sure, Jews on both sides of the Atlantic earnestly called for his release, but they generally did so with a measure of moderation. French Jews feared that strident agitation could backfire. America's Jewish leadership, meanwhile, was reluctant to recognize that the Enlightenment project of religious equality might be failing in Western Europe. These uptown Jews preferred to treat the Dreyfus Affair as an anomalous miscarriage of justice against an unfortunate Frenchman, not as a symptom of structural antisemitism. To grapple with the full implications of French prejudice would have raised uncomfortable doubts about the Jewish future in supposedly civilized nations. Downtown Jews, however, proved an exception to this dynamic. With the memory of their own Old World oppression all too fresh, they drew a straight line from Russian pogroms to Dreyfus's persecution.[228]

Governor Roosevelt’s views on Dreyfus stood in sharp relief to Henry Adams’s, their shared social circle notwithstanding. When word reached America that Dreyfus was finally granted a retrial, Roosevelt wrote a sympathetic letter addressed to three interested parties: two Jewish philanthropists and a philosemitic preacher who had just authored a book about Jewish contributions to the world. “Gentlemen, I feel the most heartfelt joy over the action now taken in relation to Captain Dreyfus, and the attempt to partially redress the hideous wrong done to him,” Roosevelt conveyed. And he praised a French colonel who had come forward with exculpatory evidence on Dreyfus’s behalf despite immense pressure on that colonel to conceal it: “I trust also that we shall not forget the splendid courage and disinterested patriotism and loyalty of gallant Colonel Picquart.”[229] Dreyfus would be convicted yet again in his retrial that summer, but the ensuing global outrage induced the French president to summarily pardon him.[230]

The Idaho Daily Statesman saw in the Rough Rider legacy an American answer to the Dreyfus Affair. The paper reprinted a quotation from Roosevelt extolling his regiment’s religious diversity and then added in its own wording, “In France, that pretends to be a republic, they degrade an officer and send him into solitary confinement because he is a Jew, but in the United States there is no difference between the Jew and Gentile.”[231] The Statesman was overselling the case—America had its own issues with religious prejudice. But even so, no antisemitic incident comparable to the Dreyfus Affair marred the records of the U.S. military. And Roosevelt’s frequent plaudits about his Jewish Rough Riders did indeed offer a marked contrast to France’s deplorable treatment of Captain Dreyfus.

* * *

Governor Roosevelt looked ahead to his political future with ambivalence. William McKinley was pursuing reelection but needed a running mate owing to the death of his vice president the prior fall. The president opted to stay neutral in the selection process, content to defer entirely to the discretion of the upcoming Republican National Convention.[232] Roosevelt was the odds-on favorite, but he didn't thrill to the prospect. The vice presidency of that era was an office best suited to an empty figurehead content to idle away the time. In other words, it was a terrible fit for TR.[233] He preferred to seek a second term as governor. Before the convention, Roosevelt lamented to a friend, "In the Vice-Presidency I could do nothing." But he was prepared to abide the convention vote.[234]

As the delegates were deciding the destiny of the ticket on a hot June day in Philadelphia's convention hall, Roosevelt holed up in a nearby hotel room awaiting the results. He distracted himself with the writings of Josephus, the acclaimed scholar of ancient Jewish history. So immersed was Roosevelt in Jewish antiquity that he failed to notice that his sister Corinne had knocked at his door, entered his room, and was standing over his shoulder. When she saw what Roosevelt was reading, Corinne broke the silence with laughter. She later recalled finding it irresistibly "quaint" that amid all the pomp and politicking of the convention, her brother was "quietly apart, perfectly absorbed in the history of the Jews of a long-past day."[235]

The RNC delegates enthusiastically nominated Roosevelt to serve as McKinley's running mate, with 925 votes in his favor and only one opposed. The lone dissenter: Roosevelt himself.[236] He made his peace with his fate and accepted the nomination. Roosevelt dashed off a letter to an American diplomat a few weeks later, acknowledging, "I am completely reconciled to being the candidate for vice-president now."[237] His mixed emotions aside, Roosevelt was boundlessly energetic as a campaigner, crisscrossing America at a frenetic pace on behalf of the Republican ticket. The race offered voters a rematch of the 1896 cycle when McKinley had faced off against William Jennings Bryan. On election day, McKinley and Roosevelt notched a dominant victory.[238]

Among Roosevelt's well-wishers on his electoral triumph was a friend from the police force. "Best success to you in your new office," telegrammed the Jewish police officer Otto Raphael. "May God have only happiness in store for you."[239] Roosevelt was "touched" by the gesture from his old sparring partner.[240] Meanwhile, Lucius Littauer—a Jewish congressman whose relationship with TR dated back to their Harvard days

—messaged Roosevelt with words of “joyous congratulations!” But Littauer’s comment came with a caveat: “My only regret is that you must waste four years in a position unsuited to your abilities.”[241] Four years would prove far off the mark.

Merely six months into his second term, McKinley was shaking hands with a crowd in Buffalo when an anarchist shot him at close range. McKinley underwent emergency surgery, and Roosevelt rushed to Buffalo. After a few days, McKinley’s condition was sufficiently improved that Roosevelt set off to join his family on a planned vacation in the Adirondack Mountains of upstate New York.[242] The vice president received a gracious letter the next day from William Cohen, a Jewish jurist who was now practicing law after a stint on the bench. Roosevelt counted Cohen as a legal advisor and a friend—they had most likely first met when both were law students at Columbia in 1880.[243] “As everyone knows, you have been placed in many delicate and trying situations in your busy life; I venture to say that no one of them called upon you for more judgment and tact than when you were at the side of our wounded president,” wrote Judge Cohen. “Never in your whole public career has your conduct been so perfect; silent and dignified when the outcome was uncertain, cheerful when the conditions warranted—with a sense of duty always present, reluctantly ready to act in case you should be called upon.”[244] The letter made an impression on Roosevelt, who told Cohen that he would “keep it permanently.”[245]

Just when it seemed that McKinley had been spared, his wound grew infected, and the once-favorable prognosis became grim.[246] A ranger hurried up the mountainside where Roosevelt was hiking to convey the urgent news.[247] Early the next day, as Roosevelt was hastening back to Buffalo, McKinley took his final breath.[248] “Now the dreadful has occurred,” a somber Roosevelt relayed to Judge Cohen, “and the only thing for me to do is to take up the burden and bear it as manfully as I can.”[249] After arriving in Buffalo, Roosevelt quickly took the oath of office in a friend’s parlor. At age forty-two, he had become—and remains still—the youngest president in American history.[250]

* * *

Roosevelt’s trajectory to the Oval Office was astounding. In four short years, he had accelerated through a dizzying succession of roles: police commissioner, navy official, Rough Rider, New York governor, vice president, and now, suddenly, he was the most powerful man in America. At every stage in this improbable journey—from the East Side slums to the San Juan Heights—Roosevelt deepened his relationship with the American Jewish community.

He was a collector of stories, and his haul from these years had been especially abundant when it came to Jewry. There was the episode of Hermann Ahlwardt, the German hate-monger whom Roosevelt cleverly guarded with Jewish policemen. There was the tale of Otto Raphael, the Jewish immigrant who braved a burning building and earned not just a police badge but Roosevelt’s friendship. There was the legend of Sam Greenwald, the Jewish soldier whose courage facing down Spanish bullets alongside Colonel Roosevelt won him a promotion. These stories mattered—to Roosevelt and to American Jewry alike—because they advanced an aspirational vision of national life where Jew and Gentile would stand as equals.

But the question of Jewish belonging at home would soon become eclipsed by the question of Jewish survival abroad. Roosevelt did not yet know, as he inherited the mantle of presidential power, that the momentous years now facing him would coincide with the greatest crisis for global Jewry of his lifetime. The Jewish people prayed that this youthful new president—this teller of Jewish tales—might prevent the next chapter in the Jewish story from being written in blood.

OceanofPDF.com

2

ROMANIAN NOTE

At the time that Theodore Roosevelt assumed the American presidency, some five thousand miles away Romanian Jews were suffering under the heel of an oppressive state and society. The Treaty of Berlin had recognized Romania’s independence in 1878, and in the ensuing decades, the newly sovereign nation subjected its Jewish community to a relentless succession of indignities. Although Jews had lived there for centuries, they weren’t considered citizens. Jews were prohibited from residing in many towns. Hospitals had quotas on Jewish patients. The Romanian government wasn’t content to merely bar Jewish students from public schools—it also thwarted a bid by the Alliance Israélite Universelle, a French-based Jewish aid organization, to subsidize a Jewish school system. Meanwhile, a series of laws banned Jews from ever more forms of employment, from educated professions like lawyer and broker to working-class occupations such as farmer and peddler. Jewish artisans were disallowed from retailing goods made by their own hands. Abject poverty was all but inevitable for the great mass of Romanian Jews. Thousands of them might have starved to death were it not for the charity of the Alliance. And beyond a legal regime of discrimination, the government actively promoted pogroms in which organized mobs ransacked Jewish property and assailed Jewish people.[1]

The Romanian treatment of Jews was all the more egregious in light of the conditions under which the preeminent powers of Europe had granted

Romania its independence. The Treaty of Berlin expressly forbade Romania from practicing religious discrimination in its political or economic affairs.[2] With Romania brazenly flouting that treaty, the country's 400,000 Jews found themselves in a deepening disaster.

Western European and American Jewry fretted about the increasingly desperate situation in Romania. In 1902, a Jewish philanthropist in England, F. D. Mocatta, wrote to the American Jewish leader Oscar Straus about an imminent law in Romania that would ban Jews from some of the few remaining jobs they were still legally permitted to hold. Britain was a signatory to the Treaty of Berlin and thus had some standing to pressure Romania, but Mocatta was dubious that his own nation or the other signatory powers would catalyze action to enforce the treaty's terms. He reasoned that the United States, despite not being party to the treaty, was actually more likely to initiate an effort on behalf of Romanian Jewry.[3] In that respect, Mocatta was typical of European Jews who had far greater faith in the American government than their own. Mocatta was hopeful that an American plea to Romania might encourage Britain to then lend its own support to the cause.[4]

Mocatta was prudent in enlisting Oscar Straus, for the latter counted among a small handful of Jews who were positioned to exert real influence on Roosevelt. Straus was a consummate uptown Jew. He had been born in Germany and raised largely in America. An alumnus of Columbia Law School, Straus worked as an attorney before serving as an ambassador to the Ottoman Empire in the 1880s and 1890s.[5] He had known TR since at least 1900 when, as governor of New York, Roosevelt appointed Straus to a committee tasked with studying the status of indigenous people in the state.[6] A month before Mocatta sent his letter, Roosevelt tapped Straus to fill one of America's four seats on the newly created international tribunal in The Hague.[7] The president had some hesitation at first in making the appointment—Straus, after all, was a Democrat—but the owner of the New York Times, also a Jew, successfully prevailed upon Roosevelt.[8]

Straus's obligations to The Hague did not preclude him from continuing to reside stateside, and over the course of the Roosevelt administration, he would emerge as TR's most trusted Jewish advisor, offering valued advice on issues far beyond the scope of his official remit. The two men were distinct by many measures. Roosevelt had a commanding presence; Straus was mild-mannered. Roosevelt could enthrall a crowd; Straus was best suited to backroom diplomacy. Roosevelt epitomized charisma; Straus decidedly did not.[9] Yet there was a great deal for these two statesmen to appreciate in one another. Both staked out moderate positions in the era's struggle between capital and labor. Both saw themselves as embodying an ethical code that transcended the crass materialism of an industrializing America. And both thought that the United States was a fundamentally virtuous nation.[10]

FIGURE 2.1. Oscar Straus. Source: The World's Work. Vol. 31, November, 1915, to April, 1916. A History of Our Time. Garden City: Doubleday, 1918.

FIGURE 2.2. Jacob H. Schiff. Source: The Miriam and Ira D. Wallach Division of Art, Prints and Photographs: Print Collection, The New York Public Library.

The plight of Romanian Jews fell outside Straus's purview—the matter certainly wasn't before The Hague—but he was sufficiently alarmed that he spent what political capital he had to advance their cause. To press his case for Romanian Jewry, Straus turned to someone who enjoyed, for the time being, even more clout with Roosevelt: Jacob Schiff. Although Schiff was a Republican and Straus a Democrat, they were both German-born members of the Jewish elite in America, and they worked well together on Jewish issues. A contemporary described Jacob Schiff as having "an aristocratic quality in his personality." He had amassed a fortune as a banker in New York and devoted much of his riches to philanthropy, particularly Jewish causes. Schiff possessed a flair for the dramatic. He could be combative or compassionate depending on the circumstances. As America's foremost advocate for Jewry, Schiff was a man whom any president of the era would be wise to cultivate as an ally and adviser on Jewish topics. And Roosevelt was savvy enough to recognize as much.[11]

* * *

After Straus and Schiff deliberated in early 1902 on a strategy for influencing Roosevelt's policy toward Romania, they agreed that Straus would draft a memo about conditions on the ground there, which Schiff would then personally deliver to the president.[12] Straus understood that it was a violation of diplomatic norms for any given country to involve itself in another's domestic affairs. At that point in world history, altruism on its own would typically offer an insufficient basis for the United States to press Romania on its persecution of Jews (although exceptions did exist). Straus's memo conceded, "If the matter were of concern … from only a humanitarian standpoint, I would not have the president's noble heart disturbed." Because Roosevelt would need a pretense to intercede, Straus provided a rationale for action that directly implicated American interests: immigration. Straus explained that as a consequence of Romania's offenses against its Jews, "these people are emigrating en masse" to the United States. Romania through its "persecutions" effectively forced thousands of impoverished Jews to flee, which constitutes an "unfriendly act" by

Romania toward America—one that “gives our government the right, not only to protest, but to remonstrate against such inhuman laws that discredit the age in which we are living.”[13] In truth, Roosevelt wasn’t actually opposed to accepting Romanian-Jewish refugees. Not even seven thousand had entered America the prior year. The immigration excuse would be pure pretext.[14]

Straus’s memo suggested some possible courses of action that Roosevelt could pursue. TR might encourage a congressional resolution “expressive of sympathy and protesting against the inhuman treatment” of Romanian Jews. Another option was the appointment to Romania of a special commissioner with “diplomatic rank” who would convey America’s disapproval to the regime there. Whatever the president might choose to do, any movement from the Roosevelt administration—Straus predicted—would prompt further action from the great powers of Europe that had signed the Treaty of Berlin.[15] Those signatories were Britain, Austria-Hungary, France, Germany, Italy, Russia, and the Ottoman Empire.

Jacob Schiff had occasion in April of 1902 to meet with Roosevelt and deliver Straus’s memo. Roosevelt summoned his secretary of state, John Hay, to join that meeting. Hay was measured in his reaction, cautioning that the path advocated by Schiff and Straus was not without “difficulty,” but Hay still assured Schiff that he wouldn’t simply let the matter rest.[16]

Secretary Hay would become a central figure in the Romanian affair moving forward, a trusted aide whom Roosevelt expected to work collaboratively with Jews like Straus and Schiff on a solution. Although Hay didn’t quite share Roosevelt’s pro-Jewish instincts, neither did Hay espouse the genteel antisemitism that afflicted so much of the Anglo-Saxon elite of his day. Perhaps Hay was less prone to anti-Jewish prejudice because his background was atypical of the patrician class with whom he fraternized. He wasn’t born into the East Coast establishment but rather grew up in rural Illinois. Moreover, Hay owed his riches to the modern railroad industry, not an inheritance from a colonial-era fortune; accordingly, he wasn’t troubled by the anxieties of the Old Money set who saw enterprising Jews as rapacious capitalists. Recall that Hay laughed off the paranoid antisemitism of his friend Henry Adams. To be sure, Hay wasn’t wholly devoid of bias himself. He once expressed a wish that a friend of his would soon be “getting [as] rich as a Dutch Jew.”[17]

At TR’s request, John Hay met with Oscar Straus and asked him to produce a second memo on Romania’s Jews that could inform the administration’s actions. Straus dutifully drafted a new report, which he sent straight to Roosevelt in May. That report uneasily grappled with the reality that any formal objection to Romania would force the United States to adopt a self-contradictory position. In order to justify its interposition in the domestic affairs of a foreign power, America would have to invoke as a pretext its own interests—in this case, the migration of Jews from Romania to America. Yet the United States was supposed to be a sanctuary for those fleeing subjugation. By bemoaning the influx of Romanian Jews to American ports, the Roosevelt administration might appear hypocritically xenophobic.

FIGURE 2.3. John Hay. Source: Library of Congress, Prints and Photographs Division.

Straus was not obtuse to this predicament and tried as best he could to paper over it in his report for Roosevelt. On the one hand, Straus reasoned that America was uniquely positioned to criticize Romania because the United States would “in all probability receive the largest number of those oppressed people.” On the other hand, he insisted that reliance on immigration as the basis for a diplomatic protest should not be interpreted as a plea “against receiving these refugees in this country, which from the day that the Pilgrim Fathers set foot upon our shores, has been the haven of refuge.” Try as Straus might, that inconsistency would continue to present challenges for the Roosevelt administration as it developed its Romania policy.[18]

Some passages of Straus’s report notably sidestepped that tension by arguing that humanitarianism alone actually could justify an American reproach. He cited a few historical examples, including instructions sent in 1872 from the U.S. secretary of state to American ambassadors across Europe; those instructions had called on the ambassadors to convey to their host nations that America was gravely concerned for the “inhumanly persecuted Hebrews” on Romanian territory. Straus closed his report with an “earnest appeal” for Roosevelt to challenge the Romanian state over its prejudice and to enlist the European signatories to the Treaty of Berlin to follow suit. He optimistically predicted that inveighing against Romania’s treatment of its Jewish population “cannot fail to have great influence at this present crisis.”[19]

* * *

The American public grew increasingly aware of Romanian Jewry’s dire condition. A newspaper in Michigan reported that thousands of them were en route to the United States on account of “systematic persecution.”[20] Another paper, in Vermont, predicted that this cohort of immigrants is “only the beginning of what promises to be an exodus of Romanian Jews” who were escaping “oppressive legislation.”[21]

In Philadelphia—among the leading cities for American Jewish life—the Alliance organized a mass gathering to decry the treatment of both Romanian and Russian Jews. Speakers emphasized that Jews in the United States, who enjoyed religious liberty and economic opportunity, shouldered a special obligation to aid their embattled coreligionists overseas. As a local rabbi told the crowd, "The voice of Jewish suffering, of Jewish sorrow … must find a responsive chord in every heart." Notably, not all orators that day were Jewish. One Gentile speechmaker insisted that Christians ought to be deeply concerned with the barbarous treatment of any human being, regardless of the victim's faith. The meeting concluded with fundraising for the Alliance's work and a vote in favor of resolutions condemning Romania and Russia.[22]

As the Roosevelt administration considered its options, the president came under pressure to do something on the diplomatic front from Lucius Littauer—a college friend, fellow Republican, and Jewish congressman representing a district in upstate New York.[23] Roosevelt assured Littauer, "Hay is already at work on the Romanian business."[24] Indeed, a plan was afoot to have an American diplomat, Charles Wilson, confront the Romanian authorities about antisemitism. The United States had no embassy in Romania, so Romanian-American diplomacy was handled by Wilson, the regional chargé d'affaires based in Greece (a chargé d'affaires is a diplomatic officer who has lesser rank than an ambassador but enjoys comparable powers in conducting foreign policy).

Secretary Hay tasked a seasoned State Department employee with formulating instructions for Wilson, which would become known as the "Romanian Note." In mid-July, Hay forwarded a draft to Roosevelt for the president's blessing. Hay included with the note a cover letter to Roosevelt acknowledging the same difficulty that Straus had well understood: America wanted to make a humanitarian plea but needed to cite immigration as a pretense to avoid breaching protocol. The United States was, by chance, in the midst of pressing Romania for a naturalization treaty, which would specify the conditions under which each country would formally recognize that a given individual had traded one nation's citizenship for the other's. That endeavor could provide the Roosevelt administration with some grounds for exerting pressure on the topic of Jewish rights, since the absence of Jewish rights was prompting Romanian Jews to seek naturalization in America. “You will see in reading it that it has not been easy to handle,” Hay confessed to Roosevelt, “but I have availed myself of what seems our only excuse, the pending naturalization treaty with Romania, to read them a pretty drastic letter on their duty to the Jews. Please let me know if it meets your approval.”[25]

The note that Hay submitted for Roosevelt’s consideration made the case that, in light of a prospective naturalization treaty, the United States was well within its rights to “scrutinize most jealously the character of the immigration from a foreign land”—especially when that land’s maltreatment of its own inhabitants spurred the emigration of destitute refugees to America. Any nation so aggrieved may “point out the evil and make remonstrance” against the offending country. Having established this principle, the note considered the litany of abuses against Romanian Jews: civil disabilities, special taxes, employment blacklists. “In the overcrowded cities … they are forced to dwell and engage, against fearful odds, in the desperate struggle for existence,” the note continued. The Jews—amid this “state of wretched misery” and “enforced degradation”—have little hope for advancement. They thus confront two options: “submissive suffering” or “flight to some land less unfavorable to them.”[26]

Much of the note awkwardly grappled with the tension between the United States’ self-professed commitment to sheltering refugees and its complaint that Romania was forcing its Jewish population onto American shores. “The United States offers asylum to the oppressed of all lands,” the note proclaimed. But this principle did not constitute a willingness to stand idly by while a bad actor created such inhumane conditions that its impecunious residents had no choice but to embark for American ports. The exodus of the Romanian Jew was not “the healthy, intelligent emigration of a free and self-reliant being” but rather “the mere transplantation of an artificially produced diseased growth to a new place.” These Jews arrived as “outcasts, made doubly paupers by physical and moral oppression in their native land.” Under such terms, their immigration wasn’t “acceptable or beneficial.” Such a damning assessment of Romanian-Jewish immigrants risked sounding antisemitic in itself, and so the note took pains to speak well of Jewish immigrants at large: American history showed that “the Jews possess in a high degree the mental and moral qualifications of conscientious citizenhood,” so long as they come suitably “equipped in mind and body.”[27]

Fabricated concerns about immigration may have given the Roosevelt administration its requisite pretext, but the note still acknowledged and even championed the humanitarian agenda actually motivating its authorship—America was moved “in the name of humanity.” Even as the note conceded that it could not “authoritatively appeal” to the Treaty of Berlin’s text since the United States wasn’t a signatory, it would nonetheless “earnestly appeal” to the treaty’s guiding ideals “because they are the principles of international law and eternal justice.”[28] Initially intended to be a confidential message to an American diplomat—which would inform his messaging to the Romanian regime—the note’s impassioned rhetoric indicates that it was drafted with an eye toward eventual release for public consumption.[29]

Roosevelt had no hesitation in giving the draft his imprimatur. “I think that the memorandum to the Romanian government is admirable,” he told Hay. The president also asked that the State Department furnish him with an additional copy that he could show his Jewish ally in Congress, Lucius Littauer.[30] Hay acceded to the request and counseled Roosevelt that Jacob Schiff and Oscar Straus would be interested in the note’s contents as well.[31] Appearing as a letter under Hay’s name, the note was sent off to Charles Wilson, the diplomat who was to convey its gist to Romania.[32]

The Jews in Roosevelt’s circle were uniformly pleased. As Jacob Schiff told Congressman Littauer, “I have read this communiqué with much interest, and I agree with you that it forms a masterful presentation.” Schiff and Littauer alike urged the Roosevelt administration to share the note with the signatory nations.[33] Hay agreed that the United States should involve the signatories, writing to Roosevelt, “I think we might do it.”[34]

Before the note was dispatched to the signatories, Charles Wilson acted upon it. He met with a Romanian official to discuss the possibility of a naturalization treaty, who explained to Wilson that the king in fact objected to any such treaty. The king was concerned that if a treaty required that all U.S. citizens living in Romania be afforded robust rights, then a Romanian Jew could abscond to America, become a U.S. citizen, and return to Romania with far greater freedoms than his coreligionists who had never left. American citizenship would thereby become an end-run around the regime of Jewish persecution to which Romania was so ardently committed. This, the king would not abide.[35]

Wilson wrote Hay with the details of this meeting. Notably, Wilson's letter made no mention of his having communicated to the Romanian official America's general opposition to the conditions of Romanian Jewry—presumably because Wilson did not. Perhaps Wilson discussed the naturalization treaty only and pressed no further because the official's negative reaction to naturalization made it apparent that any remonstrance about Romanian antisemitism would fall on deaf ears. Or maybe Wilson misunderstood Hay's note by failing to appreciate that the treaty discussion was the pretext, not the point.[36] Either way, Romanian obstinance appears to have only reinforced for the Roosevelt administration that it should indeed forward the note to the signatories. Hay initiated that process just days after hearing from Wilson. The note was accompanied with a request that the signatories take whatever steps they deem suitable to dislodge the Romanian government from its present policy.[37]

* * *

The American Hebrew periodical broke the news in early August. It reported that John Hay wired a "most forceful remonstrance" concerning the peril of Romanian Jewry. "Our government shows that it is still in the forefront whenever it comes to questions of humanity and justice," the paper boasted.[38] Roosevelt was highly satisfied. As Hay informed his subordinate who drafted the note, "The President is greatly pleased with your circular, and the Hebrews—poor dears!—all over the country think we are bully boys."[39] The coverage in the American Hebrew was based on an unofficial leak and lacked the Romanian Note's actual text. Other newspapers held off on commentary until mid-September, when the Roosevelt administration confirmed the story and provided the press with copies of the note itself.

At that point, front-page headlines nationwide carried word of the diplomatic protest. Many papers reprinted much, and sometimes all, of the Romanian Note. “United States Appeals to Save Jews,” declared the Evening News in San Jose.[40] Although the note was produced at Roosevelt’s direction and drafted by one of Hay’s underlings, it was Hay who signed it; accordingly, many headlines gave Hay the credit. The Salt Lake Telegram announced, “Hay Appeals to the Powers for Suffering Jews.”[41] Jewish newspapers, of course, lavished the administration with praise. In New York, the Hebrew Standard attributed the Romanian Note to “the head and heart of President Roosevelt.”[42] These plaudits for the Republican president were all the more notable given that the Hebrew Standard leaned Democratic.

Some journalistic outlets highlighted the note’s atypical character. The New York Times, for instance, emphasized that the administration’s conveyance of the Romanian Note to the signatories constituted an “unusual course” and that the content of the note itself was “remarkable in several respects.” The Times did not offer specifics as to why the American tactic departed from convention. It was too obvious to spell out that the United States was hardly in the habit of pressuring European countries to adhere to the terms of a treaty to which America was not itself a party. The paper did acknowledge the “double purpose” of the note: “protecting the long-suffering Jews” on the one hand and sparing America a “horde of poor people” on the other.[43]

An editorial in the Washington Post expressed concern that this latter rationale about immigration undermined America’s altruistic plea and thereby weakened the note. “If our only objection to [Romanian antisemitism] resides in the fear that those hapless people will flee to America and so introduce into our civilization a degrading and abhorrent quantity, we cannot reasonably expect our appeal to exert a very potent influence,” the editorialist surmised. The author fully appreciated that impoverished newcomers were being invoked “merely as a justification” for the humanitarian appeal. Secretary Hay may have been hamstrung by diplomatic protocol that rendered human rights an insufficient basis for intervention, but “what he wants to say … is that the American people view with horror and indignation the pitiless pursuit of a race by the government of Romania.”[44] It is striking the ease with which the Post contributor was able discern the administration’s pretextual maneuvering. Editorials like this one mattered—with sophisticated polling still decades in the offing, politicians of the day often relied on the press as the best thermometer of the public temperature.[45]

* * *

The Roosevelt administration had made its move; the question remained how Europe would react to this uncharacteristic bid by the United States. Some European papers praised America for setting an example that the Continent should follow. A Viennese daily observed that it had been left to “America to admonish the European powers concerning their obligations to civilization” after Europe “bowed itself so impotently and pitiably before Romania’s barbarities.”[46] Berlin’s paper of record lauded America’s refusal to “keep silence in the presence of international wrong” and warned that it would be “highly shameful” if Europe did not respond in like manner.[47] The paper fully grasped that America seized on immigration as a pretense for pursuing what was really a humanitarian endeavor, suggesting that “the United States does not need the protection of Europe against pauper immigration” and therefore was motivated in actuality by “feelings of humanity.”[48]

Despite these voices of support, other corners of the European press were far less favorable toward the United States. One German newspaper derided the Romanian Note as an exercise in hollow sanctimony, insisting, “The prattle about humanity and eternal justice, especially in an American mouth, is an empty phrase.”[49] A number of the European critics accused the United States of hypocrisy for intruding in Old World affairs after long resisting comparable interventions by Europe into the Western Hemisphere. President James Monroe had first articulated in 1823 what became known as the Monroe Doctrine, which held that any European attempt to colonize an independent nation in the Americas would be interpreted as an act hostile to the United States. Given this history, an Austrian daily condemned the “impertinent meddling” from a nation that “maintains the Monroe Doctrine” and thus “has the least right of any country to exercise a similar influence.”[50]

In the Russian capital of St. Petersburg, one of that nation’s oldest papers, Zeitung, found a different basis for accusing America of a double standard. The United States was then engaged in a brutal occupation of the Philippines, and Zeitung conveyed that it “doubts the unselfishness of the American step, since the Romanian Jews are probably much better off than the Filipinos.”[51] In the same vein, a paper from the German city of Dresden argued that the United States had precious little credibility not merely because of its maltreatment of Filipinos but also because of “lynch law” whereby countless American Blacks were savagely murdered. “Romania should either remain silent or send a protest to the United States against lynch law and the treatment of the Filipinos, lest the negroes and Filipinos all emigrate to Romania,” the paper sneered.[52] This kind of commentary previewed a recurring theme throughout Roosevelt’s presidency wherein America’s own human rights abuses would undermine his claim to an altruistic agenda abroad.

The European newspapers, divided as they were on the propriety of the Romanian Note, also diverged in their predictions of its impact. Some thought it would prompt action from the signatory nations; others expected continued inertia.[53] Britain fell into the former camp. The British government had already been under pressure from a coterie of powerful Jews and Gentiles within its borders to join any remonstrance that might come from Washington.[54] When the note from the State Department went public, Britain sent a note of its own to the fellow signatories. That British note seconded American concern for Romanian Jewry and sounded out the other European powers about what action they might collectively take. The Foreign Office in London released a statement that its note “follows and supplements the action taken by the American government, which is entitled to full credit for seeking to alleviate the condition of those oppressed people.”[55] However, an unnamed member of the Foreign Office candidly acknowledged to the press that Britain was unlikely to inspire the Continent to do anything: “Nothing that will be of any permanent good can result from Secretary Hay’s note … unless somebody is willing to crush Romania, and no power seems anxious to take on that task.”[56] His pessimism proved well-founded.

Two days later, the New York Times announced that Germany would definitively not intercede on behalf of Romanian Jewry. Germany’s official rationale was the diplomatic custom of abstention from another nation’s internal affairs, but the Times contended that Germany had financial incentives to refrain. Germans held significant shares of Romanian securities, making the German government hesitant to meddle and thereby risk those investments. Austria and Russia were equally unwilling to act.[57] Several state-funded newspapers in the capitals of the various signatories suggested that these countries were more likely to collaborate on a rebuke of America for undue interference in European matters.[58]

Romania, for its part, showed little willingness to mend its ways. The Romanian minister to Britain gave an interview in which he simply dissembled about the condition of Romanian Jews. He peddled the fiction that Jews were leaving Romania owing to an agricultural decline.[59] This was a particularly audacious lie given that Romania forbade Jews from purchasing farmland, working someone else’s land, or even living in rural areas.[60] With nonexistent support from its fellow signatories, Britain had to content itself with a symbolic gesture of its displeasure: the Romanian ambassador was deliberately excluded from a banquet hosted by the Lord Mayor of London.[61]

* * *

The Romanian Note may have failed to stir meaningful action in Europe, but it did prove strikingly successful in winning over the affection of Jews in the United States. At a synagogue on the Upper East Side, a rabbi delivered a sermon that was quoted at length in the New York Times in which he extolled the “noble plea” of the American government to “prevent the upstart monarchy” from “crushing into dust its unfortunate Jewish subjects.” The rabbi also lauded the Romanian Note as embodying the principles of the Declaration of Independence.[62]

Ever since the note became public, John Hay had been inundated with messages of thanks from Jews across the country.[63] Jews in Milwaukee who had established a Romanian Relief Committee sent a telegram to Hay that expressed “profound gratitude for the timely protest.… An all-wise Providence will bless our Nation for acts like this.”[64] A rabbi in Indiana sent a letter of thanks to John Hay written exclusively in Hebrew. Hay drafted a response in English and then tasked a translator at the State Department with producing a Hebrew version for the rabbi. This marks perhaps the only instance in American history when a secretary of state sent a message on official department letterhead in Hebrew.[65]

The administration was repaid for the Romanian Note with public praise from a key figure in Jewish advocacy and Republican circles: Simon Wolf. Like Jacob Schiff and Oscar Straus, Wolf was a self-made German-Jewish immigrant who emerged as a key spokesperson on Jewish causes. And like Roosevelt, he was a veritable Swiss Army knife of versatility: prominent lawyer, prolific author, former diplomat, outspoken advocate, and energetic philanthropist. Wolf was known as “the Nestor of American Jewry”—an allusion to a sage king from Greek mythology. He enjoyed the ear of many presidents throughout his long career, and Roosevelt was no exception.[66]

Not long after the Romanian Note’s publication, Wolf delivered a Yom Kippur address in Washington that was covered in the press. He celebrated the “high resolve and exalted humanity” of the U.S. government. Even as Wolf conceded that the note had been shrugged off by Romania and the signatories—“the absolute effect of this immortal circular may not be apparent”—he nonetheless argued that the note formed a virtuous precedent whose “moral effect will be lasting for all time.” John Hay had received much of the public acclaim, but Wolf knew that Roosevelt also deserved credit. In his Yom Kippur remarks, he made sure to show appreciation “for the noble President who inspired it, and the no less noble Secretary who gave it expression.”[67] Wolf was equally enthused about the administration in correspondence. He privately told the publisher of a Jewish newspaper that he was “thoroughly satisfied” with the “splendid letter,” which was “record making and bound to be of great service to our people at home and abroad."[68]

Jacob Schiff penned an effusive letter of indebtedness to Roosevelt for sending a note of "such momentous importance."[69] In reply, Roosevelt credited Schiff and Congressman Littauer for their involvement in the matter: "It was you, and second to you, Lucius Littauer, who did the most to fix my attention on the matter of the persecution of the Romanian Jews. You have every right to feel pleased with the result."[70] Schiff was gratified by the administration and confident it would undertake additional efforts for Romanian Jewry. As he wrote the head of the Alliance, which had been so central in giving humanitarian aid to embattled Jewish communities, "I believe we can count upon the president's willingness to follow up what has already been done by further action, which it might be necessary and practicable to take."[71]

Jacob Schiff's letter didn't specify what "further action" might entail, but Simon Wolf had a concrete idea that he floated to Roosevelt. Recall that the United States did not have a diplomat specifically for Romania; Wolf reasoned that the appointment of one might placate the king and ease his hostility toward Jews. He told Roosevelt, "Such representation would be of great service to both countries and the unfortunates for whom you have interested yourself so splendidly."[72] Regardless of the merit or naiveté of Wolf's proposal, Roosevelt did not pursue it.

* * *

The 1902 midterm elections were then looming, and Republicans well understood that they could court Jewish voters on the back of the Romanian Note. A Gentile politico, Charles Treat, advised Roosevelt to dispatch John Hay to Jewish neighborhoods in New York City in advance of election day. "The mere fact of his presence, and words of cheer and advice, would arouse more enthusiasm than all the meetings we have had," Treat insisted. "The appreciation of the Hebrews for Mr. Hay's splendid defense [on] their behalf in the Romanian matter has evoked a tremendous outburst of gratitude."[73] Hay would make no such entrée into the political sphere, but Democrats were nonetheless concerned that Republicans were poised to perform well with Jewish constituents. The New York Times reported that the Romanian American Citizens' League—apparently a Jewish organization—would endorse the Republican ticket as a gesture of thanks for the Romanian Note.[74] On the Shabbat before the vote, the Romanian Note was read in a number of synagogues to remind Jews where the Roosevelt administration stood.[75] Measuring the influence of the Romanian Note on the midterms is difficult. Political observers would have to wait another two years to see the impact of Roosevelt himself at the top of the ballot.

For all the goodwill from American Jews, consternation arose from an unexpected corner. Recall that in 1898, the prominent rabbi Joseph Krauskopf had convened with Roosevelt in Cuba and favorably reported on that experience for the American press. But after the midterm elections of 1902, the same rabbi gave a sermon at his synagogue in Philadelphia that criticized the Romanian Note. Most Jewish commentators had been content to overlook the inherent tension in the administration's diplomatic gambit: the United States made a humanitarian plea for the woeful Jews of Romania while justifying its remonstrance by objecting to the influx of those very same Jews to America. The result was a note that could appear sympathetic and disdainful—and Krauskopf would not let this inconsistency pass unmentioned. He acknowledged the "humanitarian" element of America's appeal to Romania but lamented that "by far the larger part" of the note was "self-protective." This dissonance, he insisted, accounted for the lack of progress in mitigating the hardships endured by Romanian Jewry. Although in reality the note's stated misgivings about indigent newcomers was a fabricated pretext for the humanitarian entreaty, Krauskopf feared that the reverse was true: altruism was a mere cover for nativism. In his words, the Romanian Note's grievance about immigration "throws the humanitarian phase into questionable form that makes it appear as but a diplomatic sugar coating of a very bitter pill."[76] Possibly as a concession to Roosevelt, the rabbi waited until after the midterms to render his opinion. Or perhaps Krauskopf's timing was simply designed to avoid the impression that his remarks were politically tinged.

Krauskopf may have misinterpreted the administration's motives, but he wasn't wrong about the note's futility. There seemed to be little cause for optimism that Romanian Jews would enjoy better circumstances on the ground. Two weeks after the note became public, Hay had forthrightly acknowledged to Oscar Straus that concrete action from either the signatories or Romania was unlikely. "For the moment Romania seems obdurate, and some of the great powers indifferent, to the moral question involved," Hay conceded, while still offering with vague optimism that perhaps "some good may result from what we have done."[77] Three months later, Jacob Schiff confessed to a prominent German Jew, "I fear nevertheless that there has been no radical change in Romania in favor of the Jews.… But let us not lose hope."[78] There was some small reason for hope—conditions may not have improved for Romanian Jewry, but neither did they worsen. In the wake of the note, the Romanian government abstained from new restrictions on Jews. Still, that would have been little recompense for a Jewish community that was among the most oppressed in the world.[79]

⋆⋆⋆

Although the note proved ineffectual for Romanian Jews, its repercussions in other realms were significant. The affair began to solidify what might be called Roosevelt's Jewish kitchen cabinet: Jacob Schiff, the tycoon; Oscar Straus, the diplomat; Lucius Littauer, the lawmaker; and Simon Wolf, the renaissance man. Having consulted these Jewish leaders about the Romanian issue, Roosevelt would turn to them on other matters of Jewish concern throughout his presidency. This approach to statecraft more closely resembled a past era when Court Jews aided European royals than it did our modern age's reliance on professional technocrats.

The Romanian Note also demonstrated the potential for foreign policy initiatives to influence domestic electoral politics. Votes could be had in Jewish neighborhoods in America if Roosevelt was willing to make gestures—even largely symbolic ones—in defense of Jewry abroad. No historical evidence suggests that Roosevelt was motivated by an electoral agenda in this particular instance, but after now glimpsing the value at the ballot box of supporting Jewish causes, the president would be mindful of such considerations in the future.

That the United States confronted Romania at all is notable when measured against the non-reaction of the European signatories, Britain excepted. European Jews realized that their efforts were wasted in requesting the aid of their own governments. Far better for them to rally their American coreligionists to put pressure on Roosevelt.

Moreover, the Romanian Note set an important precedent that the Roosevelt administration would potentially intercede in the internal affairs of another country on a humanitarian basis, even as that humanitarianism was awkwardly couched in (contrived) objections about immigrants. To be sure, there have been moments in American foreign policy when the country clothed its self-interest in the garb of human rights; the Romanian Note stands as a vivid illustration of the reverse.

* * *

Months after Romanian Jews ceased to make front-page headlines, Roosevelt maintained his interest in their plight. He asked Hay in March 1903, “Would it be possible to have our Minister, when he goes to Romania, find out what has been accomplished under your note concerning the Romanian Jews?”[80] The minister in question was John Jackson, the newly installed ambassador in Greece whose regional remit covered Romania. Secretary Hay tapped Jackson to uncover whether the note—circulated to the signatories fully seven months earlier—had moved them to bring any pressure to bear on Romania. “The matter is one in which the president has deep interest,” Hay emphasized.[81]

The following month, Jackson informed Hay that the European powers had taken no action whatsoever. He also trivialized Jewish affliction in Romania, claiming that the country didn’t perpetuate antisemitism. After painting a fictitiously rosy picture of Romanian-Jewish life, Jackson’s letter concluded, “Their sufferings have been exaggerated.”[82] Jackson’s glib disregard for Jewish anguish is striking given the relatively bold intervention that the administration had made the prior summer on behalf of Romanian Jewry. While Jackson took their plight far less seriously than did Roosevelt, imminent events showed just how terrifying life could become for Eastern Europe's Jews. The very next day in Kishinev—a city situated just over the Romanian border, in southwestern Russia—a sudden explosion of anti-Jewish violence would shock the American conscience.

OceanofPDF.com

3

KISHINEV PETITION

At the dawn of the twentieth century, Kishinev was a handsome and even elegant city. It served as the capital of the province of Bessarabia and featured a number of stately government buildings. The principal avenue was a wide thoroughfare lined with acacia trees. Amid the upscale streets of the city center, townsfolk patronized stores, banks, and jewelers. Fashionable crowds would congregate in the evenings at the People's Park to enjoy performances by military bands. The pleasing architecture, rich foliage, and Royal Gardens all gave Kishinev the feel of an affluent and modern community. But underneath this civilized exterior, an antisemitic rage burned.[1]

Bessarabia had been annexed into the Russian Empire during the early nineteenth century. Part of the Pale of Settlement, Bessarabia in general and Kishinev in particular were home to a sizable Jewish population.[2] The city's 130,000 residents included 50,000 Jews, another 50,000 Moldavans, and 8,000 Russians. Most of the remainder originated from various Balkan territories. Some of these Jews enjoyed prosperity, but a majority were impoverished laborers and craftsmen. As with other places in the Pale, Kishinev's Jews subsisted under special strictures. They were forbidden from purchasing land or serving in high government posts. And although Jews comprised nearly 40 percent of the population, state schools implemented quotas that kept Jewish enrollment at no more than 5 percent.[3]

The prejudice against Kishinev’s Jews began to metastasize into something even more sinister in the late 1890s. Under the direction of a virulently bigoted editor, the city’s sole newspaper—the Bessarabetz—inundated readers with an endless torrent of antisemitic vitriol. One conspiratorial story after the next painted Jews as traitors to Russia and as threats to Christianity. The Bessarabetz circulated widely among municipal bureaucrats, police officers, and the lower classes. Kishinev was fast becoming a tinderbox of Jew hatred. Then came the spark that would ignite a conflagration.[4]

* * *

In February of 1903, the corpse of a missing Christian boy was uncovered in a village outside Kishinev. The murderer would ultimately turn out be the victim’s own cousin, but a rumor abounded that Jews had slain the child. It was alleged that homicidal Jews needed the boy’s blood as an ingredient in their unleavened bread for the Passover holiday.[5] This kind of blood libel against Jews was a hoary trope with medieval roots.[6] The Bessarabetz recklessly perpetrated the rumor and demanded vengeance against the Jewish community. Fearful that a violent outbreak was imminent, Kishinev’s Jews appealed to authority figures for help. The provincial governor offered them words of reassurance but took no action to preempt a pogrom. When the city’s chief rabbi asked the Greek bishop to disavow the baseless accusations, the bishop refused, confessing that he wasn’t sure the Jews were actually innocent. The police chief, for his part, reportedly said it would “serve the Jews right if they were driven from the city.”[7]

On Easter Sunday came the attack. What began with some rowdy youngsters picking on Jews soon escalated into adults ransacking Jewish businesses.[8] A mob plundered a saloon on Armenia Street owned by the Feldstein family. One rioter uncovered a slab of meat in the saloon, climbed atop the roof, and announced to the horde below, “Here are the remains of a Christian child found in the house of the wealthy Jew.” When the gang broke into Feldstein’s cellar and uncovered champagne, rioters toasted the editor of the Bessarabetz newspaper.[9]

Thus began a two-day pogrom whose brutality would evoke worldwide horror when the details later became known. Mobs roamed the streets, pillaging and massacring with abandon. At No. 13 Asia Street—an apartment building whose eight families were all Jewish—pogromists found a tradesman named Mordecai Greenschopin taking refuge in a shed. They forced him out and beat him lifeless with poles. Other residents of No. 13 were then hunted down and savagely killed, with rioters using crowbars as instruments of death. The victims' corpses were left to rot on the street for hours.[10]

In one of Kishinev's most indigent Jewish neighborhoods, a gang stormed Meyer Weissman's small grocery store. He had sixty rubles and offered his assailants the money in exchange for his life. But the gang leader wasn't satisfied with the rubles alone, announcing, "Now, we want your eye; you will never again look upon a Christian child." Weissman had already lost one eye in his youth, and he now pleaded with the mob to murder him—he would rather die than be fully blind. They used a pointed stick to puncture his one good eye, leaving Weissman to live in darkness.[11]

Throughout Kishinev, Jewish women endured appalling gang rapes. Many of these women knew their rapists by name and fruitlessly begged them to stop. One such victim was twenty-four-year-old Rivka Schiff. After she was found hiding with other Jews in an attic, she was raped more than half a dozen times. Rivka personally knew one of her assailants, pleading with him, "You have known me for many years." Her cries fell on deaf ears, as her husband and other Jews watched her assault in horror.[12]

Christian homeowners warded off the gangs by drawing crosses on their windows. When Jews tried to fool the mobs with the same tactic, it proved ineffective, which suggests that the pogromists were given advance knowledge about which homes were Jewish.[13] Most policemen were indifferent and made little effort to protect Jewish lives, but there were some officers who arrested rioters and safeguarded individual Jews. Moreover, a number of Christians hid their Jewish neighbors. Still other Jews took their fate in their own hands. Around 250 of them—bearing guns and clubs—congregated in a courtyard and managed to stave off pogromists. But whatever success that group had was anomalous; elsewhere in Kishinev, Jewish efforts at resistance were too isolated to overcome the mob’s numerical advantage.[14]

Late in the afternoon on the second day, Bessarabia’s governor authorized the use of military force to break up the pogrom. The soldiers also picked up the corpses littering the streets; many of these bodies had been showered in feathers as a final act of degradation.[15] In the end, forty-nine Jews were killed and many others hospitalized with severe physical trauma. More than a hundred children became orphans. Property damage amounted to over two million rubles (about $40 million in American dollars today). Entire streets had been effectively demolished. Kishinev Jewry lay in ruins.[16]

* * *

The first reports of the slaughter appeared in the American press on April 23, two days after it concluded.[17] Soon the papers were casting doubt on Russia’s official narrative of the pogrom, which had sought to downplay the extent of the violence.[18] By April 29, the Jewish leader Simon Wolf decided to write Secretary of State John Hay about the “terrible outrages and massacres practiced upon the Jews of Kishinev.” He noted that a number of U.S. citizens wished to send aid to relatives in Kishinev who might have been afflicted. Wolf also asked whether the State Department would tap its ambassador in Russia, Robert McCormick, to furnish “prompt and reliable information” about the condition of the victims and to inquire whether the Russian government would permit charitable donations from Americans.[19] The State Department acted on Wolf’s request, and Ambassador McCormick cabled back to Washington: “It is authoritatively denied that there is any want or suffering among Jews in southwestern Russia.”[20] McCormick here was merely relaying the Russian position, not vouching for its accuracy.

Just as Russia was brazenly denying reality, eyewitness accounts of the pogrom began to surface in American papers.[21] Meetings were organized by various synagogues and Jewish societies in New York, Philadelphia, Cleveland, and Milwaukee.[22] Yiddish newspapers in America initiated fundraising drives.[23] From affluent bankers to impoverished immigrants, Jews nationwide donated what they could. “The heart of Israel is touched,” said a member of a relief committee. “It is sore with the sorrow for its martyred brethren.”[24] Although the Jewish community in the United States had any number of internal divisions, Kishinev united American Jewry like nothing else.

The Windsor Theater in lower Manhattan staged a specially produced play, The Destruction of Kishinev, and donated half the proceeds of the play’s five-night run to a relief fund.[25] Other theaters contributed a portion of their revenue from their regularly scheduled performances.[26] In an early indication that the pogrom would awaken the conscience of non-Jews, a Chinese theater in New York sponsored three benefit shows that sold out all five hundred seats each evening.[27]

Daily newspaper coverage divulged graphic details as they became available about the pogrom’s carnage. Western journalists debunked the blood libel that had been invoked to justify the violence. They also blamed Russian authorities—central and local—for allowing such atrocities.[28]

Public pressure mounted in the United States for the Roosevelt administration to take some kind of action. In New York, a group of five hundred Jewish veterans of the Spanish-American War passed a series of resolutions calling on the president to coax Russia into prosecuting the pogromists.[29] Appeals for some kind of official response inundated the State Department.[30] And mass meetings were held in Baltimore, Boston, Dallas, Hartford, Philadelphia, and even Texarkana.[31] Some of these gatherings attracted thousands of people.[32] Leading citizens and elected officials—Jew and Gentile alike—joined the fray on behalf of Kishinev’s victims. In Chicago, a large assemblage at the Star Theatre heard two public icons inveigh against Russia: the settlement house pioneer Jane Addams and renowned trial lawyer Clarence Darrow.[33]

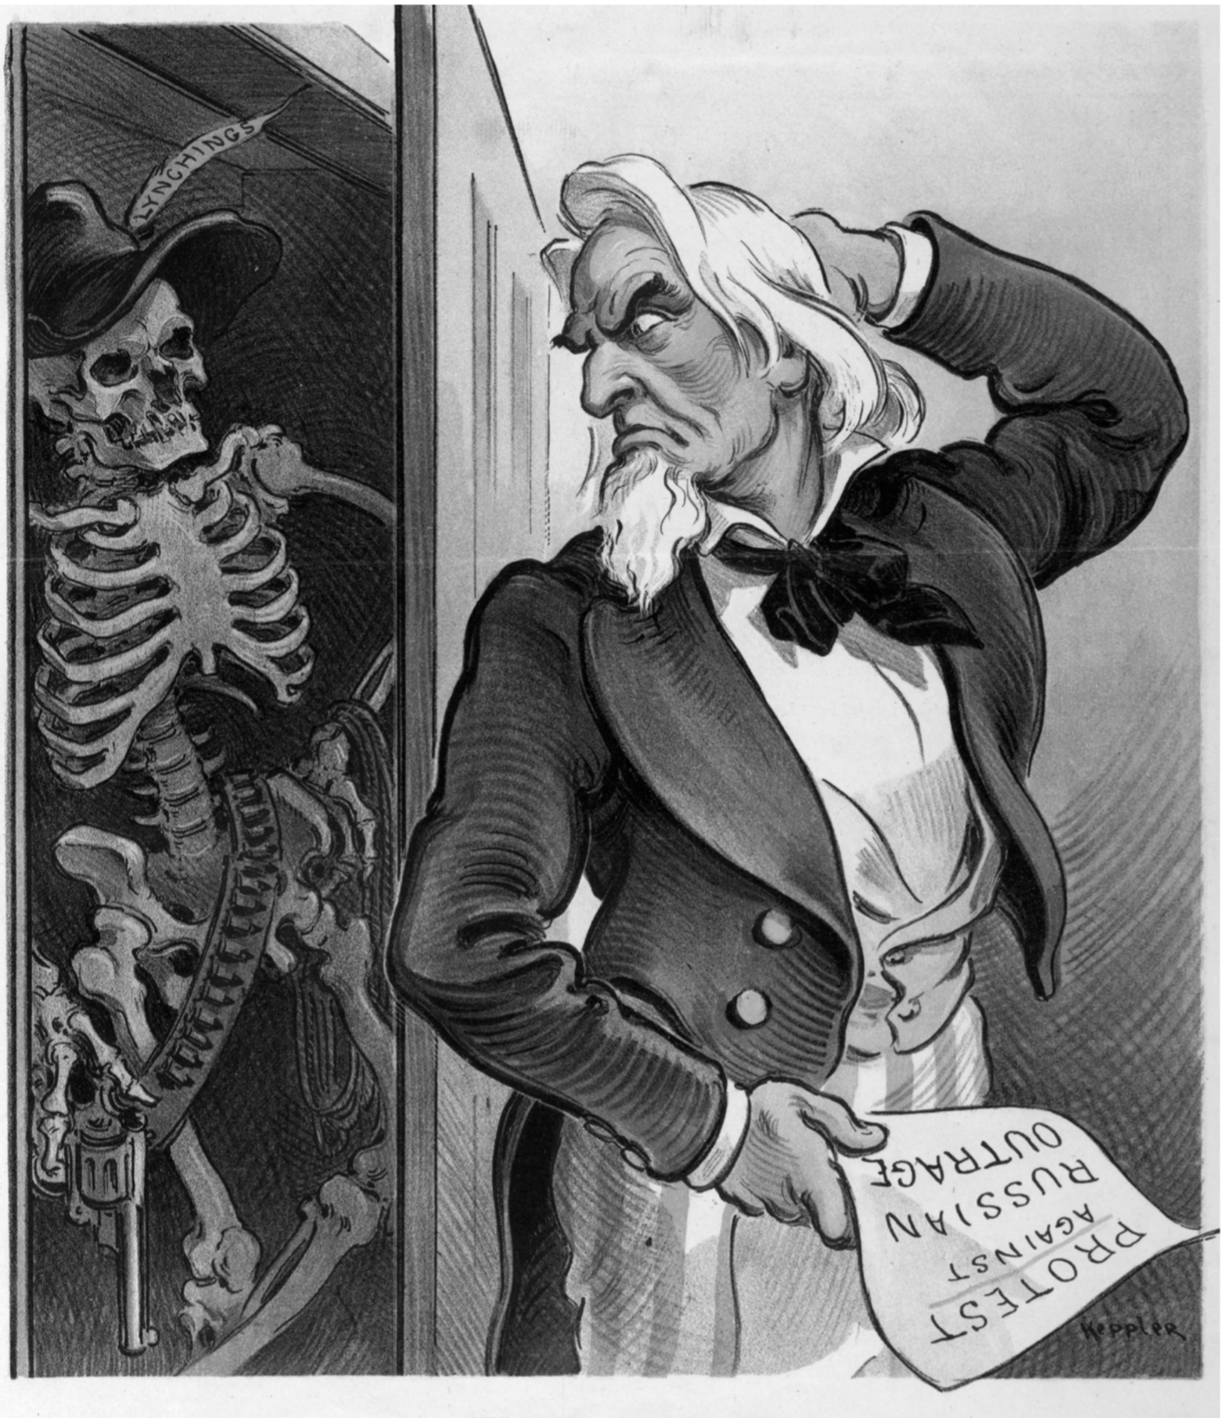
Meanwhile the Russian ambassador to the United States, Count Arthur Cassini, issued an extraordinary statement to the Associated Press. He blamed Kishinev’s Jews for the crimes that had been visited upon them. Count Cassini insisted that the “unfriendly attitude” toward Jews in Russia was justified because Jews opted to work as moneylenders instead of agrarians. The typical Jewish financier took “advantage of the Russian peasant, whom he soon has in his power and ultimately destroys.” Thus any animosity toward Jews was “only natural.”[34] Given this callous diatribe from Russia’s ambassador, Americans could hardly have been surprised when their press began reporting that the criminal probe in Kishinev was led by a prominent antisemite who was all too eager to exonerate the pogrom’s culprits.[35]

* * *

Jacob Schiff, the influential Jewish philanthropist, beseeched John Hay to speak out against Russia. But Hay was resistant. “I might feel precisely as you do in regard to it,” Hay wrote Schiff, “but you are free to express your feelings and I am not.” Hay believed, as a matter of diplomatic protocol, that the United States had no business interfering with internal Russian affairs. He pointedly challenged Schiff, “What possible advantage would it be to the United States, and what possible advantage to the Jews of Russia, if we should make a protest against these fiendish cruelties and be told that it was none of our business?”[36] It is unsurprising that Hay proved more reluctant here than he had been with the Romanian Note the year prior. Russia was a more powerful country than Romania; Hay well understood that alienating the former was a higher-risk proposition that could meaningfully threaten international trade for American businesses.

As public demonstrations from San Francisco to Yonkers continued apace, Theodore Roosevelt considered his options. The president asked Hay “if it would be advisable for me to contribute one hundred dollars [about $3,500 today] to some fund for the relief of the Russian Jews.” He directed Hay to solicit the opinion of other cabinet members as well; the secretary of war quashed the idea.[37] Thus began a pattern that would recur throughout the Kishinev affair wherein Roosevelt exhibited sympathetic instincts toward Jews that his Gentile advisors then tried to rein in.

The president was, of course, receiving a very different message from the Jewish community. Stephen Wise, a young rabbi known for his captivating oratory and inspired activism, personally met with Roosevelt and encouraged him to issue a statement condemning the bloodbath. Rabbi Wise followed up with a letter to TR highlighting instances over the past thirty years when the United States had spoken out against antisemitism on humanitarian grounds. Wise also conveyed his anxiety that the Kishinev pogrom was merely a “prelude to further scenes of violence” and stressed that a public word from the president would likely “have the effect of staying the hand of the oppressor.”[38]



LYNCHINGS
PROTEST AGAINST RUSSIAN OUTRAGE
KEPPLER

A SKELETON OF HIS OWN.

FIGURE 3.1. The U.S. government symbolized by Uncle Sam whose proverbial skeleton in the closet is race-based lynching. Source: “A Skeleton of His Own,” Puck, July 29, 1903.

Roosevelt’s instinct was to do something, but he would not pursue any particular plan without Hay’s assent. A few days after hearing from Rabbi

Wise, the president wrote Hay wondering, “Would it do any good for me to say a word [on] behalf of the Jews such as asked for, or would it do harm?” Roosevelt’s letter grappled with the uncomfortable reality that Russia had arguably just as much as right to censure America’s own problem with extralegal killing. “I suppose it would be very much like the czar expressing his horror of our lynching negroes,” he reasoned.[39] Pogroms and lynchings did involve the same grisly factors: targeted violence at a marginalized group, the effective consent of local authorities, and a spurious insistence that the bloodshed was legitimate retribution for some alleged wrongdoing.[40] There is no extant reply from Hay to Roosevelt’s letter—perhaps he responded by phone or in person—but we can glean from Hay’s later behavior that he surely did not advise the president to speak out about Kishinev.

* * *

Public pressure for action against Russia proved unrelenting. The Philadelphia Inquirer detailed in late May that there was “little or no abatement during the week in the interest aroused by the reports from Kishinev,” adding, “Everywhere in the civilized world … the sentiments aroused by this dreadful affair are those of horror.”[41] A play entitled The Story of Kishinev: A Tragedy in Five Acts was selling out nightly in New York.[42] Gatherings in support of the victims proliferated in large cities and small towns alike; often these meetings adopted resolutions requesting a diplomatic response from the Roosevelt administration.[43] Although there would be some compassionate reaction in Europe to the Kishinev pogrom—a couple protests and fundraising for the victims—it was nowhere near the scale of the outcry in America.[44] This discrepancy is unsurprising. For one, more Jews were living in the United States than in any European country, aside from Russia itself.[45] And Europe’s tortured history of antisemitism had taught Old World Jews the hazards of speaking up too emphatically.[46]

The most prominent demonstration in America took place in late May in New York’s Carnegie Hall. Before a throng of 3,500 people, Mayor Seth

Low celebrated the city as a haven for Jewish life dating back to the days of Dutch colonial rule. He also proudly noted that fundraising for Kishinev's Jews had begun on the Lower East Side even before the pogrom became a newspaper sensation. A number of other Gentile luminaries gave speeches, including the president of Cornell University and a prominent Baptist minister.[47]

The main attraction at Carnegie Hall that evening was an ex-president, Grover Cleveland. His presence elicited an effusive display of affection from the audience. As the New York Times observed, "The two upper galleries, thronged to their utmost capacity, were white with waving handkerchiefs and echoed with applause."[48] Cleveland asked the crowd to condemn the atrocities of Kishinev and provide financial relief for the survivors with "all the moral force which our American citizenship gives to us." But then he struck a cautionary note, maintaining that the "dictates of American conservatism and moderation" required the public to "forgo perplexing and extreme demands upon our government" for diplomatic interference with the Russian Empire.[49] A local paper was displeased with the former president's call for restraint, expressing "regret that Mr. Cleveland followed up his warm and manly denunciation of the murders and outrages with a timid plea for the withholding of pressure."[50]

Kishinev continued to command daily attention from the American press, and with good reason. Because it took time for a full accounting of the facts, some novel piece of information from Kishinev was always surfacing. Western journalists had to make the journey to Kishinev, where upon arrival they unearthed new stories based on testimony from victims and witnesses on the ground. They also covered the pogrom's aftermath in Kishinev—the fate of survivors, the response of Russian officials, the consequences (or lack thereof) for the accused. And once these newspaper correspondents left Russian soil and thus no longer had to contend with the Russian censors, they could furnish additional details they had earlier withheld.[51] What's more, the ceaseless sequence of public gatherings within the United States ensured that there were perennially fresh stories on the domestic front. From the American Baptist Missionary Union to the city council of Detroit, rising numbers of Gentiles were organizing in protest of Kishinev's violence. It was a mainstream story, not just a Jewish one.[52] Increasingly, questions about the proper diplomatic play from the Roosevelt administration came to preoccupy journalists.

* * *

Letters urging action from John Hay deluged the State Department in numbers too numerous to enable replies, but one particular missive did merit a response. Simon Wolf had written Hay asking him to meet with the leaders of B'nai B'rith, the oldest Jewish humanitarian organization in the country (B'nai B'rith means "Children of the Covenant"). Wolf himself was a member of B'nai B'rith's executive committee. The barrage of public pressure apparently was having some effect—it was announced in early June that Secretary Hay would indeed meet with a delegation from B'nai B'rith in two weeks' time.[53]

As the B'nai B'rith meeting in Washington drew near, Russia released a statement seeking to stymie both donations for victims and criticism of its government: "The Emperor has the means at hand to relieve suffering wherever it appears in his empire," and so aid from abroad "must be declined."[54] This line was just spurious posturing—Americans had already sent nearly 200,000 rubles to Kishinev (over $3 million U.S. dollars today).[55] The Russian statement further cited the principle of noninterference between nations and announced, accordingly, that St. Petersburg would refuse "to receive any representations regarding the Kishinev incident from a foreign power."[56]

Caught between Russian obstinance and American outcry, Roosevelt met with Russia's ambassador, Count Cassini, for nearly an hour in Washington on June 12. Neither party offered any public word about that meeting in its immediate aftermath. But behind closed doors, Cassini assured Roosevelt that several hundred suspects were in custody and would be held to account in court. He also informed TR that Russia had replaced the governor of Bessarabia.[57] Undoubtedly, Cassini's principal aim here was to preempt an embarrassing censure of his country from the United States on the global stage.

Foreign policy wasn’t the only source of friction between Count Cassini and President Roosevelt. Both statesmen were alarmed by the combustible companionship between their irreverent daughters: nineteen-year-old Alice Roosevelt and twenty-one-year-old Marguerite Cassini. Together, Alice and Marguerite formed a rambunctious duo that romped their way through the socialite scene. “Our friendship had the violence of a bomb,” Marguerite later recalled. They were thrill-seekers who scorned social convention; their penchant for fast cars, day drinking, and betting at the race track all scandalized polite society. Newspapers gleefully reported on what Marguerite called their “veritable reign of terror.” The American president and Russian ambassador were each convinced that the other’s daughter was a nefarious influence on his own.[58]

Meanwhile Simon Wolf and the other members of the B’nai B’rith Executive Committee converged on the Arlington Hotel in Washington on June 14.[59] The pinnacle of luxury, the Arlington served as the accommodation of choice for princes, dukes, and emperors visiting the American capital. Numerous senators took up residence in the hotel’s elegant quarters. The Arlington’s manager enjoyed wide renown for his diligence in meeting guests’ every need. But the B’nai B’rith leaders didn’t likely have time to avail themselves of the hotel’s ornate parlors or billiard room.[60] They were consumed with preparations for not one but two meetings: after convening with John Hay, they would be granted an audience with Theodore Roosevelt himself. Count Cassini sent word that he wanted to personally speak that day with Simon Wolf and the B’nai B’rith president, Leo Levi. They refused the offer, feeling it inappropriate to take a meeting with the Russian ambassador when they already had one pending with their own country’s secretary of state and president.[61]

B’nai B’rith’s leaders decided that they would present the Roosevelt administration with two possible courses of action. The first would entail a petition of protest—arranged by B’nai B’rith and signed by leading American citizens of all religions—that the administration would “unofficially or semi-officially” transmit to the czar. The second option would be for the United States government to organize an international conference addressing “persecutions and oppressions” rooted in “racial and religious prejudices."[62] It is unclear whether B'nai B'rith intended the prospective conference to deal only with Russian pogroms or to confront hatred worldwide.

FIGURE 3.2. Alice Roosevelt. Credit: Frances Benjamin Johnston. Source: Library of Congress, Prints and Photographs Division.

At 10:30 the following morning, Wolf, Levi, and several other members of B'nai B'rith's executive committee arrived at the State Department to see John Hay. Levi, as president, spoke for the group and offered its recommendation for a petition or conference.[63] He also gave Hay a memo outlining why the Roosevelt administration would be justified in taking either or both measures, despite the fact that no Americans were victims in Kishinev: Russian persecution drove Jewish émigrés to the United States, and their anti-Russian sentiment helped foment hostility to Russia among the American public generally, thereby weakening Russian-American relations. Pogroms were thus implicated in international relations and a proper subject of diplomacy. This was similar, if not quite identical, to the rationale that the administration had used to legitimize the Romanian Note the year prior.[64]

John Hay fully appreciated that this meeting wasn't merely an opportunity for him to hear from representatives of the Jewish community. It was also an exercise in public relations. The press had already widely reported that the administration would receive a delegation from B'nai B'rith. And so Hay responded in the meeting with prepared remarks that were transcribed for public release. Nearly two months since the pogrom, Kishinev still made daily news—Hay could be sure that whatever statement he offered, the first official one from the administration, would become front-page fodder. He began by recognizing the "deep emotion" that the "cruel outrages" in Kishinev had inspired around the world. Hay also noted the estimable role of Jews in American life. "Nobody can ever make the Americans think ill of the Jews," he insisted. "We know them too well." Hay's categorical assertion here was more aspirational than factual given that antisemitism still had some purchase in the United States.[65]

Hay then made clear that he was firmly committed to noninterference, a position he tried to finesse by lauding American Jewry for its "power of self-restraint" and suggesting that the Roosevelt administration "must exhibit the same." He asked his Jewish visitors to pay heed that "no civilized government in the world has yet taken official action—this consideration alone would bid us to proceed with care." Hay also celebrated the czar as a "man whose personal character is even more elevated than his exalted station" and praised Russia as a "great and friendly nation." America was thus obliged to assume that such an "enlightened sovereign" was surely "doing all that lies in his power to put a stop to these atrocities."[66] These obsequious comments, which were sure to make the papers and come to St. Petersburg's attention, reflected Hay's desire to preserve Russian-American relations rather than any heartfelt admiration for the czar. Hay was plainly disinclined to endorse action from the administration.[67]

After meeting for forty minutes, John Hay accompanied the B'nai B'rith delegation to the White House, where the president welcomed the Jewish leaders. They had already drafted the text of a petition that the administration could submit to the czar, and Levi handed it to Roosevelt. It began with a damning recitation of the facts surrounding the Kishinev pogrom, wherein "derelict" local officials allowed mobs animated by "religious prejudice" to butcher "hapless Jews." The petition maintained that the circumstances precipitating the pogrom—a toxic mix of bigotry and lawlessness—weren't unique to Kishinev but pervasive throughout the Pale of Settlement. Haunted by the prospect of additional massacres, Russian Jews faced a difficult choice: (1) abandon their homes and struggle as foreigners abroad or (2) stay in Russia and brace for the next wave of bloodshed. The Jewish exodus from Russia now had the dubious honor of surpassing Spain's Inquisition and rivaling Pharaoh's Egypt, the petition alleged.[68]

While exhibiting little restraint in its rhetoric about pogroms, the petition did strategically soften its tone when discussing the czar. It credited him with helping establish the international court at The Hague. The petition urged the czar to announce that "the humblest subject or citizen may worship according to the dictates of his own conscience." If the czar defended that basic right, he would "add new luster to his reign and fame."[69]

Roosevelt closely read the petition before launching into a lengthy discourse. A stenographer was on hand to record his words for circulation to the press. The president first noted that while the Kishinev pogrom had elicited worldwide sympathy, it was only natural that expressions of compassion were most fervent in the United States. After all, America had always enjoyed a special relationship with the Jewish people, Roosevelt said. He further observed that "anyone who goes through any of the old cemeteries of the cities" on the Eastern seaboard "will see the names of many an American of Jewish race, who, in war or in peace, did his full share in the founding of this nation." In an age when many native-born Americans feared that the recent influx of Jewish immigrants undermined the Anglo-Saxon heritage of the country, Roosevelt here tacitly rejected that nativist logic by emphasizing Jewish contributions to the republic's birth.[70]

Unlike Hay, Roosevelt had longstanding ties to the Jewish community, which enabled him to speak at length about his personal relationships with Jews in a way that Hay could not. Roosevelt warmly recounted the Jewish policemen on his force in New York and the Jewish Rough Riders whom he fought alongside in Cuba. Precisely because of those deep and enduring connections to Jewry, "I have felt a degree of personal sympathy and personal horror of this dreadful tragedy," the president explained.[71]

Roosevelt also referenced his positive meeting with Count Cassini three days prior and relayed that "the government of Russia shares the feelings of horror and indignation." In that moment, it must have appeared to the B'nai B'rith delegation that Roosevelt would echo Hay and invoke Russia's supposed concern for Kishinev's victims as a pretext for American inaction. But in fact TR was willing to go beyond Hay. Roosevelt promised he would "consider most carefully the suggestions that you have submitted to me." The president needed time to contemplate whether "existing conditions are such that any further official expression would be of advantage to the unfortunate survivors." In closing, Roosevelt avowed, "Nothing will have my more constant thought than this subject."[72] Perhaps Cassini's last-ditch effort to avert diplomatic censure from the United States would prove fruitless.

At the end of the hour-long meeting, the parties agreed that the White House could publicize all documentation from that morning—the B'nai B'rith memo, the petition, and the transcribed comments of Hay and

Roosevelt. Both the secretary of state and president also acceded to B’nai B’rith’s request for signed photographs for display at the organization’s headquarters. Roosevelt then had to make haste to attend a festival in Baltimore, and he inquired whether Simon Wolf would care to attend as the president’s guest. Wolf, of course, obliged.[73]

* * *

The meetings at the State Department and White House garnered considerable attention. Many newspapers printed substantial portions—sometimes even the entirety—of the remarks by Roosevelt and Hay.[74] The Jewish press, in particular, trumpeted Roosevelt’s sympathetic words to the Jewish delegation. “His answer is in itself a protest and a mighty one,” pronounced the Jewish American.[75]

As Roosevelt weighed his diplomatic options in the days that followed, some on the home front were satisfied that, given his widely covered caucus with B’nai B’rith, the president had done as much as was prudent. He ought to push Russia no further. The New York Press, for instance, maintained that Roosevelt’s comments, while fully warranted, also marked “the very limit” of propriety since no American citizens were victims of the pogrom. It would be ill-advised to proceed along the lines B’nai B’rith recommended in light of the “voluntary assurances of Russia that the murderers would be punished and the governor of the province removed.” On other hand, the New York News was frustrated that Roosevelt hadn’t been bolder. “In spite of the thousands of protests and petitions presented to him, President Roosevelt has refused to make remonstrance to Russia,” the News grumbled.[76]

As the president deliberated whether to forward the B’nai B’rith petition to Russia, Count Cassini spoke to the Associated Press on June 19 in what was surely a calculated bid to influence Roosevelt’s decision. Cassini publicly emphasized to the AP what he had already told Roosevelt in private: the Bessarabian governor had been replaced and the guilty would pay for their crimes. The Russian ambassador also stressed his country’s commitment to protecting its Jewish residents, a message that offered a stark contrast from the prior month when he had insisted that the Jews provoked the pogrom with their greedy moneylending. In conciliatory fashion, Cassini asserted that the attitude of both the Russian government and the Russian people toward the United States was amicable. “To disturb these relations owing to false impressions conceived in hostile quarters would be most deplorable,” he warned.[77]

Count Cassini’s claim that Russia was committed to the security of its Jews was, of course, rooted less in reality than in his desire to soothe tensions with the Roosevelt administration. Simon Wolf was infuriated by the Russian ambassador’s dissembling. And so Wolf took it upon himself not only to issue a piqued letter to Cassini but also to disseminate it to the press. The letter called attention to the systemic degradations imposed on Russian Jews, declaring that the American people and their government would not be misled by Cassini’s attempt to “deceive and obscure.” Wolf pointedly suggested that if Russia was truly as “friendly” toward the United States as Cassini contended, then it could “evidence the friendship by deeds and not by empty phrases.”[78] John Hay—who had so effusively celebrated Russian-American amity in his remarks to B’nai B’rith—must not have been pleased with the contents of Wolf’s publicly released letter.

Nor could Hay have been delighted to learn that Roosevelt resolved to forward B’nai B’rith’s petition to the Russian government. In late June, Hay informed Wolf of the president’s decision in a letter that soon appeared verbatim in the papers. Hay’s letter explained that TR’s determination had hinged on the question of whether such a petition would benefit or harm Russian Jews. Roosevelt, in the end, “decided to accept your opinion, and that of numerous and intelligent groups of American citizens of the Jewish faith whom you represent.” Hay also underscored that the administration couldn’t be sure how Russia might react.[79] Leo Levi, as president of B’nai B’rith, told the press that his organization would work expeditiously to collect signatures for the petition.[80]

Although the historical record doesn’t offer insight into why Roosevelt chose B’nai B’rith’s approach over noninterference, there can be little question that Roosevelt did so against Hay’s counsel. The New York Times reported that Roosevelt had initially opted against the petition idea before reversing course: “After consultation with his advisers, he determined not to forward the petition, because Russia might resent it and … break off diplomatic relations.” But then Roosevelt “reconsidered.” The president, despite the undoubted misgivings of his secretary of state, was prepared to take a diplomatic risk for Jewry.[81]

Word of Roosevelt’s decision was, of course, poorly received in St. Petersburg. According to a “semiofficial news agency” in Russia, the czar’s government would deem the petition to be foreign meddling in domestic matters.[82] The Los Angeles Times anticipated a “diplomatic rupture” between the two countries. The paper also predicted that Count Cassini, who was scheduled to take an imminent summer vacation, would soon find himself on permanent holiday owing to St. Petersburg’s displeasure with the turn of events.[83] Meanwhile, foreign envoys in Washington disapproved of Roosevelt’s pending interference into Russia’s internal affairs. The French ambassador wrote back to Paris that the American president was currying favor with “the influential Jewish coterie” and thereby setting a “most vexatious precedent … a very dangerous policy.”[84]

With tensions escalating, the Associated Press tipped off the State Department in early July about a story that would break in a few hours: the Russians were now confirming their earlier semiofficial refusal to accept the petition and they were denying that Count Cassini had ever engaged in official discussion about Kishinev with the Roosevelt administration. Because John Hay was vacationing with his daughter in Newport, Assistant Secretary of State Francis Loomis received the news from the AP. Loomis immediately wired the president, who was at his summer home in the town of Oyster Bay on Long Island. Loomis’s telegram to Roosevelt disclosed that the AP was about to release the following announcement to the papers: “The Associated Press is authorized to state that the Russian government most positively and absolutely denies the reports that it has offered any official explanation to the American government” through Cassini. The AP statement further relayed that Russia would “categorically refuse” to accept any petition from a foreign power about its domestic life.[85]

Of course, Count Cassini had supplied an explanation when he met with Roosevelt on June 12. Maybe Russia was treating that conversation as unofficial and thus felt justified in refuting the notion that it had furnished an "official explanation." Or perhaps the June 12 meeting had indeed been official and the Russians were now lying about it. After all, Russia's instinct for falsehood had been brazen throughout the Kishinev affair: first Russia gainsaid the pogrom's very existence, then it blamed the Jews for their own macabre fate, and finally it insisted that the victims required no charitable aid. An exasperated Roosevelt would later vent to a friend, "What I cannot understand about the Russian is the way he will lie when he knows perfectly well that you know he is lying."[86]

The president was riled that Russia had gone straight to the American press with the message that the petition would be a futile gesture instead of communicating that position through diplomatic channels. He well understood that the Russian government was attempting to indirectly pressure him by dampening public support in the United States for the petition. Roosevelt fired off a furious letter to John Hay, still in Newport. "I am angered over what I regard as the impertinent action of the Russians in this matter," TR fumed. "They are endeavoring to appeal to the people over our heads." He vowed that if Russia persisted in its present manipulation campaign instead of engaging directly with the State Department, then he would remain steadfast in his resolve to transmit the petition.[87] Russia's strategy was backfiring.

Roosevelt crafted a press release for Loomis to distribute to the papers. TR wrote it such that the remarks were attributed to an unnamed "high official" at the State Department rather than to the president himself. The statement made clear that the Roosevelt administration would disregard Russian declarations made outside the formal methods of diplomacy. It also reaffirmed the U.S. government's willingness to follow through on its commitment to B'nai B'rith, promising to "give expression to deep sympathy felt not only by the administration but by all the American people for the unfortunate Jews." Roosevelt's press release clarified that the administration's failure to have thus far transmitted the petition to Russia was "due solely to the delay in furnishing the address to the State Department by the petitioners," lest anyone misinterpret the ongoing lag to mean that the president had opted, as a concession to Russia, not to forward the petition after all.[88]

The newspapers, with their insatiable interest in all things Kishinev, diligently covered this exercise in diplomatic brinksmanship.[89] Count Cassini declined to issue a rebuttal. St. Petersburg was frustrated that the situation had deteriorated under Cassini’s watch. He was put under strict orders to pass along to the Roosevelt administration verbatim messages from St. Petersburg and not to improvise his own comments.[90]

Journalists were attuned to the fact that the pro-Jewish statement Loomis released—although nominally ascribed to a “high official” at the State Department—had the all the signs of Roosevelt’s doing and none of Hay’s. As the New York Times reported, “It is the understanding that the utterance given out by Assistant Secretary Loomis was authorized from Oyster Bay, [and] there is reason for the belief that it was without the knowledge of Secretary Hay.”[91] Rumors soon began swirling that the divergence between Hay and Roosevelt over the petition might well prompt Hay to resign or Roosevelt to fire him.[92]

* * *

Russian antagonism had made the president want to proceed more quickly with the petition. He directed the State Department to impress upon Simon Wolf the importance of providing the petition to Washington immediately. Wolf wrote a pained letter to Roosevelt in early July explaining that it was a “physical impossibility” for B’nai B’rith to summarily complete its collection of signatures. He reminded Roosevelt of a point that the B’nai B’rith leadership had made in person at the White House: the petition must bear the names of prominent citizens of all faiths and from numerous cities nationwide. Gathering signatures from such a religiously and geographically diverse cohort would convey a resounding message about “the universal feeling” throughout the United States toward Kishinev’s victims. But an endeavor that vast also required time, Wolf noted, especially with so many of the prospective signers on their summer vacations. In his memoirs, Wolf would later recall feeling the “utmost embarrassment” that he could not instantly comply with Roosevelt’s request.[93]

Wolf wrote a follow-up letter to Roosevelt the next day offering the president a chance to change his mind about the petition. “Will it be helping you, the administration, or the American people by not sending the petition?” Wolf inquired. “If so, do not hesitate to say so to me.” Although reversing course now would entail a sacrifice for American Jews, Wolf affirmed that his Jewish compatriots would bear that burden in the name of good citizenship. “The Jew has ever aided and suffered or both,” he observed. “We are prepared to do so now, if by our suffering the Republic of free conscience is benefitted.” But the majority of Wolf’s letter set forth why the president should in fact stand up to Russia. The Russian Empire was merely “masquerading” as a “friend” of the United States as it connived to “create public opinion inimical to your action, and to prevent signing of the petition.” Moreover, Wolf alleged that Russia bribed certain American editorialists to condemn Roosevelt’s handling of the Kishinev affair.[94] Wolf was stretching on this bribery claim. Some of the president’s domestic critics were apt to find fault with any policy that his administration pursued; they required no greasing from Russia to see lapses in TR’s judgment.[95]

Roosevelt, in turn, asked a Jewish contingency—consisting of Simon Wolf, Oscar Straus, and Leo Levi (the B’nai B’rith president)—to plan for a meeting with him in Oyster Bay, to take place in mid-July, for discussion of the petition.[96] In the intervening days, Roosevelt’s personal aide telegrammed Wolf that it would “very inadvisable” for him, Straus, or Levi to speak publicly prior to their meeting with the president.[97] The three Jewish leaders heeded that advice. They convened quietly among themselves several times prior to the Oyster Bay meeting to ensure their own views were in harmony so that they could present a unified opinion to the president.[98] B’nai B’rith, meanwhile, was hastily gathering more signatures.[99]

* * *

That Theodore Roosevelt and Czar Nicholas II both seemed willing to hazard Russian-American relations over a petition is a striking testament to the power of words in international affairs. The standoff was all the more remarkable considering its potential repercussions for East Asian geopolitics. Both Russia and Japan were pursuing imperial ambitions in the region, with Russia then occupying Manchuria while the Japanese controlled Korea, directly to Manchuria's south. Russia and Japan each saw the other as a threat to its own territorial acquisitions. And the United States, for its part, was frustrated that Russia didn't allow American merchants an "open door" to Manchurian ports. With the Russians facing the prospect of a preemptive Japanese invasion of Manchuria, it hardly behooved Russia to antagonize America into siding with Japan.[100] And yet the czar appeared ready to risk Russia's precarious position in Manchuria to forestall a petition about Jews, just as Roosevelt was prepared to jeopardize his own country's prospects for trade in Manchuria to send that very petition.

Some editorialists questioned whether the petition was worth the peril it portended for an already fraught situation in Asia. "It is while this ticklish condition of things exists in the Far East," wrote one New York paper, "that President Roosevelt goes out of his way to fling an insult at Russia which will surely be resented by that country."[101] But the Salt Lake Telegram argued that Roosevelt's approach was admirable precisely because he was daring to privilege principle above profit. The paper acknowledged that Russian-American relations were increasingly estranged and anticipated that if the president proceeded with the petition, "the open door in Manchuria, for which Secretary Hay had been laboring, will be closed by Russia." With so much on the line, Roosevelt's resolute stance was "suggestive of good red blood in the veins." The Salt Lake Telegram advised Roosevelt to show no reluctance in conveying America's disdain for "the butchers of Kishinev."[102] Irrespective of their take on the wisdom of the petition, newspapers of all stripes agreed on this much: the stakes were real, and the consequences global.

Amid speculation that Hay would possibly leave the administration over the Kishinev Petition, he denied as much to both the president and the press.[103] But privately Hay confided in his wife that he might well resign. “I am not ‘doing fixed time’ as in a penitentiary,” he told her.[104] Hay’s frustration is unsurprising—the Manchurian “open door” had long been among his signature ambitions, and now Roosevelt was risking that endeavor in service of a Jewish cause that elicited limited sympathy from Hay.

HANDS OFF RUSSIA
THE EASTERN ?
JEWISH PETITION
ROOSEVELT

ONE LITTLE MATCH MAY FIRE THE WHOLE BUNCH.

FIGURE 3.3. Roosevelt could upend great power politics in the Far East by sending the Kishinev Petition. Source: “One Little Match May Fire the Whole Bunch,” Camden Post-Telegram, July 10, 1903.

TR summoned Hay to his summer home in Oyster Bay to discuss, among other matters, the Kishinev affair.[105] Hay was annoyed. Not only was the Kishinev Petition possibly closing Manchurian doors, but now Hay was being dislodged from his holiday excursion with his daughter—all to attend to a president who wasn't always mindful of other people's time. As Hay was preparing to leave for Oyster Bay, he complained to his wife, "I always find TR engaged with a dozen other people, and it is an hour's wait and a minute's talk—and a certainty that there was no necessity of my coming at all." It would, in fact, be more than an hour's wait on this particular occasion. When Hay reached Oyster Bay, Roosevelt was characteristically playing host to a mélange of guests, which included several senators, a poet, and a shipping tycoon. The president asked Hay, "Will you excuse me till I play a game of tennis?" adding, "I have had no exercise all day." At that moment, a Rough Rider veteran suddenly surfaced to see whether he could hold serve against his former colonel.[106]

Hay bided his time ambling about the eighty-acre estate, which Roosevelt had named Sagamore Hill as an homage to an Indian chieftain who had ruled there centuries earlier.[107] The assortment of gardens, meadows, and orchards must have been some recompense for the slighted secretary of state.[108] Sagamore Hill's greatest charm was its vista; the unspoiled views gave the pleasingly false impression that Roosevelt and his guests had all of Oyster Bay to themselves.[109] The property's Queen Anne style house was sizable—three stories, twenty-eight rooms—but more folksy than luxurious. It certainly lacked the splendor of the Newport mansions where high-society types passed the warmer months. Mounted on the walls of the home were taxidermied animal heads that kept a constant vigil over the Roosevelts and their guests.[110]

Not until the evening did TR finally give Hay a private audience. Whatever precisely was said between them remains unknown, but Hay's pique melted away amid Roosevelt's warmth.[111] The next day Hay confessed to his wife, "The president was so cordial and hospitable that I felt ashamed of my surly crossness at having to go there."[112] In the immediate wake of his trip to Sagamore Hill, Hay was irked by journalists who continued to conjecture that his resignation was imminent. "I despair of the newspapers," Hay wrote Roosevelt, fretting that "the stupid rumor will not cease."[113] But Roosevelt reassured him, "Do not ever give a thought to the newspaper and other swine who delight to invent tales about our relations.” The president further gushed over “what a really great secretary of state you are.”[114] With appreciation for the heartening words, Hay thanked Roosevelt “a thousand times for your kind and generous letter” and described his pleasure in serving a president who “happened to be born a gentleman.”[115]

Their rapprochement aside, Hay continued to push Roosevelt to relent on the Kishinev Petition. Seizing on a recent consular report (albeit of questionable accuracy) that Russia was holding the pogromists responsible, Hay counseled that the Roosevelt administration should back off. “The less we do and say now … the better, in my opinion,” he cautioned.[116] By all accounts, Hay’s sentiment was indicative of the State Department at large.[117] It remained to be seen whom, in the end, Roosevelt would heed: his secretary of state or his Jewish advisors.

* * *

The Jewish delegation journeyed to Oyster Bay on July 14 to meet with the president. While en route, Wolf remarked to Levi and Straus that whether Russia accepted their petition was immaterial. He reasoned that if the Roosevelt Administration at least attempted to submit the petition, that bold act on the world stage—more so than Russia’s reaction to it—would ensure that the petition achieved its purpose.[118]

Upon arrival at Sagamore Hill, the Jews were greeted by Roosevelt with his characteristic “cordiality and informality,” Wolf later recalled. Roosevelt had invited a few other guests who happened to be on hand to join him and the Jewish delegation at lunch. The whole group spent the meal deliberating over the predicament with Russia. The president’s manner of formulating his foreign policy here is striking—a free-flowing conversation with not one member of his State Department but rather Jewish leaders, a British judge, a magazine editor, and his teenage daughter, Alice Roosevelt.[119] Perhaps Alice’s notorious friendship with the Russian ambassador’s daughter gave her unique insight into Russia’s ruling class. Perhaps it compromised her objectivity. Perhaps both.

Straus, Levi, and Wolf were concerned that B’nai B’rith had collected only three thousand signatures so far, and these were disproportionately from citizens in the Northeast. In other words, the petition was too thin in volume and too unrepresentative in geography. But the Jewish delegation also understood that Roosevelt wanted to act immediately—indeed, the president had been eager to move forward with the petition fully two weeks earlier. And so during the meal, Straus, Levi, and Wolf suggested a compromise measure: instead of sending a petition with too few signatures, the administration should instruct its embassy in St. Petersburg to convey the petition without any signatures to the Russian government and inquire whether the czar himself would accept the petition. If the czar was amenable, then B’nai B’rith would take the time to gather more signatures, secure in the knowledge that the completed petition would meet with a favorable reception. But if the czar refused as expected, then B’nai B’rith would still invest the time required to amass signatures, with the resulting document to be deposited in the State Department’s archives. There, the petition would endure in perpetuity as a historic symbol of religious freedom. This plan was designed to satisfy Roosevelt’s sense of urgency and B’nai B’rith’s desire for a comprehensive list of signatories.[120]

The time for Roosevelt to make his final decision was now at hand. In the nearly 3 months that passed since the atrocities in Kishinev, 77 public meetings had convened across America in support of the victims, and 363 speeches were delivered—by rabbis and reverends, senators and judges, editors and lawyers. Substantial sums were raised for survivors.[121] Newspapers had relentlessly covered both the pogrom and its ripple effects around the world. If Roosevelt proffered the petition to Russia, he could do so with confidence that he spoke for a broad-based movement spanning the United States.

But then again, there were compelling reasons for Roosevelt to reverse course in the eleventh hour. By submitting the petition, he might not only imperil American trade in Manchuria but provoke Russia to dissolve all diplomatic ties with the United States. No one could be sure of the unintended consequences that such a rupture could foment. The president’s own secretary of state had repeatedly advised against estranging St.

Petersburg. Some voices in the American press were arguing that Roosevelt had already fulfilled his humanitarian duty with his compassionate statements about Kishinev's Jews and that it would be reckless for him to alienate Russia any further. He could seize on newspaper reports that Russia was bringing the guilty to justice as a convenient pretext for noninterference. Even Simon Wolf had offered to withdraw the petition if it suited the president, affording Roosevelt cover with domestic Jews in the event that he changed his mind. And perhaps most significantly, no other head of state in the world had dared to challenge Russia over the pogrom. If Roosevelt sent the petition, he would stand alone in the global arena.[122]

And so he did. The president announced to his lunch companions at Sagamore Hill that he would proceed precisely as the Jewish delegation recommended and transmit the petition now, sans signatures. The group retired to Roosevelt's study where he declared, "Now let's finish this thing up." Roosevelt crafted language for a cable to the American embassy in Russia, incorporating feedback from his guests. When the cable was finished, Oscar Straus was entrusted with hand-delivering it to the State Department.[123] He, along with Wolf and Levi, caught the 4:18 p.m. train out of Oyster Bay.[124]

The president notified Hay via telegram that Straus was en route with a cable, which Hay was to forward without delay to St. Petersburg. The remainder of the telegram reflected TR's perceived need to defend his decision to Hay—Roosevelt insisted that this course of action would appease B'nai B'rith, demonstrate cordiality to Russia, and conclude the affair at long last.[125]

That same day, the president also felt compelled to justify his position to Edward Everett Hale, the esteemed writer and minister. Hale had recently urged Roosevelt in a letter to "take an old man's counsel" and "think three times before you offer advice to the czar."[126] Roosevelt replied that he wasn't "offering advice at all" but merely inquiring whether the czar would "receive a petition couched in respectful language." He assured Hale that the administration's decision-making process was duly deliberative: "We decided to send the petition only after careful and rather prayerful consideration."[127]

B’nai B’rith president Leo Levi issued a statement to the press the next day concerning the Oyster Bay meeting but divulged no specifics owing to Roosevelt’s request for continued discretion. Still, Levi provided strong hints: “Our views and those of the president are in perfect accord.” With B’nai B’rith collecting more signatures by the day, Levi’s press release celebrated the petition as a broadly American—rather than narrowly Jewish—endeavor. He also maintained (implausibly) that the petition shouldn’t be interpreted as a bid to intervene in Russia’s internal affairs.[128]

That very morning, Straus personally handed the cable to John Hay.[129] Hay wired it at once and, at Roosevelt’s request, shipped the original cable to B’nai B’rith as a keepsake.[130] With the American ambassador to Russia having taken leave to attend a wedding in Chicago, the cable was instead addressed to John Riddle, the chargé d’affaires who was administering the embassy in the ambassador’s absence. The cable instructed Riddle to meet with Russia’s foreign minister, share the text of the petition, and ask whether the minister would forward it to the czar.[131] With this fateful message dispatched to the U.S. embassy in St. Petersburg, the State Department stood by for word of Russia’s response.

What Hay and Roosevelt did not know was that before the cable reached Riddle, the Russian foreign minister had already summoned Riddle to discuss the petition. The Russian authorities, as it turned out, had been carefully reading newspaper reports about the imminent prospect of a petition to be forwarded under the auspices of the U.S. government. Anticipating this eventuality, the foreign minister in St. Petersburg raised the issue with the czar, who was adamant that the petition be refused. Czar Nicholas regarded his authority over Russian territory as absolute and could not brook any petition that concerned Russia’s domestic life. The foreign minister, in turn, met with Riddle to explain the czar’s position and reasoning.[132]

In their conversation, the foreign minister told Riddle that if he were to personally hand over the petition, it would be handed back unread; if the petition were delivered by courier in an envelope, it would be returned unopened. But the foreign minister also conveyed that the czar entertained a “kindly feeling toward America.” Czar Nicholas plainly didn’t want

Russia's refusal of the petition to undermine relations between the two nations. In that spirit, the foreign minister made clear to Riddle that he was offering this information "informally" in the hopes of precluding the "discourtesy" of having to rebuff any attempt by Riddle to physically transmit the petition.[133]

Shortly thereafter, the cable from Hay arrived at the U.S. embassy in St. Petersburg. Since Riddle had already discussed the petition with the foreign minister, Riddle felt that he had in effect followed the cable's directive; he didn't think it necessary to meet a second time and have the same conversation again. Riddle relayed to Hay all that the foreign minister had said and also shared his own determination that he had, for all intents and purposes, done his duty. "I shall consider your instructions as already carried out by the present report unless I am ordered to take further steps," he concluded.[134]

Hay forwarded Riddle's message to Roosevelt at once.[135] TR saw no need for Riddle to undertake the formality of literally handing over the petition only to have it handed back. It was sufficient that Hay had wired the cable to Riddle and that Russia had given its answer, even if the sequence of those two events was the reverse of what had been expected. From the president's perspective, his pledge to B'nai B'rith was fulfilled. And, critically, the controversy had been resolved without Russia cutting off diplomatic ties to the United States. Roosevelt authorized Hay to release to the press both TR's cable to Riddle and a brief summary of Riddle's reply back to Washington. The president also directed Hay to tell the Jewish leaders from the Sagamore Hill meeting that they could now speak freely on the matter.[136]

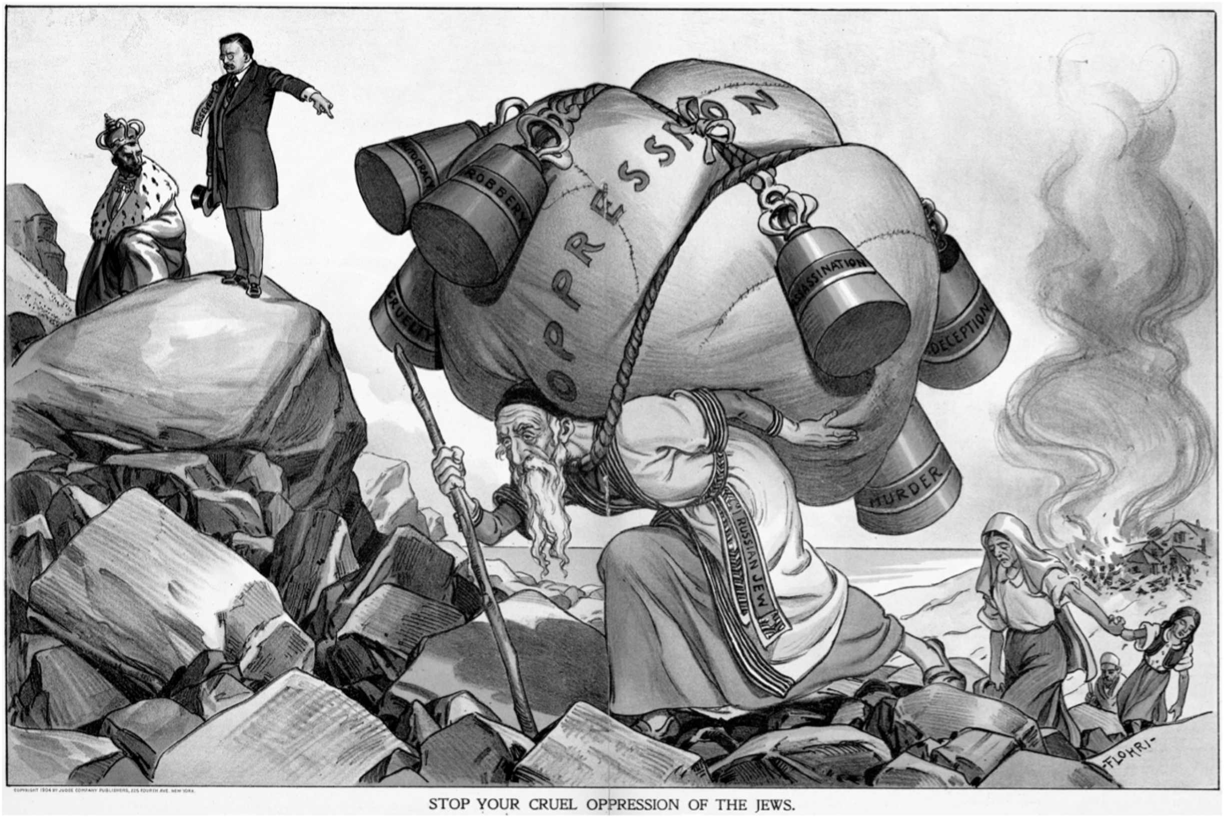
* * *

Breaking news of the petition received comprehensive coverage from the papers. The Philadelphia Inquirer described Riddle's discussion with the Russian foreign minister as tantamount to submission of the petition. Riddle had put "Russia in possession of the petition fully as much as if it had been delivered with all the formality of many sheets of paper and thousands of signatures."[137] An editorial in the New York Times minimized Russia's rejection of the petition as a trivial afterthought; the publicity surrounding the petition had ensured that its message was heard. Russia was now "on notice that the civilized world views with amazement and pain its failure to prevent within the dominions of the czar the murder of men and women for reasons of faith."[138] Back in St. Petersburg, the Russian Foreign Office spoke to the Associated Press, reiterating Russia's resistance to external interference but also its commitment to amicable relations with America.[139]

Leo Levi, on behalf of B'nai B'rith, trumpeted the outcome as a victory in his own remarks to the press. He celebrated the people of the United States for memorializing in a petition their outrage over Kishinev, and he lauded the Roosevelt administration for forwarding it to Russia. The initial plan as conceived in June had been to furnish Russia a petition with signatures, and Levi felt it important to clarify that the subsequent proposal to submit a signatureless petition came from the B'nai B'rith leadership, not from Roosevelt. Levi appeared to be concerned that the public might misinterpret the unsigned petition as some kind of half-measure that the administration had pressured the B'nai B'rith leadership into accepting. In his words, "We, upon our own initiative, and without any suggestion whatsoever, besought President Roosevelt to alter his decision to send the signed petition, and to transmit its text instead." Levi also noted proudly that the petition would ultimately endure in the State Department archives where it would "forever testify to the lofty humanity" of the American people, their president, and his administration.[140]

In a letter to Roosevelt, John Hay praised him for besting Russia in diplomatic brinksmanship. "They would have scored by receiving the petition and pigeonholing it. I think you have scored, as it is!" Hay exclaimed. "You have done the right thing in the right way, and Jewry seems really grateful." Given Hay's earlier resistance to the petition, perhaps this letter was a somewhat contrived bid to shore up his own relationship with the president after their widely publicized disagreement over Kishinev. Or maybe—with the deed done and Russian-American relations still intact—Hay was freed from his anxiety about a diplomatic rupture and could now more easily see wisdom in Roosevelt's judgment.

Hay’s letter was also uncharacteristic in its blunt disparagement of the Russians, which was absent from his earlier correspondence with the president about the Kishinev affair. “What inept asses they are,” Hay scoffed. He denigrated the Russians’ habitual dishonesty, predicting that they would still “lie to us as volubly as ever.”[141] Roosevelt, for his part, was pleased with the outcome, writing Hay, “I think the Russian business is in pretty fair shape.”[142]



ROOSEVELT
AUTOCRACY ROBBERY OPPRESSION CRUELTY
ASSASSINATION
DECEPTION MURDER
RUSSIAN JEW
FLOHRI
COPYRIGHT 1904 BY JUDGE COMPANY PUBLISHERS, 225 FOURTH AVE. NEW YORK.
STOP YOUR CRUEL OPPRESSION OF THE JEWS.

FIGURE. 3.4. Roosevelt admonishing Czar Nicholas II as Russian Jews flee a pogrom. Source: “Stop Your Cruel Oppression of the Jews,” Judge, circa September 1905.

The president’s Jewish constituents were apt to agree. On behalf of the B’nai B’rith executive committee, Simon Wolf thanked Roosevelt for honoring his commitment. “The people of the United States, especially your Jewish fellow citizens at home and abroad, bless you,” Wolf wrote. “You have lifted the veil, and the light of reason and humanity is streaming in.”[143] Roosevelt replied in kind, conveying his appreciation to Wolf for his “admirable good sense” throughout the affair.[144] Other expressions of gratitude from the Jewish community to Roosevelt were more public. Oscar Straus, for instance, authored a note to the president that appeared verbatim in several newspapers. With purple prose, Straus gushed that Roosevelt had ushered in "an era in that highest realm of diplomacy, the diplomacy of humanity, which marshals the enlightened spirit of civilization against persecution."[145] The president was pleased with the favorable publicity and felt it well-deserved. He indicated as much to Lucius Littauer, the upstate Jewish congressman who had befriended TR in college. Roosevelt asked "Litt" whether he had seen the Straus letter in the press and crowed, "We certainly went to the limit in taking the lead on behalf of humanity."[146]

Curiously, one ally of Roosevelt's in the Jewish community opposed the president's approach to the Kishinev affair: Jacob Schiff. Three weeks after the petition was cabled to St. Petersburg, Schiff wrote the president, "Petitions to the czar's government profit no one." His appraisal of Roosevelt on this count was a marked deviation from Jewish-American opinion at large. Instead of a petition, Schiff preferred protests like "the Carnegie Hall meeting in N.Y., and in other cities," which "will not fail of their purpose."[147] It is unclear why he believed public protests were more effective than petitions in preempting pogroms. Roosevelt's reply, while respectful in tone, ceded no ground. "The action of the government concerning the petition was in effect (only to an infinitely greater degree) doing just what the Carnegie Hall meeting attempted to do," the president insisted.[148]

Schiff wasn't the only critic of Roosevelt in the Jewish community. The Democratic-leaning Hebrew Standard suggested that the president was motivated only by "Jewish votes" and that "no one suspects Mr. Roosevelt or Mr. Hay of any very burning feeling of indignation" over Kishinev.[149] But the Jewish American defended TR on that score: "It requires a mighty mean little soul to believe that President Roosevelt took the stand he did in the Kishinev matter for sake of catching a few Jewish votes."[150] The fairest assessment is that both newspapers had some purchase on the truth—Roosevelt was certainly alive to the electoral benefits of the Kishinev Petition, but he also felt genuine compassion for the pogrom's victims.

In the months that followed, B’nai B’rith collected thirteen thousand signatures for the petition. The loose pages from around the country were collated, bound in leather, and put in a custom-made ebony box, together with a volume detailing the petition’s origins. Simon Wolf had the honor of hand-delivering the petition to John Hay in late October. Wolf also gave Hay a letter from B’nai B’rith president Leo Levi expressing gratitude to the administration. Levi well understood the novelty of the government’s submitting a petition from private citizens to a foreign power about its internal affairs. “If it be without precedent, it is the more precious for becoming one,” he wrote. Hay replied that the petition would be “sacredly cherished” in the State Department annals.[151]

* * *

The consequences of the Kishinev pogrom would be long-lived and far-reaching—for global Jewry, for American politics, for international relations, and for Roosevelt’s role in all the above. Outrage beyond the borders of the Russian Empire did little to palliate conditions for Jews within them. The editor of the Bessarabetz newspaper, who had used its pages to incite the butchery in Kishinev, was undeterred in his bigotry. Just months after the pogrom, he became the first-ever publisher of The Protocols of the Elders of Zion, which outlined an alleged conspiracy for Jewish world domination and would emerge as the most widely circulated antisemitic text of the twentieth century.[152]

Meanwhile, the trials of the pogromists in Kishinev, conducted in secret, were largely a farce. The court made a full airing of the facts impossible, and prosecutors with honest intentions resigned in frustration. In the end, only a few perpetrators among the hundreds of defendants were found guilty. Even those who were convicted typically received light sentences. Jewish victims, moreover, were given no legal recourse to seek compensation for stolen or damaged property.[153] The American explorer and Russia expert George Kennan (a distant cousin of the more famous statesman by the same name) personally translated excerpts from the trial transcripts for Roosevelt. Kennan told the president that Russia was run by "a government of cruelty, duplicity, and medieval barbarity."[154]

Although Americans hoped that the Kishinev Petition would shame Russia into forestalling further slaughter of Jews, in fact Kishinev marked only the beginning of a new phase of Jewish bloodletting.[155] The massacre in Kishinev and subsequent pogroms made plain that Russian Jews could not subsist under the czarist regime.[156] Some of these Jews allied with revolutionary agitators in Russia who hoped to depose the czar. Others moved to the Holy Land, as Kishinev gave new life to Zionism—the movement to create a Jewish homeland in Palestine. But far more Russian Jews chose a third option: migration to America.[157] As we will see, the accelerating influx of Jewish immigrants to the United States stoked nativist anxieties and presented the Roosevelt administration with discomfiting challenges.

The fallout from Kishinev reverberated beyond Russia, Palestine, and America all the way to Asia. Roosevelt felt newly emboldened to confront Russia about the Far East. He remained frustrated that Russia didn't provide an "open door" for American trade in Manchuria.[158] Merely four days after Roosevelt resolved to send the petition, he informed John Hay, "I have not the slightest objection to the Russians' knowing that I feel thoroughly aroused and irritated at their conduct in Manchuria." The public uproar in the United States over Kishinev had impressed upon Roosevelt the depth of anti-Russian sentiment at home—animosity that might afford him wide latitude if the dispute over Manchuria intensified. "I am year by year growing more confident that this country would back me in going to an extreme in the matter," the president told Hay.[159] About two weeks later, Roosevelt wrote Hay again to express his annoyance with Russia's control of Manchuria. "I am beginning to have scant patience," he confessed. Smirking at Russia's appetite for deceit, the president added, "They never find any treachery really difficult."[160]

His increasingly anti-Russia posture stood to benefit not just the Jews but the Japanese as well. Japan was eager to see Manchuria rid of the Russians, and the Japanese press anticipated that America's disaffection from Russia over Kishinev might well redound to Japan's benefit in Far Eastern affairs.[161] Sure enough, within a few months Roosevelt was staking out a markedly pro-Japan position in the region. That October, the United States and Japan signed complementary treaties with China calling for an “open door” in three key Manchurian cities. Although those treaties wouldn’t actually be operable so long as Russia colonized Manchuria, they did the symbolic work of signaling America’s burgeoning affinity for Japan. Indeed, the Russian ambassador in Tokyo now considered the Americans and Japanese allied against his own nation.[162] And so—even before B’nai B’rith had finished preparing the petition for its hand-off to the State Department—the ripple effects of Kishinev had circumnavigated the globe.

ST. PETERSBURG NEWS PAPER BULLETIN BOARD
LYNCHING IN DELAWARE U.S.A ALL THE HORRIBLE DETAILS
U.S.
KISHINEFF PETITION
CZAR OF RUSSIA
ROYAL TEAR VASE
MAYBELL
CZAR—"EXCUSE ME, I'M TOO BUSY WEEPING OVER THIS DELAWARE AFFAIR."

FIGURE 3.5. "Excuse Me, I'm Too Busy Weeping over This Delaware Affair." Source: Brooklyn Daily Eagle, July 2, 1903.

Closer to home, contemporary observers in the United States saw disturbing parallels between carnage in Kishinev and lynching in America.[163] The Springfield Daily Republican in Massachusetts lamented, "Melancholy is the fact that we have Kishinevs of our own."[164] On the very day that Roosevelt and his Jewish advisors were drafting the historic cable to the St. Petersburg embassy, the Salt Lake Telegram published a list of all American lynchings in the first six months of 1903. Forty-six lives—forty Blacks and six whites—had been lost, nearly matching the death toll from Kishinev. “Russia may well advise us to do a little house-cleaning at home before we try to reform Russia,” the Telegram advised.[165]

Some newspapers tried to minimize the comparison between Russian pogroms and American lynchings. They suggested that Roosevelt’s critics, who accused the president of applying a double-standard to Russia, weren’t genuinely outraged about lynching but merely seeking to score “a point against the administration.”[166] Roosevelt himself privately told John Hay that pogroms and lynchings were not equivalent, that Jewish victims of pogroms “infinitely” outnumbered Black victims of lynchings in the years since the American Civil War.[167] The president was wildly inaccurate here—Black fatalities had exceeded Jewish ones by orders of magnitude.[168] Roosevelt’s erroneous claim betrays that he more easily felt sympathy for Jews than for Blacks. Even as he gravely misrepresented the depths of Black suffering, the similarities between lynchings and pogroms were too obvious for the president to entirely ignore. In the letter to Congressman Littauer, after Roosevelt indulged in some self-congratulations for his handling of the petition, he added, “I wish to Heaven our course were clearer in the lynching business!”[169]

Much of the Black press bristled that white America seemed much more willing to denounce lawless violence abroad than at home.[170] Other Blacks sought to make common cause with Kishinev’s Jews. A meeting of the self-described “negro members of the Louisville bar” issued a statement in support of the pogrom’s victims. These Black lawyers alluded to lynchings by noting that they, too, were “acquainted with sorrow” and “the oppressor’s wrongs.” In a spirit of solidarity born from shared suffering, they decried “the hapless condition of our Hebrew brethren” and called on the government to welcome Jewish refugees to America.[171]

And there were Jews, in turn, who translated their dismay over pogroms into support for the anti-lynching movement. Anna Strunsky was the most notable example. A Russian-born Jewish immigrant to America, Strunsky returned to the Pale of Settlement to investigate pogroms as a journalist. It was painfully obvious to her that antisemitic bloodshed in her native land resembled anti-Black violence in her adopted home. She went on to become a founding member of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, or NAACP.[172]

* * *

As the Kishinev Petition dominated headlines in 1903, Roosevelt was already looking ahead to its implications for 1904. He had inherited his office from his fallen predecessor and would soon seek to capture the presidency in his own right. The Jewish vote mattered in states that would be essential to his success at the polls. Roosevelt had long courted Jewish support in his days as a New York politico; his elevation onto the national stage in no way diminished his interest in cultivating Jewish constituencies. The president cheerfully informed Congressman Littauer that Oscar Straus, the most prominent Jewish Democrat in the country, would back Roosevelt's reelection bid: "Straus, by the way, volunteered the statement that, whoever was against me for president, he should support me."[173] Jewish endorsements would mean something to Jewish voters. So would Jewish diplomacy—between the Romanian Note and Kishinev Petition, Roosevelt had done much to bolster his stock with this key slice of the electorate. But neither episode had directly implicated U.S. citizens of Jewish faith. Come 1904, Jewish voters would focus their attention on Russia's brazen assault against the rights of American Jews themselves.

OceanofPDF.com

4

PASSPORT QUESTION

Henry Pinkos was diligent in his work, mild in his manner, and American in his citizenship. This peaceful tradesman led a quiet life in St. Petersburg with his wife and their child in the early 1880s when the local police suddenly ordered the Pinkos family to vacate the Russian capital. The reason for their ouster was uncomplicated: they were Jews. Henry Pinkos sold his modest property and purchased tickets for an outbound ship departing the empire. The boat was scheduled to set sail from Kronstadt, a small town on an island some twenty miles west of St. Petersburg. After having his family’s bags loaded onto the ship at Kronstadt, Pinkos presented the police there with both his U.S. passport and the order evicting him. Here his troubles quickly compounded. The police in Kronstadt denied him permission to exit Russia on the grounds that the order from St. Petersburg only expelled him from that city, not from the Russian Empire at large. Then the ship captain refused to refund the Pinkos family for their tickets even though they couldn’t embark. And the final blow: the boat sailed off with their luggage still on board. The Pinkoses were left destitute. They were instructed by the Kronstadt police to return to the very city from which they had been banished. Back in St. Petersburg, the family subsisted on private donations until, eventually, they did manage to secure passage out of Russia.[1]

Henry Pinkos's nightmarish experience was of a piece with Russia's arbitrary approach to Jewish rights. Russian law technically banned Jews from St. Petersburg and many other cities. However, exceptions abounded —sometimes explicitly by way of official exemption, other times tacitly by authorities choosing not to enforce restrictive laws too severely. Local officials were given wide latitude to implement or relax civil disabilities on Jews. This ambiguous state of affairs meant that a Jew could, with little notice, face eviction from a given municipality on religious grounds.[2]

That Henry Pinkos held American citizenship did not protect him from this kind of cruel caprice. But it should have. An operative treaty from 1832 then governing Russian-American relations specified that the inhabitants of each nation shall freely enter the other and enjoy the "same security and protection as natives of the country."[3] The U.S. government, acting discreetly through diplomatic channels, conveyed to Russia that Pinkos's expulsion was a violation of the foregoing treaty.[4]

The Russians were unmoved. They argued that because Russia drew legal distinctions between its own Jews and Gentiles, and had been doing so prior to 1832, it ought to be fairly presumed under the 1832 treaty that Russia could also draw distinctions between Jews and Gentiles from America. Russia, moreover, insisted that it already had significant trouble with its own Jews, who were allegedly a troublesome people in league with revolutionaries. Taking on more Jews from abroad was unacceptable.[5] Russian paranoia about Jews was unhinged. Although an underground revolutionary movement in Russia did claim some Jewish members, in reality most Russian Jews were too focused on the daily survival of their hardscrabble lives to engage in subversion.[6]

Tensions only worsened after the Pinkos incident. No later than 1886, the Russian government began directing its consulates abroad to refuse visas to foreign Jews who wished to visit Russia. When Americans did apply for visas at Russian consulates within the United States, they faced interrogation about their religious identity; applicants professing Judaism were denied entry papers.[7] By 1895, the issue became sufficiently prominent to merit comment in the State of the Union message. President Grover Cleveland derided the Russian consulates for having the audacity to pressure American citizens—on U.S. soil, no less—to reveal their faiths. He condemned these antisemitic inquisitions as an "obnoxious invasion of our territorial jurisdiction."[8]

At particular risk were American Jews of Russian birth. Some of these naturalized citizens desired to visit Russia for familial or commercial reasons. If they tried to reenter Russia, they were liable to be turned away. And even if they managed to circumvent the bar on Jews, once in Russia they could face severe punishment for having adopted U.S. citizenship without Russian permission. In August of 1901—five months into the McKinley administration—the State Department issued a circular warning Jewish Americans of Russian origin about the hazards of Russia's visa policy.[9] William McKinley drew his dying breath six weeks later, and Theodore Roosevelt inherited the "Passport Question" that had bedeviled so many administrations before his.

* * *

The following year, a Democratic congressman of Jewish faith named Henry Goldfogle decided to press the Roosevelt administration on the issue. Goldfogle was then in his first of seven terms in Congress and represented the epicenter of immigrant Jewish life in America: the Lower East Side. At his initiation, the House of Representatives passed a resolution calling on Secretary of State John Hay to furnish information about Russia's visa policy and what steps, if any, the State Department had taken to rectify the situation.[10] Hay's written response to Congress, which was released to the press, noted that Russia's restrictions against Jews from the United States applied with equal force to Jews from other nations. Hay also detailed that the State Department for many years had been engaged in "efforts to secure uniform treatment of American citizens in Russia." Those efforts "have not been attended with encouraging success," but diplomatic protest would continue unabated, Hay assured the House.[11]

Four weeks later, a spirited public meeting was held at the Educational Alliance, a Jewish settlement house on the East Side, to rally against Russia's ban on American Jews. A series of Jewish luminaries addressed the packed crowd. One speaker elicited ardent applause after connecting the Passport Question to pride in Jewish facial features. He argued that Jews shouldn't content themselves with merely looking Jewish; they needed to advance Jewish values as well. In his words, a "hooked nose and kinky hair" alone do not "make an Israelite." Being an Israelite also required "loyalty to ideals," which in this case meant opposition to Russian "despotism and tyranny." The speaker elaborated, "That Hebrew who relies on a great big nose … well, he's not Israel at all." Some high-profile Gentiles gave speeches, including a former congressman and a prominent Catholic priest. Their presence and words affirmed that the rights of Jews with U.S. passports should concern Americans of all backgrounds. To reinforce that point, Congressman Goldfogle insisted in the final remarks of the day, "The question before us is not a Jewish question. There is nothing of racial character in it. It is a matter of pure Americanism."[12]

Soon the macabre sensationalism of the Kishinev pogrom relegated the Passport Question to the margins for both American Jews and the Roosevelt administration. But when Kishinev receded as a front-page issue, passports reemerged as the focal point of Jewish concern. Just three weeks after B'nai B'rith delivered the Kishinev Petition to the State Department, Congressman Goldfogle indicated to the press that he planned to make noise about Russia's visa policy.[13] An election year was looming, and Republicans were poised to overperform with the Jewish vote thanks to the Romanian Note and Kishinev Petition. The unresolved Passport Question thus presented an opportunity for Goldfogle to reclaim ground for the Democratic Party.

In January 1904, he introduced a second passport resolution in the House that differed from his 1902 resolution. Whereas the first resolution had merely made a factual inquiry and was addressed to John Hay, this second resolution called for action and was directed at Roosevelt. It asked the president to initiate negotiations of a new treaty with Russia that would guarantee the unfettered admission of American citizens regardless of their faith.[14] After a hearing on the topic by the House Committee on Foreign Affairs in February, the House adopted the resolution in April in a bipartisan vote.[15] Both parties saw the defense of Jewish Americans as a winning issue.

The New York Times treated the Goldfogle resolution as a well-intended but ultimately futile exercise. The paper reported that any diplomatic push by the United States had “little prospect of success.” According to the Times, Russia feared that a Jew bearing a U.S. passport would, under the pretext of peacefully conducting international business, “gain access to Russian territory and prosecute his real mission of political disturbance and possibly nihilistic violence.”[16] In Russian eyes, Jews at home and abroad were radicals who threatened the czar’s empire.

* * *

The Goldfogle resolution may have been unlikely to alter Russia’s policy, but it did stand to improve Democratic performance with the Jewish vote in the upcoming election. And so Roosevelt began to make countermoves. The Republican National Convention was fast approaching and would provide a critical opportunity for the party to signal its commitment to Jewish causes, including the Passport Question. Presidential candidates of the era did not themselves attend the conventions, so Roosevelt was relegated to behind-the-scenes strategizing. In early June, TR wrote a letter to Elihu Root—who had recently stepped down as war secretary—with advice for the keynote speech that Root was to deliver at the convention a few weeks hence. “I hope that you can make some allusion to the action taken as regards Kishinev and the Jew passports,” Roosevelt urged. “It will be a good thing to recite what has been done in the Kishinev matter, and the steady and unwearied efforts of the State Department to secure passports from Russia for all well-behaved Americans, whether Jew or Gentile.” Although Roosevelt wanted Root to take up these Jewish causes in a speech, the president nonetheless cautioned, “We can hardly put this in our platform.”[17]

Roosevelt didn’t delineate why the platform ought not remark on the Kishinev Petition. As for the Passport Question, he told Oscar Straus that it wasn’t a proper subject for the platform because such a plank would smack of naked political opportunism. “Unless we mean to do something further than simply protest," TR explained, "it would look like an effort to catch votes, for such statements in the platform could not be regarded for any other purpose."[18] Roosevelt's reasoning here is arguably tenuous. After all, he felt that the Passport Question ought to be included in a convention speech, which surely would be a transparent bid to "catch votes."

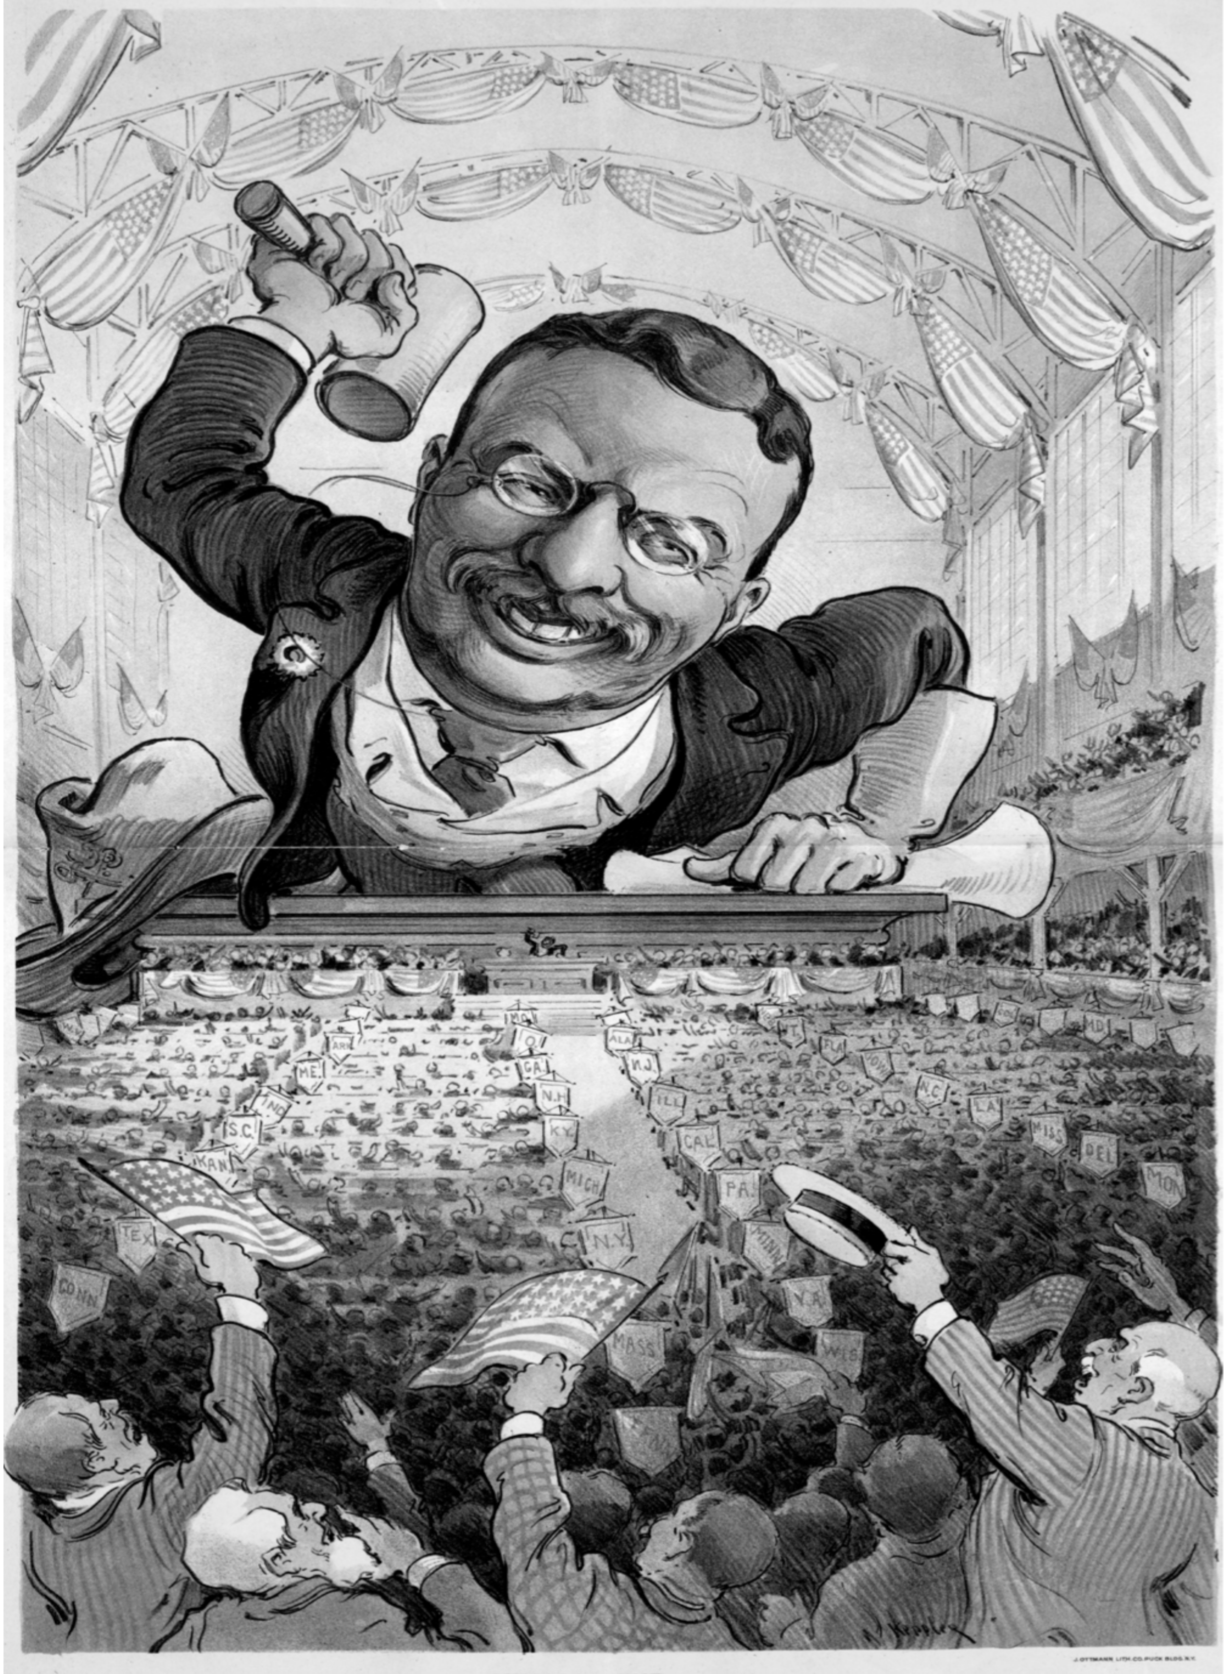
Perhaps that inconsistency reflected a president caught between two competing imperatives: courting Jewish voters and preserving Russian relations. The American and Russian governments were then engaged in secret discussions (which became public only years later) concerning a wholly distinct issue—namely, a potential agreement ensuring that any given corporation based in one country would enjoy legal standing in the other.[19] Roosevelt may have been worried that pressing Russia too hard on the Passport Question in public might compromise ongoing negotiations in private. TR was amenable to a platform that included abstract language about the rights of U.S. citizens overseas, but only so long as the plank was framed in generalities without express reference to either Jews or Russia.

To that end, the president tapped a Jewish ally of his from New York, Judge William Cohen, for input on the platform.[20] This was the self-same Cohen who had praised Roosevelt's dignified composure at McKinley's deathbed in a gracious letter that TR made a point of keeping. Once, Roosevelt flattered Judge Cohen by calling him a "bold man," and Cohen in turn gushed with delight, "If you call a fellow a 'bold man' he must be a two-footed lion."[21] When TR solicited Cohen's help with the 1904 platform, Cohen proposed some language on a slip of paper that he sent to Roosevelt. The slip doesn't survive today, but apparently Cohen's phrasing satisfied the president's dueling desires to appeal to Jewish voters on the one hand without doing so too overtly on the other.[22] As Roosevelt shared with a Republican senator the following day, "I enclose you this letter from Cohen. I think that the slip which he inserts is good, and saves us from making any direct allusion to either the Kishinev massacre or the passport business."[23]

The delegates convened for the Republican National Convention in late June at the Chicago Coliseum. Opened four years earlier, the Coliseum was an architectural marvel. Massive arches held up the roof, which obviated the need for pillars and thereby endowed the arena with a grand sense of capaciousness. Floor seating, when combined with a balcony that lined all four walls, allowed for ten thousand attendees.[24] Although the delegates didn’t fill the arena to capacity, they loudly voiced their enthusiasm during the convention proceedings. The first mention of Theodore Roosevelt in a speech occasioned particular exuberance. As one journalist reported, “Cheers rang through the hall, and many men sprang upon their chairs and waved hats, handkerchiefs, and banners.”[25]

Elihu Root took the stage for his keynote to great applause. Pacing with his feet and gesticulating as he spoke, Root offered the kind of specificity on Jewish issues that the platform would studiously avoid.[26] He explicitly referenced not only the Kishinev Petition but also the Romanian Note. “When the Romanian outrages and when the appalling massacre at Kishinev shocked civilization and filled thousands of our own people with mourning,” Root recounted, “the protest of America was heard through the voice of its government, with full observance of diplomatic rules, but with moral power and effect.”[27] Curiously, Root’s speech made no mention of the Passport Question despite Roosevelt’s request that he do so. Root’s omission may have been strategic; after all, the president had scored important symbolic victories with the Romanian Note and Kishinev Petition but lacked a public win on the Passport Question.

The day after Root’s keynote, the convention unanimously adopted a platform that included a plank along the lines Judge Cohen had suggested—probably his exact wording—as it nodded to Roosevelt’s response on Kishinev without direct comment on Jews or Russia. “Whenever crimes against humanity have been perpetrated which have shocked our people, his protest has been made, and our good offices have been tendered, but always with due regard to international obligations,” the plank read. The Republican platform was similarly vague about the Passport Question, avoiding mention of Jews, of Russia, or even of passports: “We commend the vigorous efforts made by the administration to protect American citizens in foreign lands, and pledge ourselves to insist upon the just and equal protection of all of our citizens abroad.”[28] With this, the party achieved Roosevelt’s goal of a platform that implicitly gestured toward Jewry. The platform may have lacked specificity, but it was still unprecedented; prior platforms from both parties had neglected to make even discreet allusions to the Passport Question.



MO
ARK ME
GA
N.H
ALA
N.J
ILL
FLA
N.C
LA
MD
IND
S.C
KY MICH
CAL
PA
MISS
DEL
MON
TEX
N.Y.
CONN
MASS
MINN
WIS
Keppler

J. OTTMANN LITH. CO. PUCK BLDG. N.Y.

CHICAGO, JUNE 21, 1904.

"ALL IN FAVOR OF THE NOMINATION WILL SAY AYE!"

FIGURE. 4.1. Theodore Roosevelt here gavels in his own nomination. In reality, he followed custom by absenting himself from the convention. Source: “All in Favor of the Nomination Will Say Aye!,” Puck, June 15, 1904.

* * *

In the immediate wake of the Republican National Convention, the Roosevelt administration grasped for tangible progress on passports. John Hay cabled the U.S. ambassador in St. Petersburg, Robert McCormick, sharing with him the text of the congressional resolution on the Passport Question. Hay instructed McCormick to convey to the Russian foreign minister the disapproval—by Congress and Roosevelt alike—of Russia’s ongoing visa restrictions. In Hay’s words, the discrimination against American Jews amounted to “needlessly repressive treatment.” Hay further relayed Roosevelt’s bemusement that Russia perceived itself as somehow benefitting from its prohibition against U.S. nationals of Jewish faith, whom TR considered exemplary members of American society. “In the view of the president,” Hay related, “it is not easy to discern the compensating advantage to the Russian government in the exclusion of a class of tourists and men of business” who were endowed with “intelligence and sterling moral qualities.” This communication was confidential—at least for the time being. Whether and when to publicly release the foregoing cable would ultimately become a source of debate within Roosevelt’s circles, but for now, the State Department quietly awaited a response.[29]

* * *

Democrats convened the following week for their party convention at the St. Louis Exposition and Music Hall. The venue was festooned with colorful fabrics for the occasion, and the seals of each state in the Union hung from the ceiling. The ventilation, however, did not live up to the decoration. As the crowd grew, temperatures rose and overheated attendees resorted to vigorous fanning. One journalist recorded that the hall looked like a “yellow flutter as the palm leaf fans bobbed back and forth.”[30] The Democrats nominated Alton Parker, an obscure figure with a judicial background, to challenge Roosevelt for the presidency.

Before the Democratic convention, Judge Cohen had warned Roosevelt that “our adversaries intend [on] making some reference” in St. Louis to the “recognition of our passports in Russia.”[31] Indeed, the Democratic platform now offered a plank on the Passport Question that was more extensive in length and specific in detail than the Republican version. While avoiding the words “Russia” and “Jewish,” the plank nevertheless made explicit mention of passports and religious discrimination in a way that the Republicans had not. It also echoed the Goldfogle resolution by calling for treaty negotiations, which the Republican platform had avoided.[32] Jacob Schiff would soon thereafter candidly acknowledge to Roosevelt that although “the platform of both parties makes special reference to this vexatious question, the Democratic platform [does so] even somewhat stronger than our own.”[33]

In a convention speech, a Democratic congressman from Mississippi named John Sharp Williams took aim at the Republican plank about U.S. citizens traveling abroad. Williams—whom Roosevelt once derided as a “drunken skunk”—accused Republicans of hypocrisy: in one breath, the Republican administration resigned itself to Russian discrimination by issuing a State Department travel warning that American Jews wouldn’t be protected in Russia; in the next breath, the Republican platform pledged fealty to equal justice for U.S. passport holders of all faiths. Congressman Williams suggested that “our fellow-citizens of Russian birth and Jewish extraction” would read the GOP platform with “singular astonishment” at its insincerity.[34] His criticism here was arguably unfair given that a party platform was widely understood to be an aspirational policy agenda whereas the travel warning was simply a sober description of facts on the ground. Republicans could take some solace that, according to press reports, convention delegates in St. Louis had “kept up a constant hum of conversation that smothered Mr. Williams’s voice.”[35]

As the Democrats made a strong play for the Jewish vote, Roosevelt wondered whether he would win the grand prize of Jewish endorsements: Oscar Straus. True, Straus was a Roosevelt appointee and a trusted advisor who had already signaled to TR a year prior that his endorsement was forthcoming. But Straus was also a Democrat—perhaps he wouldn't abandon his party after all. The president asked his campaign manager, "Do you know if Oscar Straus intends to support me or not?"[36] Roosevelt did not have to wait long for the answer. Four days later, Straus personally informed the president he would "dedicate my best services to your election" despite having "always been a liberal Democrat."[37] Roosevelt was relieved, replying to Straus, "I need hardly say how deeply gratified I am."[38] Straus soon publicly endorsed the president and announced he would likely stump for Roosevelt.[39] In an article about the endorsement, the Jewish Voice newspaper described Straus as "probably the most distinguished Jew of the country," a stature that on its own would render his advocacy of Roosevelt significant. But Straus's blessing was all the more noteworthy—the Jewish Voice observed—because he was crossing party lines to back the president.[40]

Another Roosevelt devotee in the Jewish community, Simon Wolf, knew that Straus would be a key ally in rebutting Democratic attacks. As Wolf told a Roosevelt aide, "You will remember that months ago I told you that Oscar Straus would be with us, there will be plenty of others, to offset John S. Williams's slur as to the Jewish question." Wolf also expressed a desire to counter "the slurs of Goldfogle, who claimed that the resolution passed by Congress had been pigeonholed." Wolf's annoyance with these congressional Democrats did not undermine his optimism about the results to come in November. "Every day convinces me more of our success," he shared. "As usual they shout and brag, but we will have the votes."[41] Wolf must have felt especially endeared to Roosevelt at this moment, as just two months earlier the president had appointed Wolf's thirty-six-year-old son to a judgeship.[42]

* * *

Meanwhile, preparations were underway for Roosevelt's nomination ceremony at his Sagamore Hill estate. Roosevelt told his campaign manager that he wanted Jewish representation in the audience. "It seems to me that if we could have one or two of our good Jewish friends out here … it would be all right," the president wrote from Oyster Bay. Naturally, Oscar Straus and Jacob Schiff would top the list, but Roosevelt wondered, "Would three be too many?" He wanted to include James Speyer, whose profile was similar to Schiff's: German by birth, New Yorker by choice, successful in banking, and generous in philanthropy. "They all three have been genuine friends," Roosevelt explained to his campaign manager.[43] Ultimately, three Jews among 125 guests did not prove too many; the full Jewish trio received invitations and, of course, each man accepted the honor.[44] In late July, a special train from New York delivered guests to Oyster Bay for the ceremony. The day's perfect weather augured well for the event. Roosevelt delivered a speech midday from a large porch adorned with American flags before the gathering of supporters.[45] The president's own family members served the visitors at the ensuing banquet.[46]

With this bit of campaign pageantry behind him, Roosevelt turned his energies toward the final element of the nominating process: his formal letter of acceptance. Such letters were published in newspapers and thus offered presidential contenders important outlets to court voters. For an incumbent like Roosevelt, the acceptance letter offered the only outlet to make his own case for his candidacy. Alton Parker as the challenger could give stump speeches, but protocol dictated that Roosevelt as the sitting president had to refrain from active campaigning and rely instead on surrogates.[47] The passive demands of incumbency ill-suited the tenacious Roosevelt. A congressional ally wrote him, "I think it depresses you a little to be the only man in the country who cannot take part in the campaign for the presidency." The word "little" understated the president's discontent. As Roosevelt told his son Kermit, "I could cut [the Democratic nominee] into ribbons if I could get at him in the open. But of course a president can't go on the stump … and so I have to sit still and abide by the result."[48] Given these strictures, Roosevelt's acceptance letter was of paramount significance to his reelection bid.

Jacob Schiff encouraged the president to use that letter as an opportunity to signal his commitment to securing Jewish-American rights in Russia. "Assuming that you are about to enter upon the preparation of your letter of acceptance, I should like to suggest that the Passport Question receive some forcible treatment," Schiff urged. He conjectured that the Jewish vote might determine New York state's Electoral College votes and thereby swing the presidential race. "It is not at all unlikely, that the East Side of New York City, which casts upwards of a hundred thousand votes, is going to decide the coming state election and through this possibly the national election," Schiff speculated, "and it will therefore be well that these voters thoroughly understand where we stand on a question so vital to them." Lest Roosevelt entertain thoughts that Schiff was simply pushing a self-interested Jewish agenda, Schiff insisted that the impetus for his writing the president was a desire to recommend a "successful issue" for the campaign more so than "any other motive."[49]

Schiff's true aims extended beyond the ballot box. He believed that a change in Russian policy toward American Jews would have a cascading effect, leading ultimately to legal equality for Russia's Jewish population. As Schiff predicted in a letter to a German-Jewish leader, if the Jews of other nations could enter Russia and enjoy the liberties rightly afforded them as foreign nationals, "then the Russian government will not long be able to insist on maintaining the scandalous restrictive laws against her own Jews."[50] Two classes of Jewry—one of foreign citizenship enjoying basic freedoms, the other of domestic subjecthood denied those same freedoms—would prove untenable.

The Russians, it appears, were proceeding from the same logic as Schiff. A Russian official personally told Schiff that discrimination against American Jews was a precondition for continued discrimination against Russian Jews.[51] This was the very same reasoning that the Romanian king had provided in refusing America's request for a naturalization treaty. Both Russia and Romania appreciated the dangers of having two categories of Jews with differing sets of liberties. The state-sanctioned prejudice against domestic Jews could buckle under the weight of this inconsistency.[52] In turn, the demise of legally enforced antisemitism could well harken the demise of autocracy in those nations. One lesson from Western European countries was that pro-Jewish reforms often worked in tandem with more sweeping liberalization—e.g., the adoption of civic equality, individual freedom, and the rule of law. The despots of Russia and Romania were hardly keen to see liberalism take root on their soil.

Roosevelt proved amenable to Schiff's counsel that he take up the Passport Question directly. "I agree entirely with you and shall dwell upon that matter in my letter of acceptance," TR replied.[53] Three days later, the president followed up with a draft for Schiff's perusal and encouraged him to "make any emendations you desire and send it back to me with your suggestions."[54] Roosevelt also requested advice on the letter from Oscar Straus and Nathan Bijur, a major figure among Jewish Republicans in New York.[55] All three provided him with feedback.[56]

Straus, for his part, advocated that the president adopt language making clear that his administration's attempt to secure entry to Russia for American Jews was a matter of neutrally applied principle rather than a concession to Jews as a special interest. As Straus put it, Roosevelt should convey it had been "high motives that prompted action, [i.e.] that it was not to favor any particular class but to maintain equality of all in their right to protection, be they native born or naturalized, Christian or Jew."[57] This was precisely the kind of messaging that would have appealed to Roosevelt, who was fond of denying that he engaged in identity politics.

* * *

As Roosevelt continued to fine-tune his letter, the diplomatic front in St. Petersburg saw some movement in late August. John Hay's cable to Ambassador McCormick—which had communicated American opposition to Russia's visa restrictions back in early July—was left unattended for several weeks owing to the ambassador's absence from Russia. After McCormick finally returned to the embassy and read the cable, he sent a letter to the Russian foreign minister informing him that Congress and the president alike were concerned about discrimination against American Jews at Russian hands. McCormick explained that religious freedom was a "principle which lies at the foundation of our government." Therefore the passport issue presented a "live question … liable to become acute" and had the potential to "seriously disturb the friendly relations" between the United States and Russia. Given the potential diplomatic cost to Russia of preserving this “needlessly oppressive” policy, Russia ought to reconsider its Jewish ban, if not on principle then at least as a matter of “expedience and reciprocal convenience” in its relationship with America.[58]

The text of McCormick’s letter wasn’t disclosed to the press, but the Roosevelt administration did quickly inform newspapers that McCormick had made overtures to the Russian foreign minister about passports.[59] Journalists had slim hope that McCormick’s efforts would prompt Russia to reconsider its treatment of American Jews. “While Russia has not yet rejected the proposal of the United States … it is particularly certain that she will decline,” the New York Times asserted. Just like Jacob Schiff, the Times appreciated that the Passport Question was so weighty because of its implications for domestic policy within Russia: “Compliance with the wishes of the United States would entail a complete change in the laws of the empire, in so far as they affect the Jews.”[60] And that kind of change was of little interest to the Russian regime. But Russia didn’t summarily issue a response to McCormick, and so the American ambassador was left waiting to see whether Russia actually would prove obstinate.

* * *

Roosevelt finally released his acceptance letter for the Republican nomination in mid-September. Some newspapers published the 14,000-word letter in its entirety, while others reprinted select passages owing to its “extreme length.”[61] The president’s letter touted his diplomacy on Jewish issues, asking, “Do our opponents object to what was done in reference to the petition of American citizens against the Kishinev massacre, or to the protest against the treatment of the Jews in Romania?” Roosevelt further acknowledged that Russia “refuses to admit and protect Jews” from the United States, and he defended his administration for having “consistently demanded equal protection abroad for all American citizens.” The Democrats’ insistence that he initiate negotiations with Russia over the Passport Question “shows either ignorance of the facts or insincerity”—after all, his administration was already applying “steady pressure.”

Roosevelt stood by his foreign policy for its commitment to humanitarianism. “Discrimination and oppression because of religion, wherever practiced, are acts of injustice before God and man,” he declared, “and in making evident to the world the depth of American conviction in this regard we have gone to the very limit of diplomatic usage.”[62]

Oscar Straus extended to Roosevelt his “heartiest congratulations” on the letter, which he found “honest, just, and noble in spirit, a great state paper reflecting the author in every line.”[63] The president responded with a request. With the election less than two months away, he was eager to more fully reap credit for the pressure that his administration was then bringing to bear on Russia. Neither the text of Hay’s cable from July nor of McCormick’s letter from August had been disseminated to the public. Roosevelt told Straus that it might become “necessary to publish the State Department dispatches showing what we have done in connection with the Passport Question. I should like your judgment as to just how far we should go.” The president added that other participants in the decision-making would include George Cortelyou, who headed the Republican National Committee. That Roosevelt involved the RNC chair in a decision about declassifying diplomatic correspondence offers striking testimony to the intimate relationship between domestic politics and foreign policy.[64]

Some prominent Jews who were Roosevelt sympathizers had already quietly suggested to Cortelyou that releasing the correspondence would backfire. After all, it had been a Democrat, Henry Goldfogle, who sponsored the congressional resolution that spurred the administration into action, and so the Democrats were possibly poised to benefit from any publicity.[65] Oscar Straus took a different view. After reading the diplomatic dispatches, an elated Straus told Nathan Bijur, who had also seen them, “I had no idea that the matter had been so fully and forcefully presented to the Russian government, and I am especially pleased with Secretary Hay’s instructions, wherein he places the subject upon so high and broad a plane.” Although Straus was sure that declassification would enhance Roosevelt politically, Straus nevertheless told Bijur that TR ought to hold his fire: “Regarding the publication of these dispatches, my judgment is not to do so for the present, but to wait.” If the Democrats renewed their line of attack that Roosevelt had been weak on the Passport Question, Straus reasoned, then the president could play his hand.[66]

Bijur agreed. Later that day, Bijur relayed to John Hay that he and Oscar Straus alike thought "it would be better not to publish these dispatches at the moment, but to await a favorable opportunity."[67] Bijur soon thereafter penned a letter to Chairman Cortelyou that expressed the same message in more vivid language: "It is very important that nothing be done about this Russian correspondence until the psychological moment"—that is, until declassification would have maximal psychological impact on the electorate.[68] Ultimately it was Hay who conveyed the Straus-Bijur position to the president, and in so doing the secretary of state lent his own imprimatur to their measured approach, writing to Roosevelt in late September, "I think [Bijur] and Mr. Straus are probably right in thinking it better not to publish the Russian matter just now."[69] A resigned Roosevelt conceded, "All right, I shall have nothing done about that Russian Jew matter at present."[70]

But then Simon Wolf pitched an idea to Roosevelt that resonated with the president: Wolf could be the one to publicly trumpet the administration's diplomatic play, if only he were given access to Hay's cable. Roosevelt anticipated that Wolf—having taken over the leadership of B'nai B'rith—could functionally serve as a surrogate under the useful banner of a nonpartisan organization. "Simon Wolf has been in, anxious to get the Hay correspondence about the Jews," Roosevelt shared with Chairman Cortelyou. The president was well aware that his inner circle presently opposed declassification, and so he floated to Cortelyou a halfway measure: the administration could provide Simon Wolf with a summary of the cable rather than a verbatim copy, which Wolf could then use in public remarks. "Why wouldn't it do to hand him a statement … which would give the facts of the case?" asked Roosevelt.[71] But Cortelyou was unenthused. For one, he didn't trust Wolf. "Wolf thinks he can do a great deal more than I believe he can," Cortelyou wrote the president, adding, "his influence stirs up a lot of antagonism." Cortelyou had more faith in the tempered judgment of Nathan Bijur. As Cortelyou told Roosevelt, "I have been over the matter of the Hay correspondence about the Jews with Nathan Bijur … and we are holding it, to be given out at just the right time.”[72]

TR did not have the cable released to Wolf, but he still struggled to heed the call for patience on declassification more generally. The following week a restless Roosevelt appealed directly to Bijur, asking him to see “Chairman Cortelyou to discuss with him as to whether we should not send out that State Department statement on the Passport Question?” Roosevelt was anxious about the Democratic push for the Jewish vote. He warned Bijur, “I hear Goldfogle’s speech on the Passport Question is to be issued in immense numbers by the Democratic Committee”—this was most likely a reference to a noteworthy speech that Goldfogle had delivered in Congress just before the House approved his resolution.[73] But before Bijur could meet with Cortelyou, the next day brought momentous news: word from St. Petersburg had finally arrived.

Ambassador McCormick forwarded to Secretary Hay a letter from the Russian foreign minister that was shockingly conciliatory. Russia had authorized a “special commission” with the aim of “generally revising the passport regulations.” The foreign minister also promised to communicate the American position on the subject to this special commission as it proceeded with its work.[74] In reality, Russia would make no effort to redress the grievances of American Jews. But Russia saw value in posturing as though it would, thanks to events transpiring thousands of miles from the halls of power in Washington and St. Petersburg.

* * *

Russian-Japanese tensions in the Far East had, by that point, degenerated precipitously. Recall that Russia controlled Manchuria in China, and the Japanese feared that Russia’s ambitions in the Far East might extend to nearby Korea, which Japan itself had colonized. To avert armed hostilities, Japan proposed an agreement with Russia whereby each power would respect the other’s sphere of influence. But the Russians did not deign to respond to Japan’s proposal, much less accept it.[75] Convinced that military action was its only recourse, the Japanese launched an attack on Port Arthur —Russia's key seaport in Manchuria—in February of 1904.[76] Thus began a full-blown war that would have reverberating effects on Jewish causes.

Japan's special finance minister journeyed to Western capitals in the spring of 1904 for the purpose of securing war loans. He made little headway until a chance encounter at a dinner in London found him seated next to Jacob Schiff, who happened to be passing through town. The Japanese minister would later recount how Schiff was "justly indignant at the unfair treatment" and "notorious persecutions" that Russia inflicted on Jews.[77] Even before the dinner, Schiff had actively lobbied Jewish bankers in Europe to deny Russia loans for its war effort; now Schiff was presented with a unique opportunity to subsidize the other side of the conflict. Within a matter of days, his banking firm in New York was underwriting a multimillion-dollar bond for Japan.[78]

The Russian interior minister, Plehve, then invited Schiff to come to Russia for a discussion of Jewish rights—this was a self-interested bid to placate Schiff in the hopes that Russia could secure war financing in the loan markets if Jewish bankers relented in their opposition.[79] In a letter to Theodore Roosevelt, Schiff relayed that he had issued to Plehve an ultimatum: "I replied that I would never come to Russia by toleration, and that if I was wanted there, the government would first have to remove the restriction against foreign Israelites in general."[80] This much was untenable to the likes of Plehve.

However, two developments over the summer moved Russia to soon adopt a more accommodating stance on passports. When Plehve was traveling by carriage in St. Petersburg, a revolutionary agitator tossed a bomb at its wheels and assassinated the minister. The man who replaced Plehve was comparatively moderate in his politics.[81] What's more, Japanese forces were pressing ahead with a long and bloody siege of Port Arthur at the very moment when Ambassador McCormick cabled the Russian foreign minister about the Passport Question.[82] With Russian antisemitism proving a tangible obstacle to war funding, it is unsurprising that Russia—on its backfoot militarily and financially—tried to assuage the United States on passports. If Russia softened its hard line, then perhaps Jewish bankers like Schiff would soften their own.[83]

Russian assurances about passport reform would ultimately prove hollow, but that much would not become clear until after the election. For now, the State Department quickly issued an announcement about those assurances, thereby offering Roosevelt the appearance of a win at the height of campaign season. The Duluth News-Tribune announced, “Jews May Get a Better Deal.”[84] Even more optimistic was the Morning Oregonian front-page: “Plea Not in Vain—America Wins Victory at Russian Court.”[85] Coverage in the Washington Post emphasized the unexpected nature of the result in light of Russia’s previous recalcitrance. “This is the first time the Russian authorities have not brusquely declined to entertain American representations upon this question,” the Post observed.[86] Roosevelt could rest on this favorable news for now and hold off on declassifying the State Department correspondence until an even more opportune moment. As for Jacob Schiff, he remained resolute in his support for the Japanese and helped arrange additional loans to finance their forces.[87]

* * *

Two days after Ambassador McCormick shared with John Hay the mollifying language from the Russian authorities, McCormick wrote Hay unofficially in order to communicate with total candor. “I have something to add to my dispatch,” McCormick informed him, continuing ominously, “I thought it best not to include what I have to say in my official note.” The ambassador related how he had personally conversed with the Russian foreign minister, Count Lamsdorff, who had been unrestrained in his criticism of Jewry. As McCormick now paraphrased it for Hay, Lamsdorff considered Jews a “veritable plague” who “exploited the Russian peasant” through usury. This Jewish profiteering explained why “the feeling against the Israelite in the lower social stratum was most bitter,” said Lamsdorff. He insisted that “this feeling had to be reckoned with”—in other words, the Russian government was obliged to “protect the peasants” from rapacious Jews. This was the same antisemitic canard that the Russian ambassador to the United States, Count Arthur Cassini, had peddled to the American press after the Kishinev pogrom: Jews invited persecution through their own predatory behavior.[88]

Ambassador McCormick's missive to Hay is striking because he made plain that he found Lamsdorff's indictment of Russian Jews to be credible. McCormick relayed to Hay that Cecil Spring Rice—the chargé d'affaires at the British Embassy in St. Petersburg—had "an example of this leech-like exploitation." Spring Rice described a habit among "the shrewder Jews" who would approach Russian peasants en route to market where the peasants planned to sell produce from their farms. The Jews, purportedly, offered the peasants prices below what the produce would fetch at market, which the "stupid thriftless" peasants tended to accept. "This example goes to explain the feeling existing throughout Russia towards the more thrifty Israelite," McCormick told Hay.[89]

As it happens, Spring Rice—whose first diplomatic assignment twenty years earlier had been in Washington—enjoyed warm relationships with prominent Americans. McCormick's letter to Hay described Spring Rice as "a gentleman who is a friend of yours as well as of mine … who was long enough in Washington to have made many friends there, and among them, President Roosevelt."[90] In fact, Roosevelt and Spring Rice had known one another even before either of them landed in Washington. They were in their twenties when they first met as fellow passengers on a transatlantic ship. By the time the ocean liner docked in England, Spring Rice had accepted Roosevelt's offer to serve as the best man at his wedding.[91] It is unsurprising that Roosevelt's social circle included friends who lacked his own relative liberality toward Jews, given the prevalence of antisemitism among the elite classes.

Ambassador McCormick, for his part, not only took Spring Rice at his word about Jewish trickery but also trusted Russian officials in their besmirchment of Jews as radicals. The ambassador conveyed to John Hay in his foregoing letter, "I learned from Minister Plehve some months before his tragic taking off … that 70% of the Socialists in Russia are Jews." McCormick credulously regurgitated Plehve's antisemitic talking points for Hay: "The stringent passport regulations are directed mainly against the German and Polish Jew, who are the most violent propagandists of the doctrine of socialism in its most extreme form." Here was an American ambassador willing to uncritically believe the worst about a persecuted minority within Russian borders.[92]

Even so, McCormick was skeptical that Russia could subjugate Jews in perpetuity, and in his letter he ultimately walked himself back to a position more in accord with official State Department policy, telling Hay, "The anti-Jewish laws, the passport system itself, and the censorship of the press, are but a part of the rotten underpinning of a system which, in my judgment, must soon give way under the influence" of international censure. McCormick's letter, then, amounted to a mixed conclusion: the persecution of Russian Jews had some justification behind it, and yet Russia's antisemitic agenda was bound to yield in the face of foreign pressure.[93]

* * *

As the election neared, Jewish newspapers increasingly spilled ink about Roosevelt. The Republican-leaning Reform Advocate in Chicago reprinted an editorial that maintained, "Jews would be churlish ingrates if they did not recognize the efforts that the United States continues to put forward on behalf of their race." Recalling TR's role in the Romanian Note, the Kishinev Petition, and now the Passport Question, the writer declared, "We hail President Roosevelt as the nearest approach to the political knight-errant that exists in the latter-day world." The editorial also approvingly noted that another paper dubbed Roosevelt "The New Moses."[94]

TR received comparably favorable coverage in Menorah, which billed itself "a monthly magazine for the Jewish home." A Jewish undergraduate at Harvard named Joseph Lebowich authored a piece for Menorah entitled "Theodore Roosevelt and the Jews." Lebowich reminded readers of the iconic stories connecting Roosevelt to Jewry, like TR's provision of a Jewish police detail for an antisemitic speaker. Even as Lebowich targeted Jewish voters in a Jewish periodical, he praised the president for rejecting identity politics: "In his dealing with the citizens of Jewish faith or race, President Roosevelt has always treated them not as Jews but as citizens of the United States." Lebowich contrasted TR with the "unscrupulous politicians of our country" who "split the voters into sects and classes."[95]

Few would guess that a sitting president in the midst of a reelection campaign would have time to read a piece in an obscure ethnic periodical authored by a college student. And yet Roosevelt enthusiastically wrote Oscar Straus, "I like that article by Mr. Lebowich. Do you know him? If so, I wish you would tell him how much I appreciate it—and add that I wish he had been among the Harvard men in my regiment," referring to the Rough Riders.[96]

The president especially appreciated Lebowich's argument that Rooseveltian politics were based on a common civic identity as Americans rather than a plurality of religious identities as Jews, Protestants, and Catholics. "I am particularly pleased with the way he has grasped exactly what my attitude is," Roosevelt remarked. Whereas "various Democratic papers" have "endeavored to show that I have appealed to the Jew vote, the Catholic vote, etc.," in reality—or, at least, in the president's self-perception—he had sought to "make it evident that each is to have a square deal, no more and no less," irrespective of religious background. Roosevelt predicted that in the fullness of time "there will be presidents of Jewish faith, presidents of Catholic faith," and his stated aspiration was to behave himself just as he hoped future Jewish or Catholic presidents would behave toward their fellow citizens—namely, "without regard to the several creeds they profess or the several lands from which their ancestors have sprung."[97] Lebowich and Roosevelt alike may have been enamored of the idea that America could boast an identity-neutral civic sphere, but that was more of a comforting conceit than a lived reality. Jewish voters cared about Jewish issues, and politicians like Roosevelt courted them accordingly.

Straus was thrilled to receive the president's note. "I thank you for your splendid letter, which I know expresses the innermost feelings of your heart," he gushed. Straus shared that he had relayed Roosevelt's approval directly to Lebowich, which would surely "be a source of great pride and gratification to him."[98]

Not all commentary in the Jewish press was as positive as Lebowich's. The Democratic-leaning Hebrew Standard in New York published a guest column from a New York Times staffer named Louis Wiley, who derided Roosevelt's recent diplomatic play with Russia as an election-year stunt. "Not until June 1904, on the eve of the presidential campaign, did President Roosevelt begin any action in the matter," Wiley sneered. Prior to election season, the Roosevelt administration had assumed a posture of "utter indifference" as "clearly demonstrated by the fact that it remained silent until after the passage of the second Goldfogle resolution in April 1904." Wiley added, "President Roosevelt should have taken the initiative—that was his privilege and his duty. At least, he might have made some effort when Representative Goldfogle first agitated the matter in Congress in 1902. Yet not a line of diplomatic correspondence between Washington and St. Petersburg, not an effort of any kind was made by the administration tending to correct the abuse." Accusing Roosevelt and the Republican Party of "insincerity," Wiley belittled the president's foreign policy with Russia as "comic-tragic performance."[99]

The very day this editorial appeared, in late October, the Democratic nominee Alton Parker made a surprise appearance on the Lower East Side. He surfaced at a Yiddish theater to see a Judaized rendition of King Lear, in tow with local Tammany leaders and Congressman Goldfogle. After the show, Parker enjoyed a meal at Lorber's, a nearby haunt on Grand Street. His dining party included the play's lead actor, some East Side politicos, and a local rabbi who ran a settlement house.[100]

Notwithstanding Parker's late-stage bid for the East Side vote, the conciliatory word from St. Petersburg about passports had been a significant win for the president, and now his administration optimized its impact for his campaign. The Department of State declassified Secretary Hay's July cable to Ambassador McCormick just six days before Americans headed to the polls. The "psychological moment" had finally arrived. Excerpts from the cable appeared in newspapers nationwide.[101] The press projected an air of certainty about an imminent change in Russian policy—articles featured headlines like "Russia Will Favor Jews" and "American Jews to Be Protected."[102]

* * *

Roosevelt delivered a crushing blow to his opponent on election day. His victory of nearly twenty percentage points was the largest in almost a century and translated to a 336-to-140 margin in the Electoral College. Although he lost the South, the president triumphed in the North and West in an unbroken wave stretching from Maine to California.

His success with Jewish voters was, frankly, astounding. On the Lower East Side—solidly Democratic terrain—Roosevelt didn't merely outperform conventional Republican results. He actually won the East Side. His victory in that neighborhood, slim as it was, blew away McKinley's showing four years earlier. The Lower East Side's sixteenth assembly district is instructive. That district was overwhelmingly Jewish and reliably Democratic. Among its residents who cast ballots for either major party in 1900, McKinley lost by sixteen points. But in 1904, Roosevelt narrowly edged out his opponent on that same turf by a quarter percent. Another measure of TR's popularity throughout the Lower East Side was his vote count relative to down-ballot Republicans. There were twelve such GOP candidates, running for everything from governor to assemblyman; in East Side districts, Roosevelt outran them all.[103]

Even as TR surpassed these other Republican office-seekers, they benefitted immensely from his coattails. Races that would normally result in Democratic landslides were suddenly competitive. Democrat Henry Goldfogle, for instance, represented the Lower East Side in Congress for many terms. Between 1900 and 1910, Goldfogle consistently dominated his Republican opponent by an impressive average of nearly thirty points—except in 1904. With Roosevelt at the top of the ballot that year, Goldfogle nearly lost his seat as his usual margin of victory plummeted to a measly 2 percent.[104] Meanwhile, the aforementioned sixteenth assembly district—which had unfailingly sent a Democrat to the New York legislature in annual elections for three decades—saw the Republican candidate for the statehouse pull off a stunning upset.[105] Roosevelt had remade the political map with Jewish voters, and the Republican Party at large was reaping the rewards.

Members of his Jewish kitchen cabinet sent words of congratulations. After receiving a telegram from Jacob Schiff, Roosevelt replied, "I understand to the full all that you have done in this election and am very grateful for it."[106] Of course Oscar Straus was elated, confessing to the president, "It has required some time for me to get over the ecstasy of my delight upon the result." He credited Roosevelt's reelection to ordinary Americans rather than to the elite. "It was not the frock-tail gentry, but the plain people who, uninfluenced by Democratic bogies, best understood you," Straus crowed.[107]

Even elements of the Jewish press that had chided Roosevelt now conceded that his historic triumph was attributable to his positive qualities. The Hebrew Standard acknowledged that the "enviable and widespread personal popularity of the president" accounted for "the great disintegration of the Democratic Party." Roosevelt may not have been the paper's preferred candidate, but the Hebrew Standard nevertheless granted, "The future of a great country lies in the hands of a great man."[108] Similarly, the B'nai B'rith Messenger in Los Angeles—which had given a platform to anti-Roosevelt voices during the campaign—now offered, "We are quite satisfied as to the people's choice."[109]

* * *

In the wake of Roosevelt's victory, his detractors surely anticipated that the president would take the path of least resistance on the world stage and ease off St. Petersburg. There was, after all, truth in the critique that he turned up the pressure on Russia only in the heat of campaign season. And Roosevelt wasn't worried about facing voters again—he had announced on election night that his second term would be his last (which wasn't a constitutional requirement, as presidential term limits were still a half-century in the offing). What's more, the Russian foreign minister had assured Ambassador McCormick that passport reform was under consideration, a revelation that could provide Roosevelt a solid pretext to relent on the issue. And yet as the president toiled on drafts of his State of the Union message, he was determined to fulminate against Russia for its treatment of both American and Russian Jews, even at the risk of alienating the Russian government.

State of the Union messages in that era were sent in writing to Congress rather than spoken aloud at the Capitol. Roosevelt summoned Oscar Straus and select others to a dinner at the White House to discuss the contents of his forthcoming message. After the meal, the party adjourned to the president's private study where he reached into a desk drawer and pulled out a draft of various sections of his State of the Union. He turned to Straus for advice on the Jewish-related portions. Roosevelt also shared with the group his frustration that Russia so readily analogized pogroms to racial lynchings in the American South. TR continued to erroneously insist that there were far more pogrom victims. As Straus later recalled, "He argued that the lynchings were comparatively few, and, though bad enough, were nothing compared to the wholesale murder in cold blood under official sanction and perhaps instigation." Roosevelt further remarked that he, unlike the czar, was actually willing to engage foreigners about the shameful propagation of violence in his own country and furnished an example: when a collection of British citizens sent Roosevelt a petition about lynching, he accepted it and issued a reply denouncing the practice.[110]

The State of the Union, in its final form, was unequivocally disparaging of Russia. The president championed "the right for our Jewish fellow-citizens to receive passports and travel through Russian territory." Deriding Russia's policy as "unjust and irritating," Roosevelt insisted there weren't countervailing benefits that could plausibly outweigh the diplomatic animosity Russia was fomenting: "No conceivable good is accomplished by it." So long as American Jews were denied free passage into Russia "merely on racial and religious grounds," the administration was "entitled to protest."[111]

TR didn't limit his censure of the Russians to their visa policy. He also defended his decision to forward the Kishinev Petition to St. Petersburg. "There are … cases in which, while our own interests are not greatly involved, strong appeal is made to our sympathies," he affirmed. Casting aside the diplomatic orthodoxy that prohibited intrusion into another nation's internal affairs, Roosevelt argued that "there are occasional crimes committed on so vast a scale and of such peculiar horror" that it becomes "our manifest duty … to show our disapproval." He cited the "massacre of the Jews in Kishinev" as just such an atrocity. The president effectively acknowledged the Russian retort that a hypocritical America was bedeviled by lynchings—he conceded that the United States suffered from "brutal lawlessness and violent race prejudices here at home."[112] But Roosevelt would not let the scourge of racialized terror within America's borders muzzle his protest against evil perpetrated beyond them.

His allies in the Jewish community naturally celebrated the president's tough-minded treatment of Russia in his State of the Union. The Reform Advocate, edited by a Jewish Republican, contrasted Jewry's history of transient wandering with the permanent homeland that Roosevelt's America provided. "Mr. Roosevelt's last message bears testimony to the fact that we are not homeless waifs," the paper pronounced, "but that the Jew in America is a Jewish American and as such has a flag and a country that will speak for him."[113] Meanwhile, B'nai B'rith president Simon Wolf published an editorial celebrating the State of the Union, which "most gloriously vindicated" the government's defense of American Jewry against Russian discrimination. Wolf juxtaposed TR's principled stance with the allegedly self-serving machinations of the president's critics, lamenting how the "Passport Question unfortunately has been made the shuttle-cock by scheming politicians for their own selfish ends"—a veiled reference, no doubt, to Goldfogle and his supporters in Congress.[114]

Roosevelt wasn't the first American president to deem the Passport Question worthy of space in the State of the Union. Chester Arthur in 1883 and Grover Cleveland in 1895 had both raised the issue in their annual messages. Even so, the New York Times reported that foreign envoys in Washington were abuzz about Roosevelt's blunt reproach of Russia, which was "amazing" in its departure from the international norms that prevailed in European capitals. But this was Washington, not Vienna or Berlin; Old World customs did not rule American politics. One unnamed diplomat told the New York Times that the European powers had "come to regard the United States as entitled to exceptional toleration in matters of this kind." According to the Times, foreign emissaries in Washington were speculating that St. Petersburg would likely refuse to amend its passport policy after Roosevelt admonished Russia so publicly.[115] The Dallas Morning News similarly predicted, “Roosevelt’s tart reference to Russia … will be received with much distaste at the court of the czar.”[116]

One measure of dissatisfaction by the Russian government was the defensive reaction of Novoe Vreyma (New Time), a semiofficial newspaper in St. Petersburg that predictably lampooned the United States for its own raft of extralegal killings. The paper tallied the lynching of thirty-two Blacks in America over the prior seven months. Novoe Vreyma suggested that Russia’s objection to the admission of American Jews was rendered in the same spirit that “the people and government of Louisiana” would surely refuse “to be overrun by the dark races of Russia.”[117]

Given that Russia had recently provided assurances to Ambassador McCormick about passport reform, it is striking that Roosevelt would take such a provocative stand. The president surely felt emboldened by the steady stream of headlines about Japan’s tenacious siege of Port Arthur in its war against Russia. With Russia in a weakened condition and still in need of financing, Roosevelt had seized an opportunity to apply pressure on Jewish issues. The Cleveland Plain Dealer reported that “military and naval disasters” would likely force Russia’s hand on passport reform. St. Petersburg was facing a reality that “the great Jewish bankers in the countries where Russia must borrow money” would persevere in their favoritism toward Japan so long as Russia persisted in its hostility against Jews. If the Passport Question was resolved to the satisfaction of Jewry, “at least one good will have resulted from the war,” the Plain Dealer reasoned. But then the paper sounded a note of caution, recalling that Russia had a penchant for “devious political and diplomatic ways.”[118]

Indeed, the unreliability of Russian diplomacy combined with Russia’s increasingly perilous war footing meant that the situation was unpredictable. No one could be certain what unintended effects the bombardment of a port in the Far East would have for Jews thousands of miles away. Maybe a newly vulnerable Russia would succumb to the exigencies of the moment and offer Jews—foreign and native alike—the dignity of equal standing with Gentiles. Or perhaps a nation long steeped in antisemitism would, in a time of crisis, plunge itself deeper into the abyss of Jew-hatred.

OceanofPDF.com

5

PEACE AT PORTSMOUTH

By the thousands, eager spectators descended on Washington to witness the inauguration of Theodore Roosevelt. They spent the morning of March 4, 1905, under a canopy of clouds that threatened rain, but as the noon hour approached so did the sunlight. Roosevelt had sufficient opportunity to savor his two-mile journey from the White House to the Capitol—after all, his horse-drawn carriage was escorted by slow-moving Civil War veterans "who were fast approaching the Scripture limit of life," one reporter remarked. A steady wind ensured that the countless American flags lining the route down Pennsylvania Avenue were blowing with dutiful enthusiasm.[1]

Outside the east wing of the Capitol, an immense horde awaited the president. Those sufficiently agile to climb trees enjoyed superior vantage points to the throngs below. When Roosevelt finally emerged on the dais, the mass of onlookers erupted with excitement. A journalist recorded, "The shouting began, swelling into a roar like Niagara, rising to cyclonic effects." Roosevelt was accompanied by esteemed personages from across the federal government—members of Congress, justices of the Supreme Court, leaders of the navy and army—as well as foreign dignitaries. Per tradition, the chief justice administered the presidential oath of office upon a Bible. Once Roosevelt finished reciting the words prescribed by the Constitution, he touched his lips to the holy book and commenced his inaugural address.[2]

Nearly four years earlier, Roosevelt had been hastily sworn into office in a parlor in Buffalo, amid the fright and grief of McKinley’s assassination.[3] Now TR stood on the steps of the Capitol before an adoring multitude, not as a deputy who had become head of state by default but as the winner of the presidency in his own right. Top of mind for the newly emboldened Roosevelt was America’s emerging place in the global arena. “We have become a great nation,” he declared to the crowd, “forced by the fact of its greatness into relations with the other nations of the earth, and we must behave as beseems a people with such responsibilities.”[4] Roosevelt and the country alike had reached remarkable heights of power despite their relative youth. Jews on both sides of the Atlantic wondered how he would deploy that power on the world stage.

* * *

TR wasted little time advancing his agenda overseas. Within a week of the inaugural festivities, he redoubled his efforts to serve as peacemaker between the warring Russians and Japanese. Roosevelt’s motivations for seeking a negotiated peace were complex. When the conflict had begun in February 1904, the president and the American public at large favored Japan. He had little regard for a czarist regime that oppressed its people at home and was deceitful in its diplomacy abroad.[5] Unsurprisingly, Roosevelt’s closest Jewish advisor, Oscar Straus, had been of similar mind. “Japan is certainly battling on the side of civilization,” Straus wrote Roosevelt as the war commenced. “May wisdom and victory be on her side.”[6]

Japan’s superiority in troop training, weapons technology, and intelligence gathering all redounded to Russia’s detriment.[7] Roosevelt thrilled to Japan’s surprising string of successes early in the war. But by late 1904, the president’s delight morphed into dismay. The Japanese seemed poised to unconditionally crush Russia and dominate the Far East—and not, Roosevelt feared, in a manner conducive to American interests. He expressed to the British ambassador in St. Petersburg his worry that Japan privately drew no distinctions between Russians and Americans, all of whom the Japanese supposedly considered “white devils inferior to themselves.”[8] If Roosevelt could mediate an end to the war before Russia’s total defeat, he might well secure peace terms ensuring a balance of power in the Far East, one that would benefit America’s own ambitions in the region.[9] And beyond the level of pragmatic geopolitics, the president genuinely believed that war was an evil to be truncated, whenever possible. As he later reflected about the Russo-Japanese War in his autobiography, “The losses of life and of treasure were frightful.”[10] True, this was the same Roosevelt who had lusted for blood in Cuba. But TR had a talent for effortlessly inhabiting a contradiction.

* * *

On March 10, Roosevelt instructed his secretary of state, John Hay, to make discreet overtures to the belligerent parties indicating that the American president was willing to broker a peace. Both Russia and Japan, exhausted by war but hamstrung by pride, suffered from an inertia that threatened to prolong the bloodshed.[11] The Japanese enjoyed the upper hand and wanted to cease hostilities in theory, but only on one-sided terms that Russia was destined to reject. Meanwhile, Russia seemed determined to carry on a losing struggle; such was the arrogance of an autocracy that believed itself immune from facts on the ground. “Did you ever know anything more pitiable than the condition of the Russian despotism?” Roosevelt asked Hay. “The czar is a preposterous little creature.” TR further conveyed his frustration that Czar Nicholas was unwilling to free himself from a quagmire of his own making. “He has been unable to make war, and he is now unable to make peace,” the president lamented.[12]

The Japanese eventually signaled their amenability to Roosevelt’s involvement in late April. They wanted to conduct any peace negotiations with Russia directly, but they were open to TR’s help in clearing what would surely be a difficult path to even reach the bargaining table in the first place.[13] With Japan on board, Roosevelt concentrated his efforts on coaxing Russia toward the same end. The czarist regime proved obstinate, however. The Russians were letting their vainglory override their material interests, for they could hardly afford to fight much longer.

Russia was then enduring not only an embarrassing succession of military defeats but significant upheaval at home. Earlier that year in St. Petersburg, a peaceful demonstration calling for labor reforms ended with Russian troops firing into the crowd, killing 130 people. That massacre—known as "Bloody Sunday"—damaged the czar's standing with the Russian populace and touched off months of domestic unrest.[14] Russia's internal strife swept diverse segments of society, from peasants to professionals and from cityside to countryside. Waves of worker strikes resulted in deadly clashes between protestors and soldiers. Radicals orchestrated political assassinations, including the murder of a high-ranking official in the czar's own family. Some faction of the Russian navy even began whispering about inciting a mutiny. The unrest wasn't centrally organized; the fragmented nature of the resistance allowed the czar to maintain power for the time being. But he was badly weakened, and it was unclear how much longer his grip on Russia would hold. (Lenin would later refer to the 1905 tumult as the "dress rehearsal" that presaged the Bolshevik Revolution of 1917.[15])

Russia's lackluster military performance against Japan exacerbated the rebellion within Russian borders. In symbolic terms, the Russian losses in the Far East epitomized the ineptitude and corruption of the czar's autocracy; in practical terms, the war exacted a severe toll on the Russian economy.[16] Still, the czar blindly pushed forward in his conflict with Japan—until a devastating naval loss in late May, combined with considerable cajoling from the Roosevelt administration, finally brought Russia to the table.[17]

Oscar Straus, with his characteristically effusive prose, congratulated TR for this "recent triumph in that humanitarian diplomacy," which had sealed Roosevelt's stature as "the world's greatest peacemaker."[18] The president knew, though, that the difficult work had only just begun. Simply getting the two parties to agree on a city for negotiations was proving onerous. "I have been having a curious time," Roosevelt told Straus. "I have been endeavoring to get Russia and Japan to go to The Hague. Curiously enough, Russia is most reluctant and Japan positively refuses."[19] Both sides were, however, willing to accept Washington, DC. Roosevelt personally harbored doubts about Washington on account of the heat that engulfed the American capital every summer. He began considering New England coastal communities, which could offer the twin benefits of balmy weather and relative seclusion. Posh locales like Bar Harbor and Newport held strong appeal, but it was the picturesque town of Portsmouth on the New Hampshire shoreline that won the honors of playing host.[20] Neither Russia nor Roosevelt yet knew that the Portsmouth conference, for all its focus on the Far East, would present an unexpected opportunity for American Jews to confront Russian officials face-to-face about the pernicious antisemitism that found free rein under czarist rule.

* * *

In the midst of these preparations, Secretary Hay's health rapidly deteriorated. His ultimate fate was approaching faster than anyone realized or wanted to believe. On July 1, with the peace conference mere weeks away, John Hay took his final breath.[21]

American Jews in particular felt the loss of a statesman whose efforts on the Romanian Note and Kishinev Petition they wouldn't soon forget. That Hay had only begrudgingly participated in the latter initiative was readily overlooked in the wake of his death. It is a striking fact that the only memorial service in New York honoring Hay took place at a Jewish house of worship, on the Lower East Side. Although temperatures in the city that day reached 87° Fahrenheit, with the humidity lending the air a "sultry" quality, Jews packed tightly into the Romanian synagogue on Rivington Street. Women and children sat in the balcony, which featured an American flag adorned with black streamers, as befitting a mourning ceremony. The men, gathered below, uniformly wore black ties. Attendees who had never met Secretary Hay openly wept as if a beloved family member had passed.[22]

The service was late to begin owing to the delayed arrival of Henry Goldfogle, the Jewish congressman who represented the district. For an interminable hour, the crush of people in the synagogue waited in the heat. Finally Goldfogle surfaced, and he delivered an address that notably set aside his partisan differences with Republicans. Although he had a history of accusing the Roosevelt administration of feckless disregard for Russian Jewry, Goldfogle now saw fit to praise not just the late secretary but the sitting president as well. “With Theodore Roosevelt, in calling attention to the indignation of Americans at the Russian outrages on the Jews, [John Hay] made himself heard even in darkest Russia,” Goldfogle affirmed.[23] That same day a similar service was held to commemorate Hay in a Philadelphia synagogue.[24] And the Union of Orthodox Jewish Congregations, which spanned both the United States and Canada, wired a telegram of condolence to Hay’s widow.[25]

* * *

The new head of B’nai B’rith, Adolf Kraus, was making his own arrangements in advance of the peace conference. Kraus was politically adept—he had managed a successful mayoral campaign in Chicago—and he saw in Portsmouth a potential forum to champion the cause of Russia’s Jews.[26] Perhaps the embattled Russian regime, reeling from military defeat and internal discord, could be persuaded in this moment of crisis to relent in its persecution of Jewry. Russia was dispatching one of its leading officials, Count Sergei Witte, to America for negotiations with the Japanese. Witte was considered a reformer, at least by Russian standards. And his wife, a convert to Christianity, had originally been Jewish.[27] Maybe he would agree to meet with a contingent of American Jews during his stay in New Hampshire about what was often called “the Jewish Question.” This phrase referred to debates in various European nations about whether their Jewish residents should remain consigned to second-class citizenship. By Roosevelt’s day, many European countries (but certainly not Russia) had favorably answered the Jewish Question with “emancipation,” or the removal of civil disabilities imposed on their Jewish subjects. If American Jews could convince Witte of emancipation’s merits, then perhaps Witte in turn could convince the czar.

Kraus contacted a Russian consul to see whether such a meeting could be scheduled.[28] Count Witte was, in fact, eager to meet with representatives of the Jewish community. This would be a strategic play on Witte's part. He believed that America's Jews had prejudiced their fellow citizens against Russia—with real consequences. The broad antipathy to Russia within the United States meant that Japan had been able to float war bonds on the American market while Russia could not. If negotiations in Portsmouth failed and the conflict dragged on, Witte hoped that a meeting with Jewish leaders would improve Russia's image in the United States and thereby enhance the Russian war effort. He seemed to think that his optics campaign in America wouldn't necessarily result in U.S. banks' financing Russian forces—that was too quixotic—but he might achieve the more attainable goal of leading American investors to cut off their financial support for Japan. It would take real work, Witte recognized, to reverse Russia's diminished standing.[29]

When word came that Witte was amenable, Kraus began assembling a delegation of Jews to convene with the Russian statesman. Naturally, Kraus solicited Jacob Schiff, the de facto spokesman for American Jewry and an ally of the president's. Schiff, however, had reservations. "I have been urged to meet Mr. Witte and Baron Rosen [the Russian Ambassador to the United States] to discuss with them Jewish affairs, but I have fought shy of them," Schiff privately told the publisher of a Jewish newspaper. "First, because I know it can do no good; and secondly, because I do not wish to have it said that I went to discuss Russian finance with Mr. Witte."[30] Schiff had been the single-most powerful force stonewalling Russia's bid to secure war funds, and he was hardly inclined to lend his ear to the pleas of a country that itself remained deaf to the lamentations of its Jewish inhabitants. But the meeting with Witte was moving ahead either way, and Schiff would ultimately put aside his misgivings to participate.

Three others were tapped for the occasion. Of course, Oscar Straus would be part of the deputation. He was the most politically powerful Jew in America thanks to his close relationship with Roosevelt. And by dint of Straus's ambassadorial experience, he possessed a diplomatic finesse that Schiff hadn't seemed to cultivate in his career as a banker. Joining them was Adolph Lewisohn, whose profile was similar to Schiff's: a German-born New Yorker who had acquired a large fortune and was active in philanthropy.[31] Rounding out the party was the brilliantly named Isaac Newton Seligman. The Seligmans, among the wealthiest and best-connected Jewish families in the country, enjoyed longstanding ties to TR.[32] Although the Roosevelt administration had no official role in the pending encounter between Witte and this Jewish cohort, the president was keen to be discreetly involved from a distance. And so Roosevelt met with Straus and Seligman in advance of the conference, calling on them to keep him apprised of developments in Portsmouth.[33]

* * *

As Count Witte's ship approached New York, he found that a cadre of reporters and onlookers hadn't been content to wait on shore for his arrival and instead filled a "whole flotilla of small vessels" to greet him in the waters. He could not have been difficult for them to spot—Witte had a massive frame, six feet six inches with broad shoulders. Once docked, Witte rode to the city's finest hotel, the St. Regis, where he was led to a lavish suite that boasted a sizable Russian flag draped from his balcony for the occasion. He also enjoyed the protection of the Secret Service, at Roosevelt's behest. The Russian statesman, who was to have a brief stay in New York before heading north, saw his limited time in the city as an initial opportunity to begin a strategic campaign to win over public opinion. On his second day in New York, Witte traveled to the Lower East Side—or "the Jewish ghetto," as Witte called it—where he conversed in Russian with some of the Jewish immigrants there. Witte later explained in his memoirs that, "in view of the considerable influence of the Jews on the press and on other aspects of American life," he had felt it was imperative that he not "exhibit any hostility toward them."[34]

He then took the train to Oyster Bay to see Roosevelt at his Sagamore Hill estate, which Witte thought "looked like an ordinary summer house of a burgher of small means." Witte was even less impressed by the meal inside. "The luncheon was more than simple and, for a European, almost indigestible," he later complained. According to Witte, Roosevelt was an apt representative of his country in culinary matters: "I noticed that, generally speaking, people ate very poorly in America." Although Witte came from a nation maligned on the world stage for its barbarity, he was offended by the lack of tablecloths and wine at TR's lunch. The president used the visit to press Witte into considering treaty terms that the Japanese would find acceptable, an early indicator that Roosevelt—though not formally part of the negotiations—would exercise clout as they proceeded.[35]

* * *

When the delegations from Japan and Russia surfaced in Portsmouth several days later, this sleepy seaside village of colonial homes and leafy streets came alive.[36] Onlookers packed the roadsides to catch a glimpse of the diplomats as they rode in open buggies down a processional route that was festooned with banners and flags. New Hampshire state troops, bedecked in blue and yellow, kept the throngs at bay. Spectators cheered the Russian and Japanese envoys alike; Witte repaid the honor by repeatedly lifting his silk hat. The parties disembarked at the courthouse where the governor ceremoniously welcomed them. At the expense of the American taxpayer, the dignitaries stayed at the Wentworth, a luxury hotel that exuded opulence. The Japanese took the elevator to their suites, whereas the Russians opted to labor up the stairs—perhaps a fitting metaphor given that the negotiations ahead would be more difficult for the Russians, whose bargaining position was far weaker.[37]

Portsmouth didn't technically host the bilateral meetings between the delegations. Every day, the parties would travel just across the Piscataqua River to Maine where the U.S. Navy maintained a facility outfitted with communications infrastructure that would enable the diplomats to easily cable Tokyo and St. Petersburg. The American officials playing host undertook extensive efforts to ensure that the daily cuisine was nothing less than sumptuous. But Witte remained underwhelmed, confining himself to a meager diet of vegetables and grains.[38] "It is highly dangerous to eat the ordinary food which is served in America," Witte later reflected. "I have arrived at the conclusion that Americans have no culinary taste and that they can eat almost anything that comes in their way, even if it is not fresh."[39] When a Japanese negotiator fell ill during the peace talks, Witte blamed the food. Nor was Witte terribly pleased with the Wentworth's accommodations, the hotel's grandeur notwithstanding. For one, the light in his room was disagreeable to his eyes. And when he tried to squeeze his sizable body into the bathtub, Witte twisted his ankle in the process.[40]

FIGURE. 5.1. Sergei Witte outside the Wentworth. Source: Library of Congress, Prints and Photographs Division.

⁂

Reporters had poured into Portsmouth from across the country and around the world: London, Paris, Frankfurt, Rome, and Tokyo.[41] On his fifth day in town, Count Witte finally sat down for an extended interview with a newspaper, giving an exclusive to the Boston Globe during a break in the peace talks. Witte's cadence of speech was "animated" yet "deliberate" as he shared strikingly frank views about Jewish people. "The Jews in America possess great influence and have quite naturally used that influence to destroy American sympathy [for Russia], to do all that is possible to enlist sympathy for the Japanese," he griped. Witte must have realized that he sounded conspiratorial and even antisemitic because he then quickly hedged, "I do not say this with any bitterness." Despite Witte's self-directed resolution to present a friendlier face to Jews, it appears he could not help but peddle the hackneyed conceit of the Jew as duplicitous puppet-master.[42]

Witte utilized his interview with the Globe to reiterate the Russian sentiment expressed during the Kishinev affair: external interference into internal matters was beyond the pale—in both senses. He conveyed that the "Jewish Question" was strictly a "domestic matter that must be dealt with by Russia herself" and lay outside "the domain of international discussion." To buttress his point, Witte relied upon the popular Russian tactic of referencing race-based lynching in the United States. He contended, "Every country has its own great questions to settle that can only be settled by itself. I need only refer by way of illustration to the negro in America." He then curtailed his commentary by suggesting that it was wise for him not to say too much in advance of his meeting with the Jewish leaders. But Witte had said plenty already.[43]

⁂

That same day, members of the Jewish contingent turned up in Portsmouth.[44] Oscar Straus spoke to the press upon arrival and called for the repeal of hundreds of discriminatory Russian laws targeting Jews. He evoked the Declaration of Independence in his remarks: “We will ask M. Witte that the Jews in Russia be accorded the same right to pursue life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness that others in that country have.” (The “M.” before Witte meant “Monsieur,” a nod to French as the language of diplomacy.) Straus then added, “This is what we ask. No more, no less, to use President Roosevelt’s effective phrase.” He was referencing Roosevelt’s famous line that everyone merits “a square deal, because he is entitled to no more and should receive no less.”[45] Straus also sought to preempt speculation in the press that he was there to purchase civil rights for Russian Jews in exchange for war loans. “This is [in] no way involved with any financial question,” he clarified. “It is purely and simply a question of humanity.”[46]

Loans were indeed not on the agenda, but the New York Times discerned that the topic couldn’t have been far from Witte’s mind. “When this war began and [Russia] turned to the financial centers for money,” the Times recounted, “she found every Jewish banking house in the world closed to her.” Consequently, a Russian regime that just two years prior had refused to accept a petition sent by an American president would now subject itself to a remonstrance by American citizens. It was an “extraordinary spectacle,” proclaimed the Times.[47] To be sure, no explicit quid pro quo was on the table, but many observers thought that if the Russians made moves toward Jewish emancipation, their financial troubles might well ease.

* * *

Witte received his Jewish visitors in his room at the Wentworth Hotel at 8:45 in the evening, joined by the Russian ambassador and Witte’s interpreter. The Jewish delegation revived a line of reasoning that had appeared first in the Romanian Note and then in the Kishinev Petition: the prejudicial treatment of Russian Jews prompted “an influx en masse” of refugees to the United States, rendering the issue international in character.

Therefore, the czar's regime couldn't rightly claim that the Jewish-American representatives before him were "meddling with affairs" internal to Russia. While immigration gave them just cause to state their grievances, they insisted that immigration itself wasn't a viable solution to the Jewish Question. There were too many millions of Russian Jews to simply displace them to other nations. "The Russo-Jewish question must be settled in Russia," they averred.[48]

The Jewish leaders also assured Witte that Russia had nothing to fear from granting civil equality to its Jewish population. After all, Jewish emancipation in France, Germany, and England all demonstrated that once the Jew is granted the full prerogatives of citizenship, he becomes "a lover of his country and supporter of the government." And, of course, in "the United States the Jew has become an ardent American"—so ardent that American Jews of Russian origin were helping rally the U.S. government against their former homeland. The Jewish delegation asserted that "Jewish influence in the United States" was substantial and increasing daily thanks to the arrival of Russian-Jewish refugees. Emphasizing Russia's self-interest, the Jewish representatives urged Witte to consider the detriment to Russia of an icy relationship between the eagle and the bear: "Can it be expected that the influence, which the American Jew is thus gaining upon public opinion, will be exerted to the advantage of the country which systematically degrades his brethren in race and makes their fate almost unendurable?"[49] If Witte worried about Jewish persuasive power in America, then the Jewish delegation was more than happy to leverage his concerns toward their own ends.

Witte, for his part, sought to stake out some middle ground between the typical Russian denial of Jewish persecution and a candid acknowledgement of that reality. He conceded, "Jews in Russia [are] in a very difficult position," yet he still alleged that "the horrors of the Jewish situation in Russia had been presented to the world in a somewhat exaggerated light."[50] Witte also expressed optimism for Russia's Jews thanks to a new development: Czar Nicholas, under pressure from domestic unrest, had recently agreed to institute an assembly—the Duma—that would represent the people's interests. Once the Duma convened, it would likely repeal antisemitic laws, Witte told the Jewish delegation.[51] His prognosis here lacked credibility because the Duma was to exercise merely consultative rather than binding powers, providing a nominal gesture toward liberalism while allowing the czar to preserve absolutism in practice.[52]

The meeting wasn't without its tenser moments. In one instance, Jacob Schiff motioned toward Witte's translator—a Russian national of Jewish faith—and pointedly pressed Witte, "Will you please tell me why you, as a Russian, have full rights in your country while he, also a Russian, has none?"[53] Witte responded with an expression of support for the emancipation of Russian Jews but argued that any progress should be incremental. He conjectured that the "immediate and complete removal of their legal disabilities would, in my opinion, do them more harm than good" because it would provoke hostility from the Russian people.[54]

Unsurprisingly, that answer didn't satisfy Schiff and the others. They countered that if the Russian populace was going to take umbrage at each piecemeal step toward Jewish liberation, all the better for the regime to implement equality "by one single action." The swift and total emancipation of Jewry would limit Russian hostility to one discrete point in time. Alternatively, Witte's proposal to have emancipation "dragged on through partial measures" would only serve to stoke "anew the irritation" among Russians toward their Jewish neighbors in an endless succession of aggravating reforms.[55]

Jacob Schiff was particularly irked when Witte recommended that American Jews use their supposed clout with their Russian coreligionists to sway them away from revolutionary movements and toward loyalty to the czar. Witte was proceeding from the common view in Russia that its Jewish population comprised dangerous traitors. The reality was that only a small minority of Russian Jews were seditious agitators. Most the czar's Jewish subjects were far too preoccupied with the relentless struggle of daily life; insurrection simply wasn't on their agenda. But Schiff did not reject the allegation that many Russian Jews were subversive of state authority. Instead, he argued that they were justified in their radical bid to create a Russian republic. With an edge in his voice, Schiff asked rhetorically, "Is it not probable that the young men became revolutionists in the hope that a republic will grant them just laws which are denied under the rule of the Emperor?” Witte, in turn, dismissed revolutionary aspirations as quixotic, declaring that the end of the czarist dynasty—the Romanovs—would not materialize in their lifetime. “The Romanovs will rule Russia for at least another hundred years,” he insisted.[56] He was off by about ninety.

Despite some friction—at one point, Schiff pounded his fist on the table—both sides were reasonably cordial.[57] Witte would later recall that Schiff’s stridency was “toned down by the more balanced judgments of the other members,” and he singled out Oscar Straus for making an especially “excellent impression.”[58] In the same spirit, Seligman would describe Count Witte as “a gentleman inspired with broadminded views and having a thorough grasp of the situation.” Even if Witte was disinclined to recognize the full depths of Jewish deprivation, the willingness of a high-ranking Russian official to admit any of it was a breakthrough of sorts. Witte offered to resume his discussion with the Jewish leaders in New York City, after he concluded the peace talks.[59]

* * *

Reporters had been patiently awaiting the reappearance of the Jewish delegation from Witte’s suite, as a meeting that was supposed to take one hour stretched to three. Finally, the Jewish leaders emerged just before midnight. Jacob Schiff gave a mixed statement to the press—he surmised that their conference with Witte “could not well lead to any practical result” for Russian Jewry but nevertheless vaguely anticipated that the “frank exchange of views” on the subject would “bear beneficial consequences” in the fullness of time. Oscar Straus added, “There is nothing more for us to do; our mission is done.”[60]

As with the peace negotiations themselves, Roosevelt was officially uninvolved with the Jewish contingent’s endeavor but still proved an important behind-the-scenes player from Oyster Bay. TR had requested that the Jewish participants keep him updated on their gathering with Witte; three of the five dutifully dashed off letters to the president. Jacob Schiff reconstructed at length the contents of the discussion and requested Roosevelt's input. "We have become so accustomed to look to you, dear Mr. President, for advice and guidance in dealing with the momentous questions which at this time touch the weal of our race," Schiff wrote.[61] Isaac Newton Seligman relayed to Roosevelt that Witte expected—or at least claimed to expect—that the pending Duma in St. Petersburg would institute pro-Jewish reforms. Seligman had his doubts. "The past promises and subsequent non-performances on the part of Russia naturally lead us to feel distrustful, and we have some misgivings as to his utterances," Seligman confessed, even as he acknowledged having a "favorable" opinion of Witte.[62] Meanwhile, the president's most trusted Jewish confidant, Oscar Straus, told Roosevelt that Witte had expressed a preference for "gradual emancipation" and that they in response had demanded "equal rights—no more no less—and without delay."[63]

Roosevelt wanted to personally lend himself to their ongoing cause. But his first priority was coaxing the Japanese and Russians into a peace accord. "I am greatly interested in what you tell me about the Russian Jew question," the president assured Straus, "and will of course do anything I can, subsequent to the peace negotiations being out of the way, as I do not want to complicate the latter."[64] Indeed, Roosevelt would soon find himself frenetically working back channels to ensure that the precarious discussions between the warring parties did not end in failure.[65]

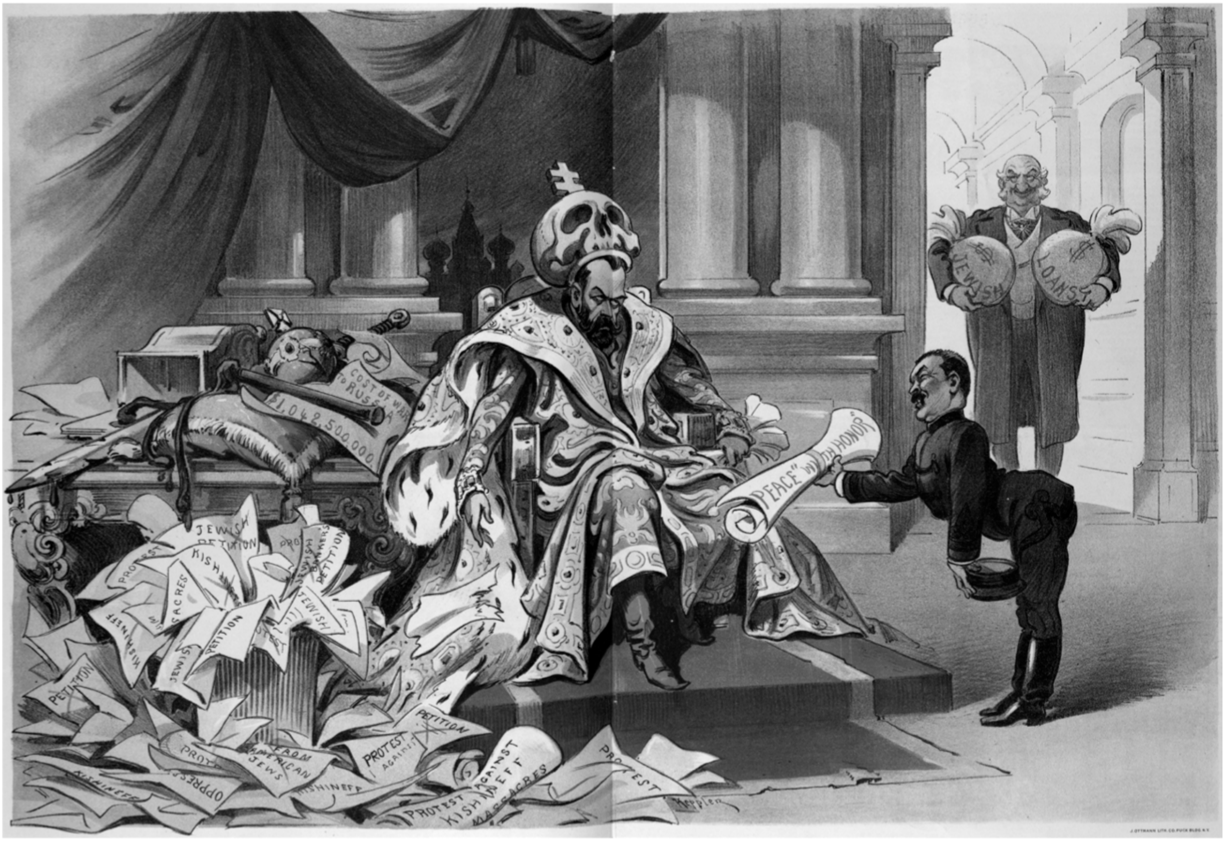
* * *

The Jewish summit with Witte garnered front-page headlines nationwide. From the Colorado Springs Gazette to the Augusta Chronicle, Americans read about the Jewish leaders who confronted the Russian official over the plight of their embattled coreligionists.[66] The Cleveland Plain Dealer declared that the Jewish meeting was "far overshadowing" the peace negotiations.[67] One newspaper correspondent vividly captured the significance of the moment. "Great and dramatic is the spectacle presented tonight," he marveled. "Picture, if you will, the mighty bear, rampant and aggressive, with its teeth so often displayed in harsh snarls … humbled before the much despised Jew."[68] After years of practiced obstinance, Russia was now hearing a humanitarian message, from Jewish lips no less.

Opinions in the mainstream press differed over the meeting's potential to appreciably impact the lives of Russian Jews. The Idaho Daily Statesman suggested that Witte would surely "carry home with him some new view of the entire subject" after he had not only conversed with the Jewish delegation but also seen firsthand the flourishing Jewish-American community, a model for what Russian Jewry could become if granted equality.[69] But the Cleveland Plain Dealer was less sanguine. That paper derided Witte as irrelevant next to the czar, in whose imperial hands the fate of Russia's Jews ultimately rested. Witte was "not supreme" and consistently "overruled" back home by "his weathercock of a master."[70]

When the Jewish representatives returned from Portsmouth to their respective cities, they tried to strike an optimistic note about the near future in their remarks to journalists. B'nai B'rith president Adolf Kraus, who had initiated the meeting with Witte, announced in Chicago, "Better times are coming for our people," and he predicted that the new Duma would dismantle the country's antisemitic legal code.[71] Meanwhile, Seligman—despite confiding in Roosevelt his wariness of Witte—told the New York press that Witte would relay "our message to the emperor in a convincing way that we are confident will bear fruit."[72] Kraus and Seligman were of course incentivized to publicly depict their encounter with Witte as a promising step forward, lest they preemptively undermine their goals.

Other voices in the Jewish community were less hopeful. The Democrat-leaning Hebrew Standard reported skepticism in New York among Russian-Jewish immigrants, who were cautioning that "Witte will promise a great deal" but "he will in reality be able to accomplish little."[73] Jews actually living in Russia were also leery. As the Associated Press wired from St. Petersburg, "Prominent Jews here … are pessimistic regarding the outcome of the promised reforms and have little hope of favorable Jewish legislation from the Duma."[74] Witte's reputation for relative liberality appeared insufficient to outweigh Russia's inveterate Jew-hatred.[75]



COST OF WAR TO RUSSIA
$1,042,500,000
JEWISH PETITION
KISHINEFF
PROTEST
MASSACRES
JEWISH BANKERS PETITION
JEWISH PETITION
PROTEST PETITION
PROTEST AGAINST FROM AMERICAN JEWS
OPPRESSION
KISHINEFF
PROTEST AGAINST KISHINEFF MASSACRES
PROTEST
"PEACE" WITH HONOR
JEWISH $ LOANS $
Keppler

FIGURE. 5.2. After rejecting the Kishinev Petition, which lays scattered on the ground, a defeated czar is depicted as having to accept “Jewish loans” to compensate for the war’s cost. In reality, Jewish financiers had no desire to offer loans to Russia. Source: “Kishineff Must Be Paid For—with Interest,” Puck, September 6, 1905.

The members of the Jewish delegation were frustrated that the press frequently depicted their meeting with Witte as exactly what it was not: a trade of loans for Jewish rights.[76] In South Dakota, for instance, the Aberdeen Daily News erroneously reported, “The well-known ability of the Jews to drive a good bargain is demonstrated again in the proposition of American bankers of that race to loan the czar all the money he needs, provided he will grant reforms in Russia which will deliver the Jewish race from persecution.” The paper earnestly “hoped that the bankers will succeed in driving their bargain.”[77] Although intended as a compliment, this commentary reinforced tropes about Jews as cunning moneylenders.

Oscar Straus made sure to disabuse Roosevelt of any misinformation he might have picked up from the newspapers. “Contrary to press reports, the conference had nothing to do with finances,” he stressed. “The subject was not referred to."[78] Isaac Newton Seligman, too, took pains to assure the president that they never contemplated funding Russia's war efforts in exchange for Jewish emancipation. "The papers manufactured that matter out of whole cloth, and there is not a particle of truth in such published reports," he vented.[79] The Jewish leaders had already given statements to the press back in New Hampshire categorically refuting rumors of a quid pro quo.[80] Witte himself corroborated their claims, but the Cleveland Plain Dealer remained unconvinced that war loans had been off the table: "The numerous denials were cleverly calculated, both by M. Witte and these representatives of great banking houses, to befog the casual observance as to the real object of their visit."[81] Jews and Russians alike could not so easily escape stereotyping about duplicity.

With Russia bedeviled by ongoing turmoil at home and abroad, no one could be sure of Russian Jewry's imminent fate. A Jewish scholar in New York, Isidor Singer, published an open letter to Count Witte that reflected the moment's uncertainty. Singer posited that the Russian treatment of Jews would be a bellwether for the very survival of the czarist regime. If Russia applied "the principle of American life and American government" to itself, then perhaps the regime could endure in a reformed condition. But Singer held out the possibility that Russian backwardness was incorrigible under czarist rule, leaving revolution as the only alternative. In Singer's words, perhaps "the malady is rooted so deep, that the amputation of the empire is the only means of salvation." His letter also approvingly alluded to Roosevelt, suggesting that even if the peace talks with Japan failed, at least Witte "had the great advantage of making the personal acquaintance of the American people and [their] sturdy president."[82]

* * *

It looked as though the Russo-Japanese talks were, in fact, careening toward collapse but for the efforts of the sturdy president himself. The warring parties found themselves mired in an intractable standoff over land claims and indemnities, spurring Roosevelt to fire off a rapid succession of cables from Oyster Bay to Portsmouth, St. Petersburg, and Tokyo. A principal obstacle to peace was convincing the pride-wounded Russians to make concessions that offended their sense of honor, even though the proposed terms were reasonable given Russia's poor military showing. At first, Roosevelt appeared unable to finesse a compromise that both sides could stomach. But in the waning days of August, just as it seemed the diplomats would return home empty-handed, they agreed to terms.[83] "It's a mighty good thing for Russia and a mighty good thing for Japan," Roosevelt told a congressman, adding that it was "a mighty good thing for me, too!"[84]

Indeed. Heads of state and newspaper editorialists the world over lauded Roosevelt for his pivotal part in a conference he never actually attended.[85] After facing criticism earlier in his presidency that he pursued a reckless brand of "cowboy diplomacy," Roosevelt could justifiably claim the mantle of peacemaker in the wake of Portsmouth.[86] Oscar Straus gushed in a letter to the president that many people who "only a few months ago looked upon you as the scourge of war now praise you as the angel of peace."[87] For Roosevelt's role in the Russo-Japanese negotiations, he won the Nobel Peace Prize—the first American to receive a Nobel in any category. He resolved that the prize money be spent in pursuit of improved relations between capital and labor, tapping Straus as a steward of that endeavor.[88]

* * *

The signing ceremony of the peace treaty took place in early September in a brick building in the navy yard where the diplomats had spent weeks wrangling over terms. After three previous days of gloomy weather, the sun now appeared as if on cue. All of Portsmouth waited eagerly for the signal—a nineteen-gun salute from the navy yard battery—that would indicate the diplomats had affixed their names to the historic document. The salute was expected at three o'clock that afternoon, but at the appointed hour one agonizing minute after the next elapsed without any discharge from the battery's gunner. Finally, upon the last pen stroke in the conference room, a clerk ran outside to announce, "All signed at 3:47," prompting a navy seaman to wave a red flag at the gunner some fifty yards away.[89] "The opening shot of the salute rang out on the clear air of the soft September afternoon," recorded one journalist, "proclaiming peace between Russia and Japan."[90]

A cacophony ensued. Portsmouth's churches tolled their bells, ships in the harbor blew their whistles, and a marine band in the navy yard "burst out into a fanfare." Amid the noise, a State Department official phoned Oyster Bay to inform Roosevelt of the news. Champagne was opened for the diplomats back inside the conference room, where the American president was toasted even before the Russian czar or Japanese emperor—a testament to Roosevelt's centrality to the negotiations.[91]

At five o'clock, the Russian delegation journeyed across the Kittery Bridge into Portsmouth, which was densely packed with festive crowds. Witte was due to attend a special service at a local church but struggled to make his way through the crush of onlookers. They kept extending their hands to him—and understandably so, given that handshakes were "the usual expression of attention with Americans," he recalled. Finally, Witte entered the church, which was delightfully adorned with floral arrangements. A Russian Orthodox priest walked with rabbis in a procession behind a choir that was intoning a song of peace, a sign that the war's resolution might well hasten a fresh start for Jewish-Christian relations in Russia.[92]

* * *

Four days after the peace conference concluded, Witte was back at Oyster Bay as Roosevelt's dinner guest. The president had hosted the Japanese diplomats earlier that afternoon for lunch, and now he provided a final—perhaps inedible—meal to Count Witte. Following that supper, Roosevelt sent a letter to a retired British statesman, George Otto Trevelyan, that reflected his mixed feelings about Witte. "I suppose Witte is the best man that Russia could have at the head of her affairs at present," Roosevelt offered in Witte's favor before disclosing, "I cannot say that I liked him, for I thought his bragging and bluster not only foolish but shockingly vulgar."[93] Witte's diplomatic credentials aside, he wasn't known for his subtlety or tact.[94]

The president may have felt self-professed “contempt” for Witte, but Roosevelt was also encouraged by their discussion at Oyster Bay, which covered the oppression of Russian Jewry. Weeks earlier, TR had promised Straus that he would personally take up the cause with Witte after the peace negotiations, and Roosevelt appears to have stayed true to his word. Precisely what the president said to Witte remains unknown, but he did share with Trevelyan that he had aimed to “get a little alleviation of the condition of the Jews out of this peace conference, as what you might call a by-product.” And Roosevelt saw cause for hope, relaying to Trevelyan, “Witte also expressed his views about religious freedom and freedom of conscience in a way that would command hearty support from you or me.”[95]

The president felt sufficiently optimistic to send Witte a follow-up letter about an issue that the Jewish group in Portsmouth hadn’t broached: the Passport Question. Despite assurances the prior year that Russia would reassess its visa restrictions on Jews with U.S. citizenship, the prohibition of American Jews remained in effect. “In furtherance of our conversation of last evening, I beg you to consider the question of granting passports [i.e., visas] to reputable American citizens of Jewish faith,” Roosevelt pressed. He emphasized that the stakes weren’t confined to American Jewry but implicated the whole of Russian-American relations; reform on this front would “remove the last cause of irritation between the two nations” and ensure the perpetuity of their “historic friendship.” TR acknowledged Russia’s right to ban any given U.S. citizen from its territory, provided such a decision hinged on that citizen’s rectitude rather than religion.[96] The president’s letter came with a request that Witte forward it to the czar himself.[97] Roosevelt’s bid here for passport reform was, and would long remain, hidden from public view—in other words, he wasn’t posturing to score points with a domestic audience.[98]

On Witte’s final morning in New York City before returning to Russia, he and the Russian ambassador visited their Japanese counterparts at the Waldorf-Astoria for a farewell. Then, at the St. Regis, Witte reconvened with the Jewish representatives he had met in Portsmouth—or at least most of them. Three of the five were present for this second gathering: the banker, Isaac Newton Seligman; the diplomat, Oscar Straus; and the B’nai

B’rith president, Adolf Kraus.[99] The latter had traveled all the way from Chicago for what was a merely ceremonial send-off. Having already aired their views fully in New Hampshire, all parties were content to treat this latter occasion primarily as an exercise in politesse.[100]

Afterward, Seligman told the press that Witte had just now pledged “as far as he can personally assist, all will be done to give the Jews their full constitutional rights,” though Seligman noted that Witte had been speaking as an “individual” rather than in an “official” capacity.[101] To what was surely Seligman’s annoyance, he continued to fend off queries from reporters about whether Jewish-run banks would provide loans for Russia. “The matter of a loan was not even suggested,” he insisted. Meanwhile, Witte lunched at the ritzy Union Club on Fifth Avenue before beginning his long voyage home. From on board his steamer prior to sailing, Witte gave an ambivalent statement to the papers. He did express hope for a “new era” of religious equality but cautioned that “it takes time to change sentiment and work political reforms.” Witte then added with vague foreboding, “Regrettable things cannot always be foreseen or prevented.”[102] As he well understood, cessation of war beyond Russia’s borders would not necessarily forge peace within them. It remained to be seen whether ongoing domestic strife would ultimately improve or imperil life for the czar’s Jewish subjects.

⁂

Witte returned home to a Russia roiled by turmoil that was alarming even by the standards of 1905. A cascading series of strikes across different industries turned into a general strike by October that brought the nation’s cities to the brink of paralysis. Witte pleaded with the czar that only a transition to a constitutional monarchy would placate the revolutionary fervor sweeping the country. The reform-minded Witte drew up a memorandum for Czar Nicholas’s consideration that called for civil liberties, voting rights, and a Duma with real legislative powers; under this scheme, the czar would retain his status as emperor, and prospective laws would be subject to his veto. Nicholas did not thrill to the idea of significantly diminishing his autocratic control, but the dysfunction of Russian society was too plain for even an intransigent despot to ignore. At the month's end, the czar begrudgingly issued the October Manifesto, based on Witte's memorandum, in which "freedom of conscience" was affirmed as a core element of "genuine personal inviolability."[103] This was a remarkable concession for millions of Jews who had endured relentless subjugation.

Witte's promise to the American Jewish leaders that he would do all he could for their coreligionists in Russia was now improbably realized in an official decree bearing the czar's signature. Yet even as its ink was freshly drying, the manifesto became a dead letter. The day after its promulgation, thousands of Russians would greet the news of civic freedom for their Jewish neighbors with an explosion of antisemitic violence never before seen in the dark history of their empire.

OceanofPDF.com

6

POGROMS

As word of the October Manifesto spread throughout Russia, some Jews and liberal Gentiles took to the streets in celebration. Their outburst of excitement was decidedly not an expression of gratitude to the czar for bestowing new rights. To the contrary, these reformers viewed the manifesto for what it was: an act of desperation from a flailing leader. The anti-czarist crowds sensed the regime's weakness and pressed their advantage in cities across Russia. They marched with banners to jails, police stations, and governors' homes where they called for political prisoners to be set free.[1] "Hurrah, freedom to all!" they chanted. "Down with the autocracy, down with the czar!"[2]

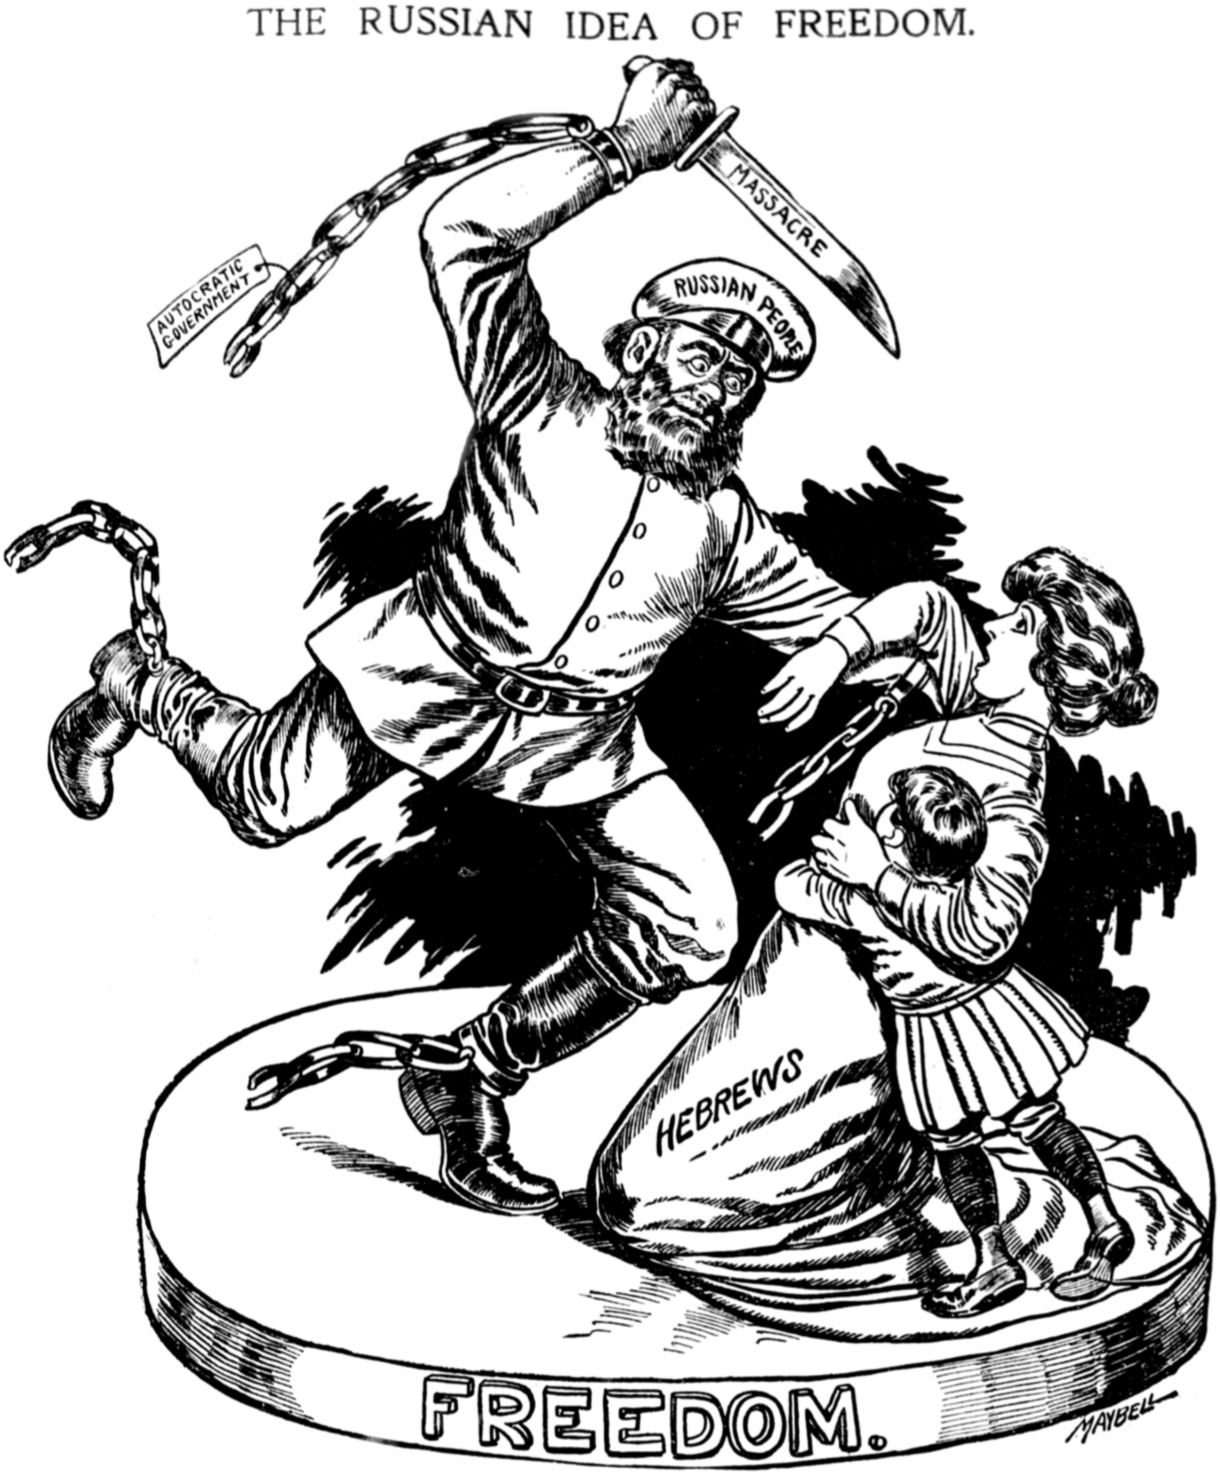
But these Jews and their like-minded compatriots were not the only ones in the streets that day. A loose collection of reactionary organizations—dubbed the "Black Hundreds" by their critics—began massacring Jews with abandon.[3] The assailants savagely beat Jews to death while berating them, "Here is your freedom, here is your constitution, here is your revolution."[4] In one community after the next, mobs torched local synagogues before moving on to Jewish homes and Jewish businesses.[5] That most of the Jewish victims were not actually liberal agitators was of little moment to the pogromists.[6]

On hand that day in Kyiv was the acclaimed Yiddish writer Sholem Aleichem (whose short stories about Tevye, the fictional milkman, formed the basis for Fiddler on the Roof). Aleichem gave a firsthand account for the press of a devastating pogrom there. He related how the city's Jews pleaded with Christian acquaintances to offer them refuge but were refused and left for slaughter. Pogromists had no inclination to spare even the most vulnerable. "Jewish girls were dishonored," wrote Alecheim, "children were rent in twain."[7] The very worst of the genocide took place in Odessa, where the streets were littered with Jewish corpses. One journalist described the "revolting barbarity" inflicted on Odessa's Jews. "Heads were battered with hammers, nails were driven into the bodies, eyes were gouged out, and ears severed," the report read. Some of the city's Jews were strangled to death, others burned alive.[8]

These blood-soaked scenes unfolded on a staggering scale throughout the Pale of Settlement and in some cases beyond it. Over the course of twelve days, pogroms erupted in well over six hundred cities, towns, and villages. The forty-nine Jewish deaths in Kishinev were now eclipsed by ghastly orders of magnitude. By some counts, more than three thousand Jewish souls lost their lives in the 1905 pogrom wave, with thousands more injured. Two hundred thousand Jews sustained property damage, entailing losses of 63 million rubles (over $1.1 billion U.S. dollars today). Russian Jewry was in abject ruin.[9]

The pogromists—waving Russian flags and singing nationalistic tunes—were self-professed patriots who viewed their butchery of Jews as an expression of loyalty to the czar. In one sense, their rationale was incoherent: they were violently raging against a manifesto that the czar himself had decreed.[10] But in another sense, the Black Hundreds and their ilk were supremely faithful czarists; after all, the October Manifesto was a begrudging concession that scarcely veiled Czar Nicholas's opposition to liberalization in general and to Jewry in particular.

The czar showed no compassion for the pogrom's victims and felt that they deserved their grisly fate. As he told his mother, "The people became enraged by the insolence and audacity of the revolutionaries and socialists; and because nine-tenths of them are Yids, the people's whole wrath has turned against them."[11] Nicholas here insinuated that the pogroms were spontaneous, which is not entirely accurate. Although some of the antisemitic attacks were indeed unplanned, in other places the Black Hundreds had been plotting and waiting for an opportune moment to savage the Jewish population.[12]



THE RUSSIAN IDEA OF FREEDOM.
MASSACRE
AUTOCRATIC GOVERNMENT
RUSSIAN PEOPLE
HEBREWS
FREEDOM.
MAYBELL

FIGURE. 6.1. The Russian people react to the October Manifesto and its promises of freedom by slaughtering Jews. Source: “The Russian Idea of Freedom,” Brooklyn Daily Eagle, November 3, 1905.

The degree of government complicity varied by place. Some authorities on the ground tried to mollify the mobs, but many other officials passively consented to the brutalities or even partook in them.[13] When Odessa's governor was beseeched to intervene on behalf of Jews, he coldly responded, "You wanted freedom—here is the Yid's freedom."[14] The inconsistency among local authorities paralleled a divide at the highest echelons of the Russian state. On one side was Sergei Witte, whom Czar Nicholas had named the Russian premier—effectively, the prime minister—on the very day that Nicholas signed the October Manifesto.[15] On the other was Dmitri Trepov, the governor-general of St. Petersburg, who favored pogroms.[16] Each man appeased a different constituency: Witte, the reformers; Trepov, the reactionaries. As Lenin keenly observed, "Both Witte and Trepov are necessary: Witte to beguile some, Trepov to suppress others; Witte—for promises, Trepov—for deeds."[17] Trepov cultivated close ties to Nicholas and reinforced the czar's own inclination toward antisemitism. "The Emperor was surrounded by avowed Jew-haters such as Trepov," Witte would later recall in his memoirs.[18]

The atrocities visited upon Russia's Jews were part of a broader turbulence upending Russian society. Witte had hoped that the October Manifesto would soothe tensions, but the perilous situation on the ground seemed only to worsen. In the cities, laborers refused to work. In the countryside, peasants resorted to arson and theft. In the military, mutinies abounded. Railroads came to a standstill. Universities were hotbeds of dissent. Educated elites abstained from their professional obligations.[19]

The American ambassador's aide, H. Custis Vezey, sent a letter back to Washington that offered a revealing glimpse of the fear and furor gripping Russia. "Today a great many people in St. Petersburg were in dread of being murdered in their beds, and they are hardly to be blamed," Vezey shared. "There was a rush on the gun shops and nearly all their stock was sold out yesterday as everyone is arming for the expected riots, no one placing any confidence whatsoever in the police or the troops doing their duty." He further relayed reports that the czarist regime was actively spurring the Black Hundreds—made up of "hooligans, toughs, and the ignorant multitude"—to terrorize Jews and other reformist elements.[20]

While the instinct to kill Jews amid a crisis was familiar to many Russians, at this moment of particularly acute social rupture, Jewish blood flowed at an unprecedented pace.

* * *

After the horrors of Kishinev in 1903 and before the mass carnage of 1905, pogroms had periodically broken out in Russia. But the violence was comparatively limited in that timeframe. Kishinev had taught Russian Jews that they would need to mobilize in their own self-defense, and in a number of attacks predating the October Manifesto, Jews were able to partially defend themselves and mitigate casualties.[21] Pogroms, accordingly, became a secondary concern for most American Jews. To be sure, the American press did report on the sporadic assaults against Russian Jewry, and Jacob Schiff at times nudged Theodore Roosevelt on the issue.[22] Yet it was the Passport Question, rather than pogroms, that assumed prominence amid the 1904 presidential race. And the following year, when the Jewish delegation met with Sergei Witte in Portsmouth, they chose to focus their remonstrance on legal forms of discrimination against Russian Jews, not on extralegal violence.

But the bloodbath of fall 1905—whose sheer scale had overwhelmed Jewish bids at self-defense—once again made pogroms the galvanizing cause for American Jews and many of their Gentile compatriots. Major papers in the Jewish population centers, like the New York Times and Philadelphia Inquirer, dedicated their front pages to the pogroms.[23] And the news coverage reached communities with far fewer Jews too. From the Deep South and New England to the Great Plains and Pacific Northwest, local papers carried word of the macabre developments in Russia.[24] The St. Albans Daily Messenger, on the northern edge of Vermont, printed reports of the "wholesale plunder of Jews."[25] In Alabama, the Montgomery Advertiser described how Jews were "being hunted down in the streets."[26] And the Evening World-Herald in Omaha relayed, "The mobs swear they will not leave a single Jew alive."[27] The question for America—its Jews, its Gentiles, and its government—was whether and how to mount a response to a calamity of unconscionable magnitude.

* * *

America's most outspoken Jewish leader, Jacob Schiff, concentrated his initial efforts at government authorities not in the United States but in Russia. He cabled Witte directly in early November: "The American people stand aghast at atrocities in Odessa and elsewhere." Schiff's cable blamed the Russian state for allowing the slaughter to persist and warned that Russia could never "expect the moral support of other nations" under such circumstances.[28] Witte's reply came two days later. He insisted, unconvincingly, that the Russian government was "horrified" by the "savage outbreaks." Witte was at least honest about the reigning unrest: "As long as the country is in such [an] excited state, the local authorities are often powerless."[29] So was Witte. He did admonish local authorities to stop the pogromists but to little avail.[30]

Witte's feebleness was a symptom of both a teetering regime and his own beleaguered position within that regime. Even before the October Manifesto, political circles in St. Petersburg erroneously suspected that Witte might be conspiring with Jews to engineer a coup. The October Manifesto itself, with its proclamation of religious liberty, could have only served to stoke fears of a Witte-Jewish alliance.[31] Against this fraught backdrop, Witte was reduced to little more than an impotent figurehead in his new role as premier. He later lamented, "I wielded little power and bore all the responsibility" while the antisemitic Trepov, who enjoyed the czar's fidelity, functioned in effect as "the irresponsible head of the government."[32]

Oscar Straus journeyed to the White House bearing in hand the text of Witte's unpromising cable to Schiff. Straus and Roosevelt discussed what steps, if any, TR might take on behalf of Russian Jewry. Afterward the president consulted with Elihu Root, who had succeeded John Hay as secretary of state and whose affinity for Jews was limited. Roosevelt resolved that he would not press the cause of Jewry with the Russian government. The White House released a statement to the newspapers explaining that Russia was far too anarchic to render diplomatic entreaties of any value. “In the conditions of social disorder which actually exist in Russia,” the statement read, “the president does not see that any action can be taken by this government at present which will be of any benefit to the unfortunate sufferers for whom we feel such keen sympathy.”[33]

Roosevelt’s reasoning here was probably genuine. After all, he had been willing to exert pressure, both publicly and privately, on the Russians at various points throughout his presidency. What made this juncture different was the shambolic state of affairs bedeviling the Russian Empire. The October Manifesto—the kind of reform that American Jewry had long sought—had resulted not in liberation but rather devastation for Russian Jews. In all likelihood, Roosevelt sincerely believed that speaking out now would be negligible or even counterproductive. Secretary Root’s counsel mattered, too. He almost certainly helped persuade Roosevelt that inaction was advisable. But most American Jews did not share that calculus; they wanted a robust response from their government. Whatever the president’s rationale, the goodwill he had earned from previously supporting Jewish causes would not insulate him from criticism moving forward.

* * *

With Russia devolving, Roosevelt fretted that his chief envoy to St. Petersburg was absent from his post. The president had appointed a new American ambassador to Russia, George Meyer, who had overlapped with Roosevelt at Harvard. But Meyer, at this crucial crossroads in Russian history, was back in his native Massachusetts visiting his wife and children. “I think you should be in St. Petersburg now and that you ought not to delay one day,” Roosevelt telegraphed.[34] Meyer proved reluctant to leave quite yet. He was a dedicated family man whose daughter was ailing from appendicitis and had just undergone an operation. Meyer told the president that he hoped to wait “until she is out of danger.”[35] In turn, Roosevelt expressed obligatory concern for the daughter’s well-being but reiterated the urgency in Russia. “I should have asked you to start for St. Petersburg three weeks ago," Roosevelt reflected regretfully. "During these three weeks, the one place where it was really very important that we should have an ambassador was St. Petersburg.… You should be there at the earliest possible moment."[36] But Meyer lingered as Russia imploded.

* * *

American Jewry—divided by class, religiosity, politics, and country of origin—united in the face of Russian butchery. Elements from New York City's diverse Jewish communities convened at Temple Emanu-El to establish a relief committee that would channel funds to victims in Russia. The initial contributions from that evening totaled an impressive $56,800 ($2 million today). Roosevelt's two most important Jewish advisors, Jacob Schiff and Oscar Straus, were featured speakers. Schiff recounted to the crowd his fruitless cable to Witte and relayed that he was coordinating relief efforts with prominent European Jews, including Lord Rothschild in Britain. When Schiff read aloud telegrams from Russian Jews pleading for assistance, the crowd cried out: "We will help!"[37]

Oscar Straus, in his own remarks at the gathering, tried to buffer the administration from possible complaints about its passivity. He recalled his recent trip to the White House where he had convened with Roosevelt. "I found our great president as shocked and horrified as we are, and with his heart full of sympathy for our stricken people," Straus assured the audience. He added, "I did not ask him to take any step" because presidential action might unwittingly prompt "greater catastrophes" and exacerbate the "unbearable burden" upon Russian Jewry. In an early indication that Straus's prestige in the Jewish community would not suffice to shield Roosevelt, a subsequent orator took the floor and called for thousands of "Hebrew defenders" to march on Washington in a bid to jolt the president into motion.[38]

The pressure on Roosevelt was only just beginning. Shortly after the Emanu-El fundraiser, newspapers throughout the country printed a plea sent to the president by Simon Wolf, the former head of B'nai B'rith. Wolf's message tried to appeal to Roosevelt as a decisive leader: "The man that sidetracked precedents by ending the coal strike, the man that conjured [peace] between Russia and Japan, and who has in a hundred ways shown marvelous versatility and courage—can he not take the initiative and bring about [a] concert of action to stem the cruelties in Russia?"[39] Wolf had long been an ardent Roosevelt supporter who worked hand-in-glove with the president on the Kishinev Petition, the administration's signature achievement for Jewry. It is thus striking that an ally like Wolf was now pushing Roosevelt so publicly.[40]

Not all voices in the Jewish community were inclined to resort to flattery in the hopes of cajoling the president. A Democratic-leaning paper, the Hebrew Standard, was underwhelmed by Roosevelt's claim that Russian disarray precluded American intervention. "It is said that there is no responsible government in Russia," the paper noted. "All the more reason that the rest of the 'civilized' world should step in." True, the president had voiced compassion for the Jewish victims in Russia, but the Hebrew Standard thought that such "honeyed phrases" rang hollow as the corpses piled high. The paper bemoaned, "President Roosevelt is sympathetic. We Jews are sick of sympathy.… We demand action." The Hebrew Standard also accused America of hypocrisy, recalling that the nation had gone beyond diplomatic protest and actually taken up arms for what was considered a humanitarian cause: Cuban rebellion against Spanish rule in 1898. It was little coincidence that the editorialist here alluded to a war with which Roosevelt himself was so closely associated.[41]

* * *

As the press printed graphic first-hand accounts of the carnage, donations from across the United States flooded into the relief committee's coffers.[42] Newspapers would announce in each successive issue the latest philanthropic totals, which tallied more than $500,000 (over $17 million today) after just nine days.[43] Some of the country's most renowned Gentiles, including Andrew Carnegie, gave substantial sums to the relief committee.[44] Jacob Schiff praised his Christian friends for their largesse, writing one of them, "It is encouraging to feel that in misfortune, at least the whole world is akin."[45] Although Schiff's comment about the "whole world" was overbroad—Western Europe, for example, wasn't quite so forthcoming with its commiseration—the vast outpouring of compassion from Americans was undeniable.

Meetings were organized throughout the United States, usually in synagogues, to pay respect to the dead and give succor to the living.[46] Many of these gatherings called on Roosevelt to abandon his passivity. At a packed synagogue in Pittsburgh, attendees passed resolutions that beseeched the president to intervene in Russia.[47] So did a group of Jewish veterans of the Spanish-American War based in Harlem.[48] Although Jews organized most demonstrations, many Gentiles participated and even hosted. The Warren Avenue Baptist Church in Boston, for instance, invited a local rabbi named Charles Fleischer to address the congregation. "We have been told that neither as president nor as man can Theodore Roosevelt say anything to Russia in the present crisis," Fleischer told the churchgoers, adding, "I do not believe it." Rabbi Fleischer acknowledged that an American entreaty to Russia would be "unconventional and undiplomatic" but urged Roosevelt to buck any "custom which makes such cowards of us all."[49]

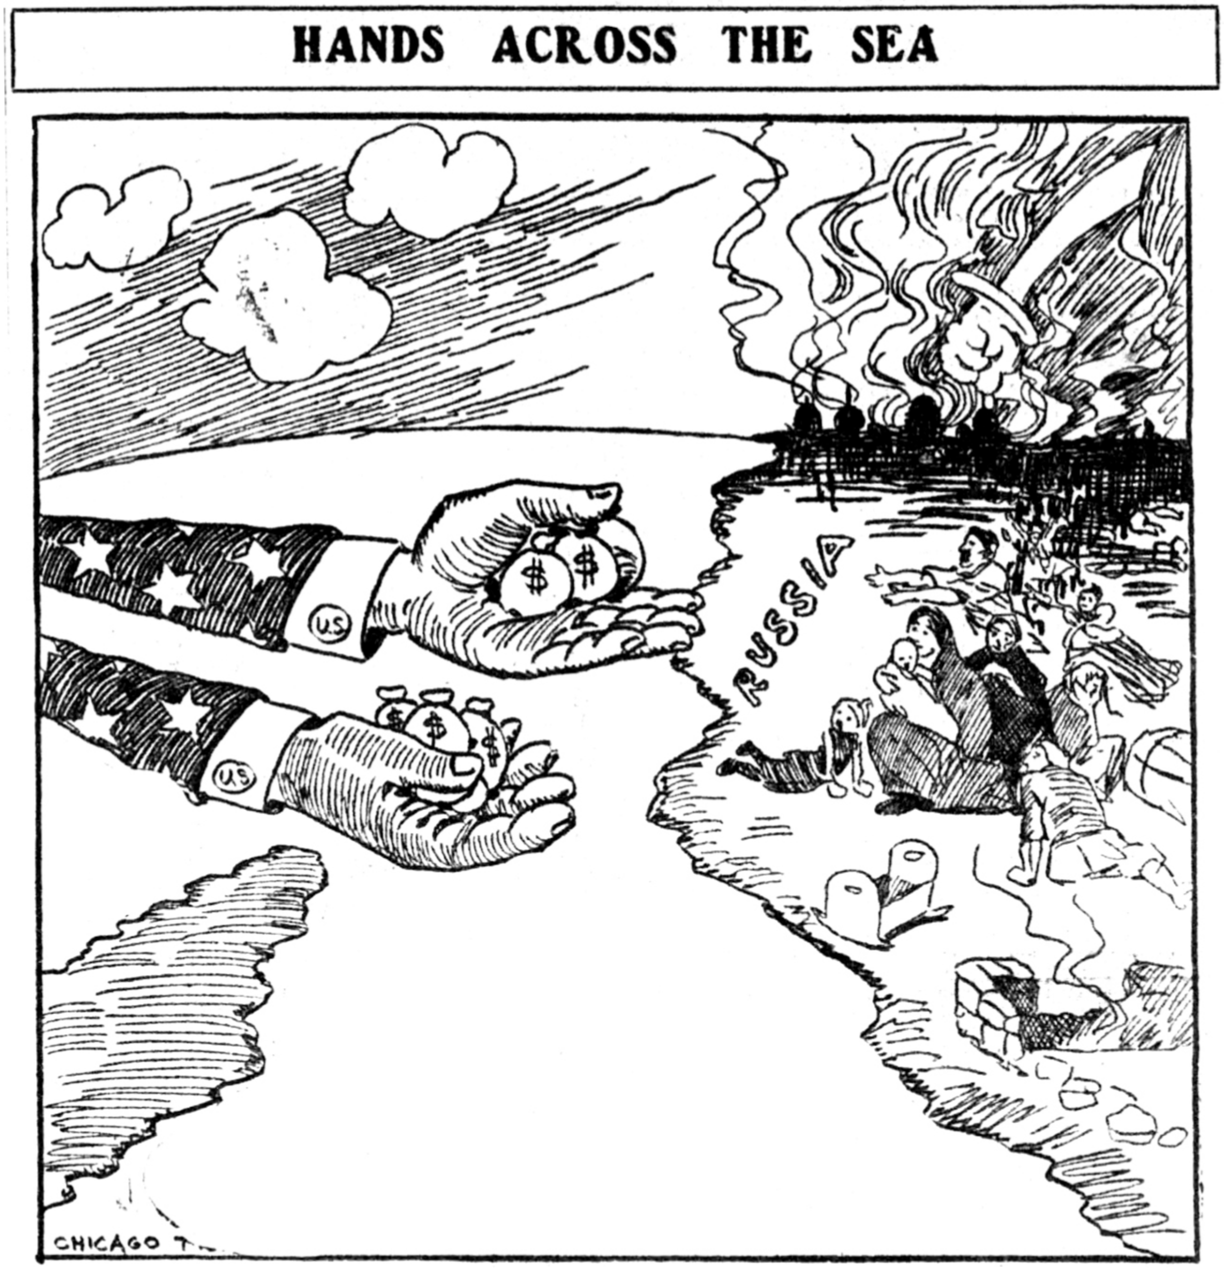

FIGURE. 6.2. Americans donate fulsomely to the pogrom survivors. Source: “Hands across the Sea,” Chicago Tribune, circa November 1905.

Christian clergymen joined in the admonitions. At a Baptist church in New York, an interfaith audience of Jews and Christians heard the pleas of a prominent preacher who suggested that Roosevelt—if constrained from speaking out on the nation’s behalf—should at least speak out on his own. “Perhaps our fearless president can do nothing as president, but I tell you that he can do almost anything simply as Theodore Roosevelt," the reverend declared, eliciting an enthusiastic reaction from the crowd.[50] A similar scene unfolded at Grand Central Palace in midtown Manhattan, where the famous Christian theologian Lyman Abbott announced to an assemblage of six thousand Jews, "It is time for the United States government to interfere in the cause of humanity."[51] Notably, Abbot enjoyed a warm relationship with TR; that even Abbott would conspicuously pressure the Roosevelt administration testifies to the depth of resistance facing the president.[52]

Public officials began turning up at mass meetings where crowds matched moral outrage with financial contributions. The mayor of St. Louis surfaced at one such interfaith gathering in a synagogue.[53] Baltimore hosted a bipartisan affair at its city hall with the Republican mayor and Democratic governor of Maryland.[54] Meanwhile, at the Atlantic City pier, the Republican governor of New Jersey rallied a crowd of thousands, and a local congressman, also a Republican, expressly appealed to Roosevelt for action.[55] The presence of elected officials at these demonstrations—many of whom belonged to Roosevelt's own party—could have only intensified the pressure on the administration.

* * *

Secretary of State Elihu Root was more concerned about subduing American Jewish fervor than in alleviating its cause. In mid-November, Root met in person with Ambassador Meyer, who had journeyed from Boston to Washington and would shortly sail for St. Petersburg. Meyer recorded in his diary that Root asked him to prod Witte for some kind of statement that would "reassure the Jewish element [in America] and quiet public sentiment." Root also derided Jewish protests in the United States as self-interested, telling Meyer that "certain Jews in America were merely striving for notoriety."[56] Root's comment here is deeply cynical given the desperate plight of Russian Jewry at that moment. Even an incorrigible antisemite like the British diplomat Cecil Spring Rice, a close friend of the president's, wrote to the first lady that he was aghast at the "inconceivable brutality" of the "savage attacks."[57]

Over the ensuing days—as mass meetings, fundraising drives, and press coverage continued apace—it must have become increasingly clear to Root that he could not idle his way through the crisis. He personally sent a sizable check to the relief committee along with a note, republished in the papers, that was partly an expression of sympathy and partly a defense of the administration's inactivity. Root conveyed his compassion for "the unfortunate Jews who have been subjected to such dreadful cruelties" while nonetheless insisting that "we have little power to help them." He hoped that the "present disorder" would yield in time to a "better day of security and freedom" in the Russian Empire.[58]

Around that same time, Root reached out to the embassy in St. Petersburg for more information. "Many influential Hebrews in this country are greatly distressed over reports of Jewish loss of life and suffering in recent outbreaks," he relayed. Root asked for numbers concerning the pogroms' victims—the deceased, the ailing, and the dispossessed.[59] With Ambassador Meyer on the long journey back to Russia, it fell to his deputy to notify Washington of whatever details could be confirmed about Jewish "destitution" across the empire.[60] The situation remained perilous for Russian Jews. Although the initial twelve-day killing spree of Jews had subsided, pogroms were still breaking out with some regularity. Survivors were left tending to their ravaged communities across the Pale. And Russian society more broadly continued to convulse with chaos.[61]

* * *

In late November, Roosevelt showed that he was willing to lobby on behalf of Jews overseas—albeit in the Arab world. The president was then helping organize the Algeciras Conference, set to take place the following year in Spain. There the great powers of Europe, together with the United States and Morocco, would convene to arbitrate tensions between France and Germany over their conflicting ambitions for Morocco's future. Just as the Russo-Japanese peace negotiations had presented America with an opportunity to press for concessions on Jewish rights, the Algeciras Conference held out the same promise that the United States might successfully shoehorn Jewish issues into an unrelated international event. Per usual, it was the ubiquitous Jacob Schiff who had brought up the matter with the Roosevelt administration, sharing with Elihu Root a report about conditions of Moroccan Jewry produced by the French-Jewish organization Alliance Israélite Universelle.[62]

That report—which turned out to be riddled with inaccuracies—outlined the putative degradations of Jewish life. Jews were confined to residences in ghettos that were locked in the evenings. Walking canes were forbidden for Jews, even for the elderly or infirm among them. Nor could Jews wear shoes; locals would toss hot coals and glass shards at Jewish feet as something of a hobby. Severe restrictions limited Jewish travel and emigration. Moroccan courts banned Jewish testimony. The government levied special taxes on Jews and tightly regulated Jewish commercial activity, even forcing Jews to work on Shabbat.[63]

The administration would find out two months later that these allegations of Moroccan prejudice were variously erroneous or misleading.[64] But Schiff, Root, and Roosevelt took them at face value for the time being and proceeded accordingly. At the president's behest, Root instructed Henry White—the American ambassador who would represent the United States at Algeciras—to inject the Jewish Question into the conference agenda. Perhaps America could rally the great powers to support religious liberty in Morocco.

Secretary Root conveyed to Ambassador White that Moroccan Jews "appear to suffer from painful and injurious restrictions" that would be "hard now to ignore." He enclosed the report from the Alliance and stressed that Roosevelt himself wanted White to prioritize the issue: "It is the president's wish that you give the subject your earnest attention and endeavor in all proper ways to impress its importance upon your colleagues in the conference."[65] Accompanying these formal instructions to White, Root included a private note underscoring the utility of standing up for Jews in Morocco in order to counterbalance the administration's policy of abstention in Russia. "It would be very opportune," Root explained, "because our immense Jewish population is now naturally much excited over the cruelties in Russia, and it is very difficult for many of them to understand why our government cannot interfere."[66] This pending diplomatic play regarding Morocco was not yet made public nor did it promise to yield results until the conference concluded in the spring of 1906. But, if successful, it might eventually reverse some of the present damage to Roosevelt's relationship with American Jews.

The president's amenability to American interference in Morocco, even as he remained motionless on Russia, offers an instructive comparison. Plainly, Roosevelt was still prepared to leverage his nation's influence for the benefit of Jewry abroad, provided he found the particular conditions favorable. His approach to the Algeciras Conference thus lends credibility to the idea that Roosevelt wasn't coldly seizing on Russian upheaval as a convenient pretext to pursue a do-nothing policy; rather, it appears he honestly believed that U.S. intervention on behalf of Russian Jews might only worsen their situation. It is otherwise difficult to comprehend why he resisted the politically popular option of capitulating to America's public uproar over the pogroms.

Given Roosevelt's restraint on Russia, Schiff resolved to make diplomatic moves of his own with St. Petersburg. He communicated directly to Witte his view that the Russian authorities had "instigated" the atrocities. Schiff well knew that the premier stood apart from the reactionary elements within the state apparatus, and he told Witte that he was praying for Witte's success. Recall that in Portsmouth, Witte had warned Schiff and his fellow Jewish leaders that a sweeping enactment of religious freedom in Russia would foment antisemitism. Schiff now acknowledged Witte's grisly prescience on that score but still argued against Russian appeasement of the antisemitic mobs, insisting that it was "doubly proper and important that no step backward be taken, and that the Jewish subjects of the czar be vouchsafed every civic right." Failure to do so, Schiff warned, would ensure that Russia remained a pariah state on the global stage.[67]

⁎⁎⁎

Against the backdrop of untold Jewish suffering in Russia, synagogues across the United States took a brief respite from their sorrow to celebrate a landmark occasion at home: the 250th anniversary of communal Jewish life in America.[68] The most illustrious commemoration took place in New York's Carnegie Hall in late November. More than five thousand people squeezed into the famed venue, which was grandly decorated for the event. Coats of arms, representing each state in the Union, adorned the boxes on the lower tier. The mezzanine featured a series of golden shields, symbolizing the Holy City of Jerusalem. And American flags festooned the packed galleries above. Jacob Schiff presided, with notable speakers including the mayor and governor as well as former president Grover Cleveland. Among the evening's highlights was a performance by fifty cantors, clad in black and arranged in a semicircle, who sang the Jewish hymn "Adon Olam" in accompaniment with the New York Symphony Orchestra.[69]

Prior to the event, Schiff had asked that Roosevelt furnish a letter to be read aloud at Carnegie Hall. The president may have rebuffed Jewish pleas for the past month regarding Russia, but this much he could do. As TR's words were recited to the crowd by one of the evening's speakers, loud applause broke out every few sentences.[70] Roosevelt's letter explained that he didn't normally accede to such requests for various celebrations—the solicitations were unending and he had to avoid favoritism—but he would "make an exception in this case because [of] the lamentable and terrible suffering to which so many of the Jewish people in other lands have been subjected." The Jewish-American experience, the letter declared, demonstrated that Jews exhibit "fine qualities of citizenship" when they "enjoy the benefits of free institutions and equal treatment before the law." Although Roosevelt didn't mention Russia by name, few in Carnegie Hall could have missed his implication that Russia ought to look to America for the right answer to the Jewish Question.[71]

The remainder of the letter described the Jewish community in terms that seemed designed to implicitly counter antisemitic stereotypes. Whereas American nativists saw Jewish immigration as a threat to the country's founding character, Roosevelt trumpeted the historical truth that Jews had been central to American democracy from its inception. “During the Revolutionary period,” he recounted, “they aided the cause of liberty by serving in the Continental Army and by substantial contributions to the empty treasury of the infant republic.” Some in Roosevelt’s genteel circles engaged in a kind of moderate antisemitism wherein assimilated Jews of Central European origin passed social muster, while the indigent masses from Eastern Europe were met with contempt. Yet the president hailed both Jewish subgroups, lauding the work ethic and patriotism not just of established Jewish families but also the more recent Jewish “refugees reduced to the dire straits of penury and misery.”[72]

Roosevelt further insisted that Jews could be Jews and Americans; they needn’t shed their particular religious identity to lay claim to a common civic one. “While the Jews of the United States … have remained loyal to their faith and their race traditions, they have become indissolubly incorporated in the great army of American citizenship,” TR proclaimed. Many Gentiles would make homogenization the price of acceptance for Jews, but the president here advanced a decidedly pluralistic vision for Jewish-American life.[73] (Two years later, when a hotel in New York tried to exclude Jews, a judge ruled against the hotel and quoted Roosevelt’s foregoing letter in his legal opinion.[74])

* * *

New York City resumed its role as the epicenter of Jewish protest the following week. Amid a mass demonstration whose size was surely unprecedented in American Jewish history, the usual bustle of activity on the Lower East Side came to a standstill. A mournful procession of some one hundred thousand Jews wound its way through the cramped streets of their neighborhood, culminating in Union Square. Along the route, the sounds of weeping mingled with funeral melodies and prayers.[75] Meanwhile, the relief committee announced, less than three weeks since its fundraising campaign began, that it had topped an astounding $1,000,000 in donations (over $35 million today).[76]

Jewish leaders decided to press the Roosevelt administration yet again in early December, undoubtedly hopeful that the unrelenting public agitation would soften the government's stance. When a relief committee member issued a plea to Elihu Root's deputy, the State Department line remained unbending: "I sincerely wish that this department had the power to relieve the unfortunate people with whom we sympathize so deeply." Simon Wolf—the former B'nai B'rith president who unsuccessfully pressured Roosevelt the month prior—now tried his luck with Secretary Root. But Root's view was fixed: so long as Russia was seized by acute instability, diplomatic overtures were ill-advised. Root's reply to Wolf, which was reprinted in the press, assured him that "the problem is one which strongly attracts the sympathetic attention of this government." Should the Russians adopt a "more liberal form of government," along with the resumption of law and order, then the Roosevelt administration might well attempt to "exert efficient and good influence toward the liberal treatment of all Jews in Russia."[77] Yet the set of preconditions that Root spelled out for American intervention looked increasingly elusive as Russia's nihilistic spiral showed few signs of slowing.

Back in St. Petersburg, Ambassador Meyer's aide, Vezey, conveyed a deep sense of distress in a letter to Meyer, who was making his way through Europe en route to Russia. "One has the feeling of living over a volcano," Vezey remarked. He anticipated the prospect of fresh violence on an alarming scale: "Now all are armed, and if it comes to a conflict, it will not be so easy to put down the rabble."[78]

When Meyer himself finally set foot back on Russian soil, his assessment of conditions on the ground was equally bleak. He told Senator Henry Cabot Lodge that the Russian "government is showing the same incompetency as to handling the internal situation as they did in the late war." By Meyer's lights, Witte was mired in a nigh impossible situation, bereft of support from any faction: "The reactionists are plotting against Witte, and the liberals do not believe in his integrity." Nor did Witte have the political instincts to navigate such treacherous terrain. "He is a financier, not a statesman or even a practical politician," Meyer sneered. Ambassador Meyer was also skeptical that the Russian populace could be pacified, relaying to Senator Lodge, “the people are all nearly crazy here and are not contented with any concessions.” Amid frighteningly volatile circumstances, no one could be sure what each new morning might bring. “One day we are told there will be a general strike, another that Witte is to resign and a military dictator to succeed him,” Meyer reported. “Everything in fact is rumored, from the flight of the czar down.”[79]

Even Jacob Schiff now conceded to Roosevelt that, at the present moment, diplomacy would be futile. With “Witte’s government tottering” and “not likely to last many days,” any protest from the Roosevelt administration would probably come to naught, Schiff acknowledged. For TR, that reality meant his only option was inaction. For Schiff, it meant justification for a far more audacious move: military invasion—or at least the threat of it. Schiff reminded Roosevelt of recent precedent for America’s resort to armed intervention on humanitarian grounds, precedent that the Rough Rider knew intimately. “You willingly took your own life into your hands to help to prevent the oppression of the Cuban people,” Schiff recalled. Surely the “horrors now occurring in Russia” would similarly warrant martial measures to preempt additional “slaughter,” which Russia’s own government “declares it is powerless to prevent.” More specifically, Schiff advised Roosevelt to solicit congressional authorization for a multilateral effort in tandem with the great powers of Europe. A mere signal of possible military operations would likely serve the intended purpose, Schiff predicted, thus sparing the United States from actually hazarding American lives. The specter of foreign troops on Russian soil would “rally national self-respect in Russia” and facilitate the ascension of a “proper party of law and order.” If Roosevelt took that kind of bold step—or, perhaps more accurately, that kind of bold bluff—the American people would stand firmly behind their president, Schiff insisted.[80]

Roosevelt balked. Although his replies to Schiff were typically prompt, in this instance TR uncharacteristically dithered for nearly a week before responding to the letter. “I did not answer it because, my dear Mr. Schiff, I must frankly say that it would be difficult to answer it without hurting your feelings,” Roosevelt confessed. The remainder of the president’s missive bordered on caustic. He derided Schiff’s proposal as “simply nonsense.” No pressure on Russia could possibly bear fruit when “there is revolt in every quarter of the empire among every class of people and the bonds of social order everywhere are relaxed.” Roosevelt would not turn the czar’s Winter Palace into the next San Juan Heights nor bluff as if he might. “We should act in accordance with the [Great] Plains adage when I was in the ranch business, ‘Never draw unless you mean to shoot,’ ” the cowboy-turned-president told Schiff. Hollow threats of military intervention would not only fail to benefit Russian Jewry but confine America to a “humiliating and ridiculous” position. And Roosevelt dismissed Schiff’s idea for a transatlantic coalition as “of course wholly chimerical.”[81]

Roosevelt’s retort to a loyal, and powerful, ally is striking for its barbed tone. The president himself apparently sensed as much, mustering a conciliatory word for the well-intentioned Schiff in a postscript. “I sympathize thoroughly with your feelings, wrought up as they are and ought to be by the dreadful outrages,” he offered, adding, “Anything I can do I will do, but I will not threaten aimlessly and thereby do harm.”[82] Roosevelt resolved to bide his time unless and until Russian affairs less starkly resembled a descent into anarchy.

At least the president could still count on the only Jew in America who rivaled Schiff in stature: Oscar Straus. Roosevelt divulged to Straus, “By the way, our good friend Jacob H. Schiff became hysterical over what I could do about the dreadful atrocities perpetrated upon the Jews in Russia. I enclose a copy of my letter to him.” TR was grateful that Straus wasn’t making comparable demands: “Thank Heaven, you kept your head, as you always do, my dear fellow!”[83] Straus replied that he had attempted to leverage his own credibility with American Jewry to “buffer” Roosevelt from critics. But those voices agitating for American action were unmoored from reality, lamented Straus, as “they crown you with a halo of international omnipotence” even though events in Russia lied beyond the president’s control. Straus concurred with Roosevelt that bids at external inference in a country lurching toward collapse would prove ineffective at best and inimical at worst. He further posited that Russia’s upheaval was on the same inescapable trajectory as the ill-fated French Revolution. “The logic of history, said Bismarck, is as exacting as Prussia’s accounting office," Straus quipped, borrowing language from the quotable German statesman.[84]

Having reassured Roosevelt of his personal loyalty, Oscar Straus did gently nudge the president on the question of immigration. Should the Jewish exodus from Russia to America intensify, Straus opined, it might behoove the president to make a statement embracing the newcomers. But then Straus tempered his proposal, anticipating that events would render such a statement unnecessary. He expected that Russian-Jewish immigration would actually diminish "as the hope for enlarged rights and ultimate freedom in Russia near realization." Given that Straus thought Witte's government was doomed to failure, these latter remarks imply his belief that, somehow, a liberal democracy in Russia would emerge from the bedlam.[85]

Witte himself shared in Roosevelt's belief that no progress could be made for Russian Jews under prevailing conditions. In the first lethal weeks following the October Manifesto, the embattled premier had clung to delusions that he might yet operationalize its liberal promises.[86] But by December, he came to concede that the outlook for Jewry was hopeless. Witte remarked to the Western press that no one could escape the manifesto's unwitting lesson: if the Russian state were to "proclaim equality of rights" for Jews, it would "provoke appalling bloodshed." Under that scenario, the only way for the authorities to protect Jews from pogromists would be for "the Russian government to shoot down the Russian people, and that is inconceivable." This was the unforgiving calculus of a society rotting with antisemitism—Russia's Jews could endure either the indignities of second-class citizenship and periodic carnage or nominal pretenses to first-class citizenship and mass carnage.[87]

A Jewish paper in San Francisco, Emanu-El, was exasperated that Roosevelt seemed content to leave Russia to its own barbarity. "Every country may slaughter its Jews to suit itself; that is the courteous rule of non-interference in the internal affairs of other nations," Emanu-El wrote with disdain. "President Roosevelt, Russia's great and good friend, finds it impossible to even lodge a protest on behalf of the American nation."[88] To be sure, the principle of noninterference had given the administration some hesitance in censuring Russia in prior episodes, but Emanu-El was off the mark at this particular juncture. Roosevelt was now citing a different rationale entirely—the havoc enveloping Russian society—to justify presidential passivity.

* * *

Meanwhile, the fundraising drive for pogrom survivors continued to elicit the generosity of American donors and even some celebrities. A benefit performance at Broadway's Casino Theatre featured Sarah Bernhardt, a famous French actress of Jewish birth and Catholic upbringing who identified with both religious traditions. A number of other actresses were on hand in the lobby, selling flowers and playbills at prices that were benevolently inflated to boost the philanthropic total. "The prices, however, were no more objectionable than the smiles that went with them," the New York Times reported, "and this feminine lobbying proved a popular and profitable device." The one-act play was followed by a special appearance from the legendary Mark Twain, who regaled the packed audience with his masterful storytelling.[89]

Not long after the performance, a Russian revolutionary in exile asked Twain whether he was rightly proud of America's considerable philanthropy for pogrom victims. Twain was not. He claimed, inaccurately, that Jews alone contributed to the relief efforts, and Twain expressed embarrassment that his fellow Christians—whom he referred to as "Americans"—withheld their charity. "That money came not from Americans, it came from Jews," Twain alleged. "Suffering can always move a Jew's heart and tax his pocket to the limit. He will be at your mass meetings. But if you find any Americans there put them in a glass case and exhibit them. It will be worth fifty cents a head to go and look at that show." Twain's distinction between "Jews" and "Americans" implied that one could not belong to both groups; he was distancing Jews from American identity even as he was exalting Jews above Gentiles.[90] Sometimes Jews themselves in the United States used "Americans" in that same exclusionary sense. The most respected Jew in the country, Oscar Straus, employed "American" as a synonym for Anglo-Saxon in a press interview where he was inveighing against antisemitic stereotypes.[91] Twain and Straus, then, both demonstrate a counterintuitive reality: the contemporary defense of Jews at times relied upon tropes that are recognizably prejudicial by modern lights.

⋆⋆⋆

Two Democratic congressmen from New York City stepped into the yawning gap that separated America's public uproar from Roosevelt's strategic inertia. The first, Henry Goldfogle, submitted a resolution to the House decrying the butchery of Russian Jews. Goldfogle's resolution employed measured language with respect to the Roosevelt administration, asking "respectfully" that the president make diplomatic overtures to Russia "if he finds it not incompatible with the public interest."[92] His colleague, William "Plain Bill" Sulzer, was less temperate in a stemwinder from the House floor that drew applause from fellow representatives. He remarked with incredulity, "I know it is said by those who speak for the administration that our government can do nothing, that the president and secretary of state cannot act and have no power, according to international law, to intervene." But America hadn't been hamstrung in its condemnation of Armenian persecution in Turkey or its full-blown war on Cuban soil, he noted.[93] Sulzer's reasoning here was disingenuous—Roosevelt and Root had consistently pointed to Russian disarray, not international law, as the basis for their quietude.

A Jewish outlet of Democratic persuasion, the Hebrew Standard, was also unsympathetic to Roosevelt but at least willing to engage the debate on TR's own terms. "It has been remarked with diplomatic regrets that the president cannot intercede in view of the fact that there is no responsible government at present in Russia," the Hebrew Standard acknowledged. Skeptical that Roosevelt's hands were tied quite so tightly, the paper mused, "It certainly seems strange that the man who was able to bring some sort of pressure to bear upon Japan to accept Russia's terms is powerless to stop the carnival of bloodshed." The Hebrew Standard suggested that the president was inadvertently culpable for the pogroms because the peacemaking in Portsmouth—which with Roosevelt was so closely associated—prevented the Japanese from delivering a “smashing defeat” to their Russian adversaries. Had the czarist regime crumbled at Japan’s hands, then the ensuing pogrom wave wouldn’t have come to pass. Naturally a Democratic paper like the Hebrew Standard would be disposed to critique TR. More telling, perhaps, was the relative silence from pro-Roosevelt quarters that would normally have defended him on Jewish issues.[94]

Still, disturbing developments in Russia could have only reinforced the president’s inclination toward abstention. Ambassador Meyer reported to Roosevelt in late December that the czarist regime was making a fervent stand for its survival. “Reaction, during the last few days, has set in,” wrote Meyer—the Russian government was shutting down the press, imprisoning editors, and unleashing armed forces on labor unions. But the troops weren’t necessarily reliable. As Meyer disclosed, the army was plagued by “insubordination” in various cities throughout the empire, including the capital. His overall assessment was bleak: “Matters must soon come to a crisis.”[95] Indeed, that very day, a strike commenced in Moscow that immobilized the city and quickly turned violent. As the Moscow uprising spurred similar revolts elsewhere in Russia, the government responded with brute force.[96]

Meyer spoke with a shockingly relaxed czar during a New Year’s reception for diplomats at the imperial palace outside St. Petersburg. Czar Nicholas seemed obtuse to the turmoil upending his country. The American ambassador related the conversation in a cable to Roosevelt, scoffing at the czar’s naïveté: “He has a sublime faith in God … not at all appreciating that God prefers to help those who try to help themselves.”[97] In the face of deadly insurrection, Nicholas’s nonchalance could not have inspired Roosevelt’s confidence.

January, however, proved to be a good month for the czar. His government’s strategy of ruthlessly repressing the Russian people finally led to the restoration of order. Witte’s aspirations aside, it had not been liberal reform that earned the people’s respect but rather state violence that demanded it. Pogroms largely ceased as the government reestablished control. The authorities wouldn’t tolerate homicidal rioting of any kind, even when directed at a widely loathed target like Jews. Before the October Manifesto, pogroms were of real utility to the state; they deflected the people’s anger toward a vulnerable minority and away from the czarist kleptocracy that should have elicited their indignation. But the past several months had demonstrated that mob violence against Russian Jewry could coincide with broader anarchy that the regime might struggle to contain.[98]

* * *

While Russia’s strife was subsiding, the commencement of the Algeciras Conference presented an opportunity for the president to score a palpable win on Jewish rights. America’s ambassador for the summit, Henry White, was under straightforward instructions: make the plight of Moroccan Jewry an actionable issue at the conference. In mid-January, delegates began descending on the amiable tourist town of Algeciras on Spain’s southern coast. Nested in a bay across from her more famous neighbor Gibraltar, Algeciras boasted an enviable supply of fresh oranges and bright homes befitting the Mediterranean scenery.[99] Ambassador White found that the Hotel de Ville, playing host to the conference proceedings, had been “handsomely arranged for the sittings.”[100]

In the conference’s opening days, White communicated to Secretary Root that the Roosevelt administration had been given flawed intelligence with respect to Moroccan Jewry. Recall that Jacob Schiff had forwarded to Root a study from a French-Jewish charity—the Alliance Israélite Universelle—enumerating the civil disabilities imposed on Moroccan Jews. White, in turn, had dispatched a Jewish-American diplomat, Lewis Einstein, to conduct a fact-finding mission. Einstein journeyed to Morocco before the conference and interviewed various Western experts on Morocco who were on hand for the negotiations in Algeciras. The results were in, and they largely undermined the claims by the Alliance.[101]

White relayed as much to Root and appended the text of Einstein’s report, which determined that anti-Jewish “restrictions have been abolished or else have fallen into abeyance.” Einstein continued, “Almost unknown to the outside world, a peaceful humanitarian reform has silently been accomplished, and the Jews of Morocco are well-nigh emancipated from the oppression which formerly burdened their lot." His report proceeded to debunk many of the specific allegations that the Alliance had made. Still, Moroccan-Jewish life was perhaps not quite as "enlightened" as Einstein's rosy portrait would have it. He tried to trivialize ongoing civil disabilities, writing for example, "That a Jew may not testify in court is more oppressive in theory than practice." For all Einstein's soft-pedaling, the fact remained that the Alliance had overstated the discrimination endured by Moroccan Jewry, giving Ambassador White pause about a formal remonstrance in Algeciras.[102]

White shared with Root yet another factor weighing against a censure of Morocco: Moroccan Jews themselves thought it ill-advised. They feared that the Moroccan sultan would take offense, given his relatively broad-minded attitude toward his Jewish subjects. "Anything in the nature of a complaint, they deem not only unjustified but prejudicial to their best interests," explained White. However, Moroccan Jews still wanted America to issue some kind of statement at the conference praising the sultan's liberality toward Jews while also prodding him to direct his state officials to act alike.[103]

To that end, two distinguished Moroccan Jews each proposed language that the U.S. government might adopt, which White forwarded to Root. The first Jew, Mr. Pimienta, advised that any declaration from the Roosevelt administration ought to credit the sultan for his "equity and goodwill" toward Jews. It should further convey America's hope that the sultan "see to it that his Jewish subjects may never be denied justice nor suffer violence" at the hands of his subordinates.[104] Pimienta reached out to the grand rabbi of Tangier, who sent his own substantially similar statement to Ambassador White. That these Moroccan Jews wanted the United States to promulgate a statement at all—one designed to preempt their maltreatment and even bloodshed—underscores that their condition wasn't as benign as Einstein's report insisted. The grand rabbi closed his message to White with an expression of gratitude: "I pray Almighty God to bestow His blessings on President Roosevelt."[105]

Ambassador White turned his attention to other conference matters in the subsequent weeks. In late March, with the conference still ongoing, White informed Secretary Root that he planned to submit the Moroccan-Jewish question to his fellow delegates in short order. But he was conflicted about how to proceed; Moroccan Jews desired a statement in language that might be too moderate to pass muster with their coreligionists back in America. "I fear the form suggested by [the] grand rabbi and others will be inadequate and unsatisfactory to our Jewish fellow citizens," White confessed, "and yet it would be unwise to say anything likely to be prejudicial to Jews in Morocco."[106] If true, it is highly ironic that American Jews—in a bid to support fellow Jews in Morocco—would be displeased with language that Moroccan Jews themselves preferred, language designed to ensure their good standing with the sultan. The Roosevelt administration had already suspected (in the case of Russia) that Jewish-American activism on behalf of Jews abroad might be ill-advised. Here was a striking indication that those suspicions had some merit.

Secretary Root replied to Ambassador White that, in light of the Einstein report, it was not "necessary or desirable" for America to seek from the conference any sort of sharp-elbowed protest regarding Morocco's treatment of its Jews. Whether to pursue even a tempered statement along the lines recommended by the grand rabbi, Root left to White's discretion. Root didn't address White's concerns about the potential dissatisfaction of American Jews with the kind of measured phrasing favored by their Moroccan coreligionists.[107]

Five days later, White formally solicited the conference delegates for mutual assent to a statement on Moroccan Jewry. The draft language from White was somewhat more pointed than that offered by Mr. Pimienta and the grand rabbi. While it did applaud the "equity and kindness" that the sultan extended to his Jewish subjects, the statement nonetheless contended that Moroccan officials "in the parts of the country far removed from the central power are not always sufficiently inspired with the feelings of tolerance and justice that animate their sovereign." Employing a French term, the statement affirmed the conference's "voeu" that the sultan would direct these errant authorities to emulate his own enlightened approach.[108]

(White later explained to Root that he chose “voeu” because it is “stronger than the English word ‘hope.’ ”[109]) Every delegate in succession spoke approvingly of White’s proposal—even Russia’s Count Cassini, who had peddled antisemitic fictions to the American press during his former stint as an ambassador in Washington.[110] The Moroccan delegation in Algeciras declared that the delegates’ collective sentiment would command the attention of the sultan, who could be counted upon to perpetuate his longstanding liberality.[111]

These developments garnered mainstream press coverage across the United States.[112] Ambassador White received a note of appreciation from the Alliance Israélite Universelle, whose semi-inaccurate report had catalyzed his monthslong initiative. And the grand rabbi of Tangiers, on behalf of Moroccan Jewry at large, wrote a missive requesting that White “convey to President Roosevelt and the American government the expression of our grateful feelings for their noble and generous intervention.”[113] Both Jewish and mainstream papers throughout the United States published the grand rabbi’s letter.[114] The Algeciras Conference thus gave Roosevelt a public win for Jews, albeit a minor one given his strained relationship with American Jewry amid the Russian bloodbath.

* * *

At the same time that White was raising the Jewish Question in Algeciras, the State Department learned that a fresh round of Russian pogroms might be in the offing. The prior two months had been relatively quiet ones for Russian Jewry after the devastation of last fall and early winter. But now Easter—a holiday that had coincided with anti-Jewish violence in the recent past—was imminent. American Jews with relatives in Russia were highly anxious that premeditated pogroms were afoot, and their fears came to the State Department’s attention. The deputy secretary of state cabled Ambassador Meyer in St. Petersburg, asking him for details about how Russian authorities planned to forestall Jewish deaths. Meyer was also instructed to discuss the issue with Britain’s ambassador to Russia; the British, compelled by their own Jewish community, were themselves soliciting information from the Russian government about possible pogroms.[115]

Two days later, Ambassador Meyer wrote Secretary Root, “Witte appears to be very sanguine that there will be no Jewish troubles.” Meyer relayed further that Russia’s provincial governors had been directed to hold police accountable for the preservation of peace. Still, Meyer didn’t expect an entirely nonviolent Easter. He warned Root, “I believe there is liability of some disturbances between Jews and subordinate authorities on account of the ill feeling which exists, but they should not be extensive if the governors of the various provinces act in good faith.” By Russia’s abysmal standards, this was promising news for Jewry.[116]

Meanwhile, Oscar Straus—apparently unaware of Meyer’s inquiry—raised concerns with Roosevelt directly about imminent carnage in Russia. “I know you have so many things upon your mind,” Straus began, “therefore pardon me if I take the liberty of reminding you of your intention to speak with Baron Rosen [i.e., the Russian ambassador in Washington] regarding the threatening Russian massacres on Easter.” Straus also shared with Roosevelt the anxieties of a British Jew and former MP, Sir Samuel Montagu, who was anticipating bloodshed.[117]

The president informed Straus that he had actually already met with Baron Rosen, who made “the positive statement that Russia was fully alive to the situation and was taking every step to prevent any trouble to the Jews.” TR divulged another detail from his meeting with the Russian ambassador: Rosen favorably remembered Straus’s even-keeled comportment in Portsmouth, where Rosen had been party to Witte’s conversation with the Jewish delegation the previous summer. But not everyone in New Hampshire had impressed Rosen. As the president now revealed, “I am bound to add that he stated that another prominent Jewish gentleman … had prejudiced Witte against the cause for which he was pleading, by his attitude”—a barely veiled reference to the outspoken Jacob Schiff.[118]

Between the inquiry that Ambassador Meyer made of Witte and the same that President Roosevelt made of Rosen, American diplomacy was once more at work for Russian Jewry. The Roosevelt administration had publicly announced throughout Russia’s turbulent period months earlier that future entreaties to the Russian state about Jewish safety would hinge upon the return of law and order. With the tumult now subsided, Roosevelt and his State Department were making good on their word.

Still, Roosevelt hardly relished being pushed to intervene in other countries’ affairs, especially since such requests were so common. In the foregoing letter to Straus, the president was candid about his frustration with frequent calls for him to speak out not just for Jews but also for the persecuted Armenians in Turkey and the innocent civilians of the Congo Free State, which was then under the brutal reign of the Belgian king. Roosevelt lamented, “It is a literal physical impossibility to interfere in any of these cases, save in the most guarded manner.” Given that America would never levy war against Russia because of the pogroms, TR maintained that it would be “futile, undignified, and mischievous” to overplay his hand. He resented that some Jewish advocates were obtuse to such difficulties. “All of this it is needless to write as far as you are concerned,” the president assured Straus, “but there are some of your friends who need to have these considerations ever clearly before their eyes.”[119] Jacob Schiff was unquestionably on Roosevelt’s mind with this latter comment. The president did not here specify what his professed reluctance meant for the future of his foreign policy vis-à-vis Jewish issues. Whether he would stay the course of periodically pressing Russia or retreat from that approach remained unclear.

Straus cabled his British counterpart, Montagu, relaying that Roosevelt had raised concerns about anti-Jewish violence with the Russian ambassador in Washington. Montagu, in turn, asked Straus for permission to publicize that information, an idea that Straus forwarded to the White House. But Straus caveated Montagu’s message with his own recommendation—the Roosevelt administration should take the initiative of trumpeting its measures for Russian Jewry. The benefits of publicity, Straus believed, were twofold: it would prevent the president from being subjected to additional requests for action from those who were unaware of his current efforts, and if Easter pogroms did take place, the public would know that the American government had at least tried to take preemptive steps.[120]

Roosevelt felt some misgivings about irking Russia with publicity. “She might readily be made sensitive by having it published that we are bringing pressure upon her,” the president explained to Straus. But TR ultimately put those worries aside, greenlighting Straus to disseminate a short statement about the recent American inquiry. Roosevelt provided Straus with language setting forth that the Russian government had offered the United States “the most positive assurances” that it was taking due care to avert anti-Jewish violence. The president’s draft statement continued, “The strictest orders have been given to local officials, who understand that they will be held responsible for any disturbance.”[121] American newspapers published that revelation a few days later just after Easter, which turned out to be a mercifully uneventful one for Russia’s Jews.[122]

Perhaps the Russian directive that local authorities were to keep the peace reflected the czarist regime’s own desire for law and order, regardless of Roosevelt’s preferences. Or maybe Russia was indeed spurred by the knowledge that it was under American scrutiny. Both factors were likely implicated to some degree. In either case, the fear of an Easter slaughter remained unrealized, and Straus credited the president. “He prevented the massacres,” Straus wrote matter-of-factly to a White House aide.[123] The aide replied the next day, “It is very gratifying to know that the president’s action was effective.”[124]

* * *

The absence of atrocities against Jews on Easter didn’t signal a diminution in Russian antisemitism. One indication that Judeophobia still had traction was Witte’s marginalization within the state apparatus. He found himself sidelined by Czar Nicholas in part because Witte didn’t share the czar’s inveterate hatred for Jews. Witte was still technically premier, but his title grew increasingly nominal. Nicholas told his mother that Witte was “absolutely discredited with everybody, except perhaps the Jews abroad.” When Witte asked the czar to lift Jewish quotas at Russian universities, Nicholas bluntly replied, “The Jewish question should be considered in its entirety only when I consider it appropriate”—which was to say, never.[125]

Shortly after Easter, Witte resigned his post. He was uninterested in serving as liberal cover for reactionaries any longer. Reflecting on his departure from office, Witte explained, “I did not wish to be a cat’s-paw for General Trepov … and a shield for the Black Hundreds.”[126] Russia’s regime was now rid of its most prominent advocate for Jewish rights.

Although Witte no longer offered the czar a facade of reformism, Nicholas could begrudgingly rely upon the newly convened Duma to that end. Ambassador Meyer showed little confidence in this incremental step toward democracy. He reported to Roosevelt, “Russia is entering upon a great experiment, ill prepared and really uneducated.” The tension between the czar and the legislature was palpable—and likely unsustainable. Meyer elaborated, “I do not mean to imply that a crash is coming at once, but that sooner or later a struggle … between the Crown and the Duma, unless all signs fail, is more than probable.”[127] If Russian Jews thought that the establishment of the Duma was a hopeful harbinger for their future, they would be disabused of their illusions before long.

* * *

Situated near the Pale of Settlement’s western edge, Bialystok was predominantly Jewish—fully three-fourths of the city’s residents were Jews. They thought their majority status offered them a buffer against the kind of violence exacted upon their coreligionists elsewhere in the empire. But their sizable population only served to make the city a target-rich environment for pogromists. Two months after a calm Easter, the feast day of Corpus Christi in mid-June quickly turned into mass murder on the streets of Bialystok.[128]

The three-day massacre entailed unconscionable cruelty. Jews were ruthlessly battered to death, with some assailants continuing to bludgeon the victims’ bodies long after their final breaths. “The faces of the dead have lost all human semblance,” observed a newspaper correspondent, “and the corpses simply are crushed masses of flesh and bone soaking in blood.”[129] Even by Russian standards, the extent of government complicity was damning. Troops and police alike were active in the barbarity, firing at defenseless Jews and sometimes bayonetting them. When the governor was informed of the deadly havoc, he bogusly blamed the Jews for provoking it with their revolutionary violence.[130] Some Jews managed to flee the city, but no safe haven awaited them. As one journalist reported, "Jews who escaped from Bialystok are wandering, starving, in the fields and woods."[131] The final death count placed the loss of life at upwards of seventy Jews, with about as many injured, and large numbers of Jewish homes and stores were left ransacked.[132]

Bialystok's butchery made front-page headlines across the United States—in large cities with many Jews and small towns with very few. Jacob Schiff expressed to Roosevelt his concerns about "the devilish proceedings at Bialystok" and forwarded "heartrending cablegrams from Russia" in the hopes that TR might initiate some kind of intervention. Schiff fully appreciated that the president had grown weary of such diplomatic endeavors, but the atrocities in Bialystok prompted Schiff to spend whatever capital he might have left. "I do know in advance that unfortunately nothing can be done by our government," Schiff conceded, anticipating Roosevelt's resistance. Still he expressed "the faint hope" that the administration might press the "Russian government, such as it is, to abstain from instigating the low populace to bloodshed." Schiff confessed his displeasure at leaning on Roosevelt anew—"I feel mortified that I have again to address you on this depressing subject"—but asked TR to consider the recent carnage to be sufficient "excuse."[133] It is highly likely that Oscar Straus advised Schiff to proceed cautiously here given that the president had vented to Straus before Easter about certain "friends" in the Jewish community whose repeated solicitations were becoming nettlesome.[134]

Roosevelt's response to Schiff was restrained, indicating he would discuss the matter with his secretary of state but commit to nothing more. "You know how deeply we sympathize with your feelings and how shocked and horrified we are at what has occurred in Russia," he offered, "but you know also how well-nigh impossible it is to accomplish anything but harm by interference."[135] Two days later, Simon Wolf visited the White House to discuss Bialystok with the president. Wolf had been a dependable Roosevelt ally until the horrific events of the prior fall, when he publicly and unsuccessfully tried to prod the president into action. Now Wolf was attempting the same, this time in person. Although Russia was no longer in a state of mass upheaval, Roosevelt's answer remained unchanged: American involvement was untenable.[136]

There was some plausibility in the president's prediction that American interference might backfire. It would have come as little surprise to Roosevelt that his name had been invoked as a means of whipping up anti-Jewish sentiment just before the Bialystok pogrom. A circular distributed to troops in Bialystok falsely asserted that Russian Jewry was agitating against the motherland at the behest of President Roosevelt and King Edward of England. This Anglo-American duo had allegedly operated through Jews in an unsuccessful bid to coax Russian soldiers to break ranks in the late war against Japan. Then, the American president and English king purportedly turned their sights on sabotaging the czar's regime by abetting Jewish revolutionaries in Russia. The circular claimed that this "fierce foreign foe sets his snares through his friends, always the Jews" in a bid to "seize altogether the land of our fathers." The Quarterly Review, a British periodical, would later report that the Russian military had not merely consumed but actually printed this propaganda.[137] With the government having regained control of the country for several months now, apparently the authorities deemed it safe to once more permit and even promote mob violence against Jews without fear that broader chaos might ensue. And any public criticism that Roosevelt made of Russia could provide grist for antisemitic conspiracy theories fueling such violence.

* * *

Mourners gathered on the Lower East Side at the oldest Russian synagogue in America to grieve for Bialystok's fallen Jews. The crowd was so immense that it spilled out the building's doors onto Norfolk Street. Although the synagogue was Orthodox, the principal speaker was a reform rabbi, Joseph Silverman—an indication that Russian antisemitism was yet again uniting an American Jewish community that otherwise had numerous schisms. The rabbi read aloud the recent message from Roosevelt to Jacob

Schiff about the hazards of intervention, and Silverman encouraged Jewry's deference to the president's discretion. "We must abide by the dictate of our own chief magistrate," insisted the rabbi. "If he thinks that the time is not ripe, then there shall be no diplomatic interference."[138]

But as it turned out, Roosevelt wasn't confining himself to diplomatic silence. Rather, he was maintaining the public illusion of nonintervention. TR wagered that covert solicitation, not overt censure, would elicit a more constructive reaction from the prideful Russians. He disclosed to Schiff, "I do not wish to say to anyone as yet what was done. The efficacy of anything that is done depends largely upon their being no symptom of offense to the Russian authorities." The president here intimated that a quiet appeal had already been made to St. Petersburg; in reality the administration was still finalizing how to proceed.[139]

Roosevelt then asked Schiff, if possible, to impress upon Jews in the United States that their conventional reliance on well-publicized clamor to support Russian Jewry would only undercut the administration's clandestine efforts to that same end. "Every public expression on their part looking to the interference of our government with Russia tends to defeat its own purpose and to make it more difficult for the [American] government to act," the president complained. "They simply hamper us in the effort to do whatever is possible and if they arouse antagonism in Russia, foredoom any such effort to failure." Roosevelt doubted that the leaders of American protests were even well-intentioned, contending, "There are demagogues engaged in these meetings whose purpose is not to do good to the poor sufferers in Russia, but to strengthen themselves with their people at home"—by this, he meant Democrats trying to gin up Jewish votes.[140]

Roosevelt's foregoing comment about "these meetings" wasn't an allusion to ongoing public demonstrations in America, as there simply hadn't been an eruption of mass meetings in the week since the Bialystok pogrom. Instead, it appears that Roosevelt was referencing the protests of the prior fall, and he anxiously anticipated that American Jewry might soon revive its public pressure campaign. The president warned Schiff that if his administration did push Russia publicly, it would inflict the dual harm of worsening Jewish life there and relegating the United States to an "undignified position" on the world stage.[141] Meanwhile, down the street from the White House, Congress was passing a joint resolution that expressed "hearty sympathy" for Bialystok's victims but notably avoided any criticism of the Russian government or any call for American intercession.[142]

The following day Secretary Root shared with Roosevelt draft language for a cable to St. Petersburg. That proposed cable directed Ambassador Meyer to "ascertain informally" from the Russians whether local officials in Bialystok were responsible for the pogroms, as was widely reported in the American press. Meyer was to convey the administration's belief that any local complicity surely ran counter to the central state's "true attitude," which Russia could reaffirm by holding "inculpated local officials" to account. Of course, the Roosevelt administration actually had little faith in the "true attitude" of the czar's regime; the State Department would be offering up a fiction and hoping that the Russian government might go along with it. Strikingly, the draft cable was candid that the administration's aim was to mollify popular uproar in the United States: Meyer was supposed to inquire whether the Russian government planned to "show its condemnation" and thereby "do away with the present unfortunate effect upon American public opinion."[143]

In forwarding this suggested language to the president, Root added his own ambivalent assessment of the draft cable. "I think it may do some good, though I do not feel sure of it," he confessed. "I do not know how it will be received. It may merely give offense. I am sure that to go further would do harm." And Root emphasized that even if Roosevelt did approve the cable for transmission to Meyer, it ought not be released to the press. After all, Russia wouldn't want to look like Roosevelt's puppet. An inquiry from Meyer to the Russian foreign minister—if kept discreet—might help induce Russia to bring local authorities in Bialystok to justice because Russia could prosecute them without appearing to have acted at America's behest. Roosevelt surely appreciated better than anyone that Root's insistence on "absolutely confidential communication" between America and Russia meant that the president wouldn't reap the political benefits at home of publicly stretching himself abroad. But Root was certain that staying sub rosa was necessary to avert further losses of Jewish life.[144] Roosevelt deferred to Root's discretion, agreeing to send the cable but keeping its existence from the newspapers.

The U.S. embassy in St. Petersburg received the cable the next morning. It was Ambassador Meyer's birthday, but he didn't take the day off. Instead, Meyer promptly requested a meeting with Count Izvolsky, the newly appointed Russian foreign minister, and was granted one for 4:30 that afternoon. Although the cable from Root to Meyer was written in cipher, the Russians had cracked the American code, so Izvolsky would have already seen Root's instructions prior to their conversation. Meyer himself was well aware that the Russians were in the habit of intercepting his cables from Washington. At their afternoon meeting, both statesmen partook in a bit of diplomatic fiction: Meyer told Izvolsky that he wanted to share with him a cable from Root, acting as if the cable would be unexpected news to the foreign minister; Izvolsky, in turn, pretended to be learning of the cable for the first time. Apparently, Izvolsky wasn't a very good performer. Meyer later wrote in his diary that Izvolsky's feigned ignorance was "unnatural."[145]

Having gotten through this rigmarole, Izvolsky informed Meyer of Russia's hard-line position: it would not entertain discussion of its internal affairs with a foreign power. Even though the cable from Washington was framed as merely a covert request for facts—and thus designed to avoid accusations that America was engaging in external interference—it was plainly a form of prodding. And the Russians saw it in exactly those terms, treating this bid at finesse as improper meddling. Izvolsky fell back on Russia's tried tactic of pointing out that the Roosevelt administration would not readily welcome Russian denunciation of American lynchings. As a modest concession, Izvolsky referred Meyer to a decree from the interior minister, promulgated after the Bialystok pogrom, declaring that "disorders of any kind, whether agrarian or anti-Jewish … must be suppressed in the most decisive manner." But the foreign minister would go no further. Ambassador Meyer found out the next day that his British counterpart in St. Petersburg, who had made similar inquiries of Izvolsky, met with comparable treatment. Meyer promptly communicated the whole of it to Root and later relayed the same in a letter to Roosevelt.[146]

TR aimed to placate Schiff, indicating that something had been done but withholding specific details. “I want to tell you that we have gone up to the very verge of receiving a rebuff that would put us in a very undignified and unpleasant position, in the effort to do what you suggested,” the president divulged. “I do not wish to give you the particulars in writing, and I do not want you to quote what I am saying to you.”[147] In turn, Schiff assured Roosevelt that this information would be held in “strict confidence.” Still, Schiff was eager to learn more and shared that he would soon be visiting his son, whose new summer home was conveniently located in Oyster Bay near the president’s own. “Perhaps you may then be willing to say something further to me,” Schiff wrote nudgingly. For the time being, though, he promised not to “burden” the president anymore and closed his letter with a word of gratitude for the administration’s recent effort.[148] Of course, Schiff stayed his hand for only so long before indulging the instinct to write Roosevelt again, this time to propose using American warships to ferry Russian Jews out of the czar’s empire. TR replied with a token word of sympathy—“I quite appreciate the horror which all people must feel at what has gone on in Russia”—before giving his candid appraisal that Schiff’s warship idea was “a spectacular bit of folly.”[149]

Although Roosevelt’s diplomatic play remained confidential, there was one public display of sympathy from the president: he signed the congressional resolution expressing condolences to Bialystok’s Jews.[150] The English Jew Sir Samuel Montagu was optimistic that even this kind of exercise from the Americans, while not policymaking per se, had the potential to impact the Russian regime. He told the British press, “We are much gratified that President Roosevelt approved the resolution passed by Congress expressing horror over the massacres. Official declarations, such as this, have great influence in persuading the St. Petersburg authorities to stop Jew-baiting.”[151] The weight of foreign opinion would prompt a response from Russia, though not the kind that Montagu wanted.

* * *

Early July saw the Russian interior minister circulate his own report on the pogrom—riddled with antisemitic falsehoods—to various embassies in St. Petersburg for transmission to their home governments. It depicted the violence in Bialystok as effectively a pitched battle between local authorities and Jewish "terrorists" engaged in revolutionary assaults. Although the report did concede that there were blameless Jewish victims, it nevertheless insisted that their radical coreligionists had fomented conditions ripe for the loss of innocent life. Among the most egregious untruths was the denial of state culpability. In the report's words, "The government indignantly denies the rumors spread abroad that the anti-Jewish riots at Bialystok took place with the knowledge and connivance of the local administration and of the troops."[152] Of course, these were not rumors but facts, and they emanated not from foreign lands but from Bialystok itself.

That the Russian state took the extraordinary measure of disseminating a report at all to the international community was a concession of sorts—plainly, St. Petersburg felt compelled to respond amid the global revulsion at Russian barbarism. The New York Times noted that even though the report certainly did not countenance the propriety of foreign inquiries about internal affairs, still this "unprecedented action" amounted to a "distinct recognition of the power of public opinion abroad."[153] Public opinion abroad had power indeed: the power to elicit from Russia defensive posturing. The report reflected precisely the kind of reactionary impulse that Roosevelt had been wary of provoking.

But the czar's administrative apparatus was no longer the only voice of Russian governance. For the first time in the country's history, a pogrom had transpired with a legislative body, and not just the autocracy, exercising authority. And that body even included twelve Jews. The members of the Duma, known as "deputies," took decisive action when word of the atrocities reached St. Petersburg. A three-person committee set off for Bialystok to engage in an extensive investigation. When they returned, a dramatic session of the Duma convened to hear their findings at the very moment that the interior ministry was readying its sham report.[154]

A deputy representing the investigatory committee, M. P. Arakantzeff, took the floor before densely packed galleries. For two hours, he read aloud an unsanitized rendition of Bialystok’s brutalities. Arakantzeff rejected the baseless allegation that Jewish revolutionaries were to blame and instead fingered local authorities for premeditating the attack. According to one account, the deputy spoke “in quiet, sober language and in a low voice, which only heightened the thrilling horror of the recital.” Arakantzeff concluded his remarks by asking the Duma to pay its respects to Bialystok’s dead. The entire body stood up in homage to those slain.[155]

Several days later, another deputy told the Associated Press that the central state itself was implicated in planning the pogrom.[156] In truth, it remains unclear even today whether the national government in St. Petersburg bore direct responsibility for the slaughter in Bialystok. That uncertainty holds for the pogroms at large—historians debate the extent to which the central authorities actively advanced pogroms versus passively tolerated them.[157] But the evidence is strong that at least some officials in high command relied on pogroms as a tool of statecraft. As Witte remarked of his rival, “Trepov did not love the art of pogrom-making for its own sake. He merely did not hesitate to resort to pogroms whenever he considered them necessary for the protection of the vital interests of the state.” A number of Trepov’s ilk were even more callous. Witte knew of “many other high officials to whom the bloody game of pogrom-making was a mere political amusement.” Antisemitism had as much purchase on the upper echelons of the capital as it did the lower classes of the Pale.[158]

* * *

Back in the United States, Roosevelt grew annoyed when a Jewish paper called for more robust American intervention. In a letter to Nathan Bijur—a steadfast Jewish Republican ally—the president confessed his frustration: “We have gone to the very verge, perhaps beyond the very verge, of doing what as a government we could do in this matter, consistently with our own self-respect and with the advantage of the Russian Jews.” He felt that pushing harder could only backfire so long as czarist Russia was hostile to American entreaties. An exasperated Roosevelt vented, “Surely it seems to me that the most foolish and hysterical person should realize that, under conditions as they actually are, it is impossible for us to do more than we have done in this matter.” In what was becoming a recurring refrain in TR’s correspondence, he grouped the cause of Jews in Russia together with Armenians in Turkey and Congolese under Belgian rule—this unholy trinity of humanitarian catastrophes elicited repeated requests for the president’s intercession, but he maintained that America could not police the world.[159]

Roosevelt’s letter to Bijur also reprised a cynical grievance that TR had shared with Schiff: those disposed to call on his administration for diplomatic protest were engaged in a self-serving ploy for political power. The president alleged to Bijur that public agitation “represents not an effective purpose to do good to those who are suffering in Russia, but to exploit, in the interest of entirely selfish individuals, the Jewish vote in America.”[160] Roosevelt himself may not have been on the ballot, but 1906 was an election year for Congress and New York state alike; November clearly loomed large in his mind amid a difficult stretch with his Jewish constituents.

Of course, Democrats would prove eager in the fall campaign to condemn the pogroms and call for action by the U.S. government. But Roosevelt was too cynical by half. Most appeals for his intervention came not from politicians but from ordinary people, as testified by the one thousand Jewish immigrants, all from Bialystok, who came together in an anguished meeting at a Lower East Side synagogue. They mourned the dead, donated to the living, and petitioned the president. Their resolution called on TR to beseech the czar, pleading with Roosevelt, “In civilization and humanity’s name, bring this universal protest, and the other powers will certainly follow.” Many of those present still had family in Bialystok and feared that fresh outbreaks of violence might threaten the survivors.[161]

That gathering aside, Roosevelt was under less intense pressure to act than he had faced the prior fall. Bialystok, gruesome though it was, did not spark a tidal wave of antisemitic violence engulfing the whole Pale of Settlement, as happened eight months earlier. The scale of suffering was thus far more limited, and the response of American Jewry accordingly proportional. To be sure, June and July saw some Jewish demonstrations and donations in the United States, but nothing on par with the mass mobilization of the previous November and December. Schiff even suggested with striking optimism to a playwright that Bialystok "represented only the last outburst of impotent rage on the part of the old Russian governmental system in its final breakdown."[162] And Jews in America could take some comfort in knowing that Russia now had a Duma, one determined to surface the truth about Bialystok. "The Duma to the Rescue," read a headline in a Jewish weekly from California.[163]

Indeed, in the third week of July, the Duma's deputies passed a damning resolution. It pinned culpability for the massacre not just on local officials but on the central state as well, which purportedly approved "extensive propaganda for the organization of an attack." The resolution fulminated against the autocracy's "official reports [that] concealed the truth and clearly sought to justify the murder of peaceful citizens." Duma deputies also demanded in their resolution widespread punishment for all guilty parties, no matter how lofty their stations.[164] The next day, when Duma members arrived at their legislative hall, they found the doors bolted shut. On a nearby column hung a decree from the czar: the Duma was officially dissolved.[165] Nicholas would not stomach one day more of a legislature committed to justice for Jewish victims.[166]

With the threat of legislative oversight now vanquished, Russian troops instigated a pogrom in the town of Sedlits, some sixty miles from Warsaw, in early September. The American consul in Warsaw concisely captured the devastation in a five-word wire to the U.S. embassy in St. Petersburg: "Sedlits exact repetition of Bialystok."[167] And then quiet. Sedlits was the last pogrom of the appalling wave that had begun with Kishinev in 1903. Survivors across the Pale were left to rebuild their lives amid the blood-stained rubble of three terrifying years. If there was now peace, Schiff remarked, "it is the peace of the graveyard."[168]

* * *

Theodore Roosevelt's relationship with American Jewry had suffered its greatest strains over the preceding ten months. His generic expressions of sympathy, decoupled from public pressure on Russia, left even his traditional supporters disappointed in his apparent inertia. Unlike his Jewish-American compatriots, TR believed that the widespread chaos following the October Manifesto precluded his solicitations of a Russian state that seemed to be careening toward collapse. Once the czar's government regained control, the president resumed his willingness—with some reluctance—to make use of diplomatic channels, first before Easter and again after Bialystok. Roosevelt was concerned, in part, about the embarrassment of a rebuff from Russia, which was always ready to invoke the principle of noninterference in domestic affairs and to remind Americans that the scourge of lynching made hypocrites of them. TR also worried that American overreach on the diplomatic front might actually worsen conditions for Russian Jews—indeed, there was plausible reason to think it could alienate the czar and incite popular resentment among Russian Gentiles.

Roosevelt therefore shielded his efforts from public view, lest the exposure undermine their efficacy. Unlike earlier episodes—the Romanian Note, the Kishinev Petition, the Passport Question—the past year left him bereft of any major win on Jewish causes that he, and his fellow Republicans, could trumpet. True, the Algeciras Conference allowed Roosevelt to score some points with the American Jewish community. But that was a trifling victory against the backdrop of mass murder in the Pale. Soon Jewish voters would head to the polls for the 1906 elections; their recent memory of seeming inaction by the president might well override their longer memory of prior instances when the Republican administration manifestly stood up for their coreligionists in Eastern Europe.

But Roosevelt wasn't going to passively watch Jews drift to the Democratic Party. He told a leading Republican official to consult with Jacob Schiff about the Jewish vote. The president then added, with deliberate ambiguity, "He knows of something which I am going to do."[169] For more than a year, Roosevelt had been quietly plotting a major move—whose significance to American Jewry would be unprecedented—and the opportune moment for his historic reveal was almost at hand.

OceanofPDF.com

7

APPOINTMENTS & IMMIGRANTS

Theodore Roosevelt's name may not have been on the ballot in the 1906 midterm elections, but Republicans well understood that the party's fate that fall would be inseparable from the president's stature. In places with large Jewish constituencies, Republicans wagered that Roosevelt's reputation was still favorable enough to bolster support for their candidates. A Yiddish daily in New York, the Jewish Morning Journal, published a letter in English from the RNC chairman insisting that "Theodore Roosevelt's personality must be a central figure and his achievements a central thought in the campaign."[1] The Republican calculus with Jewish voters would certainly not mean running away from the president and his record.

Still, the plight of Russian Jewry remained a vulnerability for Roosevelt and thus for the GOP. The Democratic Hebrew Standard suggested that his reticence to advocate for Russian Jewry was hypocritical. After all, the president had showed a strong willingness to insinuate himself into other nations' affairs in Latin America, especially when U.S. businesses stood to profit thereby. "If Russia were only a little nearer home and this country had some interest—financial if possible—in her affairs, how quickly President Roosevelt would intervene," the paper sneered.[2]

In New York state, which claimed more Jews than all other states combined, the local party conventions in late September betokened the importance of Russian Jewry to the campaign.[3] The Democrats, gathering in Buffalo, included a platform plank calling on the national government to protect Russia's Jews from any further "atrocities" that have "shocked the conscience of civilization."[4] Meanwhile, the Republicans adopted a platform in Saratoga that expressed "sincerest sympathy" for the pogrom's victims but notably made no comparable demand for action.[5] Although both sides nodded to the state's considerable Jewish electorate, only Democrats had something to gain from pressuring the Roosevelt administration.

Among the most eager observers of New York's campaign season that fall was TR himself. He felt deeply attached to New York—both city and state—and was personally invested in ensuring Republican success there. Roosevelt's wide portfolio of international and domestic challenges as president did not preclude him from stressing about such granular details as the absence of a sufficiently religious Jewish candidate on a slate of nominees for the county bench covering Manhattan. In early October, a Republican congressman from New York City named Herbert Parsons, a non-Jew, brought the issue to Roosevelt's attention. Parsons argued that the GOP should not endorse a judicial ticket put forward by a group of self-styled nonpartisan lawyers and should instead furnish its own slate of judges. The reason: "There is not an Orthodox Jew on their ticket."[6] He conveyed that the nonpartisan ticket did include a Jew, but that Jew wasn't traditionally devout. The ticket regrettably overlooked Otto Rosalsky, a young Orthodox judge who had received an interim vacancy appointment to the county bench and was now hoping for election to a full term. From the GOP perspective, the thirty-three-year-old Rosalsky was the ideal candidate: not only was he Orthodox and Republican, but he was so steeped in the Lower East Side that he still lived with his parents on Rivington Street.[7] "There is nobody from the East Side," Parsons lamented.[8]

Roosevelt was incensed by the snub to the Orthodox community. "It was an outrage to leave off Rosalsky," the president fumed to Parsons. "You must have the East Side represented."[9] TR also took up the matter with the Republican nominee for governor, Charles Evans Hughes. "They had no business to leave an excellent East Side Jew, Judge Rosalsky, off of it," the president griped as he implored Hughes to throw his weight behind the Orthodox jurist.[10] Several days later, Rosalsky indeed earned a slot on the Republican judicial slate, no doubt thanks to Roosevelt's intervention.[11]

As a former resident of the governor's mansion, TR was particularly interested in Hughes's own race. Hughes was a lawyer (and future chief justice of the U.S. Supreme Court) who had earned a reputation for fighting corruption after undertaking state investigations into the utility and insurance industries. He was now facing off in the gubernatorial contest against William Randolph Hearst, a Democratic congressman who doubled as a newspaper tycoon. "The situation is certainly very serious in New York," Roosevelt cautioned Hughes. "Hearst will of course use money like water and with shameless corruption wherever he gets a chance." TR fully appreciated the importance of the state's Jewish vote, particularly in New York City, where one in five residents was Jewish. He advised Hughes to consult the state attorney general, himself a Jew who "ought to know the East Side." Roosevelt warned Hughes in a postscript, "I hear the Jews on the East Side are enthusiastic for Hearst."[12] Despite Republican victories in four consecutive governor's races, the president would take nothing for granted.

Roosevelt soon reached out to Timothy Woodruff—chairman of the state Republican committee—to share his worries about "the Jews, who I understand are inclined to go for Hearst in a mass."[13] Woodruff, however, was more sanguine about Hughes's Jewish prospects, informing Roosevelt, "The Daily News and the Morning Journal and the Abend-Post, all printed in Yiddish, which have an aggregate circulation of over a hundred thousand, are already supporting Hughes in their news columns." Lest the president wonder how an Anglo-Saxon blue blood like Woodruff kept abreast of the Yiddish papers, the state chairman explained, "I know because I have had the Yiddish translated for me."[14]

Roosevelt wasn't content to rest on this promising bit of intelligence, so he tapped his closest Jewish aide, Oscar Straus, for help. "See if there is not some way you could be of assistance in preventing the East Side vote—notably among the Jews—from going for Hearst," TR urged Straus. "He has completely misled those poor people over there. I earnestly hope you can do this."[15] Straus tried to allay the president's concerns. "Bijur and I have our hands on the pulses on the East Side," he wrote, referring to the Jewish Republican and longtime Roosevelt confidant Nathan Bijur. "I think you need have no fear that Hearst will mislead your constituents over there." Straus encouraged TR to have faith in the Jewish electorate: "Our East Side friends, I am sure, will show a wise discrimination. There is much more wisdom over there than one would imagine." Oscar Straus also reiterated what Woodruff had already communicated to the president: the Jewish papers were standing behind Hughes. And Straus further assured TR that he was personally prepared to stump on the East Side.[16] The president's response was consummately Rooseveltian: "Bully for you!"[17]

Although Hearst may not have been as dominant with Jewish voters as Roosevelt fretted, the Democratic nominee for governor was nevertheless making considerable efforts to woo them. He pushed Tammany Hall to include the consummate East Sider Otto Rosalsky on the Democratic judicial slate, even though Rosalsky was a Republican (apparently, no rule prohibited both parties from putting the same nominee on their respective tickets).[18] Hearst also held a packed rally on the East Side where a surrogate touted the candidate as a longtime friend of the Jews.[19] A few days later, Hearst took a highly unusual step that only a press mogul would devise: he started his own Jewish newspaper for distribution on the Lower East Side to make his case to voters.[20] And then Hearst lined up an endorsement from a prominent Jewish philanthropist.[21]

But Roosevelt was the sitting president, and as such, there were tools at his disposal that even a newspaper magnate couldn't boast. Since at least the spring of 1905, TR had contemplated taking an unprecedented step forward for American Jewry.[22] The president disclosed his plan to a small circle but insisted on confidentiality; he wanted to maximize the impact of its publicity at the optimal moment. "Of course, see that under no circumstances any hint gets out, save from me," Roosevelt told Timothy Woodruff as the campaign season intensified in October. He added, "I wish to prevent its getting out until a week from today, Sunday, at the earliest, and then only with my authority."[23] Woodruff responded that he would, of course, defer to Roosevelt’s discretion on timing but nonetheless felt “the quicker the better, from the standpoint of the best interests of the campaign.”[24] Soon thereafter, with election day just two weeks away, voters learned of the president’s seminal initiative: Oscar Straus would become the first Jew in American history to sit in the cabinet.[25]

* * *

Nine months earlier, Straus enjoyed an informal lunch at the White House with the president and a collection of guests. Roosevelt asked Straus to stay behind in the Red Room for a private discussion. “I don’t know whether you know it or not, but I want you to become a member of my cabinet,” TR divulged. Straus did indeed already know it; Jacob Schiff had tipped him off. Two earlier presidents—Ulysses S. Grant and Grover Cleveland—had offered a cabinet post to a Jew, but in both instances the prospective candidate declined the opportunity. Straus would be the first to accept. It was yet to be finalized which department Straus would head, but the president told him that “your character, your judgment, and your ability” all commended him to a cabinet appointment.[26]

The promotion wasn’t just a reflection of Roosevelt’s esteem for Straus; TR also considered it a move in global diplomacy. “I want to show Russia and some other countries what we think of the Jews in this country,” the president informed Straus in their Red Room meeting. At that moment, in January of 1906, the spike in pogroms precipitated by the October Manifesto hadn’t fully subsided. Roosevelt expressed to Straus his fear that denouncing Russian pogroms would play well at home but exacerbate Jewish conditions abroad. Far better to signal the United States’ commitment to religious equality by example, TR reasoned. Jewish representation in the cabinet of the American president would offer a sharp contrast to the blood-drenched bigotry then prevailing in the Russian Empire.[27]

Over the summer, with the pending appointment still under wraps, Roosevelt indicated to Straus that his imminent placement and performance in the cabinet would offer a powerful rebuttal to antisemitic stereotypes in general. Straus had just given an interview to the Cleveland Plain Dealer in which he repudiated the pernicious myth that Jews were materialistic, prompting Roosevelt to compliment Straus: “Your article in answer to the attacks upon the Jews was excellent.” The president added, “I think the best answer, after all, my dear fellow, will be your appointment to the cabinet and the service you are certain to render thereunder.”[28] Straus would later tell the president he understood that his promotion was intended to combat antisemitism within and beyond America’s borders. “Your calling me to your cabinet … I well know had a meaning which far transcended my personality,” he recognized. “You desired to rebuke, not only in this country but also in others, that spirit of intolerance which is repugnant to the fundamental principles of our democratic institutions.”[29]

The appointment was designed to send a message to Jews as well. As Roosevelt conveyed to the Christian theologian Lyman Abbott, Straus’s elevation to the cabinet demonstrated to America’s Jews that “they have in this country just the same rights and opportunities as everyone else.” And it provided an exemplar for the upcoming generation of Jewish Americans. “I want the Jewish young man who is born in this country to feel that Straus stands for his ideal of the successful man rather than some crooked Jew money-maker,” the president explained to Abbott.[30] We see once again Roosevelt’s capacity for framing his defense of Jews in the trappings of prejudicial tropes.

In sum, Straus’s identity as a Jewish cabinet member mattered. It showcased American inclusivity to audiences at home and abroad. It gave younger Jews in the United States a model to emulate. And it mattered electorally, too, or else TR wouldn’t have waited until the eve of an election to reveal the nomination. Roosevelt unambiguously acknowledged to the social reformer and political ally Jacob Riis, “I did all I could to help out the campaign by announcing the selection of Oscar Straus for my cabinet.”[31] Straus capitalized on that announcement by courting Jewish voters on behalf of Charles Evans Hughes, Republican nominee for the New York governorship.[32] For all the resources and reportage at his Democratic opponent’s disposal, it was Hughes who emerged victorious on election day.

This is not to say that the Straus pick was purely about optics. To the contrary, the president had deeply valued Straus's advice for years, and not just on Jewish issues. Straus counseled Roosevelt on topics as varied as Indian affairs, labor conflicts, and Caribbean relations.[33] But Straus's unquestioned competence aside, the ascendance of a Jew to the presidential cabinet was of no small moment. Diplomatically, culturally, and politically, TR understood as keenly as anyone its significance.

* * *

Roosevelt had long been dogged by a philosophical tension in his hiring. He wanted to actively ensure that his recruits and appointees reflected America's heterogeneity while also resisting the idea that any factor beyond merit influenced his selection process. Whether as police commissioner, Rough Rider colonel, or chief executive of the nation, TR often championed religious diversity in employment. For instance, Roosevelt told Lyman Abbott that he had aimed to ensure that his cabinet—wherein Protestant, Jew, and Catholic served alongside one another—had "an absolutely representative character." But Roosevelt was also enamored of a countervailing concept: American civic life as an identity-neutral sphere where merit alone mattered.[34]

The result was a Roosevelt divided against himself. He routinely stressed the importance of involving Jews in government and routinely denied that their Jewish backgrounds in any way informed his hiring or promotion decisions. In the very letter to Abbott where he acknowledged his conscious effort to make the cabinet reflect the nation's diversity, Roosevelt disavowed that self-same goal: "It is not considered whether any member of my cabinet is of English, or Scotch, or Dutch, or German, or Irish descent; whether he is Protestant, Catholic or Jew."[35] He could never bring himself to definitively choose between the identity-driven ideal of pluralism and the identity-free ideal of merit. In theory, Roosevelt might have reconciled the two by suggesting that true meritocracy would organically engender diversity. But he never made any such claim.

In fact, Roosevelt confessed in moments of candor that he appointed Jews in part because they were Jews. For example, he received word in 1904 that a Jewish federal marshal in New York City, William Henkel, had allegedly cultivated ties to Tammany Hall and ought to be relieved of his post. If Henkel were dispensed with, the president preferred that another Jew take his place. “We could substitute for him some first-class Jew,” Roosevelt told a senator. “I would not want the Jews to feel that we had turned out one of their number when he is the only representative of the race at present holding a federal position in New York.” The president also contemplated the possibility that the accusations against Henkel had been leveled “unjustly.” In the end, Henkel retained his post.[36]

A similar episode arose the following year. Roosevelt received a letter from a congressman expressing concerns about a particular Jewish office-seeker whom the president planned to make the customs surveyor in Indianapolis. Despite the congressman’s doubts, Roosevelt was determined to stay the course, admitting, “One reason, which I do not like to have spoken of much, is that I like when I can to appoint a Jew for the very reason that it is often so difficult to find just the right Jew to appoint.”[37] It is unsurprising that Roosevelt did not like to speak much of it; he took pains to ensure religious diversity in the government workforce at the same time that he wanted to espouse merit as the only rightful qualification. The president neatly summed up these dueling imperatives when he put his hand on Straus’s knee and remarked, “I don’t appoint you because you are a Jew, but I am mighty glad you are one.”[38]

* * *

For Straus to join the cabinet at all was consequential, but it became doubly so because he was tapped to lead the Department of Commerce and Labor, which housed the Bureau of Immigration. In other words, a foreign-born Jew would preside over American immigration policy. Some extended commentary here on the larger context of immigration is warranted because it throws into high relief the extraordinary nature of Straus’s appointment.

The Rooseveltian age was a fraught one for immigrants, as a tidal wave of newcomers stoked nativist anxieties. Since the country's founding, American borders had been open to nearly anyone who sought to forge a life in the New World. Most of the immigrants for the first hundred years of the republic were Northern and Western European: British, Irish, French, German, Dutch, Swiss, and Scandinavian. But beginning in the late nineteenth century, these "old immigrants" were overtaken in number by "new immigrants" hailing from Southern and Eastern Europe: Italian, Greek, Slavic, Balkan, Turkish, and Jewish.[39] To be sure, there were immigrants from other continents, but more than 90 percent of foreign arrivals could claim European provenance.[40]

Russian Jews formed a sizable slice of the influx at American ports. Although some Jews fleeing the Russian Empire settled elsewhere—Western Europe, South America, Palestine—the bulk landed stateside. Jews constituted little more than 4 percent of the Russian population but almost 80 percent of Russia's emigrants. In fact, a Russian Jew was thirty times more likely than a Russian Gentile to expatriate. The horrific pogrom wave of 1903–1906 prompted an unprecedented Jewish exodus from Russia in those years, sevenfold the number who had left amid the pogroms of the 1880s. With the United States claiming more of these Russian-Jewish refugees than all other countries combined, Roosevelt's tenure at the White House aligned with a peak in Jewish immigration never before seen in American history.[41] It had previously taken more than two centuries for the Jewish-American population to reach its first million. TR's two terms in office saw that number almost double.[42]

And there were many more Jews yet to come. In 1906, the U.S. ambassador in St. Petersburg recounted to Roosevelt that he had recently inquired with a Russian official about a group of local Jews who were scheduled to embark for America, and the official "smiled and replied that they had seven million in Russia that we were welcome to."[43] The real number was closer to six million, but it was still the largest number of Jews in the world, even with the ever-quickening Jewish flight from czarist territory.[44] Other antisemitic countries, such as Romania and Austria-Hungary, also contributed to the Jewish migration stateside.[45]

Although the old immigrants in the United States hadn’t always enjoyed the warmest welcome, the new immigrants—both Jew and Gentile—fomented particularly acute anxiety among the native-born. New immigrants spoke in strange tongues, practiced curious customs, and packed into ethnic enclaves in overcrowded cities. Many nativists feared that the essential character of the country was under siege.[46]

It had long been fashionable among some faction of Anglo-Saxon elites to imagine themselves as members of a superior race upon whose leadership rested the nation’s fate. In response to the perceived threat posed by new immigrants, Anglo-Saxons became more accepting of old immigrants who had been previously marginalized. Anglo-Saxon nativists increasingly claimed a common “old stock” identity with others deriving from Northern and Western Europe. These nativists feared that American greatness could not withstand the unrelenting infusion of alien blood from Southern and Eastern Europeans.[47]

Madison Grant, the most prolific xenophobe of the day, fulminated against the “hordes of immigrants of inferior racial value” in his popular publication The Passing of the Great Race.[48] As a favor to a mutual friend, Roosevelt endorsed Grant’s book, only to immediately rue that decision.[49] Grant’s ilk hardly saw themselves as part of a shared white race that encompassed all European ancestries. For them, Jews ranked among those who fell outside the boundaries of whiteness.[50] Nativist angst reveals how antisemitism had ethnic, and not merely religious, dimensions. If the problem with Jews was solely their religion, conversion could remedy that much. But the nativists saw Jews as a congenitally flawed race; immigration restriction alone could protect the old stock.

Recall that in 1894 three young Harvard alumni of Anglo-Saxon lineage established the Immigration Restriction League, the most conspicuous organization seeking to reduce the inflow of Jews, Italians, and other stigmatized groups. The reactionary elitists who comprised the league formed an unlikely alliance with some portion of the laboring classes—blue collar workers who were concerned that impoverished immigrants, willing to toil for low wages in hazardous conditions, were jeopardizing their own earnings and job security.[51]

Even before the league's founding, anxieties about immigration had become sufficiently widespread by the early 1880s that Congress began implementing some novel regulations. In 1882, Congress passed a law refusing immigrants who were liable to become dependent on the state, and three years later, a new statute somewhat limited employers' ability to import labor. The following decade, another law created new categories of excludable immigrants, including polygamists, convicted felons, and the contagiously diseased. After William McKinley was felled by an anarchist's bullet, political extremism became another legally sanctioned reason for turning back fresh arrivals, as a 1903 statute barred anarchists and seditionists.[52]

Still, the borders remained relatively open. The emerging legal architecture of immigration didn't actually result in many deportations. What's more, not all Mayflower descendants or factory workers opposed the new immigrants. The nativist movement was underdeveloped and wouldn't achieve its restrictionist goals in earnest until the 1920s. Legislation before the xenophobic heyday of the 1920s didn't target immigrants on the basis of national origin or ethnicity (with the notable exception of the Chinese Exclusion Act of 1882). For Southern and Eastern Europeans in Roosevelt's age, cultural stigma more than legal prohibition presented the primary challenge to their belonging in American society.[53] That stigma was particularly severe for Jewish immigrants.[54]

The nationally renowned sociology professor Edward A. Ross gave voice to widely held misgivings about Jewish newcomers. In the popular periodical Century Magazine, he published a deeply antisemitic article entitled "The Hebrews of Eastern Europe in America." Ross's piece recycled well-worn stereotypes about Jewry as a plague on American society. He accused Jews of corrupting professional ethics—from law and medicine to newspapers and theaters—with their unscrupulous quest for wealth. From Ross's viewpoint, Jews had only themselves to blame for their exclusion from patrician social clubs and summer resorts. "Bigotry has little or nothing to do with it," Ross maintained. He explained that the Gentile doesn't want to fraternize with the Jew because "the Gentile resents being obliged to engage in a humiliating and undignified scramble in order to keep his trade or his clients against the Jewish invader.” Drawing on yet another common trope about Jews, Ross alleged they were sexually unscrupulous. “Pleasure-loving Jewish businessmen spare Jewesses, but pursue Gentile girls,” he warned Christian fathers.[55]

Jews not only degraded the marketplace and womanly virtue; according to Ross, they were outright lawbreakers. “The Eastern European Hebrews feel no reverence for law as such,” he reported, “and are willing to break any ordinance they find in their way.” Although official statistics showed that Jews were substantially underrepresented among convicted criminals, Professor Ross was not so easily dissuaded by data. He contended that the comparatively low percentage of Jewish inmates was itself damning—it demonstrated the Jews’ success at evading detection of their illicit schemes. “The fewness of the Hebrews in prison has been used to spread the impression that they are uncommonly law-abiding,” he noted, but “it is harder to catch and convict criminals of cunning.”[56] By arguing that the favorable crime statistics for Jews actually offered all the more evidence of Jewish illegality, Ross exemplified the kind of circular reasoning that so often shielded antisemitism from factual refutation. Antisemitic thought, unburdened by the demands of evidence and logic, contented itself with the unproven premise of Jewish degeneracy.

At times, Ross’s article tempered its indictment of Jews with kinder observations. But even these compliments were in service of his broader criticisms. For example, he credited Jews for their “intellectuality” and recounted their considerable ability in a range of cognitively challenging endeavors. Yet that very same mental prowess was, purportedly, the most effective Jewish weapon against Gentiles. Ross depicted Jews as shrewd operators who relied on their “subtle Hebrew brains” to convince American Gentiles of “the blessings of immigration.” He similarly groused that “keen-witted Hebrews” were taking over key positions in local and national government.[57] Toward the end of his piece, Ross warned in summation that “there will be trouble” if America continued to admit large numbers of Jewish immigrants.[58] That Ross enjoyed considerable stature suggests much about the resonance of his anti-Judaic biases among elites.

In response to contemporary antisemitism in America, the president of a B’nai B’rith local chapter expressed concern about “the low ebb of the public’s favorable opinion of the Jew.” He decried how “our petty vices have been magnified and our slightest errors exaggerated.”[59] Although prejudicial stereotyping was the most common form of anti-Jewish bigotry, violence against American Jews was not unheard of. Sometimes assaults were perpetrated by other ethnic groups, other times by the police. And in one notorious case, a Jew named Leo Frank from New York met his mortal fate at the hands of a Georgia lynch mob after he was wrongly accused of murdering a Christian girl.[60]

To be sure, America wasn’t categorically antisemitic. Jews and Gentiles alike partook in mass protests against the Russian pogroms and donated fulsomely to the survivors. Then again, the public’s condemnation of Russian oppression wasn’t always an indication of unalloyed sympathy for Jews. Some American Gentiles resented the mass migration of Jews to the United States and hoped that liberalization in Russia would curb the impetus for Jews to flee the Pale.[61] Conversely, a seemingly anti-Jewish position could obscure humanitarian motivations. Many Gentiles who were warmhearted toward immigrants counterintuitively favored immigration restriction, for example. They lamented the impoverished condition of immigrant life in American cities and—in a bid to improve the lot of those struggling souls—wanted to limit the influx of new arrivals, whose presence would further burden already congested urban slums.[62]

American attitudes toward Jews, then, defy facile description. The voices of tolerance and those of nativism sometimes diverged and other times dovetailed. Jews in the United States had to navigate a complex social terrain indeed—and in Theodore Roosevelt, they found a president whose approach to immigration was just as conflicted as the country he led.

* * *

Historians debate the extent to which Roosevelt embraced immigrants throughout his career and the role that race played in his perspective on them. A comprehensive exploration of that topic could fill several books and lies beyond the scope of this one. However, a few key points merit consideration here. For one, minimal effort suffices to find Roosevelt contradicting himself in his thoughts on race. Even within a single paragraph he could endorse two distinct positions. His inconsistency goes some way toward explaining why scholars have differed when describing his appraisal of various racial groups. We ought not project coherence onto him, lest we paper over those contradictions. An honest accounting requires acknowledging Roosevelt's incongruity.

Complicating the issue further is that Roosevelt employed the term race to denote a number of discrete concepts. While he sometimes did use race to refer to ethnicity, frequently he meant race as a synonym of nationality. In Roosevelt's racial cosmology, therefore, Jews could constitute a "Jewish race" unto themselves in an ethnic sense and yet still be part of the "American race" based on a shared civic identity with American Gentiles. He also used race to indicate bonds that connected similar peoples across national boundaries, such as a "French race" that tied together France and French Canada. Finally, Roosevelt adopted race to signify geographic subdivisions of people within a given country, using terms like the "Texas race" or "Kentucky race."[63]

A failure to distinguish between Roosevelt's numerous meanings of race (and of synonyms like stock) has generated misunderstanding about his take on race and immigration. Many scholars, for instance, characterize Roosevelt's fear of "race suicide" as the principal example of his racism. They suggest that he defined "race suicide" as the declining birth rates among old-stock Americans, which would supposedly lead to societal decay.[64] His varying notions of race, however, complicate this conventional wisdom.

Undeniably, Roosevelt in the 1890s did express anxiety about population deflation among the traditional elite. "Most certainly there are evil forces at work among us in America," he fretted to a British friend. "The diminishing birth rate among the old native American stock, especially in the Northeast, with all that that implies, I should consider the worst."[65] Here, stock certainly does signify ethnicity, as Roosevelt revealed a xenophobic strain in his worldview. During his presidency, however, Roosevelt explicitly recast his concerns about race suicide in national, rather than ethnic, terms. He was troubled by the prospect of low birth rates among native-born and immigrant families alike. Roosevelt told the press that some other countries ought to be cautioned about the perils of population decline, but happily "the ordinary American, whether of the old native stock or the self-respecting son or daughter of immigrants, needs no such warning."[66] After his tenure at the White House, Roosevelt would continue to sound the alarm about race suicide among the "native stock" while defining that phrase in an ethnically inclusive manner. He took pains to clarify, "I use the term with elasticity to include all children of mothers and fathers who were born on this side of the water."[67] The ancestry of those mothers and fathers was immaterial.

As members of the "American race," Jews in the United States understood themselves to count among those whom Roosevelt wanted to procreate prolifically. A Jewish newspaper in San Francisco affirmed shortly after his tenure in office, "We are only too glad to commend and applaud our former president for his strenuous efforts against race suicide."[68] Another Jewish periodical reported that "the strenuous Colonel" had been invited to the Jewish Maternity Hospital on the Lower East Side "in order to convince him by the many triplets there that the fear of race suicide is considerably exaggerated, in our metropolitan ghetto at least."[69] Ultimately, Roosevelt's angst about race suicide demonstrates the importance of discerning his varied usages of both race and stock, and it also highlights the need to differentiate TR's changing positions across the decades of his career.[70]

Like many of his contemporaries, Roosevelt placed immigrant groups in a pecking order of desirability. Yet his hierarchies didn't map precisely onto popular nativist conceptions. American patricians, disproportionately of English ancestry, often saw Anglo-Saxons as the superior race. But Roosevelt did not. That he himself wasn't primarily Anglo-Saxon surely accounts, at least partially, for his immunity to that common belief.[71] "I have not got a drop of that kind of blood in me," he once remarked.[72] In fact, Roosevelt did have some English blood—as well as Scottish, French, and Irish—but the predominant strain was Dutch.[73] He was proud to descend from what he called "old Dutch knickerbocker stock."[74] In an indication that Roosevelt was untethered from Anglo-Saxon elitism, he ranked German immigrants above the vaunted Puritan settlers.[75] His departure from Anglo-Saxon supremacy notwithstanding, TR still thought old-stock immigrants on the whole were more desirable than Southern and Eastern Europeans.

Roosevelt's hierarchies sometimes came with caveats; a given group might rank high on one measure and low on another. Using the term "American" in an ethnic sense to denote descendants of the old stock, Roosevelt once commented to a writer, "In the schools we find that the Jewish children are very much brighter than the American, or than any other foreigner, the American tending to come next and the Irish rather low down; yet in the Police Department in point of efficiency and usefulness, I should have said that on the average this was reversed." He then quickly hedged, "We must be very cautious about hasty generalization or dogmatization in this matter."[76] Even though Roosevelt had a penchant for group rankings, he routinely stressed the need to treat people according to their individual merits. As he once proclaimed in a speech, if a fellow citizen "has the right stuff in him, I care not a snap of my fingers whether he is Jew or Gentile."[77]

His views about ethnic hierarchies were deeply influenced by a particular variant of evolutionary theory known as Lamarckism. The French biologist Jean-Baptiste Lamarck had argued in the early nineteenth century that organisms acquire traits based on their environment and then pass on those traits to their offspring. During Roosevelt's lifetime, many American academics applied Lamarck's ideas to the comparative study of societies. They held that whole races could develop new characteristics because of their social context and then biologically bequeath those characteristics to the next generation. Lamarckians provoked plenty of criticism, but Roosevelt threw his lot in with them nonetheless. He believed that some races were at more advanced stages of development than others but that any race could—through Lamarckian evolution—better itself by cultivating traits favorable to its environment. Roosevelt's Lamarckian convictions undergirded his racially inflected imperialism, which saw "civilized" white nations as the proper custodians of “savage” non-white lands until the given indigenous population was, by his estimation, ready for self-government.[78]

But Roosevelt diverged somewhat from other Lamarckians because he didn’t deem European and European-descended peoples to be necessarily of higher quality than those of other continents. Even as he held the Chinese, Filipinos, and Latin Americans in low regard, the Japanese regularly earned Roosevelt’s praise.[79] He marveled at their success against the Russians in battle, writing to a friend, “What wonderful people the Japanese are!” They were on pace to become “a great civilized power.”[80] But Japan wasn’t merely better than benighted Russia—it rivaled even what Roosevelt considered the best countries of the West. As he maintained in his autobiography, “The Japanese are one of the great nations of the world, entitled to stand, and standing, on a footing of full equality with any nation of Europe or America.” Far from inferior, “their civilization is in some respects higher than our own.” However, his affinity for Japan did not mean that he encouraged immigration from there, warning, “It is eminently undesirable that Japanese and Americans should attempt to live together in masses.… But this is not because either nation is inferior to the other; it is because they are different.”[81] Roosevelt thus saw the Japanese in a distinct light from the Jews, who may have emerged from inferior conditions but—he believed—were perfectly capable of thriving in an American context.

* * *

Roosevelt repeatedly promoted the notion of American identity as a melting pot.[82] The metaphor of the melting pot implies homogenization; differences dissolve into an unvariegated stew of national identity. Consistent with that conceit, Roosevelt called on newcomers to shed their past ways and adopt a universal Americanism. He espoused such views in 1894, for example, in a magazine called The Forum. There Roosevelt inveighed against “immigrants or the sons of immigrants [who] do not heartily and in good faith throw in their lot with us, but cling to the speech, the customs, the ways of life, and the habits of thought of the Old World.” It was “necessary to Americanize the immigrants of foreign birth who settle among us.” His melting pot had its egalitarian aspects. He rejected the nativist premise that the old stock ranked above the new in their authenticity as Americans, but only if the new immigrants' assimilation was absolute. In Roosevelt's words, "An immense number of them have become completely Americanized, and these stand on exactly the same plane as the descendants of any Puritan, Cavalier, or Knickerbocker among us"—here he was referring to the colonial settlers of, respectively, Massachusetts, Virginia, and New York.[83]

Roosevelt's embrace of an iconic play, The Melting Pot, offers the most pronounced example of his enthusiasm for a crucible where different ethnicities and nationalities merge into a superior phenotype: the American. Created by the famed British-Jewish playwright Israel Zangwill, The Melting Pot debuted in the latter days of Roosevelt's presidency. TR and his wife, Edith, were in attendance for the world premiere at the Columbia Theater, just a few blocks from the White House. Other luminaries on hand that evening included Oscar Straus and Zangwill himself.[84]

The play revolves around two young Russian immigrants in New York: David and Vera. David is a Jew who narrowly escaped the Kishinev pogrom even as the rest of his family was massacred; Vera is a Christian whose father served as an officer in the Russian military. Even the play's macabre twist—it turns out that Vera's father was responsible for the murder of David's family—does not derail their unlikely love story. In Zangwill's vision of the United States, the likes of David and Vera could cast off Old World antipathies and fuse their bloodlines into a purified American one.[85] The final scene features David gazing out into a sunset and musing, "There she lies, the great Melting Pot.… Celt and Latin, Slav and Teuton, Greek and Syrian, black and yellow." Vera affectionately leans into David, adding, "Jew and Gentile." He then continues, "Yes, East and West, and North and South, the palm and the pine, the pole and the equator, the crescent and the cross—how the great Alchemist melts and fuses them with his purging flame!"[86] Zangwill's sympathetic rendering of interfaith romance was probably informed by his own marriage five years earlier to a non-Jew.[87]

After its run in Washington, the play toured the American West and then headed to Broadway.[88] Jews nationwide condemned The Melting Pot for appearing to extol self-eradication via intermarriage. On the Upper West Side, immense crowds packed into the Free Synagogue to hear a visiting rabbi, Leon Harrison, deliver a repudiation of Zangwill's play.[89] The rabbi cautioned that if Zangwill's vision were to materialize, "the little Jewish race would be diluted to extinction." An impassioned Harrison further castigated Zangwill for "sacrificing the ancient sanctities of his people's faith on the altar of sentimental claptrap."[90] Numerous Jewish papers throughout the country reported on Harrison's rousing sermon.[91]

On the other side of Central Park, at the iconic Temple Beth-El, Rabbi Judas Magnes delivered an equally scathing denunciation of Zangwill's "pernicious" production. "The melting process glorifies disloyalty to one's inheritance," Magnes warned. He glimpsed in The Melting Pot the specter of self-induced annihilation. Magnes scoffed, "We cannot be thankful to anyone for preaching suicide to us." Although Zangwill applied his assimilative logic to all ethnicities, Magnes pointed out that its threat was uniquely grave to Jews. Gentile newcomers originated in homelands where their people would continue to propagate, but for the stateless Jew, "America spells his great hope for the preservation of Judaism." Rabbi Magnes offered an alternative metaphor to the melting pot: the symphony. In the symphony, harmony results not from a "vast monotone" but rather from a "variety of distinct sounds blending into music under the artist's hand."[92] Each subgroup within the United States could contribute its individual note to the collective orchestra of American life.

The Jewish press joined in the repudiation of Zangwill's play. In New York, the Hebrew Standard deemed the melting pot a menace to Jewish perpetuity, no less than the pogroms themselves: "If others slay us, it is ruin … but that we should thrust the knife within our very self is adding slaughter unto slaughter."[93] Meanwhile, a Jewish paper in Missouri addressed its defiant rebuke to Zangwill directly: "With a single stroke of the pen, you cannot obliterate an existence of four thousand years."[94] Jewish voices defending The Melting Pot were so rare that a Boston rabbi jokingly described himself as a "heathen" for endorsing the play.[95]

Unlike American Jewry at large, Roosevelt delighted in Zangwill's assimilative message. The president shouted down from his theater box to

Zangwill, “A great play! A great play!” after the final scene on opening night.[96] TR may not have boasted credentials as a dramaturge, but that didn’t stop him from proffering a suggestion to the playwright a couple days later. One character in The Melting Pot had a line making light of divorce’s commonality in the United States, which sat poorly with a president for whom the decline of marriage and child-rearing was a foremost concern. Roosevelt hosted Zangwill for lunch at the White House so that TR could urge him to remove the offending dialogue.[97]

Soon thereafter Zangwill wrote Roosevelt, “I have changed the line to which you took exception.” And Zangwill had a request of his own: the play’s script would be printed as a book, and he wanted permission to dedicate it to TR.[98] The president responded that he would be “very much pleased” to have his name attached to The Melting Pot. “Let me again most heartily congratulate you upon your play,” Roosevelt added. “I do not know when I have seen a play that stirred me as much.”[99] Years later, Zangwill wrote him a letter making reference to “the play of mine (‘The Melting Pot’) which you have doubtless forgotten is dedicated to you.”[100] Roosevelt responded effusively. “My dear sir, the idea of supposing that I have forgotten the ‘Melting Pot,’ and its dedication to me!” he exclaimed. “Now as a matter of fact, that particular play I shall always count among the very strong and real influences upon my thought and my life. It has been in my mind continually, and on my lips very often.”[101] Although many Jewish people deemed Zangwill’s purifying crucible an existential threat, Roosevelt saw in The Melting Pot the possibilities for American liberation from the Old World’s stubborn hatreds. Indeed, TR was so enticed by the melting pot ideal that when an American humorist jokingly spelled his name in a seemingly Judaized way—Tiddy Rosenfelt—Roosevelt told him, “I wish I had a little Jew in me.”[102]

Roosevelt’s support for the notion of a melting pot serves to obscure the presence of a competing strain in his thought, one more inclusive than even the most expansive melting pot: pluralism. At times Roosevelt advanced a decidedly pluralistic vision of national life wherein members of different ethnicities need not choose between their particular group identity and a common civic one. Rather than abandon longstanding customs, they could harmonize their singular subcultures with a shared status as "Americans." Recall that a commemoration of the 250th anniversary of Jewish communal life—held in Carnegie Hall in 1905—featured the recitation of a letter from the president that applauded Jews for staying "loyal to their faith and their race traditions" while still becoming "indissolubly incorporated in the great army of American citizenship."[103]

Roosevelt sounded a similarly pluralistic note later in his presidency when he wrote to a group of Jewish children in advance of a Hannukah celebration at Jacob Riis's settlement house. "The fine loyalty and valiant achievements of the Maccabees have always made them favorite heroes of mine," he offered in a reprise of his days as police commissioner when he had routinely lauded American Jews who emulated their Maccabean forebearers. The president's letter continued, "It is a good thing that the Jewish boys and girls should keep their pride in and admiration for their own heroes of early days, and such pride and admiration, instead of hindering them, will help them to the friendliest and most brotherly relations with all their fellow Americans."[104] Jews could integrate into the United States by honoring, not disowning, their heritage.

* * *

Given Roosevelt's inconsistent views on immigrants, it unsurprising that his policy preferences reflected those inconsistencies. He felt torn throughout his career between his instinct to restrict immigration for the benefit of those already in the United States and his desire for America to serve as a refuge for the world's oppressed. Among Roosevelt's contemporaries who endorsed restriction, some did so out of a concern for protecting domestic labor from an influx of competition; others were driven by anxieties that foreign arrivals were racially incompatible with the native-born population. Roosevelt sometimes belonged to both camps simultaneously. In a magazine article published shortly before his appointment as police commissioner, he asserted, "It is urgently necessary to check and regulate our immigration, by much more drastic laws than now exist; and this should be done both to keep out laborers who tend to depress the labor market, and to keep out races which do not assimilate readily with our own." Yet Roosevelt decried xenophobia as "utterly un-American" in the very same article.[105] His position, in effect, was that immigrants deserved a warm welcome, but only if they posed no undue threat to laborers and were prepared to embrace American culture.

Roosevelt articulated a similarly conflicted attitude in another magazine, the Review of Reviews, three years later. That piece excoriated nativists for their self-perceived superiority. "I have no sympathy with mere dislike of immigrants," he announced. "There are classes and even nationalities of them which stand at least on an equality with the citizens of native birth." But in the next sentence, Roosevelt called for immigration restriction, fusing together concern for American labor with the prevailing racial biases of the day: "In the interest of our workingmen we must in the end keep out laborers who are ignorant, vicious, and with low standards of life and comfort, just as we have shut out the Chinese."[106] TR would carry these warring instincts about immigration into the White House.

During his presidency, Roosevelt's compassion for immigrants was evident in his oversight of William Williams, the commissioner of Ellis Island. Williams was a restrictionist with limited affinity for Southern and Eastern Europeans, and his stringent application of immigration laws reflected as much. Unsurprisingly, Jews weren't enamored of Williams.[107]

A group of Jewish leaders—headed by Roosevelt's old college classmate and congressional ally, Lucius Littauer—met with the president to voice their concerns that many Jewish immigrants were unfairly subjected to deportation. Afterward, TR told Williams about that visit, stressing that these Jewish leaders were "men of very high character" and "valued friends of mine." Roosevelt admonished Williams that it was "doubly incumbent scrupulously to avoid any appearance of unnecessary harshness" in deportation cases. The president conceded that immigrants who "tend to the physical or moral deterioration of our people" must be repatriated to their country of origin. But even so, Williams was to remain ever mindful in the case of any given candidate for deportation that "to send him back is often to inflict a punishment upon him only less severe than death itself, and in such cases we must be sure not merely that we are acting aright but that we are able to show to others that we are acting aright." Substance and optics both mattered. To those ends, the president instructed Williams to allow potential deportees of Jewish background to be accompanied by "a reputable representative of the United Hebrew Societies" to ensure the actuality of due process and its appearance. Roosevelt added that the same practice should hold for non-Jewish immigrants—like the Italians and Irish—who would find comparable support from their own local aid societies as their deportation cases were adjudicated.[108]

In the same letter, TR pressed Williams to generally stay in "close touch" with charitable organizations that assisted immigrants. It behooved Williams to persuade them "that your aim is not to do anything to discriminate against the immigrant, especially the immigrant of any particular race or creed." To soften his message, Roosevelt assured Williams that the Jewish leaders who had conveyed their misgivings nevertheless praised the Ellis Island commissioner's integrity.[109] It is dubious that Williams actually believed they were terribly delighted with him.[110]

Later that year, TR made his first presidential visit to Ellis Island, and in Rooseveltian fashion, the whole affair was a string of sensational moments. He departed Oyster Bay on a government-owned yacht with an entourage that included his wife, his son Kermit, and America's most famous immigrant, Jacob Riis. The yacht forged its way through a tempest that roiled the Long Island Sound with ferocious winds and frightful waves. Officials back on Ellis Island were skeptical that Roosevelt would hazard the trip under such volatile conditions. But around two o'clock that afternoon, amid the fog and rain, the president's yacht improbably came into view. The party anchored some distance off Ellis Island, and a tug boat—due to deliver Roosevelt the final leg of the trip—defied the "howling gale" and attempted the "ticklish job" of aligning itself next to the president's yacht, as the New York Times detailed. He embarked on the tug and braved the last stretch of his journey on the deck, cheerfully waving his signature slouch hat as the precipitation drenched him. Once docked, Roosevelt raced across a wobbly plank onto the iconic isle where each day thousands of aspiring Americans first set foot.[111]

The president was then joined by a pair of U.S. senators and his longtime Jewish ally Nathan Bijur, among others. Roosevelt's first order of business: declaring the appointment of a special committee to uncover any discrimination on Ellis Island. The New York Tribune reported that the committee had been initiated at Williams's own request to investigate and debunk accusations of his malfeasance. Conversely, the New York Times contended that Williams had been deprived of "the slightest intimation" ahead of time about the committee and that this unexpected announcement "came like a thunderclap out of a clear sky." In either case, Williams was an unpopular figure with immigrant communities, and the creation of the special committee reflected Roosevelt's keen interest in cultivating a reputation for fair play. The remainder of the president's tour of the island, spanning nearly five hours, involved various gestures of courtesy to the foreign newcomers. He shook hands and exchanged words with those waiting to be processed. And in one remarkable instance, Roosevelt took it upon himself to personally adjudicate a detention case where he summarily decided to free a woman pleading for release.[112]

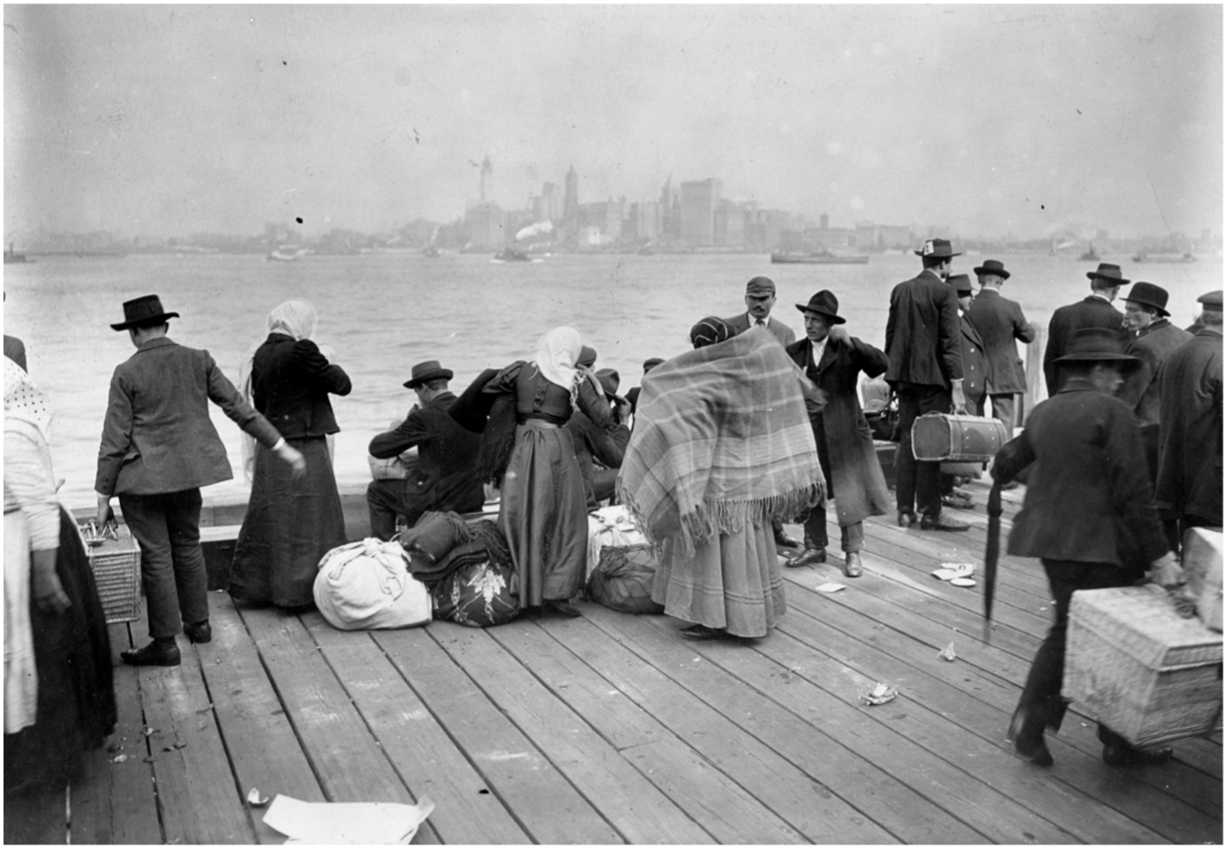

FIGURE. 7.1. Immigrants at Ellis Island, with the Manhattan skyline in the distance. Source: Library of Congress, Prints and Photographs Division.

His diverse appointees for the investigatory committee nodded to the immigrant communities whose unease he hoped to assuage. An unsympathetic newspaperman chided the president for choosing “two Germans, two Irishmen and a Jew—not a single native American [i.e., Anglo-Saxon].” In turn, Roosevelt boasted to one of the committee members, “Evidently, that writer did not regard me as a ‘nativist!’ ”[113] The committee’s final report, while offering suggestions for improvement, exonerated Williams of any misconduct.[114] Still, it is notable that when Williams resigned his post toward the end of Roosevelt’s first term, the president replaced him with a more moderate successor who was himself an immigrant.[115]

★★★

Notwithstanding a dramatic voyage to Ellis Island and his establishment of an investigatory committee, the president sided with the restrictionists on a key issue: the literacy test. In his second term, Congress considered making literacy in any language a prerequisite for admission into the country. The proposed law—although neutral on its face—would disproportionately exclude new-stock immigrants in practice. Illiteracy rates among them were high: one in four Jews, nearly two in five Russian Gentiles, and a majority of southern Italians. Conversely, immigrants from old-stock countries such as the England, Ireland, and Germany could boast literacy rates of 95 percent or better.[116] Like immigration restriction generally, the literacy test created some unlikely alliances. Proponents of the test included nativists, who were suspicious of alien blood, and laborers seeking to insulate themselves from competition. The opposition encompassed certain industrial interests, which wanted a steady influx of inexpensive workers, and people with genuine sympathy for new immigrants.

Back in 1896, Senator Henry Cabot Lodge successfully shepherded the literacy test through Congress, but President Grover Cleveland deemed it prejudicial and vetoed the bill. Roosevelt proved more sympathetic, endorsing the idea as early as 1901 in his first State of the Union message. By the spring of 1906, the Immigration Restriction League, working in tandem with the American Federation of Labor, made considerable headway in rallying lawmakers behind the literacy test. It looked as though Congress might well be poised to codify the measure, with the Senate approving it in late May. If the restrictionists could prevail in the House of Representatives as well and keep Roosevelt to his word to sign the bill, the literacy test would become the law of the land.[117]

The literacy test was distinct from passports and pogroms in that it wasn’t a specifically Jewish issue. But Jewish interests were certainly implicated. Oscar Straus—still months away from his cabinet nomination at this point—fretted that a literacy requirement would preclude 10 percent of Jewish foreigners from entry into America, a number far too high for his comfort. Had he known that illiteracy among Jewish arrivals was actually 26 percent, Straus’s angst would have been that much more acute. Still, he felt hesitant to lobby the president on the matter, telling a fellow Jewish leader, “We should not trouble him unless it becomes absolutely necessary.”[118] Straus was understandably reticent to overspend his political capital with TR at that particular moment; only a month prior, he had solicited a wary Roosevelt to address Russia about the specter of renewed pogroms as the Easter holiday approached. However, Straus’s misgivings about the literacy test soon outran his reluctance to pester the president. He pressed his case against the measure to TR with a letter in late May and then again in person in early June.[119] But Roosevelt was immovable, telling Straus that he felt bound by previous statements in which he publicly backed such a test.[120]

Fortunately for Oscar Straus, other forces joined him in opposing the restrictionists. He found a willing partner in America’s most prominent Catholic, Cardinal James Gibbons, whose flock included many immigrants.[121] The cardinal took up the cause and beseeched Roosevelt to “prevent the passage of such an obnoxious bill.”[122] Meanwhile, industries like shipping, railroad, and steel were all active in their resistance to the literacy test.[123] And there was public protest as well. At a mass meeting on the Lower East Side, the Federation of Jewish Organizations fulminated against the literacy test. Prominent attendees included a pair of New York congressmen—one a Democrat, the other a Republican. The meeting’s chairman, Edward Lauterbach, addressed a packed throng of two thousand onlookers, proclaiming, “While the Russian government not long ago and even now is murdering and prosecuting the Jews … we should open our arms and say to them, ‘Come to us. Come to our country, where you will have freedom, liberty, and work, even if you do not know how to read and write.’ ”[124] For thousands of Russia’s Jews hoping to flee stateside, the stakes of the literacy test were existential.

Lauterbach organized a deputation to meet with Roosevelt the following week in the hopes of dislodging the president from his position on the bill. That group included leaders from various immigrant societies. Pro-immigration American Southerners were also present; they wanted to see new arrivals redirected from crowded coastal cities to the underdeveloped parts of their own region. Roosevelt expressed sympathy with his visitors’ collective aims but made plain that his perspective remained unshaken.[125]

Although the test enjoyed widespread support among lawmakers, the domineering Speaker of the House—Joseph "Uncle Joe" Cannon—wouldn't necessarily throw his all-important weight behind the measure. Cannon maintained a studied silence, abstaining from any stance on the issue before debate opened on the House floor.[126] Roosevelt leaned on Cannon to pass the bill. In a letter, the president explained to the Speaker his own, somewhat begrudging, endorsement of the literacy test. TR admitted that he would prefer a more holistic approach to screening immigrants: in an ideal world, American consuls overseas would vet prospective newcomers to ensure they were "physically, morally, and intellectually of a good type." But that plan wasn't "at present practicable," and so Roosevelt was willing to settle for the literacy test—and he hoped Cannon would, too. The test would prevent "immense masses of cheap labor" from flooding the domestic marketplace. Roosevelt's letter also criticized certain business interests for fighting the literacy test in their self-serving bid to suppress wages for American workers, native-born and foreign-born alike.[127]

Two weeks later, the president sent another letter to Speaker Cannon, acknowledging that he was under pressure from Jews and Catholics. "I have had frank talks with very good and staunch friends of mine representing the Jewish and Italian elements in our population," Roosevelt informed Cannon. The president went on to recount the substance of those conversations: he had told those friends that he lacked "a particle of prejudice against any man because of creed or birthplace" and that his chief interest lay in protecting "manual laborers," a category that included countless recent immigrants. Whereas nativists were championing the literacy test because it promised to favor old-stock immigrants over the new, Roosevelt proceeded from a different logic: overcrowded tenements and meager earnings precluded new immigrants from achieving a better life. Those new immigrants stood only to benefit from an attenuated flow of human capital into the labor market, TR reasoned.[128]

In his foregoing letter to Cannon, the president expressly collapsed the distinction between old and new immigrants. "Like the Germans, the Scandinavians, the English, Irish, Dutch, French, and Swiss, so I believe that ultimately Jew and Italian, Mongol and Slav will, if given the chance, become, and see their children become, just as good citizens as anyone else," Roosevelt affirmed. "But I do not think that under the present laws they get this proper chance, and the effect is bad for them and bad for the rest of the country."[129] TR was surely genuine in his conviction that the literacy test would elevate rather than exacerbate conditions for new-stock immigrants. After all, he had shown a consistent willingness to embrace Southern and Eastern Europeans since his days as police commissioner, and his letter to Cannon reflects that longstanding commitment. The president's advocacy of the literacy test may have placed him on the same side of this policy debate as the nativists, but it wasn't because he shared their anxieties about Jews and other new-stock Europeans.

Roosevelt's appeals to Cannon fell on deaf ears. As the House members prepared to vote on the literacy test in late June, the Speaker announced his opposition and browbeat his caucus into defeating the provision. His imperious tactics on the House floor included seizing members by their collars and wrenching them from their chairs.[130] Despite his animosity to the test, Cannon didn't bother to disclose his motivations at the time. Years later he would clarify that he quashed the literacy test because relatively open immigration thus far had served the United States well and he saw no reason to change course.[131] Cannon was also undoubtedly informed by his laissez-faire economic philosophy, which saw immigration restriction as a form of government interference in the market that unduly boosted labor at the expense of capital.[132] And there were campaign considerations as well—his congressional district was home to a sizable immigrant vote.[133]

Although Cannon killed the literacy test at this juncture, its proponents hoped they might soon revive it in Congress. Roosevelt, however, became increasingly uninterested. He had never been as enthused about the test as were the xenophobic restrictionists. And Roosevelt grew concerned over the summer that Republican support for the literacy test might play poorly in the upcoming midterm elections. By October, he was voicing doubts about the test's efficacy to an advisor. The vice president of the Immigration Restriction League grumbled to one of the league's founders that TR was now taking a "more the merrier" approach to foreign transplants.[134]

Roosevelt’s State of the Union that fall made a vigorous case for an inclusive nation. The president’s earlier annual messages had hewed to a middle course that honored immigrants as valuable additions to American society while nonetheless objecting to their unfettered admission.[135] But now Roosevelt emphasized only the theme of acceptance. He maintained that the determination whether to admit a given immigrant must rest upon a principled blindness to both religious background and national origin. “Whether they are Catholic or Protestant, Jew or Gentile; whether they come from England or Germany, Russia, Japan, or Italy, matters nothing,” stressed Roosevelt. “All we have a right to question is the man’s conduct.” The president declared that once immigrants secure entry into the country, they deserve respect. Drawing language from the Book of Exodus, he admonished his fellow citizens, “Especially do we need to remember our duty to the stranger within our gates.” TR also confronted the xenophobic currents in American culture, asserting, “It is the sure mark of a low civilization, a low morality, to abuse or discriminate against or in any way humiliate such stranger who has come here lawfully and who is conducting himself properly.”[136] On the very day that Roosevelt submitted this message to Congress, he sent his nomination of Oscar Straus to the Senate for confirmation as the cabinet secretary in charge of immigration. Entrusting a foreign-born Jew with the immigration portfolio was the most prominent indication yet that the president had abandoned his alliance with the restrictionists.

* * *

As the public learned that Oscar Straus would become the first Jew in the cabinet, contemporaries immediately recognized the multilayered significance of his appointment. The Trenton Evening Times marveled at the historic measure: “Never before in American history has a Jew held office in the president’s cabinet.”[137] Naturally, the Jewish press celebrated this milestone. The Reform Advocate gushed that the news “cannot fail to fill the heart of every American Jew with joy”—the Roosevelt administration was “epoch-making.” That paper further suggested that Roosevelt’s choice for the role was a clarion signal: surely, the president now opposed restrictionist legislation and preferred lenient interpretation of existing immigration statutes.[138]

Newspapers saw that the stakes were international. As the Cleveland Plain Dealer reported of Straus's nomination, "Abroad it is expected to give notice that this government is animated by the most friendly feelings toward the Jews."[139] Meanwhile, the Reform Advocate discerned a message to Jew-haters at home, contending that the appointment was intended as "a rebuke to possible antisemitic know-nothingism."[140] (The term "know-nothingism" derived from the "Know-Nothing Party," a xenophobic movement in America that had died out decades earlier but whose peculiar name endured in the national lexicon as a shorthand for nativism.) Some papers underscored the electoral consequences of Straus's ascendancy. Not only would Straus endear Jews all the more to the GOP, but he was also a Democrat whose willingness to break partisan ranks might well lure Gentile members of his party to do the same at the polls.[141]

As an undergraduate at Columbia in the 1860s, Straus had been denied membership in a campus literary society on account of his Jewish identity; now he was conferred membership in the cabinet of an American president.[142] Straus's gratitude to Roosevelt ran deep. "You have made me famous," he exclaimed, as congratulatory telegrams poured in from all corners of the globe. Straus knew that he carried the weight not just of the department he would lead but of the precedent he would set for American Jewry. As he told Roosevelt, "I appreciate the honor and its significance."[143] Straus further expressed the hope that he would live up to Roosevelt's expectations, prompting a warm reply from the president: "I only wish that I had as little cause for anxiety about the result of all my actions, great and small, as about the action in your case. Good luck to you!"[144]

* * *

Oscar Straus was a tireless cabinet member whose typical work week stretched seventy hours with no days off. Much of that time was spent advancing the cause of immigrants. Despite the department's diverse portfolio—which ranged from labor relations to lighthouses—Straus recalled that “no subject in the department occupied my daily attention to the extent that immigration did.” He felt compassion for refugees fleeing persecution abroad, but this did not mean he saw the admission of foreigners as a mere act of charity by the United States. Rather, argued Straus, migration to America produced manifold benefits for the country. Immigrants spurred economic growth by furnishing fresh sources of human capital. And an inclusive immigration policy also strengthened American ties to other nations and thereby expanded trade opportunities. That the United States spanned a vast continent with space aplenty for settlement made the case all the stronger for a hearty embrace of aspiring citizens, Straus insisted.[145]

He personally visited immigration processing sites and directed officials to treat the recent arrivals with dignity. Straus even gave money from his own pocket to the Ellis Island commissioner for distribution to the neediest newcomers. Immigrants sometimes faced deportation on the grounds that they were prone to become a burden to the state, but they could appeal their pending expulsions; Straus took it upon himself to personally decide all such cases and showed great sensitivity to their plight. He was instinctively reluctant to condemn Russian Jews to a horrid fate back in the czar’s empire. To be sure, Straus always operated within the confines of the law, but statutes could be applied with greater or lesser severity, and he unapologetically opted for a merciful approach. “I would be less than human if I failed to interpret the law as humanely as possible,” he told his brother. Straus added, “I propose to remain on the side of the angels, come what will, and I shall defy hostile criticisms—to do less would be cowardly.”[146] With a foreign-born Jew championing immigration, the criticism was destined to be hostile indeed.

The most conspicuous of objections to Straus came from the most predictable of sources: Prescott Hall, founding member of the Immigration Restriction League.[147] Hall’s general xenophobia was of a piece with his particular antisemitism. Relying on well-worn stereotypes about Jewish connivery, he claimed that Jewish immigrants were “trying to gain some monetary advantage by craft and deceit.”[148] Unsurprisingly, Hall did not thrill to Straus's appointment, deriding him as a "bitter opponent of immigration restriction."[149] Hall tried to persuade Roosevelt that the Jewish cabinet secretary was disregarding immigration laws in order to admit undesirable foreigners. The president was skeptical of Hall's accusations. "I have a very high regard for Secretary Straus," Roosevelt informed Hall, "and it is exceedingly difficult for me to believe that there has been the slightest conscious failure on his part to enforce the immigration law." His faith in Straus notwithstanding, TR was willing to submit the matter to the Immigration Commission—an investigatory body comprising three experts plus six lawmakers. Among the lawmakers was Henry Cabot Lodge, who had been the Senate's foremost proponent of the literacy test. Roosevelt assured Hall, "Lodge is very anxious that [immigration law] should be enforced with the utmost strictness."[150]

The commission simply could not find any evidence of malfeasance on Straus's part. Lodge reported to the president that Prescott Hall's allegations were left unsubstantiated: "[Hall] is extreme and does not understand that it is one thing to make general charges on hearsay and another to sustain them by proof." Senator Lodge had heartfelt sympathy for Hall and shared his restrictionist goals, but the commission's inquiry into Straus had been a fool's errand. "There was no escape from the facts," Lodge conceded.[151]

Still, Senator Lodge's letter to Roosevelt managed to convey doubts about Oscar Straus. Lodge speculated—without evidence, by his own admission—that Straus perhaps failed to adequately apply immigration laws when they disproportionately burdened indigent Jews. One such law excluded immigrants with "physical and mental defects" who would struggle to secure employment and were thus liable to become wards of the state. Pursuant to that statute, immigration officers employed a "poor physique" standard to assess new arrivals; many malnourished Jews who had just fled destitution were unlikely to fare well under such a precondition. Lodge told Roosevelt, "That Mr. Straus is adverse to the laws which affect the entry of poor Jews, and especially to the poor physique clause, I believe to be true, and if true it is unfortunate in the head of that Department. How far his influence is exerted to procure slackness in exclusions, I do not know. I can only say we found no proof." According to

Lodge's antisemitic logic, even a complete lack of evidence that Straus had been malfeasant was insufficient to merit his exoneration.[152] Roosevelt, for his part, was unwilling to indulge Lodge's aspersions and instead deemed the commission's findings to be "conclusive" vindication of Straus.[153]

Given nativist anxieties around Jewish newcomers, the president must not have been terribly surprised that Straus's role irked the likes of the Immigration Restriction League. The elevation of Straus to the cabinet in any capacity would have been historic; the decision to place a Jew of foreign birth in charge of American immigration was arguably audacious. The president, after a tepid response to the 1905 pogrom surge, had reclaimed some goodwill with American Jewry thanks to the Straus appointment. But Roosevelt would soon find an unexpected threat to those warm relations. At the twilight of his presidency, a disturbing revelation surfaced, one that suggested his administration itself was becoming an active tool of Russian antisemitism.

OceanofPDF.com

8

ELECTION YEAR

As an election year dawned in 1908, a British-Jewish journalist named Maurice Low intimated in the London Morning Post that Theodore Roosevelt would break his promise not to seek a third term. The American president, in turn, sneered to an English friend, “Maurice Low is a circumcised skunk.”[1] It was a rare, if not altogether unprecedented, antisemitic slur from Roosevelt. In any event, Low’s reporting proved erroneous. TR was indeed determined to step down and bequeath the White House to his preferred heir-apparent: William Howard Taft, the secretary of war.[2]

Roosevelt was never one to take the Jewish vote for granted, and 1908 would prove no exception. He had always been keen—especially in election years—to solidify a favorable record on Jewish causes, one that fellow Republicans could tout in their own bids for office. But in the early weeks of 1908, the Passport Question suddenly reemerged as a major vulnerability for the Roosevelt administration, which found itself fending off accusations that it had become a willing accomplice in Russia’s anti-Jewish agenda.

Recall that back in October 1904, Russia had given indication to the Roosevelt administration that it intended to repeal its passport restrictions on American Jews. The mere signal of reform had been a public win for the president, all the more valuable for its timing amid his reelection campaign. But in the years that followed, it became clear that passport revision was just another empty promise about Jewish rights that Russia had made for strategic reasons. Jews bearing American passports, with a handful of exceptions, continued to face exclusion from Russian borders.

For most of Roosevelt’s second term, more urgent matters overshadowed the Passport Question. The scourge of pogroms abroad and the specter of a literacy test at home preoccupied American Jewry. But late in Roosevelt’s presidency, Secretary of State Elihu Root promulgated a circular about passports that alarmed Jewish leaders. The circular announced that the State Department—consistent with Russia’s own policy of excluding Jews—would decline to issue passports to U.S. citizens of Jewish faith who were intent on entering Russia.[3]

This circular diverged markedly from an earlier version in 1901, produced just before Roosevelt became president. The 1901 circular did warn American Jews about Russian restrictions on them, but the State Department at that time hardly shaped its own policies to accord with Russian prejudice. Jews with U.S. citizenship remained free to seek passports from their government. The State Department itself took no cognizance of any American’s religious identity, even as Russian consulates on U.S. soil interrogated visa applicants to winnow out Jews. That status quo was now upended by the appearance of this new circular by Secretary Root, who appeared to be doing Russia’s bidding. He officially divided Americans into two classes: Jews and Gentiles. The former were refused the right to a passport enjoyed by the latter—all to accommodate the bigotry of a foreign power, no less. Never before in the nation’s history had its Jewish citizens been subject to a religious test by their government.[4]

The newly constituted American Jewish Committee (AJC) mobilized to combat this latest affront to Jewish dignity. The AJC had been formed just two years earlier, in 1906, in response to the mass violence visited on Russian Jewry. Before then, temporary Jewish committees had sprung up to collect donations and press the federal government for action as circumstances merited. But those ad hoc measures had their limitations—advocacy in Washington proved only as effective as the personal connections that Jewish grandees happened to share with political figures at a given moment. Jewry required a more institutionalized approach, a permanent body that could robustly address Jewish issues whenever they arose. The AJC promised to fill that need.[5]

True, there already was a longstanding institution with a history of lobbying American civic leaders on Jewish causes: B’nai B’rith. But B’nai B’rith principally emphasized humanitarian relief, not political persuasion. In theory, B’nai B’rith’s top brass might have put ego aside and welcomed the creation of the AJC as a valuable complement to their own important role. In reality, they felt threatened by the idea of the AJC; the very prospect of the new organization felt like an indictment of B’nai B’rith’s past efforts.[6] Proponents of the AJC pushed ahead, and their ranks included key German-American Jews such as Jacob Schiff and Oscar Straus (though Straus stepped aside after accepting his cabinet appointment). The AJC thus continued the custom whereby affluent Central European Jews served as the principal spokesmen for their impoverished Russian coreligionists.[7]

When the AJC learned of the State Department’s prejudicial circular, a pair of AJC officials—Louis Marshall and Edward Lauterbach—took action. The two had much in common: both were Germans by descent, lawyers by profession, and New Yorkers by residence. They were also Republicans, so their criticism of the Roosevelt administration wasn’t attributable to partisan politics. In a letter to Root sent in early February 1908, Marshall and Lauterbach inveighed against the State Department for conferring second-class citizenship on Jews. The right of American Jews to a passport had become conditional, whereas “all other citizens, of whatever race or creed, are assured an unlimited passport and are guaranteed the absolute protection of our flag.” This kind of antisemitic discrimination was unprecedented in the annals of the republic, lamented Marshall and Lauterbach: “An American citizen applying to the State Department for a passport, who is suspected of being a Jew, is for the first time in our history obliged to disclose his faith.” They referenced the Treaty of 1832, whereby Russian and American nationals were supposed to enjoy freedom of travel between the two countries. Root’s circular was “practically justifying Russia in the violation of her treaty obligations and condoning her contemptuous disregard of the American passport.” It had been degrading enough that Russian consulates in the United States interrogated visa applicants about their religion, but now—the AJC leaders fumed—America's own government "seeks to indulge in these inquisitorial practices and to apply an unconstitutional religious test." Marshall and Lauterbach closed their missive with a request that Root rescind the circular.[8]

As it turned out, Oscar Straus had already been working toward that end from within the administration. Straus brought the circular to Roosevelt's attention, and the president promptly ordered Root to eliminate the discriminatory language.[9] Unbeknownst to the AJC, Root had produced a new circular just days before he received the exasperated letter from Marshall and Lauterbach. This revised circular avoided any mention of Jews and forwent any provision for denying passports. It merely relayed that Russia considered it a crime for a Russian to assume citizenship in another country (unless the expatriate in question received the prior consent of the Russian authorities), and therefore Russian-born Americans who managed to return to their native land were liable to suffer imprisonment.[10]

But news of the amended circular did not fully insulate the administration from reproach. On the House floor, a Democratic congressman from New York, Francis Harrison, denounced the rescinded circular as a national embarrassment and a breach of the Treaty of 1832—a treaty in which the rights of American Jews weren't supposed to hinge "upon the whims and fancies of an unhappy autocrat," Harrison insisted. He endorsed a proposed resolution that would call on Secretary Root to provide the House with details about any efforts by the State Department to extract concessions from Russia on the Passport Question. Root had thus far been disinclined to divulge such details to Congress, probably because he had done very little. A Republican representative from Illinois who opposed the resolution came to Root's defense, declaring, "We have confidence enough in the secretary of state to believe that his judgment should be supreme on this question." To what was surely Root's relief, the resolution failed 118 to 97. Still, the prejudicial circular, even if no longer operative, had plainly created an opening for Democrats to agitate against the Roosevelt administration.[11]

That same day, Root submitted his revised circular to the AJC leaders and asked if they saw anything amiss with its phrasing. They did. Marshall and Lauterbach took issue with a specific line that read: “An American citizen, formerly a subject of Russia, who returns to that country places himself within the jurisdiction of Russian law and cannot expect immunity from its operations.” They argued that this language contravened a congressional statute requiring the president to defend the rights of Americans abroad. The State Department was effectively signaling to Russia that the U.S. government would not enforce its own statute, Marshall and Lauterbach cautioned. In their words, the circular was tantamount to “an implied invitation … to violate the rights of American citizenship.”[12] Root’s deputy quickly informed the AJC that the State Department would dispense with the problematic wording.[13]

* * *

The State Department had now rectified its terminology twice, but the Passport Question continued to fester. Russia’s longstanding ban on Jewish visitors showed no signs of abating, and Root’s ill-advised circular inadvertently helped revive the Passport Question as a central concern for American Jewry. Rarely did Jews in the United States, whether Russian-born or not, harbor any desire to actually visit the czar’s empire. But Jewish Americans on principle rejected the notion that a foreign nation could impose upon them a religious test on their own soil. And they were also alive to the implications of the Passport Question for Russia’s Jews—observers in the United States had long believed that the admission of American Jews to Russia would create a chain reaction, culminating in the end of Russia’s restrictions on her own Jewish subjects. This line of reasoning began with a provision in the Treaty of 1832 that afforded U.S. nationals in Russia the same rights as natives. Were Russia to open its gates to American Jews, then two classes of Jews would be found within the empire: domestic Jews, enduring a perilous struggle for life and livelihood; and foreign Jews, enjoying the very same liberties exercised by Russian Gentiles. Russia’s regime of persecution would supposedly implode under the crushing weight of that contradiction.[14]

As early as 1881, the secretary of state conveyed to a State Department official that the sitting president, Chester Arthur, subscribed to this domino theory of Jewish emancipation. Arthur reportedly anticipated "that an amelioration of the treatment of the American Israelites in Russia could only result [in] a very decided betterment of the condition of the native Hebrews—that any steps taken toward the relief of one would necessarily react in favor of the other."[15] Recall that Jacob Schiff made a similar prediction in 1904. "When foreign Jews are equally entitled to cross the Russian border with other foreigners," he surmised, "then the Russian government will not long be able to insist on maintaining the scandalous restrictive laws against her own Jews."[16] Russia, too, recognized a necessary relationship between banning Jews from abroad and discriminating against Jews at home. In a letter to Roosevelt, Schiff recounted how a Russian official had candidly revealed to him that the czar's regime "would not grant to foreign Israelites the privilege to freely move about its domain, while its laws denied the same right to its own Jewish subjects."[17] American Jewry and the Russian government proved unyielding on the Passport Question precisely because each side understood its vast ramifications. The real stakes were not the very few Jews trying to enter Russia but the many millions of Jews with no means to escape it.

In May of 1908, the AJC decided to call for a radical move from the Roosevelt administration. This time the message came from AJC president Mayer Sulzberger, a state court judge in Pennsylvania, and it was addressed to Roosevelt directly. Sulzberger suggested that the United States should now force Russia's hand with "direct and emphatic" action: the unilateral withdrawal from the Treaty of 1832. Roosevelt could thereby coerce Russia to the bargaining table for a new treaty, one that would affirm the right to mutual travel while providing enforcement mechanisms to ensure Russia's fulfillment of its obligations. Drawing on his judicial background, Sulzberger argued that the U.S. Constitution guaranteed equal justice to all citizens, and therefore any treaties brokered under the Constitution's authority must accord with that paramount principle of equality. He acknowledged it was difficult to correct "wrongs encrusted with age" but nevertheless insisted that "the dignity of our own country" was on the line.[18]

Judge Sulzberger also encouraged Roosevelt to void another American treaty with Russia—an 1887 agreement providing for the reciprocal extradition of criminals. He explained that Russia, with its warped view of criminality, ruthlessly condemned political dissidents as lawbreakers. If such dissidents reached American shores, the treaty obliged the United States to forsake its rightful role as an asylum and ship these alleged “criminals” back to Russia’s corrupt empire.[19] Extradition was something of a sidelight that American Jews hadn’t previously emphasized in their lobbying of the administration. Even Sulzberger would have been surprised when unforeseeable events late in the campaign season would make extradition an explosive issue.

Roosevelt passed along the foregoing missive to Secretary Root, who in turn assured Judge Sulzberger, “The letter will receive attentive consideration.”[20] But neither Roosevelt nor Root was inclined to take the drastic step of unilaterally dissolving Russo-American treaties. The administration let the matter rest, at least for the time being.[21]

Shortly thereafter, TR wrote Root, “The Jews always want to embroil us with Russia, and therefore feel very friendly with England” because England periodically launched its own diplomatic bids against Russian antisemitism. Roosevelt wasn’t actually complaining here. Indeed, he saw American Jewry’s aversion to Russia as beneficial to his foreign policy; it counterbalanced the Irish-American opposition to England. The president’s letter ticked through a number of other immigrant communities—Poles, Danes, Norwegians, Swedes, Germans, French, Greeks, Armenians—each wanting him to adopt some particular position in global affairs, each offset by some other group. As Roosevelt mused, “It is a good thing from the standpoint of the Americans of this country that we have many different race elements coming, instead of simply one.” Pluralism had created a diplomatic equilibrium that Anglo-Saxonism alone could not.[22]

As spring turned to summer, the campaign heated up along with the weather. Republicans were eager to court the Jewish vote and remained alive to the Passport Question. Their convention, as it had four years earlier, approved a platform calling for the protection of U.S. citizens abroad. The Democrats followed suit at their own convention two weeks later. But neither party went so far as to adopt AJC’s hard-line position of unilateral treaty abrogation.[23]

With William Howard Taft poised to become the GOP standard-bearer, he came under pressure from the AJC to foreground the Passport Question. Judge Sulzberger urged Taft to address the issue in his speech accepting the Republican nomination. Taft obliged. Standing before a boisterous throng in his native Cincinnati, Taft decried as “repugnant” any foreign power that classified American citizens by religion. He pledged to advance Roosevelt’s efforts by taking “every proper endeavor to secure the abolition of such distinctions.” Yet Taft avoided specificity about what those endeavors would look like.[24]

* * *

The following month, Roosevelt was delighted by a flattering revelation from an improbable source—Russia’s most esteemed sociologist. Professor Maksim Kovalevsky, from the University of St. Petersburg, had gained access to classified documents about the Portsmouth Peace Conference of 1905 and produced a report on the negotiations that proved highly laudatory of Roosevelt’s contributions. Kovalevsky’s study praised TR for keeping alive peace talks that might have easily unraveled. The professor also brought to light a previously unpublicized detail: in the days following the treaty signing, the American president had beseeched Count Witte to lift Russia’s invidious ban on foreign Jews. This disclosure first appeared in a Russian outlet before reaching the American press; the New York Times dedicated nearly two full pages to its digest of the Kovalevsky report.[25]

The news came at an auspicious moment for Roosevelt. After the embarrassment of Root’s discriminatory circular earlier that year, TR now scored a notable public relations win with Jewry just as the campaign season was ramping up. Leslie’s Weekly, a well-regarded magazine, crowed in its coverage of the Kovalevsky report, “The Jewish people in the United States have every reason to entertain profound respect for the president.”[26] Naturally, Roosevelt was “mighty interested” when the magazine’s editor forwarded him a copy of that article. “I had never felt at liberty myself to speak of the fact that I interceded as strongly as I know how with Witte in the matter of passports for American citizens of Jewish faith," the president explained. "But I am very glad that someone has brought it out." He then recollected how he had "with the utmost emphasis" admonished Witte that as long as Russia persisted in its prejudice, so would the "constant bitterness" between their two countries.[27]

A month later, Leslie's Weekly continued to trumpet Roosevelt's advocacy for Jews, this time in a piece entitled, "What the Jew Owes to the Republican Party," by the partisan journalist Charles Harvey. His article was breathlessly loose in its fidelity to the facts. Harvey claimed about the Roosevelt-Witte meeting in 1905, "It is certain that the improvement in Russia's attitude toward the Jews dates from that affair, and Mr. Roosevelt had a decisive influence in bringing it about." Harvey's specific examples of such "improvement" were divorced from reality. He erroneously contended, "There have been no repetitions of the Kishinev massacre of the Jews." In reality, the bloodiest wave of pogroms began just after Roosevelt's meeting with Witte. The article also falsely asserted that the Passport Question was resolved: "In the attitude of Russia toward the American Jews who visit her, no line is drawn between them and the Christians." Harvey further credited Roosevelt with the establishment of "elections with the successive Dumas," neglecting to mention that the czar had dissolved the first two Dumas to preserve his autocratic agenda. Of course, the article's ultimate aim was to extend Roosevelt's popularity with Jews to Taft. "The Jews have known, too, that Secretary Taft was in hearty sympathy with the president," Harvey assured his vote-casting readers.[28]

That article's abundant inaccuracies aside, Roosevelt was pleased with the piece, alerting Taft to "an article by Harvey, which I think may help us among the Jews," and enclosing a copy for Taft's perusal. Roosevelt's missive also came with a cautionary note about campaign optics. "About your playing golf … I have received literally hundreds of letters from the West protesting about it," the president wrote. He advised Taft to delay his next eighteen holes until after election day.[29]

After the editor of Leslie's Weekly suggested to Roosevelt that Jewish support for the GOP was tepid, the president anxiously replied, "I am concerned at what you tell me as to the attitude of the Jews. My own information was that they were favorable.” TR speculated that Harvey’s “excellent” article had failed to reach a sufficient audience owing to a “lack of funds”—presumably from the Republican Party—that would have otherwise ensured its wide distribution.[30]

* * *

The battle for Jewish voters unexpectedly expanded to novel terrain in August: extradition. Previously, the topic hadn’t preoccupied American Jewry; the AJC’s request in May that Roosevelt void the extradition treaty with Russia was anomalous. Pogroms, passports, and literacy tests had been the focal points of Jewish activism. But in late summer 1908, extradition suddenly became a rallying cry.

The precipitating event was the extradition case of Jan Janoff Pouren. Hailing from the Latvian region of the Russian Empire, Pouren was a Gentile revolutionary who had agitated against the Russian authorities in 1906 before absconding to New York City. Russia requested his extradition in early 1908, and the State Department initiated the hearings that would decide Pouren’s fate. According to Russia, Pouren was a criminal guilty of theft, arson, and homicide. According to Pouren’s supporters, he was a humble peasant who had been forced to take up arms and defend his village against an unjust assault by Russian soldiers. His entire case turned on the distinction between these two perspectives. The governing treaty between Russia and America stipulated that criminals were subject to extradition but political refugees were not. If Pouren could demonstrate that his violent acts supported the revolutionary cause, then the U.S. government would have a legal basis to grant him asylum.[31]

Pouren’s case had been obscure until mid-August, when an American extradition commissioner ruled against him. The commissioner found that Pouren failed to furnish evidence that his activities had been related to political upheaval in Latvia. That ruling was not akin to a majority opinion on the Supreme Court, which binds the executive branch. Rather, the Roosevelt administration had discretion to accept or annul the commissioner’s decision.[32] As Pouren awaited an uncertain future, he remained locked up in a lower Manhattan prison nicknamed “The Tombs,” where he had resided since the extradition proceedings began seven months earlier.[33]

Pouren’s pending exile to Russia made national headlines. From Alaska to Alabama, newspapers decried Russia’s bid to wield the extradition treaty as a weapon of counterrevolution. One journalist explained that the ramifications of Pouren’s case were hardly limited to the “mild looking, fair-haired little peasant” facing the dismal prospect of czarist justice back home. The case instead raised the gravest of questions: “When fugitive militants … reach our shores and seek refuge in our cities, shall we act as sleuth and police for the czar and chase down these unfortunates?” At stake was America’s cherished status as a haven for political dissidents.[34]

Pouren wasn’t Jewish, but the implications for Jews were immense. Even as most Russian Jews weren’t revolutionaries, a number of Russian revolutionaries were Jews. Untold numbers of them who had fled Russian repression for American freedom might soon find themselves surrendered in shackles to their erstwhile oppressor. Unsurprisingly, then, American Jews were overrepresented in the movement to secure Pouren’s release. A call for a petition quickly circulated throughout the Lower East Side, announcing, “Our only hope is in President Roosevelt.”[35] Jews joined with Gentiles to form the Pouren Defense Conference, an ad hoc organization designed to orchestrate the campaign for his release. Its members hoped to exert pressure on the administration with a combination of grassroots activism and press coverage.[36]

Reputable outlets from the New York Times to The Nation proved eager to promote his cause. The Outlook—a popular weekly based in New York—asked pointedly, “Shall we return the fugitive to the torture chamber?”[37] That same day, Roosevelt alerted Secretary Root that the Pouren case was no ordinary matter. “The Outlook and all kinds of philanthropic bodies, not to speak of socialists and others, are very much interested,” Roosevelt relayed to Root. By “socialists” he meant Jews, at least partly; many Russian-Jewish émigrés had seen socialism as an answer to czarism in the Old World, and they retained their socialist leanings after immigrating to America. The president’s letter further stressed that Root himself should personally review the facts. “It is not a matter that should be handled … in a perfunctory way,” warned Roosevelt. “You should go over it carefully yourself” rather than rely on underlings in the State Department. TR was keen to “forestall action being taken without you or me knowing anything about it.” Roosevelt also divulged that a congressional ally, Herbert Parsons, had solicited him about the matter—not incidentally, as Parsons was serving as Pouren’s lead counsel.[38]

The following week, a boisterous crowd descended on Cooper Union, the celebrated East Side venue, at the initiative of the Pouren Defense Conference. “The great hall was packed in every nook and corner,” the New York Times observed, adding, “A good portion of those present were Jews.” One speaker elicited a notable reaction when he suggested that the czar wanted to replace the Statue of Liberty with a statue of a Russian soldier. When Congressman Parsons took the stage, he spelled out the collective consequences of Pouren’s individual fate: “The matter is of tremendous importance. It is a test case. If Pouren is extradited, there are thousands of men in this country who stand in Pouren’s shoes. The question is, ‘Are they safe here or not?’ I have an abiding faith that they are safe, and that Pouren is safe.” With this, the audience erupted into a proper frenzy.[39]

It took a few minutes for the crowd to calm itself before Rabbi David Blaustein, a Harvard-educated settlement house leader, could begin his remarks. Blaustein read aloud letters of support from preeminent Jews—like Jacob Schiff and Justice Greenbaum of the New York Supreme Court—and from an eclectic mix of Gentiles, including a trio of Christian clergymen, a socialist writer, and the president of City College. Resolutions against Pouren’s extradition, for submission to Roosevelt and the State Department, were offered for the throng’s approval. Well-nigh two thousand “ayes” rang out in unison. In one indicator of the robust Jewish presence that evening, two speeches were delivered in Yiddish.[40] Pouren, meanwhile, bided his time in a prison cell just a mile away.

Letters poured into the White House on his behalf, some signed by notable names of the era. The head of the American Federation of Labor, for instance, beseeched Roosevelt to intervene. So did the celebrated poet and octogenarian Julia Ward Howe, whose legendary lyrics “mine eyes have seen the glory” had been immortalized during the Civil War as an unofficial anthem by Union troops.[41] Roosevelt’s old college friend Lucius Littauer—a recently retired Jewish congressman—also penned a note to the president about Pouren’s cause.[42]

The celebrated Jewish reformer Lillian Wald was granted a personal audience with Roosevelt at the White House to discuss the matter. Recall that Wald had known Roosevelt since the 1890s, when he was the young police commissioner of New York and she the even younger founder of the Henry Street Settlement on the Lower East Side. Having dedicated her life to serving immigrants, Wald was a natural vessel for the anti-extradition message. She shared with Roosevelt a letter that she received from some of Pouren’s fellow revolutionaries who had fought alongside him and themselves relocated to America. They begged, “Do not let him fall into the hands of the bloodthirsty vampire.” To save Pouren’s neck, these refugees were willing to risk their own—they offered to give affidavits in his defense even though that would risk alerting Russia to their own “crimes” against the czar’s regime and thereby prompt extradition requests against them. Roosevelt assured Wald that any new affidavits would be duly considered.[43]

Happily for Pouren, his cause célèbre coincided with the height of a presidential campaign, a time when any administration is most likely to privilege electoral exigency over diplomatic delicacy.[44] A Republican paper in Massachusetts fretted about the party’s prospects at the ballot box should the Roosevelt administration fail to spare Pouren. His extradition would “raise such a tempest among the Jews and Russians of New York and Chicago that the Republican Party in November would be crushed beyond recognition.”[45] It required no great powers of prophecy to foresee the political blunder of permitting Russia to wage its reactionary war on American soil.

* * *

By late September, Roosevelt was pressing Root in his most vehement terms yet. TR wanted the commissioner’s ruling against Pouren overturned —immediately and publicly. “My judgment is very strong that we ought to refuse to deliver this man and that we ought to make [an] announcement now,” he implored Root. The president bemoaned that treaty obligations had put his administration in this difficult position, venting, “We never should have had an extradition treaty with Russia. Its conduct toward so-called political criminals is so inconceivably brutal and foolish.” Given that Russia was inveterately “indifferent to the truth,” Roosevelt felt that “we have no business to treat it as we do the average civilized nation.” He also drew a connection between passports and extradition: since Russia wouldn’t admit Jews, America shouldn’t relinquish Pouren. In the president’s words, Russia’s “consistent attitude in the matter of the passports is such as to justify us on that ground alone in refusing to perform such an act of mere international comity.”[46] The truth or falsehood of Russia’s allegations against Pouren was immaterial by that reasoning.

Roosevelt’s letter all but ordered Root to reverse the ruling. “Do go over the papers in this Pouren case carefully, and I will take it up with you,” he wrote. “I feel that it would be a good thing from every standpoint if we could at once announce that we do not intend to permit the man to be extradited.” Root surely understood that “every standpoint” included Taft’s ongoing race for the presidency. Roosevelt closed his letter with an affirmation of his own authority over the State Department: “I am informed that under the uniform practice of the Department, the whole matter, both as to law and facts, as to extradition cases of this kind, is vested in the president.” Root could not have missed the heavy-handed implication: if he failed to act, Roosevelt would.[47]

The argument against Pouren’s extradition soon received a boost. New affidavits from other revolutionaries—probably the self-same whom Lillian Wald had discussed with Roosevelt—swore to the political character of Pouren’s actions back in Latvia. His lawyers explained to Secretary Root that they had deliberately withheld testimony from these witnesses during their client’s extradition hearing for fear of placing them in danger of their own extraditions.[48] The president seized upon this favorable development to pressure Root yet again. “I enclose herewith a number of affidavits in the Pouren case,” Roosevelt wrote him in early October. “Unless controverted, these affidavits seem to establish clearly the fact that Pouren was a revolutionist and took an active part in the revolutionary troubles.” Pouren’s alleged acts were technically crimes, but they were in service of “the revolutionary proceedings and therefore political crimes,” reasoned Roosevelt. Given the president’s desire to rebuff Russia’s extradition request even before this evidence had surfaced, Root could now scarcely have been surprised by Roosevelt’s overdetermined conclusion: “Pouren’s case is one that comes directly under the clause of the treaty which forbids the extradition of political offenders.”[49]

Root forwarded the affidavits to the Russian embassy in Washington and invited a response.[50] As he waited, Jacob Schiff told Root that extradition would be a “terrible mistake.” Schiff alluded to electoral considerations in positing, “Public opinion will never approve the surrender of Pouren to Russia, but to the contrary will condemn such an act most harshly.” That same day, Roosevelt sent Root a trunk whose contents seemed to corroborate Schiff’s take. Inside were some seventy-thousand signatures—“a monster petition,” as the New York Times described it—that Congressman Parsons had passed along to the president.[51]

The Jewish community continued to call for the prisoner’s release. Sounding much like Roosevelt, the Hebrew Standard insisted, “If Pouren committed a crime it was executed in the name and because of humanity. He is neither more or less than a political prisoner; as such his right to asylum here should not be invaded.” The paper reflected the Jewish community at large in appreciating the broad stakes, acknowledging that Pouren’s removal from U.S. soil would mean “no Russian immigrant of recent arrival here is safe.” But the Hebrew Standard was optimistic: “America, we are sure, will not permit the czar’s myrmidons [i.e., unscrupulous subordinates] to capture their unfortunate quarry in this land of freedom.”[52] Notably, this vote of confidence came from a Democratic organ.

Two days later, Root heard from an official at the Russian embassy, Basile Kroupensky, who scoffed at the prospect of rebutting these new affidavits. “The embassy does not feel called upon to furnish any proof in addition to that already adduced before the [extradition] commissioner,” Kroupensky related. He noted that the legal process culminating in the commissioner’s ruling took eight months, more than enough time for Pouren’s lawyers to have produced the testimony. Kroupensky further emphasized that the prisoner’s legal team comprised “several experienced counsel” including a congressman; in other words, Pouren’s attorneys were sufficiently versed in the law to know that these new witnesses should have testified before the ruling. That the affidavits were forthcoming only afterward—argued Kroupensky—not only violated established legal norms but also weighed heavily against their credibility. He asserted that “universally accepted principles of law” ought to preclude Root from considering the affidavits at all in his review of the case.[53]

Under intense pressure from the public and the president alike, Secretary Root disregarded Kroupensky’s remonstrance and ordered the extradition commissioner to revisit the case in light of the new evidence. Root explained to the commissioner that although Pouren’s lawyers had wrongly withheld witness testimony during the hearings, the prisoner shouldn’t effectively “be punished for his counsel’s mistake.” The affidavits in question spoke directly to the potentially political nature of Pouren’s actions, and so “the plain intent of the treaty would fail if this evidence were now altogether excluded from consideration,” Root concluded.[54]

Roosevelt, meanwhile, searched for a means to free Pouren while the case was pending. “Why can’t we admit Pouren to bail?” the president asked Root. “Is it possible to do this? It would help a great deal if this could be done.” Indeed it would—the election was less than three weeks away. Apparently, Root proved unresponsive, as five days later Roosevelt wrote him again in emphatic terms, “Cannot we arrange at once to release Pouren on bail? Cannot this be done today or tomorrow? If he were an American citizen this would be done. Why discriminate against him because he is a political refugee from Russia?” An exasperated Roosevelt added for emphasis, “Oh, Lord!!”[55]

After several more days, Root finally acted. He superseded his earlier order for the extradition commissioner to reopen the case, announcing instead that the entire proceeding against Pouren was now dismissed “without prejudice”—meaning that Pouren’s case was no longer active, but

Russia remained free to submit a new extradition request, which would restart the hearing process from scratch.[56] Russia filed its new request immediately.[57] The practical consequence of these maneuvers was that, in late October, Pouren was released on the dismissal of his first case and rearrested moments later on the initiation of his second. "Free for a Minute," ran the headline in the Grand Rapids Press.[58] Contrary to Roosevelt's wishes, Pouren would remain confined to a prison cell. But Pouren did not face any immediate risk of being surrendered to the Russians, and he was poised to derive the benefit of exculpatory affidavits in the forthcoming proceedings. (Pouren's case would ultimately resolve shortly after Roosevelt's presidency, when the defendant was at last set free.[59])

If the provision of a new hearing for Pouren wasn't a total victory for the Republican administration, it was a victory nonetheless—and favorably situated on the calendar. The Fort Worth Telegram noted the auspicious timing: "On the eve of the presidential election, it is announced that Secretary Root has taken cognizance of the petition … to refuse the demand of Jan Janoff Pouren."[60] Meanwhile, the Hebrew Standard celebrated that Pouren thus far had evaded the vengeful claws of the bear. "We see signs which show that Russia's erstwhile dominance in this country is indeed a thing of the past," the paper remarked.[61] This reference to "signs" plural was well merited, for Pouren's chance at redemption was not the only recent indication of American resistance to Russian illiberalism.

* * *

In the latter half of October, as Pouren remained in legal limbo, Secretary Root curried favorable publicity on a different cause dear to Jewish voters. He sent a letter to Jacob Schiff—designed for circulation to the press and undoubtedly written at Roosevelt's behest—announcing a bolder stance from the administration on the Passport Question. Russia had long maintained that the Treaty of 1832 did not extend to Jews; America had long maintained that it did. Rather than endlessly recycle this decades-old dispute, the Roosevelt administration was now changing course. It had recently requested of the Russians “complete revision and amendment of the treaty,” Root informed Schiff. The United States would insist upon treaty terms that left no ambiguity about the “reciprocal rights of residence and travel” for American passport holders—be they Jew or Gentile, native or naturalized. Granted, this approach did not go as far as the AJC suggested, wherein America would unilaterally void the existing treaty to jolt Russia into concessions. Root explained that the AJC’s more aggressive tactic was ill-advised because it could result in a problematic interregnum between treaties during which all Americans and Russians lacked any rights whatsoever in the other nation. He closed the letter by assuring Schiff that “the administration is in full and sympathetic agreement with you” about passports.[62] After the letter’s expeditious dissemination to the papers, the Idaho Daily Statesman gave the story front-page coverage. The Dallas Morning News trumpeted, “New Treaty Is Favored to Protect Americans.” And the New York Times reprinted Root’s missive to Schiff in full.[63]

William Howard Taft aimed to build on this momentum when he barnstormed through Brooklyn in the waning days of the campaign. At a packed rally in Saenger Hall, Taft’s speech to a predominantly Jewish audience was preceded by an appearance from, of course, Oscar Straus. The first-ever Jewish cabinet member sparked an enthusiastic reception. With a portrait of Theodore Roosevelt in a Rough Riders hat hanging overhead, Straus lauded Taft as the man whom TR personally selected as his political heir. One journalist observed, “His first mention of the name of Roosevelt brought down the house.” Straus cast the matter of succession in Biblical terms: just as Elijah ascended to Heaven in a chariot of fire and Elisha picked up Elijah’s fallen mantle, so too would Taft carry on Roosevelt’s mission. When Taft finally took the stage, he declared to the throng—in a voice hoarse from overuse—that he would labor diligently to protect the authority of the U.S. passport the world over. The Republican nominee also cautioned with candor that he couldn’t promise results, but he vowed nonetheless “I shall give my very best energies” to the cause.[64]

Two days later, Taft was again courting New York Jewry, this time before a capacity crowd at the Thalia Theatre on Bowery Street in lower Manhattan. The venue housed a “typical East Side audience,” in the words of one reporter. Taft told the assemblage, “I almost think that an audience made up of people newly come to this country is more patriotic than the descendants of the Puritans [who] take so much for granted.”[65] He also reaffirmed his pledge to pressure Russia on passports. In Taft’s words, “Our passports certifying our citizenship should secure to every man, without regard to creed or race, the same treatment, the same equality of opportunity, in every nation on the globe.” And he once again demonstrated a keen awareness that his candidacy rested on Roosevelt’s presidency, calling on voters to “commend the administration of Theodore Roosevelt” by choosing himself to perpetuate the passport fight.[66]

This bid for the Jewish vote was hotly contested. The Democratic platform featured a plank on the Passport Question. Moreover, William Jennings Bryan—in his third stint as the Democratic nominee for the presidency—also earned good press by proposing that a rabbi serve among the chaplains at his party’s convention.[67] And late in the campaign, Bryan submitted a letter for publication to Cleveland’s Jewish Independent that insisted on the equal treatment of American citizens abroad. “I need hardly add that Russia is no exception,” he wrote, “and that an American Jew ought to have as full protection as Americans of any other race or religion.” That letter commanded attention beyond Ohio, eliciting coverage from St. Louis’s Jewish Voice and prompting a favorable headline in the New York Times: “Bryan Would Protect Jews.”[68]

But Bryan had longstanding vulnerabilities with Jewish voters. His 1896 race for the presidency left him on the defensive over accusations of antisemitism. In that campaign, which was animated by economic populism, Bryan delivered a stemwinder from the floor of the Democratic National Convention in which he railed against the gold standard for the U.S. dollar. “You shall not press down upon the brow of labor this crown of thorns,” he thundered. “You shall not crucify mankind upon a cross of gold.” These two phenomena—the Crucifixion and the gold standard—were often blamed on Jews, and Bryan here managed to conflate them in a single memorable breath.[69]

The New York Sun claimed that Bryan’s followers crossed the line into overt antisemitism. They reportedly yelled at that 1896 convention, “Down with gold! Down with the hook-nosed Shylocks of Wall Street! Down with the Christ-killing goldbugs!"[70] The Sun was a Republican paper and thus may have been exaggerating for political gain; either way, this news coverage could not have helped Bryan in Jewish precincts.[71]

Bryan's troubles in the 1896 cycle were exacerbated when he received—quite likely to his dismay—an enthusiastic endorsement from Hermann Ahlwardt, the invidious German Jew-hater whom Roosevelt as police commissioner had adroitly assigned thirty Jewish officers to protect in New York.[72] Bryan also found himself fending off accusations that his well-known criticism of the Rothschilds, a prominent Jewish banking family, meant that he harbored anti-Jewish bias.[73] There was, overall, much in his campaign that commended it to antisemites.

In his play for Jewish voters in 1908, Bryan could only do so much to reverse the damage of 1896. Moreover, his Christian fundamentalism surely held less appeal for many Jews than did Taft's liberal-minded Unitarianism. And Bryan lacked Taft's greatest asset: the incumbent president on his side. None of Bryan's backers were empowered to, say, coax the secretary of state to reverse an extradition ruling. Nor could any Bryan supporters initiate efforts to negotiate a new treaty with Russia that would honor Jewish-American rights. Roosevelt alone enjoyed the powers of the presidency, and in the waning weeks of the campaign he did not hesitate to wield them with Jewish voters in mind.

* * *

Election night for Taft—if not the once-in-a-century showing that Roosevelt had registered four years earlier—was a towering triumph in its own right. Taft won the popular vote by more than eight percentage points and racked up a nearly two-to-one margin in the Electoral College. His sweeping success across the North and West more than offset losses in Southern states, an echo of TR's own regional variations in 1904. Expressing "deep gratitude" to Roosevelt, the president-elect credited his nomination and victory to the current occupant of the Oval Office: "My selection and election are chiefly your work."[74]

Taft nearly matched Roosevelt’s 1904 results for the Empire State at large, but he vastly underperformed TR on the traditionally Democratic Lower East Side. Whereas Roosevelt had narrowly won East Siders, Taft lost them by fourteen points. That neighborhood’s sixteenth assembly district, which Roosevelt had carried by a handful of votes, now went to William Jennings Bryan by a twenty-five-point differential.[75] Comparing 1904 with 1908 demonstrates that Roosevelt’s historic success with East Side Jews had not marked the beginning of an enduring shift by Jewish immigrants to the GOP. Instead, it underscores that TR’s appeal on the Lower East Side was strikingly singular.

* * *

Roosevelt commenced the lame-duck stretch of his presidency with a public rebuke of religious bigotry. Large numbers of Americans, goaded by certain preachers and papers, had viewed Taft’s Unitarianism with contempt during the campaign. Because Unitarians rejected the divinity of Jesus Christ, Taft was essentially a nonbeliever in many Christian eyes. Rumors also circulated that Taft was a Catholic, or at least in league with Catholics, and possibly even beholden to the Pope.[76] In August, Taft predicted that this line of attack from his adversaries might actually endear him to voters who abhorred religious prejudice. “It might prove to be a sword cutting both ways, especially among the Jews,” he suggested to Roosevelt.[77] Taft was right. The Jewish paper Emanu-El exclaimed, “The whole matter is decidedly un-American, nay! It is positively anti-American.”[78] Even the Democratic Hebrew Standard came to Taft’s defense, reproaching hateful ministers for “sticking their clerical noses into politics.” These clergymen were nothing more than “bigots.”[79]

Roosevelt himself had been indignant about the infusion of religious intolerance into the race. In the campaign’s closing weeks, TR vented to Taft, “The attacks upon you by a certain type of small Protestant bigot are so infamous as to make my blood boil.”[80] But the president held his tongue and stayed his pen during the race—and advised Taft to do the same. After all, any defense of Taft’s religious background would amount to a concession that a candidate's faith should be subjected to political scrutiny.[81] With election day now behind them, Roosevelt felt free to publicly voice his long-suppressed ire.

He trained his righteous anger on a piano dealer in Ohio named J. C. Martin. Like many Americans, Martin had sent a letter to the president amid the campaign season disparaging Taft's religious affiliation. The piano dealer predicted, erroneously, that Taft would prove unelectable because he is an "infidel (Unitarian) and his wife and brother [are] Roman Catholics." (In fact, neither Taft's wife nor his brothers were Catholic.) Roosevelt's post-election reply to Martin was scathing—and widely distributed to newspapers. "I received many such letters as yours," the president wrote him. "I did not answer any of these letters during the campaign because I regarded it as an outrage even to agitate such a question as a man's religious convictions, with the purpose of influencing an election." In response to Martin's insistence that Taft expose his religious beliefs for public examination, Roosevelt retorted, "It is a matter between him and his Maker, a matter for his own conscience; and to require it to be made public under penalty of political discrimination is to negative the first principles of our government, which guarantee complete religious liberty, and the right to each man to act in religious affairs as his own conscience dictates." This comment reflected not only the free exercise clause in the First Amendment but also the Constitution's explicit ban on religious tests for federal office.[82]

The president's letter to Martin venerated the religious variety in his administration, nodding to Oscar Straus's trailblazing role. "In my cabinet at the present moment there sit side-by-side Catholic and Protestant, Christian and Jew," he proudly boasted. Lest anyone think these appointees were tapped because of their identity rather than their merit, Roosevelt quickly added that all of them had been selected based on their fitness for office. Diversity of faith could also be found among elected officials, he noted. Whereas Martin had expressly doubted that Americans would vote for a Unitarian, TR highlighted the routine election of candidates who differed in creed from most of their constituents. "By their very existence in political life, they refute the slander you have uttered against your fellow Americans," he seethed. "I knew particularly well … one man of Jewish faith who represented a district in which there were hardly any Jews at all"—this was an allusion to Roosevelt's college friend Lucius Littauer, whose rural district in upstate New York sent him to Congress five times. Roosevelt made a bold prediction about the liberality of America's electorate: "I believe that this Republic will endure for many centuries. If so, there will doubtless be among its presidents Protestants and Catholics, and, very probably at some time, Jews."[83] From Montana to Georgia, newspapers nationwide reprinted Roosevelt's letter on page 1.[84]

TR's frequent reference to Jewry in the letter is noteworthy. Plainly, he appreciated that if prejudice were to prevail against a Unitarian, all the more tenuous was the religious freedom of a Jew. American Jews understood this grim fact—and thus understood the significance of Roosevelt's letter for their own community. A Midwestern rabbi urged his congregants during a sermon, "If you have missed that letter, you should procure it and put it away among your most valuable family papers, to be bequeathed to your children."[85] An editorial in Emanu-El emphasized the letter's timing—that is, after the election—when Roosevelt's words could not be dismissed as a mere gambit for votes: "This expression of the president is no campaign document." It was, rather, a heartfelt pronouncement that rebutted "narrow-minded church bigots who would drag religion into politics."[86] Excited by Roosevelt's prediction of a Jewish head of state, Philadelphia's Jewish Exponent marveled at "the president's implied prophecy that Seder may be observed in the White House at some future day."[87] Notably, the Democratic-leaning Hebrew Standard printed a letter praising Roosevelt's response to Martin for its "undiluted Americanism."[88] Simon Wolf, the former president of B'nai B'rith, told Roosevelt, "Not a single act of yours will redound more to your glory and fame than the letter you have just written on religious liberty."[89]

⋆⋆⋆

Roosevelt spent his final morning as president hosting Taft for breakfast. The night before, a gentle snow had begun falling on Washington; by morning, blizzard-like conditions took hold. Armed with an umbrella and galoshes, Roosevelt emerged from the White House and boarded his horse-drawn carriage with his successor seated beside him. Some spectators trudged through three inches of slush on Pennsylvania Avenue to catch glimpses of the presidential pair en route to the Capitol.[90]

The ill-timed snowstorm brought Washington to a halt. Trains, trolleys, and telegraphs were all inoperable.[91] Taft's inauguration was forced to relocate from the publicly viewable Capitol steps to the seclusion of the Senate chamber, gravely disappointing the crowd on hand that had braved the weather.[92] Roosevelt enthusiasts had reason to cheer, however, once the inauguration concluded. He emerged from the Capitol to find an enthusiastic "marching club"—numbering nearly one thousand Republicans from New York—who had been patiently waiting to escort the former president's carriage to the train station. As Roosevelt and the marching club began the half-mile journey, a band played the somber tune "Auld Lang Syne," which seemed to capture the wistful mood in the air. The New York Times reported, "The whole mass of humanity that detached itself from the sea of faces around the Capitol to see the last of the retiring president moved on to the rise and fall of the song." Even the congenitally jovial Roosevelt grew pensive as the melancholic notes rang out. But spirits were soon lifted when the band transitioned to an upbeat number, "There'll Be a Hot Time in the Old Town Tonight." By the close of that second song, the procession reached the newly opened Union Station, an architectural wonder of its day. TR alighted from his carriage, and the marchers mobbed the ex-president in search of a handshake. Roosevelt managed to oblige a fortunate few in his immediate proximity before retiring to the station's waiting room to reunite with his family members. Finally, at 3:26 p.m., Roosevelt's train departed Washington and headed north to Oyster Bay. The man who had reshaped the presidency, and with it the nation, was once more a common citizen.[93]

* * *

The following day, the Jewish newspaper Emanu-El featured a retrospective on Roosevelt's tenure at the White House. "Even Roosevelt's severest critic must confess that he accomplished considerable [deeds] for the country and the world," Emanu-El remarked. The paper deemed him a "great leader" but acknowledged he wasn't quite a Lincoln or a Washington. Rehearsing Roosevelt's record on Jewish issues, Emanu-El found cause for celebration and frustration alike.[94]

That postpresidential assessment—upholding Roosevelt as worthy of admiration but still finding some fault—aptly epitomized the Jewish experience with him. With the Romanian Note and Kishinev Petition, he demonstrated a willingness to bend or even break diplomatic norms in defense of Jewry overseas. Roosevelt also repeatedly pressured Russia to respect the passports of his own Jewish constituents. Moreover, his administration extolled America as a political asylum for the world's persecuted, refusing to extradite a dissident refugee to the czar's clutches. Roosevelt consistently used the most visible means available—State of the Union messages, the GOP platform, his nomination acceptance—to champion Jewish causes. And he took an unprecedented measure in American history: the elevation of a Jew to the cabinet. For all these efforts, Jewish voters rewarded Roosevelt with historic support at the ballot box.

But Roosevelt's ties to Jewry sometimes frayed. During Russia's appalling bloodbath in 1905, the telegraph wires from Washington to St. Petersburg hardly hummed. Roosevelt defended his inaction, insisting that a diplomatic push for Jewish rights would be futile amid the anarchy. For many American Jews, however, Roosevelt's strategic inertia felt cruelly tepid in the face of mass slaughter. If that nonintervention marked a low point for Roosevelt-Jewish relations, it wasn't the only moment of strain. Roosevelt endorsed a literacy test for aspiring immigrants, to the chagrin of his Jewish allies. Limiting the influx of newcomers, he argued, would ease the burden on those already crammed into urban slums. Roosevelt's Jewish friends tried to dissuade him, but to no avail.

His complicated history with Jewry reflected the countervailing forces acting on him at any given time. Roosevelt often found himself caught between humanitarian crisis and diplomatic protocol, between philosemites and antisemites, between pluralism and assimilation. These tensions bespoke the complexities of the moment—and of the man. After all, Roosevelt was famously rife with incongruities. Here was the East Coast aristocrat who became a Dakota cowboy; the bookish intellectual who threw punches in the boxing ring; the combat-thirsty colonel who won a Nobel Peace Prize. There was perhaps no more fitting representative of a nation riddled with its own irresolvable contradictions.

OceanofPDF.com

EPILOGUE

Theodore Roosevelt remains the youngest person to claim the White House and the youngest to leave it. He emerged from office only fifty years old and brimming with energy. In the decade that followed, Roosevelt rarely took a beat. He ventured a treacherous exploration of the Amazon. He dined with royals in the palaces of Europe. He launched a third party—nicknamed the Bull Moose Party—in a bold bid to recapture the Oval Office. His legendary efforts in that race included delivering a stump speech after taking a bullet from a would-be assassin. Roosevelt lost that election but not his life. Even when TR wasn’t on a ballot, Americans were seldom left to wonder what their former president thought of current events; he published editorials, essays, and books at an astounding rate. Roosevelt was still very much the man in the arena.

Amid this afterlife of his administration, he deepened his engagement with Jewish people and Jewish causes. The same issues that had preoccupied American Jewry during his presidency persisted thereafter: persecution abroad, immigration at home, and antisemitism on both sides of the Atlantic. Roosevelt was alive to these challenges. He weighed in on them routinely in public addresses and private correspondence. As with his presidential years, Roosevelt’s standing with his Jewish fellow citizens depended on the moment. More often than not he earned their adoration; sometimes he elicited their consternation. The story of Roosevelt and the Jewish community in this postpresidential period is so rich that it merits a book all its own.[1] But suffice it to say that Jews played a significant role in his journey until the very end—an end that came far sooner than the world expected.

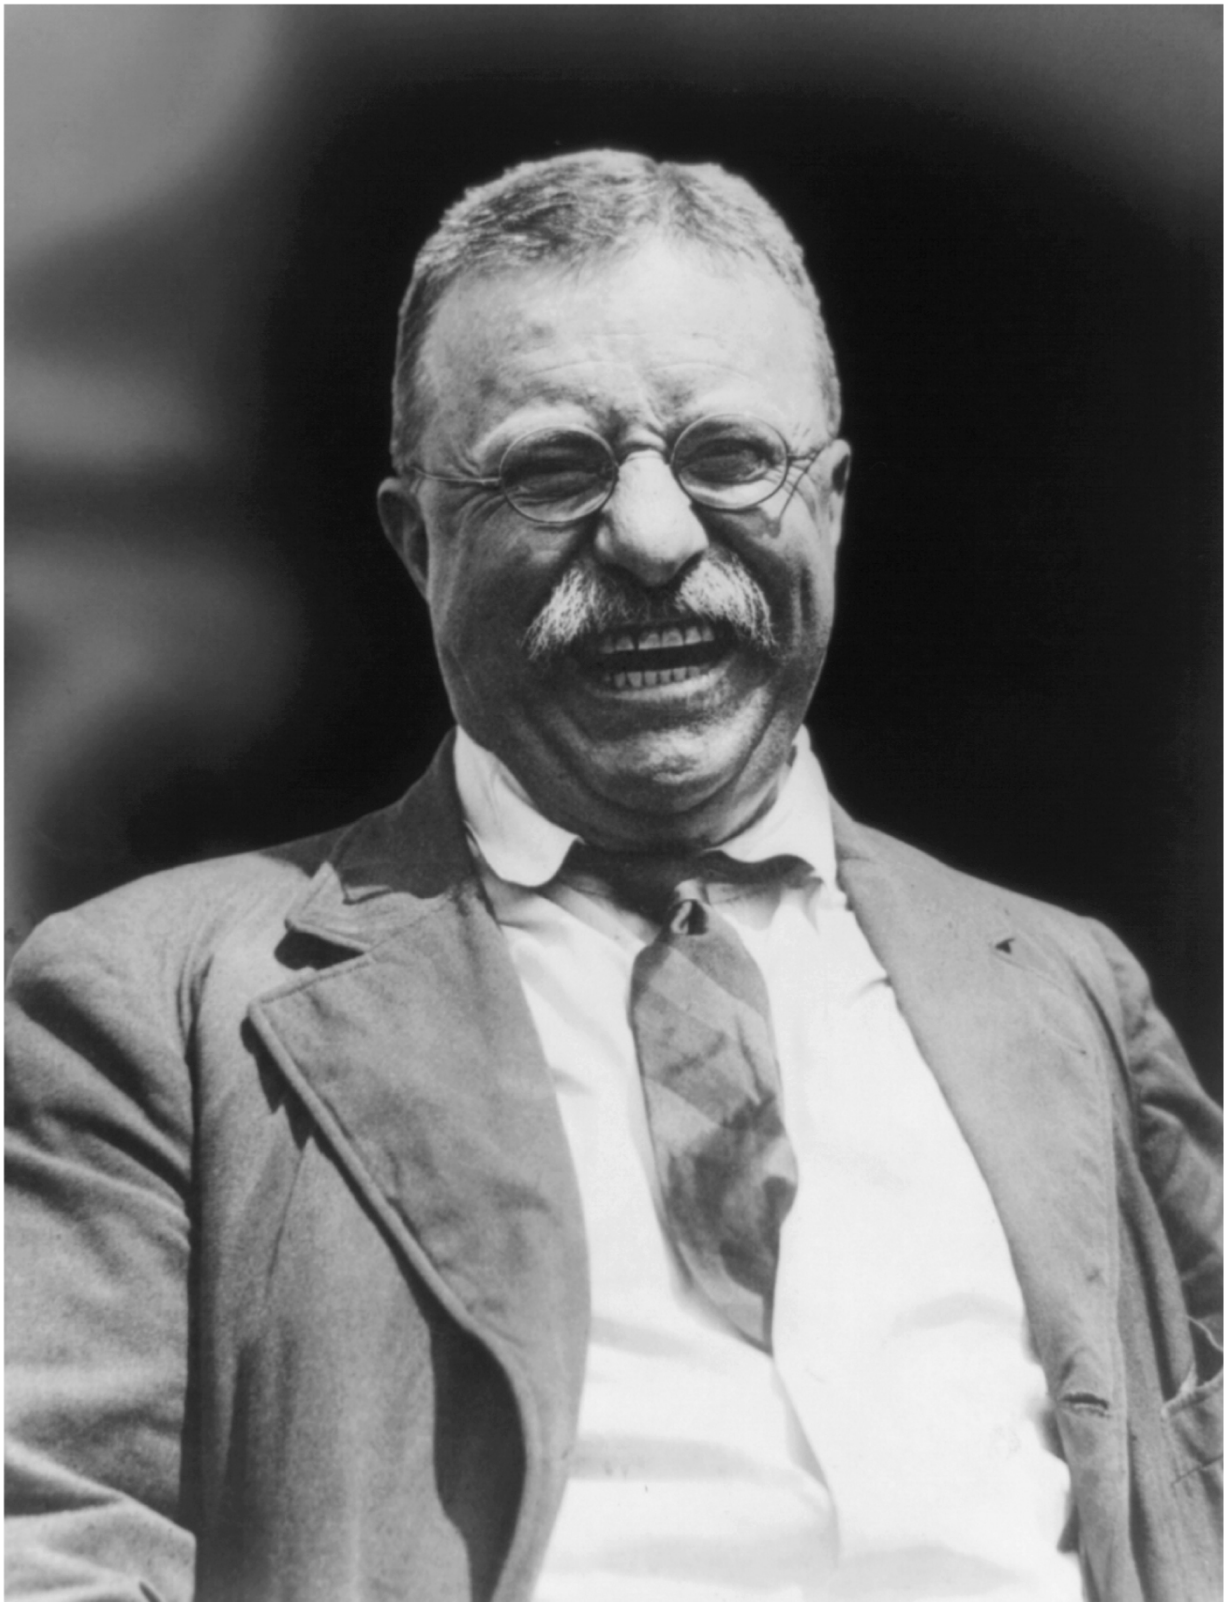

FIGURE 9.1. Theodore Roosevelt in his post-presidency. Source: Library of Congress, Prints and Photographs Division.

On Christmas Eve, 1918, Roosevelt was discharged from the hospital after receiving treatment for inflammatory rheumatism. His prognosis was largely favorable, even if total recovery seemed unlikely. He plunged himself into writing after the new year, dictating pieces for Metropolitan Magazine and the Kansas City Star. But the first weekend of January had been a fitful one for Roosevelt. He told his wife that Sunday evening before bed that something felt amiss. The next day, Roosevelt's youngest son telegraphed his two older brothers: "The old lion is dead."[2]

* * *

As word spread from Sagamore Hill to the farthest reaches of the country, Americans were stunned by the sudden news of Roosevelt's demise.[3] Here was the Rough Rider who braved Spanish snipers unscathed, the Bull Mooser who campaigned with a bullet freshly lodged in his chest, the ex-president who improbably survived a perilous journey through the Brazilian jungle. And yet, for all Roosevelt's seeming invincibility, the life had quietly slipped from his body amid the calm slumber of a winter's night. "Death had to take Roosevelt sleeping, for if he had been awake there would have been a fight," the sitting vice president mused.[4]

At the spare funeral in Oyster Bay that could accommodate limited numbers, the exclusive guest list included the giants of American politics. There was Roosevelt's ally-turned-adversary William Howard Taft; his old confidant Senator Henry Cabot Lodge; and the imperious House Speaker "Uncle Joe" Cannon. Oscar Straus, besieged with grief, was of course in attendance. After a brief church service, the mourners adjourned to a nearby cemetery for the burial. Roosevelt had long ago chosen his resting place atop a hill that featured spectacular views and birdsong melodies. Six pallbearers labored mightily to lift the flag-draped coffin up a steep incline that was slick with snow.[5] That grueling final act was a fitting tribute to the man whose appetite for "the strenuous life" had been famously insatiable.[6]

For every individual on hand that day in Oyster Bay, millions more paid their respects from afar. Roosevelt's hometown of New York shut down to mark his passing—from schools and subways to firehouses and factories, a reverential stillness replaced the typical commotion. Further afield in the nation's capital, Congress and the Supreme Court suspended their proceedings. And in American military outposts the world over, the armed forces honored their former commander-in-chief by firing shots every thirty minutes from dawn until dusk. Nor were lamentations limited to Roosevelt's compatriots. Amid the capitals of war-torn Europe, orators gave homage to his legacy. Westminster Abbey even took the unprecedented measure of forgoing its evening service and holding a memorial ceremony.[7]

⋆⋆⋆

American Jews felt the loss deeply, especially those whose lives had been directly touched by Roosevelt. "He was the most encouraging person that ever breathed," remarked Edna Ferber, a Jewish novelist he had warmly buoyed.[8] Rabbi Joseph Krauskopf, who had once communed in Cuba with Roosevelt and his Jewish troops, arranged for his synagogue to install a stained-glass window commemorating the colonel.[9] Meanwhile, the Jewish Welfare Board—which Roosevelt had gifted a generous portion of his Nobel Prize cash award—organized a day of mourning for its constituent chapters throughout the country.[10]

Countless other Jewish Americans, who had never met the man, nursed hearts heavy with sadness. From synagogue pews, they heard sermons cataloguing Roosevelt's service to their people. Jewish newspapers published paeans to his conviction in religious equality. "Jewish immigrants had no better friend than Theodore Roosevelt," declared the B'nai B'rith Messenger. "He ever championed their cause." The Hebrew Standard, a Democratic organ that had often found fault with Roosevelt in his lifetime, now conceded after his passing that he was "the greatest of our fellow-citizens." Through these exercises in remembrance, Jews nationwide became reacquainted with the many chapters of Roosevelt's Jewish story: Police Commissioner Roosevelt's clever decision to guard an antisemite with thirty Jewish officers; Colonel Roosevelt's dogged fighting in Cuba alongside his Jewish volunteers; and above all President Roosevelt's defiant stands against Jewish suffering overseas.

As might be expected in the midst of mourning, Jewish commentators passed silently over Roosevelt’s strained moments with their community. No rabbis reminded their congregants of his muted response when the pogrom wave crested in Russia. No Jewish editors prompted their readers to recall Roosevelt’s support for a literacy test that would have barred a quarter of Jewish refugees. No Jewish memorial services recollected his enthusiasm for an assimilationist play that Jews themselves roundly condemned for seeming to promote Jewish self-extinction. Undoubtedly, Roosevelt was beloved by his Jewish constituents, but that love was never blind to his flaws, real or perceived.

* * *

Roosevelt ascended to the White House in the throes of a great national transformation. Once a fragile new republic committed to neutrality abroad, America was becoming a global player that projected its power well beyond its borders. Once a young country where Anglo-Saxons predominated, America increasingly saw its streets packed with strange newcomers speaking in alien tongues. In short, America was coming to the world, and the world was coming to America.

But the path to modernity wasn’t smoothly paved. Roosevelt found himself navigating foreign resistance to American intervention and domestic anxiety about immigration. The Jewish challenges confronting him—from massacres to migration—assumed outsized importance in American political life because they threw into vivid relief just how rapidly the country had grown daring in its external engagement and diverse in its internal composition. His mixed approach to Jewish affairs aptly reflected a nation uncertain of its own destiny. Would the United States prove wary of crises abroad and suspicious of fresh arrivals to its shores? Or would the country embrace the forces of globalization that were collapsing vast distances between the Old World and the New? Roosevelt’s checkered answer was of no small moment. At stake for America was nothing less than its very self-conception; at stake for untold Jews was nothing less than their very survival.

* * *

The night before Roosevelt's funeral, his corpse lay in the trophy room of Sagamore Hill. He had asked a friend to design the room as an addition to the home, and Roosevelt thrilled to its completion halfway through his presidency. "You cannot imagine how delighted I am with the new room," he told the architect, adding, "Really, I like it better than any room in the White House which, as you know, is my standard of splendor!" Guests would descend from a raised platform down several steps into the trophy room, whose wood paneling and animal skins lent it the unmistakable air of a hunting lodge. The room was appropriately named—its various trophies, gifts, and mementos reflected Roosevelt's many sides. The buffalo head signified Roosevelt, the hunter. The Rough Rider saber represented Roosevelt, the soldier. And the golden eagle mounted between the windows symbolized Roosevelt, the patriot.[11]

A tradition common to Christianity and Judaism alike calls on the living to watch over the dead before burial. And as Roosevelt's corpse passed this final night in the trophy room, only one person was permitted to keep vigil over the body. That honor didn't fall to any of the famous personages who had populated his life, nor to the best man at his wedding, nor even to his eldest child. In these small hours, as the world slept, Roosevelt's sole companion was a Russian-Jewish immigrant: Otto Raphael.[12]

Recall that Roosevelt and Raphael met decades earlier, when Roosevelt had just taken over New York's police department and Raphael was a young man working at his family's failing meat market on the Lower East Side. Raphael was introduced to Roosevelt as the neighborhood hero who had rescued people from a burning building. With this, Roosevelt recruited him to the police force. The two became sparring partners in the boxing ring and ultimately developed a lifelong relationship. To be sure, the differences between them were striking—the one, a strictly kosher Russian Jew raised in the East Side slums; the other, a silver-spooned cowboy with Dutch blood and a Harvard diploma. But Roosevelt treated Raphael as an equal. It couldn't have been lost on Raphael that back in the czar's dominions he might have been savagely slaughtered, but in the United States he could keep company with an American president.

Theodore Roosevelt was an imperfect leader of an imperfect nation. Yet he fervently believed—when many others didn't—that the likes of Otto Raphael made America a better place. On that last evening in Sagamore Hill, amid a trophy room adorned with the tokens of feats and fame, there could be no finer symbol of the very best in Roosevelt than this final farewell between two faithful friends.

OceanofPDF.com

Preface

I have felt a fond attachment for New Orleans ever since my friend and teacher Rabbi Julian B. Feibelman of Temple Sinai first introduced me to its charm almost thirty years ago. Three years later, at the behest of beloved Myra and Bernard H. Eichhold, I assumed rabbinical leadership of my first congregation—Shaaray Shomayim of Mobile, Alabama. At least once a month my friend Joseph Bear would take me with him to New Orleans on some excuse or other. On none of those visits in 1940 or 1943 did it ever occur to me that I would become involved in this study of the beginnings of Jewish life in New Orleans.

Over the years of my research into various aspects of American Jewish history, I had touched on themes of importance to New Orleans: the nature of Judah P. Benjamin's feelings about Judaism; Judah Touro's strange indifference to his religion until the last years of his life; Benjamin Levy's pioneering career as a bookseller, printer and publisher. But as a matter of simple fact, I never intended to write this book.

Some years ago I began to assemble material for a study of Jewish life in the ante-Bellum South; a monograph on Jews and Slavery in the Old South was one product of that effort. As I surveyed the available resources, I discovered that very little thorough research had been done into the earliest periods of New Orleans Jewish history, and I decided that I would have to do some basic digging myself. I presumed that little would be found, but I had to make certain. Much to my astonishment, the more deeply I delved, the more I uncovered—a host of early Jewish settlers who were totally unknown to those who had previously written brief essays on Jewish life in the city; a number of colorful personages who fascinated me so profoundly that I had no alternative but to try to learn more about their experiences; and some distinctive, perhaps unique, aspects of Jewish life in the community—or better, accounting for the lack of a sense of community before 1827–28—which struck me as being worth more than brief reference in a larger framework.

I was, then, ambushed into writing this book. This research has taken an inordinate amount of time, and yet it has given me more pleasure than any other work I have essayed. This is partly because I have made so many friends in the process—hundreds of librarians, scholars, students, researchers and just plain people, who have generously contributed material to these pages, or have helped me to find it. Had I lived in New Orleans this work would have been finished in one-quarter of the time. Much of the hunt had to be carried on through correspondence, microfilms, photocopies and notes made by research assistants. But on a number of occasions it was my privilege to be able to work in New Orleans libraries, museums and depositories of historic materials. These trips brought me the great pleasure of spending time with my colleagues Rabbis Julian B. Feibelman and Leo A. Bergman, and with my friends Dorothy and Shepard Shushan, in whose lovely home I was so warmly welcomed and permitted to make my New Orleans headquarters. To them and to all the others who have helped with hospitality, encouragement and information—whose names I have tried to list in the Acknowledgements—I offer my sincere appreciation.

The first and second drafts of this book were written during the summers of 1966 and 1967 in the hospitable surroundings of the American Jewish Archives at the Hebrew Union College in Cincinnati, while I was given time off by my long-suffering but sympathetic congregation. The rich collections which my beloved teacher, Professor Jacob Rader Marcus, has assembled at the Archives during the twenty years which have passed since its foundation, made it possible for me to do much checking and doublechecking while engaged in the writing process. The staff of the Archives exemplifies the highest standards of helpfulness which a research institute can offer. My thanks go as always to Professor Marcus for his unfailing encouragement and assistance as I struggled with knotty problems of synthesis and narrative.

I know that some members of my congregation have thought at times that I dwelt in the past as much as in the present. All the more am I gratified that they have indulged my research and detective work so uncomplainingly. They have afforded me the widest latitude in pursuing my second career as a student of history. They even provided me with a former president, Mr. Charles C. Pollack, who helped to translate some of the myriad of French documents with which I have had to deal.

Two other men rate a special word of gratitude: Professor Jack D. L. Holmes of the University of Alabama at Birmingham, and Mr. Winston De Ville of Alexandria and Chapel Hill. Dr. Holmes has constantly placed at my disposal his rich knowledge of the Spanish colonial period of Louisiana, and Mr. De Ville, the most ubiquitous student of French archival resources in all of Louisiana, has hunted far and wide to help me locate elusive pieces of isolated information. Both of these friends and co-workers have helped me to achieve an intimate comprehension of the colonial period. For the later, American period, I have been ably helped by Mr. and Mrs. H. L. Forsyth, dedicated students of Louisiana genealogy and joyous friends to all who are interested in New Orleans history, who always seemed to be able to come up with a new lead whenever I ran into a deadend. An entire section of Acknowledgements lists the names of the innumerable folk who have assisted in the research for this volume. Mention must be made here, however, of these: Mrs. Michell Jacques, who typed the original manuscript and has proof-read the book into print; Mrs. Herbert Greenspan, Miss Imelda McGonigle, Mrs. Leonard Sarner and Mrs. Hyman Penn, my secretaries, who participated in its preparation in many ways; my colleague, Rabbi Abraham I. Shinedling, who helped me get the manuscript ready for the press and has prepared the index; Bernard Wax, the Director of the American Jewish Historical Society, who has shown devoted interest in the success of this project; and Dr. Maurice Jacobs, my friend, the printer, who cares about the book as much as I do.

My choice of a biographical rather than a thematic approach was made somewhat reluctantly. It would have been far easier to have described the activities of these New Orleans people in terms of the various categories of life—economic, political, social, cultural, etc.—pursuing a comparative method. But the clarity achieved by this sort of treatment would have blurred the view of them as whole persons and as members of families, which I have attempted to achieve. Because they were, in such large measure, isolated persons rather than members of a Jewish community, it seemed to me essential to present them as distinct individuals. I have reverted to the thematic approach only in regard to their religious views and practices because here, as a group, they offer a sort of case study in the tension between accommodation and continuity which underlies all of American Jewish history.

My terminus ad quem requires some explanation to those who will be scandalized that I have not attempted to delineate in any great detail the experiences of the New Orleans Jewish community beyond the 1840's. Although I do devote some attention to the life stories of some early Jews who lived even into the 1890's, and much effort to the attempt to achieve an understanding of Judah Touro's later years, my primary concern has been with the origins of the community, the tracing of the story up to the point somewhere in the late 1830's or early 1840's when New Orleans began more closely to resemble other Jewish communities throughout America. Some aspects of distinctiveness did continue—a higher rate of intermarriage; a greater number of transients; a more urgent need for institutions like the Touro Infirmary and the Jewish Widows' and Orphans' Home; a lengthy delay in the creation of a genuine Reform congregation—but most developments in New Orleans can best be understood in relation to those in other major communities in the South and throughout the nation. If God spares me, I still hope to move on to an evaluation of the nature of Jewish life in the South prior to the outbreak of the Civil War. In such a study, more can be said about the further growth of New Orleans Jewry than would have meaning here.

One further explanation is in order: I was altogether astonished at the mountain of material about the Monsanto family which turned up in the later years of my research. I had presumed, without justification, that others had worked exhaustively in colonial Louisiana materials and had found nothing about early Jews.

The Monsanto story is another reason for the distinctiveness of the New Orleans Jewish community's origins; it is altogether different from Jewish experiences in the British colonial areas on the Atlantic coast. And I am equally grateful that the pursuit of the Monsanto family into British West Florida records revealed so much additional material about the first Jewish settlers in my old Southern home, Mobile.

Ordinarily a work like this would be accompanied by a formal and formidable bibliography, but I believe that this would be unnecessary. A collation of all of the manuscript and published sources to which reference is made in the notes would simply add to the length of the book, but would serve no useful purpose; nor could a bibliography legitimately include all of the thousands of books and pamphlets whose pages I have turned in the vain hope of discovering some reference to my people. Suffice it to say that I have hunted for material in every logical or illogical source noted in the standard Louisiana bibliographies; turned cards in the catalogue of every major library in the New Orleans area; and read through every available issue of New Orleans newspapers, in the original form or on microfilm, from the earliest issue to the end of 1842. I have preferred to concentrate my attention on the notes, some of which are, perhaps, too tightly packed with detailed information; but I should not want any fellow researcher to miss any hint of a detail which I have succeeded in discovering. The course over which I have plodded has been too arduous for me to refrain from sharing anything that I have found.

Although I have attempted to exploit relevant source materials with as much thoroughness as possible, New Orleans possesses an embarrassment of manuscript riches. The Notarial Archives, in particular, are incredibly informative. It would take most of the rest of my life to search through every notarial volume in the basement of the Civil District Court Building in New Orleans for additional data about the life of these people whom I call "my people" because I feel as though I have brought them back to life. But I do not think that additional years of such research would change very much in this volume, although a great deal of specific data, particularly about the business careers of some of my dramatis personae, would indeed be of interest. I hope that some candidates for master's and doctor's degrees in Louisiana universities will undertake further research along these lines. It will undoubtedly be illuminating.

Even more to the point are the similar records in parish (the Louisiana equivalent of county) court houses throughout the state, which I have not even seen, let alone searched. Rural Louisiana presents yet another challenge to students of local Jewish history. I am certain that much new material about Jews during the period from 1810 to 1840 will be uncovered in such caches of manuscripts.

Basically I conceive of this book as the story of people, not just any people, but people who are—were—part of the People Israel, the People of mystery, of pain, of hope. Always an enigma to others as well as to themselves, these who belonged to the People Israel fled through the night, over continents, and across the ocean, in search of freedom, opportunity and self-realization. In the process of flight and settlement, many of them lost their sense of relatedness to the People Israel, and abandoned their personal identity as Jews, but even this was part of the search. Many had endured too much to be content any longer to be regarded as inferiors—in an age when the Jewish religion had not yet found a way of surviving in the modern world. If they wanted to forget that they were Jews, we can understand even that. But though individuals may end their search on bypaths, the People itself persists, rediscovers itself, renews itself. Despite every obstacle, challenge, danger and difficulty, somehow Israel manages to survive to face another day, and even finds it possible to live creatively and to wring a blessing from the Most High.

B.W.K.

Wyncote, Pa.
April 1, 1969.

Chronology

1718	Founding of New Orleans by the French.
1754–63	French and Indian War, between France (joined in 1761 by Spain) and England, the American colonial equivalent of the European Seven Years' War (1756–63).
1762	Treaty of Fontainebleau (November 3), by which France ceded New Orleans and the Louisiana colonial area west of the Mississippi River to Spain, as compensation for Spain's impending loss of Florida to Great Britain.
1763	Treaty of Paris (February 10), ending the Seven Years' War and France's colonial empire on the American continent. French Louisiana east of the Mississippi was surrendered to the British; this area included the lower third of the present states of Mississippi and Alabama. The British divided their new possessions, French eastern Louisiana and Spanish Florida, into British West and East Florida.
1766	Arrival in New Orleans of the first Spanish governor, Antonio de Ulloa.
1769	Arrival in New Orleans of the second Spanish governor, General Alejandro O'Reilly.
1779	Capture of Baton Rouge, Manchac and Natchez from the British by the Spanish under Governor Bernardo de Gálvez.
1780	Capture of Mobile by Gálvez.
1781	Capture of Pensacola by Gálvez.
1800	Treaty of San Ildefonso (October 1), by which Spain ceded New Orleans and Louisiana west of the Mississippi to France. Formal transfer November 30, 1803.
1803	Louisiana Purchase Treaty between the United States and France (April 30). Formal transfer December 20, 1803.
1810	Revolt of West Florida settlers in the Baton Rouge area against Spain (September 23) and annexation of the area by the United States (October 27).

New Orleans was French from 1717 to 1766; Spanish from 1766 to November 30, 1803; French from November 30, 1803, to December 20, 1803; American from December 20, 1803.

Baton Rouge was French from 1717 to 1763; British from 1763 to 1779; Spanish from 1779 to 1810; American from 1810.

Mobile was French from its founding in 1702 to 1763; British from 1763 to 1780; Spanish from 1780 to 1813, when it was seized by the United States, which had claimed it since 1803.

Pensacola was Spanish from about 1699 to 1763; British from 1763 to 1781; Spanish from 1781 to 1814, when it was taken over briefly by the British before Andrew Jackson seized it for the United States.

List of Illustrations

1. Home of Sir Salomon de Medina (David Monsanto's Employer), The Hague
   (Copyright Meijer, The Hague)
2. The Hague Synagogue in which the Monsanto Family Worshipped
   (Copyright Meijer, The Hague)
3. First Page of 1765 Monsanto Legal Réponse, New Orleans
   Courtesy of the University of Texas Library
4. Angélica Monsanto Dow
   Portrait by José de Salazar
   Courtesy of Miss Anne Urquhart, Mrs. George Warren and the Frick Art Reference Library
5. Angélica's Husband, Dr. Robert Dow
   Watercolor by Unknown Artist
   Courtesy of Dean Kenneth Trist Urquhart
6. Angélica's Elder Son, Thomas Urquhart
   Portrait by José de Salazar
   Courtesy of Miss Anne Urquhart, Mrs. George Warren and the Frick Art Reference Library
7. Angélica's Younger Son, David Urquhart
   Bust by Hiram Powers
   Courtesy of Dean Kenneth Trist Urquhart and the Delgado Museum of Art
8. Judah Touro
   Daguerreotype
   Courtesy of the American Jewish Historical Society
9. Judah Touro
   Portrait by Solomon Nunes Carvalho
   Courtesy of the Touro Infirmary
10. Touro's Friend, Rezin Davis Shepherd
    Portrait by Gilbert Stuart
    Courtesy of Mrs. Richard M. Saltonstall and the Frick Art Reference Library

11. BARNETT'S OLD SLAVE BLOCK
Courtesy of Professor Samuel B. B. Carleton

12. MAURICE BARNETT SELLS SOME SLAVES
Bee, November 1, 1839

13. BARNETT REAL ESTATE AUCTION BROADSIDE
Author's Collection

14. SAMUEL HERMANN, SR.
Portrait by Vaudechamp
Courtesy of Mr. James Reiss

15. MARIE EMERONTHE BECNEL BROU HERMANN
Portrait by Vaudechamp (?)
Courtesy of Mr. Pierre A. de Tarnowsky

16. SAMUEL HERMANN, JR.
Portrait by Vaudechamp
Courtesy of Dr. George de Tarnowsky

17. THE SAMUEL HERMANN HOME IN NEW ORLEANS
Courtesy of Stuart Lynn and Mr. James Reiss

18. GARDEN PATIO OF THE HERMANN HOME
Courtesy of Leon Trice Photography

19. SAMUEL KOHN
Portrait by Unknown Artist
Courtesy of Mr. Maunsel White Hickey

20. JOACHIM KOHN
Portrait by Vaudechamp
Courtesy of Mr. Maunsel White Hickey and the Louisiana State Museum

21. CARL KOHN
Portrait by Jacques Amans
Courtesy of Mr. Maunsel White Hickey

22. ALEXANDER HART—THE WIDOW KOKERNOT'S SECOND HUSBAND
Courtesy of Mrs. Amy Hart Stewart and the American Jewish Archives

23. A LEVY IMPRINT: TITLE PAGE OF A SECTION OF LIVINGSTON'S PENAL CODE IN FRENCH
Courtesy of the Harvard College Law Library

24. LOUIS MOREAU GOTTSCHALK
Courtesy of the American Jewish Archives

25. DANIEL WARBURG FREES HIS SON, EUGÈNE
Courtesy of the Notarial Archives, New Orleans

26. TITLE PAGE OF WARBURG'S The Goddess Eve
Courtesy of the Library of Congress

27. TITLE PAGE OF WARBURG'S Buy A Lottery Ticket
Courtesy of the Library of Congress

28. EUGÈNE WARBURG'S BUST OF JOHN Y. MASON
Courtesy of the Virginia Historical Society

29. TITLE PAGE OF MANUSCRIPT OF G. W. HARBY'S Tutoona
Courtesy of the American Jewish Archives

30. JUDAH P. BENJAMIN
Courtesy of National Archives

31. MANIS JACOBS' SIGNATURE, WITH HEBREW NAME, ON A LEGAL DOCUMENT, 1823
Courtesy of the Notarial Archives, New Orleans

32. TITLE PAGE OF THE 1828 Constitution
Courtesy of the American Jewish Historical Society

33. HEBREW WEDDING CERTIFICATE OF DANIEL GOODMAN AND AMELIA HARRIS, 1828
Courtesy of Mrs. Adele Clark and the Southern Jewish Historical Society

34. ISAAC LEESER
Courtesy of The Jewish Museum, New York

35. GERSHOM KURSHEEDT
Portrait by Unknown Artist
Courtesy of The Jewish Museum, New York

36. CHRIST CHURCH BEFORE ITS TRANSFORMATION INTO NEFUTZOTH YEHUDAH SYNAGOGUE
Courtesy of the Howard-Tilton Memorial Library

THE EARLY JEWS OF NEW ORLEANS

I

The Colonial Experience

1. Jews in the French Caribbean

Just as the 1492 expulsion of the great Jewish community of Ferdinand and Isabella's Spain drove shock-waves of refugees to every conceivable area of open or clandestine settlement in Europe, North Africa and Asia Minor, so the minor diaspora which resulted from the capture of Dutch Brazil by the Portuguese in 1654 scattered another significant Jewish community into the nooks and crannies of a newer world. Wherever they could find a haven, hospitable or begrudging, temporary or permanent, these Spanish and Portuguese Jews, called Sephardim, sought to settle. Some went back to the Old World, to the security of Amsterdam, even to London, but many, apparently, having taken the adventurous voyage to the Western Hemisphere, attempted to establish themselves in the islands and ports of the Caribbean and Atlantic. A few found their way, by accident, to the bleak, bustling town of New Amsterdam that Peter Stuyvesant ruled on the North American mainland. Stuyvesant's heavy-handed effort to prevent them from remaining in the colony evoked the strong protest of the Jews of Amsterdam to the directors of the Dutch West India Company. They complained that

> "... The French consent that the Portuguese Jews may traffic and live in Martinique, Christopher and others of their territories, whither also some have gone from here, as your Honors know. The English also consent at the present time that the Portuguese and Jewish nation may go from London and settle at Barbados, whither also some have gone. . . ."[1]

The Jewish burghers of Amsterdam might well have mentioned that Jews had perhaps settled in Martinique even before the French added the island colony to their New World possessions in 1635, and that refugees from Brazil had fled not only to Martinique and St. Christophe, but also to Guadeloupe.[2]

This is not to suggest, however, that the status of the Jews in the French islands during the seventeenth century was idyllic. Some of the leading statesmen in the homeland and in the colonies realized full well that every brain and pair of hands, even Jewish, brought added strength to the island frontiers, but conservative religious and economic forces continually agitated against this permissive view. Controller-General Jean Baptiste Colbert supported the liberal attitude so vigorously that Louis XIV issued a formal decree on May 23, 1671, which authorized Jews to remain in "la Martinique et les autres Isles habitués par mes sujets."[3] But in 1685 this tolerant policy was reversed in the first published compilation of laws for the regulation of slavery in the colonies, the Code Noir; one section of that code ordered the banishment of Jewish settlers from the French island colonies:

> "It is our wish, and we decree, that the edict of the late King of glorious memory, our greatly honored lord and father, dated April 23, 1615, be carried into effect in our Islands and, by these Presents, We command all our officers to chase out of our Islands all Jews who have established their residence there whom, as declared enemies of the Christian faith, We command to get out in three months, counting from the day of the publication of these Presents, upon penalty of the confiscation of their persons and property."[4]

The edict of 1615 had not been applied to the Marrano merchants of Bordeaux and other commercial centers of southern France—they continued to enjoy a special status. Similarly, although some Jews may have been expelled from the French West Indies, or denied admission to them, as a result of the decree of 1685, certain privileged Jewish entrepreneurs continued to maintain residence and conduct their businesses in the islands. Members of the noted Gradis family, for instance, developed extensive commercial and agricultural holdings in Martinique and Saint-Domingue (the present-day Haiti) early in the eighteenth century.[5]

2. JEWS IN EARLY LOUISIANA?

The Caribbean islands were far more attractive to ambitious, resourceful Jews like the Gradis family than the Louisiana colony which was abuilding so painfully and so slowly on the Gulf Coast mainland. Despite the efforts of the brothers Pierre Le Moyne d'Iberville and Jean Baptiste Le Moyne de Bienville, who exhibited great confidence in the potential promise of Louisiana, the colony languished "in a state of confusion, with quarreling factions, abandoned concessions, habitations, and farms, and an immoral and generally worthless French citizenry."[6] There is no positive documentary evidence known to the writer that any Jew came to Louisiana during the early years of the colony.[7] Such immigrants to Louisiana as Jacob David, shoemaker, Romain David, tailor, Robert and Genevieve Jacob, and a soldier named Louis Salomon, all of whom arrived in 1719, have been regarded as Jews simply on the basis of their names, but no contemporary document identifies them as Jews or Jewish converts to Christianity.[8] Nor is there evidence that any of the early German colonists who settled in the area called "the German coast" were known to their fellows as Jews. The religion of almost every one of these early Germans is recorded; none is identified in available lists or documents as a Jew or as a convert from Judaism. It is natural for the historian seeking Jewish relevance to be attracted to such names as Marx, until he discovers that the first Marx in Louisiana was named Balthazar, and that he gave his religion as Roman Catholic.[9] The search for early Jews in Louisiana should continue, but researchers ought to agree that names alone can hardly be offered as conclusive evidence.[10]

In a similar vein, the ban on the residence of Jews in the Louisiana Code Noir of 1724 should not be regarded as presumptive evidence of the actual presence of Jews in the colony. A much more likely explanation is that the text of the 1724 Code (which was drawn up in Paris, not in Louisiana) was based in large measure upon the prior document of 1685, which had been issued before the establishment of the settlements on the Gulf Coast. The section on the Jews varied only slightly in the new version:

> "The edict of the late King Louis XIII, of glorious memory, dated April 23, 1615, shall be executed in our province and colony of Louisiana: this being done, We enjoin the Directors General of the said Company, and all our Officers, to drive out of the said country all Jews who may have established their residence there. These, as declared enemies of the Christian name, We command to leave in three months, counting from the day of the publication of these Presents, upon penalty of the confiscation of their persons and property."[11]

One of the variations, it will be noted, is a greater uncertainty in this document about the actual presence of Jews than in the 1685 version, as if to say that no report of the settlement of Jews in Louisiana had reached Paris.

The inclusion of a ban on Jewish settlement as Article I, and on the practice of any religion other than the Catholic as Article III, in a code which regulated Negro slavery in the colonies, has seemed to baffle certain historians. Charles Gayarré, for instance, voices his mystification: "By what concatenation of causes or ideas, these provisions concerning the supremacy of the Roman Catholic religion and the expulsion of the Jews came to be inserted in the Black Code, it is difficult to imagine."[12] But it is not so difficult once we recognize that the basic motivation was a missionary concern for the souls of the Negro slaves: if Jewish landowners could practice Judaism, they might feel free to convert their slaves to their own religion. Only a double-edged denial of the right of Jews to settle, and of the freedom to practice any faith other than the Catholic, would guarantee the proper Catholicization of the slaves. Since the time of the Emperor Constantius (339), legislation of the Roman Empire, of Church Councils, and of individual states, had sought to support the spread of Christianity by prohibiting the holding of Christian slaves, and even of potential slave converts to Christianity, by Jews, as well as the conversion of slaves to Judaism by their Jewish owners.[13] But whatever the background of the Code Noir, it should not be regarded as positive evidence that Jews who would be subjected to its provisions had already come to Louisiana. This is not to suggest, however, that they would have been welcomed into the colony. A bureau document of the Company of the Indies, dating from 1716 or 1717, urged the exclusion of Jews because they would be politically unreliable and economically too aggressive. "Those of Portugal [who are in France now] give us a good example of what to avoid."[14] It is idle to wonder what would have happened if a Jew had tried to settle in the colony. It should be recognized, however, that if Jews did not attempt to settle in Louisiana, their avoidance of the area was not motivated by their fear of rejection or banishment, but rather by their awareness of the fact that the colony's languishing economic condition offered them little opportunity of making a living in their accustomed commercial pursuits.

The extensive economic potential of Louisiana was seen clearly by one Jew who never settled there, but whose vision, if acted upon, might have stimulated the kind of growth the colony sorely required. This Jew was Abraham Gradis of Bordeaux, whose family, as we have noted, had already established commercial branches in the Caribbean and who, in 1748, organized the highly successful Society of Canada venture for the promotion of commerce in the northern colony. In the same year, Gradis proposed the establishment of a similar company which would exploit the commercial and agricultural opportunities he perceived in the Louisiana settlement. The key to the problem, as Gradis saw it, was the massive importation of Negro slaves into the colony under the auspices of the King—he suggested ten thousand slaves over a period of five years. These slaves would be utilized primarily for the clearing and cultivation of land. Some of the lumber would be used for construction, and the excess would be exported. The major objective of all this activity would be "a lucrative trade in all our manufactures with New Spain [Mexico], a commerce now inaccessible to the French because of the sea. Through overland caravans into this colony, the Spaniards could secure our merchandise and wares in exchange for gold and silver. . . ." Gradis' memorandum which embodied these recommendations to the French government was submitted from Bordeaux on May 21, 1748. It was filed without comment or action.[15]

Very possibly, however, even though Gradis' plan was not carried out, the first contacts of Jews with Louisiana were through trade rather than permanent settlement. The earliest located transaction on record concerns a cargo of goods worth 14,162 piastres and 2 reales, which Josue Henriques, Jr., a Jewish businessman in Curaçao, shipped to one Bertrand in New Orleans some time before July, 1748. Bertrand accepted the consignment, sold it and absconded with the proceeds. On July 19, 1748, the Layssard brothers, Jean Baptiste and Etienne, who were apparently Henriques' correspondents in New Orleans, petitioned Vincent d'Auberville, Commissaire Ordonnateur of the Province and First Judge of its Superior Court, for the seizure of Bertrand's property in New Orleans, so that Henriques might be reimbursed for his losses. D'Auberville approved the petition on July 19, and the required notice was served at Bertrand's residence on August 3. In September, a Bertrand associate admitted possession of merchandise worth 4,132 piastres which belonged to the fugitive, but insisted that he would not voluntarily surrender it. The incomplete record of the case ends here.[16] There may, of course, have been many other commercial contracts during the 1740's and 1750's between Jews in the Caribbean area and merchants and customers in New Orleans of which no record remains because they did not become the subjects of such legal wrangling as this.

3. The Texel Affair

Within a decade of Henriques' trouble, however, a few Jewish merchants and their families had finally established themselves in New Orleans. Attention was called to their presence in the colony, which violated the first article of the Code Noir, in the barrage of correspondence which documents the complex "Texel affair." As a result of the arrival in New Orleans in January, 1759, of the ship Texel which gave its name to this cause célèbre, the hostility which had long been simmering between the Governor of the colony, Chevalier Louis Billouart de Kerlérec, and the Commissaire Ordonnateur, Vincent Pierre Gaspard de Rochemore, burst into the open. The Texel had come to New Orleans from Jamaica on a parlementaire voyage. Parlementaire shipping ventures were a well-known feature of the Seven Years' War (1756–1763) in the colonial areas. Originally designed to encourage the exchange of prisoners of war, they developed into speculative trips to enemy territory for the sale of cargoes of scarce merchandise. A few prisoners would serve as the excuse for the shipment of sorely needed goods to an enemy port. Kerlérec welcomed these opportunities to obtain foodstuffs and other commodities for his colony, even at high prices. Rochemore opposed the Governor's policy. The Texel arrived in the Governor's absence. The Ordonnateur, in an effort to establish his authority and demonstrate his virtue, accused Kerlérec of violating the intent of the law and of sharing in the profits of such cargoes. He therefore seized the Texel and imprisoned its captain. Kerlérec, on his return to town, released the ship and the captain, and reprimanded Rochemore for taking the law into his own hands. Both men, of course, wrote reports to Paris to justify their conduct. The captain of the ship was a Jew named David Dias Arias, who died in New Orleans before he was able to leave the colony. In Curaçao, years before, Dias Arias had married Gracia Yesurun, daughter of Haham Rephael Yesurun (1678–1747). The rabbi was so unlucky as to countersign a heavy note of indebtedness for him; when Dias Arias found himself unable to pay his debts, he fled Curaçao and took refuge in Jamaica. The rabbi had to sell all his possessions in order to raise just one-quarter of the huge sum for which he was now responsible. An unsavory character, at best, was Dias Arias, to become the subject of so intense a colonial furore. The conflict between the two highest officials of the colony and their supporters dragged on for years, culminating in the dismissal of Rochemore and the resignation of Kerlérec. Long after Louisiana had been ceded to the Spanish, their families brought suits and countersuits in the courts of France and wrote memoirs on the case.[17]

It was clearly an accident that the owner of this parlementaire ship happened to be a Jew. Dias Arias was probably no different from the other commercial adventurers who participated in this legalized smuggling business. But Rochemore had little liking for Jews anyway, and used their presence in New Orleans as another argument to justify his seizure of the Texel and his defiance of the Governor:

> ". . . The sale of the cargo [after it was released by Kerlérec] has been accomplished by the Captain [Dias Arias] of this ship in the stores of the Jews established in this colony. The Captain has received the money for it, and has left the river after having had time during a two months sojourn, at complete liberty in this city, to gather knowledge of the weakness of this colony, and to carry away such commodities as he wished. One of these Jews left in another ship a short time after without declaring his destination and without a passport; and, furthermore, this is the custom in this colony on the part of those who leave for foreign and enemy colonies, to receive the approval of the Governor, who alone knows their designs. . . .
>
> "These Jews, who according to the edicts and ordinances must not remain in a colony more than three months, under penalty of imprisonment and confiscation of their property, are forming establishments here the progress and the danger of which have been observed by the whole country. There are, at present, six of them here, and I do not include those of the ship of Dias Arias, engaging in commerce both wholesale and retail, with the same freedom as French businessmen. The merchants and other inhabitants of this colony are persuaded that the Jews are only tolerated here as a means of raising money, through a tax that I know nothing of. . . ."[18]

Thus Rochemore marshalled his accusations against the Jews: they were spies for the enemy; they were weakening the colony through the exportation of commodities; they were bribing the Governor to obtain permission to remain; and they were an economic danger to the inhabitants of the colony. Had Rochemore gained the upper hand in his struggle with the Governor, or had Kerlérec agreed with his position, there is no doubt that the Jews would have been summarily expelled. But, fortunately for them, Rochemore's defiance did not prevail, and they were permitted to remain.

4. The First Documented Jews in New Orleans

Unfortunately we do not know the names or activities of all of the six Jews to whom Rochemore and his clique referred, nor do we know precisely which one was the first to settle permanently in Louisiana. That distinction may quite possibly belong to a person whose name and affairs are unrecorded in any document, but more likely than not it should be accorded to Isaac Rodrigues Monsanto. In early 1757, Monsanto and his associate, Manuel de Britto, then in Curaçao, chartered the sloop St. Joseph from its owner Charles Guillaume, for a voyage to New Orleans. Manuel Monsanto, Isaac's brother, was a passenger on the ship, probably for the purpose of supervising the sale of the cargo in New Orleans. Isaac Monsanto and de Britto may have gone ahead to New Orleans, while the ship stopped at Saint-Domingue. Either on its way to New Orleans, or on its return, the ship was captured in the Bay of Monte Christi by a New England privateer, the Black Snake, under the command of Captain Ebenezer Tyler, and taken to Providence, Rhode Island. After its arrival there, Manuel Monsanto and his associates gave their power of attorney for the recovery of the sloop to Jacob Rodriguez Rivera, a prosperous Jewish merchant of Newport, R. I., on June 8, 1757. De Britto meanwhile hastened to Rhode Island to help to secure the release of the ship, which was finally accomplished through the payment of a ransom, but the cargo was apparently confiscated because it was destined for, or had come from, a French port. The St. Joseph was loaded with rum and once more set out for the Caribbean area, only to be captured by another privateer, this time, apparently, for good. A series of suits and countersuits ensued in the courts of Saint-Domingue and New Orleans, beginning in late 1757 and continuing until 1763. Guillaume sued for the rent of the ship while it was in British custody; Monsanto and de Britto sued for the expenses involved in fitting and refitting the ship and for the profits anticipated from the sale of the rum, which they said Guillaume's agent, one Perpignot or Perpina, had hijacked for sale in Saint-Domingue—

the reason that the sloop was captured by the British the second time. The final judgment of the New Orleans court in 1763 cannot be found, but the case was so confused and complicated that neither party had all the right on its side—the real problem was that the British privateers were too efficient.[19]

It is not clear whether Isaac Monsanto had already decided to transfer his business operations from Curaçao to New Orleans before the St. Joseph's voyage, in view of that port's great need for consumer goods due to the war, or whether his enforced stay in New Orleans to pursue the case through the courts persuaded him that this would be a good location for his activities. It is also possible that Isaac Monsanto had already become discouraged by the highly competitive commercial atmosphere in Curaçao, which was perhaps the most active entrepreneurial port in the Western Hemisphere at the time. But whether through accident or design, by October 24, 1758, at the latest, Isaac had established himself in New Orleans. On that date he made some purchases at the auction of the property of Claude Joseph Villars Dubreuil, the deceased Contractor of Public Works. One of these purchases was "a little Negro girl named Quetelle," for whom he paid 1,400 livres. He was obviously setting up a household; hence his need for a slave.[20]

5. The Monsanto Family in The Hague and Curaçao

Isaac Monsanto was born at The Hague, Holland, in October, 1729, the eldest son and second child of David Rodrigues Monsanto, a native of Amsterdam, and his wife Ester Levy. Monsanto was a Sephardic Jew; Ester was an Ashkenazi (Central European) from Münster in Germany.[21] The father is first mentioned as the clerk of Sir Solomon de Medina in 1715, but he may have served in that capacity prior to that time; Medina had already established his residence at The Hague in 1705 after moving to the continent from England in 1702 in order to remain in close contact with the Duke of Marlborough, for whose armies he was a major supplier of transportation and foodstuffs. William III had knighted Medina on June 23, 1700, in recognition of his financial services to the Crown and to Marlborough. He was the first professing Jew so to be honored by a British monarch. By the time of David Monsanto's employment, however, Medina had lost much of his immense wealth, and after Marlborough's disgrace in 1711, his connection with momentous affairs of state had ended. Nonetheless, Medina was still a man of substance and influence, and we may be certain that David Monsanto's responsibilities as his secretary-bookkeeper were arduous and weighty. Sir Solomon was still supervising his business operations and investments in England and the Netherlands from The Hague, and was continuing to attempt to retrieve money he had loaned to Marlborough. David Monsanto was both loyal and efficient: he remained in Medina's employ until the latter's death at the age of eighty in 1730, and continued to serve Lady Ester de Medina and the executors while the estate was being settled, at least until 1739. Sir Solomon reposed such confidence in his clerk that he left him a bequest of 400 guilders, plus an additional 1,500 guilders following Lady Ester's death—a larger legacy than Sir Solomon's bequests to his own grandchildren, and the third largest beyond the family circle. Unfortunately, Medina's affairs were so tangled, and his debts so enormous, that David Monsanto probably never collected even a fraction of this inheritance.[22]

During his employment by Medina, who must have been fairly generous to him, David Monsanto had saved enough money to make an investment in the Compagnie van Beleninge, a municipal bank of The Hague; to contribute modest amounts of money to the building fund of the Honen Dal Congregation, which dedicated its new synagogue in 1726; and to establish a family. He married Ester Levy in the synagogue in 1726 or 1727 and sired his first child, Sara, in 1728. At least eight other children, in addition to Isaac, came of this union. Probably because the anticipated legacy from the Medina estate would make him a fairly substantial citizen, David decided, in 1732, to register his marriage to Ester in the civil records of The Hague, and to have a civil wedding ceremony performed. This was not an unusual procedure; Protestants, too, had the privilege of choosing between a civil or religious wedding ceremony, and sometimes decided on both. During the 1730's, David was apparently a fairly prosperous man. He probably pursued some of the business interests in which he had been involved with Medina, and also represented clients in business transactions by exercising their power of attorney, much as he had done for Medina. In 1736 he was elected to an expensive honor by his congregation, and to equally expensive office the following year. In 1741 he served as trustee of an estate. But by late 1742, apparently, he had fallen on hard times. Perhaps he had been borrowing against the anticipated Medina legacy, which by then had become a forlorn hope. He left The Hague for Germany, probably in an effort to recoup his fortunes, but to no avail. When he returned in 1745, he notified the authorities that he did not have the money to pay the special tax which had been levied to meet the cost of Dutch participation in the War of the Austrian Succession. Beginning in 1746, David Monsanto and his family were maintained by the Jewish community, now united by the merger of the two congregations, Honen Dal and Beth Jacob, which had taken place during his absence, in 1743. This man who, as secretary of the wealthy Medina, had kept the records of investments in the hundreds of thousands of pounds sterling, was now reduced to accepting a monthly stipend from the community of which he had once been a fairly substantial member. On Passover he received gifts of matzos, and on Hanukah both clothing and money. He who had gratefully accepted and paid for the high honor of serving in 1736 as the "Bridegroom of Genesis" on Simchas Torah (the Festival of Rejoicing in the Torah, celebrated on the last morning of the Feast of Tabernacles in the autumn), now served as a minhanista—that is, one of the group of unemployed, idle and retired men who, in exchange for a small allowance, were required to attend services in the synagogue every weekday, in order to assure the presence of the mandatory quorum (minyan) of ten men necessary for the conduct of public Jewish worship.[23]

The available evidence for the birth years of the children of David and Ester Monsanto is confused and contradictory. We know definitely that Sara, the eldest, died in January, 1736, and that a third child, Jaël, was eight months old in January, 1732. But the registration of birth of some of the other children does not give their names; and later testimony of the children themselves offers various ages which contradicts their statements on other occasions. The best guesses that we can offer are only approximations: Jaël may be the daughter named Judith who was one of the oldest children and who later lived in Saint-Domingue; Joseph may be the child born in 1733, and Manuel was born probably in 1734. There is a big jump in time to the other children, although still other children may have been born and died during the intervening years in that age of severe infant mortality—Gracia (1743?); Angélica (1744?); Eleanora (1745?); Jacob (1746?); Benjamin (1747?). We know definitely that Jacob and Benjamin were still young enough to be pupils in the synagogue school in The Hague in 1753–54. We also know that Ester, probably exhausted by child bearing and rearing, by poverty and want, died in July of 1747. If all the children were hers, as we believe, that is the terminal date for their birth. David Monsanto was too poor to pay the fee for the registration of Ester's death and burial.[24]

After years of dependence on communal funds for their support, in late 1754 the Monsanto family decided to take the bold step of beginning life anew. They made application to the officers and board of The Hague Jewish community for a grant which would enable them to emigrate to Curaçao. A total of 600 florins was offered to them; this included the 120 florins which they ordinarily received each year, aside from special gifts on holidays.[25] Many European Jewish communities during this period, and later, got rid of their paupers by dispatching them to other cities in the Old and New Worlds, but one wonders if in this case, at least, the decision to strike out for new opportunities was not made by the paupers themselves. Although the subsidy was given to David, the titular head of the family, it would seem unlikely that it was he who made this momentous decision: from what hidden reserve of psychic energy could he have summoned the imagination and courage to start a new life after eight years of poverty and failure? In view of Isaac's subsequent leadership of the family, it seems far more probable that it was he who was unwilling any longer to submit to dependence and want, and that it was his ambition and aggressiveness which precipitated the move to the New World. Isaac may well have promised his father that he would take care of his brothers and sisters if David would agree to this drastic action—but promise or not, his future conduct indeed demonstrated his willingness to assume responsibility for the rest of the family.

No record has been discovered which marks the Monsanto family's arrival in Curaçao, but it seems reasonable to suppose that it was in 1755. Actually, the first reference to any member of the family in the Curaçao archives relates to the ill-fated St. Joseph voyage of 1757, but the family would have had to be in Curaçao[26] for at least a while in order to accumulate the funds necessary for that venture. It is, of course, possible that Isaac and Manuel had made the trip alone at first, with the rest of the family following later, but this seems unlikely in view of the family's tightly-knit unity in later years in Louisiana. At any rate, by 1758 Isaac and Jacob both possessed certificates as brokers in Curaçao, while the father was pursuing his old occupation of representing the legal interests of clients by utilizing their power of attorney. Far from being a solicitor or barrister, let alone attorney-general of the colony, a legend which persists among some of his descendants—all that David Monsanto or any other Jew could do was to participate in a legal transaction by exercising the power of attorney of a client who was out-of-town or was too busy to be present.[27]

We have no certain knowledge of which brothers and sisters Isaac took with him to New Orleans in 1757–58. There is definite evidence that Manuel did remain in Curaçao, carrying on an import and export business there, but he may have been engaged in these ventures on Isaac's behalf. The last records in Curaçao relating to David and Manuel date from the summer of 1763. It may have been then that the family closed down its Curaçao headquarters, Manuel moving to New Orleans to join Isaac, and probably taking along with him Manuel de Britto, who apparently up until then had spent more time in Curaçao than in New Orleans. The date and place of David Monsanto's death are not known. Although his name is not listed in the incomplete burial records of Curaçao, he may possibly have died there in the summer of 1763, when members of the family seem still to have lived there. It was surely not in New Orleans, for, as we shall see, a bequest by David to his daughters in New Orleans was later described as having come to them in the form of a shipment of cargo. Perhaps the most probable location of David's death was Saint-Domingue, where his son Joseph settled, and where his daughter Judith (Jaël?) lived with her husband Moïse Julien. Whatever David's fate, it is clear that he had succeeded in reestablishing himself at least to the extent that he was able to leave some money to his three daughters. The move to Curaçao had indeed given him a new opportunity in life.[28]

Manuel Monsanto and Manuel de Britto probably took along with them to New Orleans another Jew, Isaac Henriques Fastio, who was to outlive most of the Monsanto brothers and sisters in Louisiana. Fastio, a native of Bordeaux, had probably established himself in Curaçao by April, 1757, when his wife Ester left Bordeaux for Curaçao by way of Amsterdam, with their four daughters in tow, accompanied by her brother Abraham Rodrigues and a forty-six-year-old servant, Abraham García. Fastio and Manuel Monsanto were partners in some complex export operations in 1763 which brought them into conflict with the son of the late governor of Curaçao. Perhaps Manuel Monsanto, de Britto and Fastio were compelled to leave Curaçao after this disastrous venture which, apparently, plunged them into debt. At any rate, Fastio was in Louisiana by 1766 at the latest, participating in some business ventures with Isaac Monsanto. Although he may have opened a store in New Orleans, it is more likely that he moved almost immediately to Pointe Coupee where he spent most of his active business life in Louisiana. His death record in 1804 states that he had been a Louisiana resident for "about 50 years," but so far as we can trace his movements, he could not have moved to New Orleans until 1763 at the earliest. Possibly Isaac Monsanto had prospered so well that he could now also support Manuel and de Britto; he may also have promised to give Fastio a share in some of his ventures. The transfer to New Orleans may also have been stimulated by the end of the Seven Years' War, and the expectation that business opportunities in New Orleans would be more attractive than in Curaçao.[29]

6. Isaac Monsanto and Company in New Orleans, 1758–1769

New Orleans had indeed offered ample opportunity for Isaac to demonstrate his capacity for aggressive and imaginative commercial activity. Assisted by the continuing scarcity of consumer goods created by the interminable warfare between England and France, the absence of competition from the largely indolent French settlers, the useful contacts which he already had established in Curaçao and possibly in Saint-Domingue and elsewhere, and the ready help of his younger brothers, he succeeded in becoming a prosperous merchant during the period 1758–69. Isaac Monsanto seems to have had a vigorous, out-going personality, and to have made friends easily. Not only did Governor Kerlérec refuse to eject him and the other Jews, but he seems to have taken a friendly interest in Isaac, which the latter reciprocated. Monsanto was one of twenty-nine merchants who signed a statement on April 29, 1763, which praised Kerlérec's efforts to encourage the commerce of the city during the war.[30] Kerlérec continued to maintain business relations with Monsanto even after his return to France. In 1766 he wrote to Monsanto from Paris about the sale of some cypress, and reported that "Mr. Gradis, who is here now, spoke to me about 600 quarts of flour you have in your store. I promised him I would do what I can to help you."[31]

The Gradis firm of Bordeaux was one of a large number of correspondents with whom Isaac Monsanto had business dealings during the period 1758–69. On occasion, Monsanto acted as their agent and collected funds due them from customers in New Orleans, and, similarly, Monsanto was sometimes asked by Louisiana clients to arrange for the transfer of credit from the Gradis firm to New Orleans.[32] Monsanto also transacted business with other firms, whose headquarters were in Bayonne, La Rochelle, Bordeaux, Paris, Cadiz and London. In the Caribbean area, he sent cargoes to, and received them from, Saint-Domingue, Cuba, Vera Cruz, Campeche, Jamaica, Martinique, Curaçao and St. Eustatius.[33] Nearer home, the Monsanto company had customers and clients in the Louisiana settlements and posts at Rapides, Pellas Creek, Bayou Manchac, the German Coast, Houma, Opelousas, Natchitoches and Pointe Coupee.[34] Ranging farther afield on the mainland, he shipped goods to New York City, Pensacola and Mobile in the British colonies, and up the Mississippi to Natchez and to more distant posts in the Arkansas and Illinois country.[35] Consignments from these areas were also shipped to Monsanto in New Orleans. Like other merchant shippers, Monsanto established limited partnerships for specific ventures: in 1765, for instance, he chartered a ship for a voyage to Vera Cruz, carrying a cargo of liquor and other merchandise, with Kerlérec's successor as Governor, Jean Jacques Blaise D'Abbadie, as a partner.[36] It was not unusual for Royal Governors and other officials to participate in business ventures like these, but it is reflective of their attitude towards the Jews that neither Kerlérec nor D'Abbadie hesitated before dealing in this way with Isaac Monsanto.

The broad geographical range covered by Monsanto's interests was equalled only by the variety of commodities which he handled in both wholesale and retail quantities. The merchandise which he traded ranged from handkerchiefs to guns, from canvas to lumber, from cordage to indigo, from sugar to lime, and from bullocks to slaves.[37] The latter were not only bought and sold singly, but en masse. In 1768 the firm had an interest in a contracted shipment of eighty slaves who were, however, never delivered to New Orleans.[38] Monsanto made frequent purchases at auction, the most important on record being the Trianon plantation of the late Chevalier Bernard de Vergès, the engineer who had been in charge of public works. This plantation, which Monsanto bought in 1767 for 5,500 livres, was located a few miles above New Orleans, across the Mississippi, with a frontage of seventeen and a half arpents on the river. The plantation house was fifty feet long, with eleven rooms and front and rear galleries. It was a palatial residence for the time, with outbuildings and slave quarters. De Vergès had been in debt to Monsanto for 2,000 livres, but the estate was bereft of cash. Since this was a time of severe commercial depression, it is entirely possible that Monsanto purchased the plantation only to protect his interest in the estate.[39] There is no indication that he ever occupied the plantation house or intended to become a planter. He was a businessman, and he was compelled to give daily attention to his affairs.

According to a court record of 1766, living with Isaac in his combination home, store and warehouse on Chartres street[40] were his sisters Angélica and Gracia, his brother Manuel, a man named Abraham Robles (apparently not related), a mulatto slave from Martinique named Valentin, a number of other slaves including a little girl and a male whose name was Baptiste Manuel Monsanto, and Jean Baptiste Marcellin Lomère, a thirty-five-year-old French weaver who had boarded with Monsanto for about seven years. Whether de Britto lived with Monsanto when he was in town—he was probably the traveling partner in the firm—we do not know. Lomère, who had always seemed a little peculiar, created a stir in September, 1766: Robles found him chasing the little Negro slave girl and brandishing a stick at her; Robles seized the stick, and Lomère promptly attacked him with a knife and stabbed him four times. In the subsequent trial, the Attorney-General demanded a fine for the state, 800 livres in damages for Robles, imprisonment and banishment of Lomère: "to be returned to his family [in France], to be confined for the rest of his days as a mad man, known by several of his acts." But before Lomère was shipped out of the colony, Monsanto and de Britto were required to return to him the 5,000 piastres gourdes which the weaver had deposited with the firm.[41]

Lomère was not the only Louisiana settler who used Monsanto as a banker; many others deposited money with him—including his sisters Gracia, Angélica and Eleanora, who left with him the money they inherited after their father's death[42]—and he, in turn, was indebted to many of his fellow residents.[43] Hard money was always scarce in a frontier area like Louisiana, and especially during the period of Monsanto's business activity in New Orleans.[44] Many of his customers required credit over a long period of time, and he sometimes had to enter suit to secure payment after the passage of many years. Louis Marie Populus de St. Prother, for instance, bought some merchandise from him on credit in 1764; the debt was still unpaid in 1773 when, with interest and charges, it had almost doubled. On occasion, even when a customer was finally ready to remit payment, the bill of exchange might not be honored. On May 15, 1765, John Stuart, the Superintendent of Indian Affairs for the Southern Colonies of Great Britain, then making his headquarters in Pensacola, bought merchandise from Monsanto worth two hundred pounds. Two years later he paid him with a bill of exchange on Charles Ogilvie of London which was eventually protested.[45]

Skins were frequently used in lieu of cash in large-scale dealings throughout the area. Monsanto owed a large sum of money to the Pensacola firm of McGillivray and Struthers long enough for John Fitzpatrick, their agent in New Orleans, to put angry pressure on Isaac in April, 1769. Fitzpatrick reported to his Pensacola superiors that

> ". . . I delivered your Letter to Mr Monsantto and intimated him that he must Not think of baffling me any longer about the payment & that if Continu^{e} Pleading his Accostmed Excuses I would present a petition to the Councl to Request they would see me Redressed by giving me up the Neoxus [a ship which belonged to Monsanto?] Untill an Entire Satisfaction was made for what he ows. . . ."

Isaac promised to do what he could as soon as possible. Shortly afterward he left for the Illinois country to buy skins; Fitzpatrick sent word to Pensacola as soon as he received reports of Monsanto's imminent return. Finally, on July 17, Isaac was back in New Orleans, assuring Fitzpatrick that boatloads of skins were on their way to New Orleans, and that some would be taken directly to Pensacola where McGillivray and Struthers could take in trade the entire amount of the debt at the rate of 37 sols per dried skin and 42 sols for a skin without the hair removed. The unsettled conditions of the time prevented the fulfillment of the agreement, however, and in September Fitzpatrick was still trying to obtain the money, although he admitted that cash was dreadfully difficult to find anywhere in New Orleans.[46]

7. Monsanto's Service to the British in West Florida

Some years earlier, Isaac Monsanto had a desperate need for cash in connection with an important service which he rendered to the British authorities in Mobile and Pensacola in 1764–65, when they were preparing to send an expedition up the Mississippi in order to take possession of the Illinois country, in keeping with the provisions of the Treaty of Paris which ended the Seven Years' War. According to a report which the Louisiana Governor, D'Abbadie, sent to the Minister of Marine in Paris, the British Commandant at Mobile had "struck a bargain with M. Monsanto, a merchant, for furnishing bateaux, utensils, etc., which would be necessary for this convoy, by the terms of which he promised to send him also ten thousand livres upon his arrival at Mobile, and to send advances in proportion to the successive expenses which he will be obliged to make; but, since the first sum has not yet been sent, the preparations for the expedition have been stopped and the only activities that M. Monsanto has performed while waiting consist in repairing five or six bateaux. . . ."[47] This report was written on January 29, 1765, but Isaac Monsanto had already been waiting impatiently for several months for the initial payment which had been promised to him by John Lind, captain of a British schooner. Lieut. Alexander Maclellan of the British forces had tried to reassure Monsanto, in a letter dated November 10, 1764, which said in part:

> ". . . Since you ask my advice I counsel you quite frankly not to stop the proceedings. I do not know at all the powers or the orders that Mr. Lind had in these matters. His Excellency Mr. D'Abbadie showed me a copy of the agreement between you and the said gentleman, according to which he was to pay you the amount of 2000 piastres instantly upon his arrival in Mobile. Since this was not done because of the different money used, you have been inconvenienced a bit at the present time, but you will no doubt be reimbursed and I hope that will be soon. . . . If the papers for the rent of the boats have been drawn up, please send > them to me as there is a chance that I will leave [New Orleans] for Pensacola tonight. . . ."[48]

Monsanto had still not received any payment from the British by January 23, 1765, when he wrote an importunate letter to Major Robert Farmar, the British Commandant at Mobile:

> "This moment I received the honor of your two letters by Mr. Campbell, bearing date the 21st decr. & 4th Jany. by which I see you order me to continue the work, in order that every thing may be ready, and that you will send me the dollars and bills of Exchange by the first opportunity. As you have not done it as yet, the want of money I find has been the occasion, that some want unfortunately is found here, and is the occasion of my finding my self very much put to it; I Imagined I deserved the preferance [sic] to Mr. Dupart who has recd. 1400 dollars, when at the same time his work is done by his own Negro's, for whom he advances nothing; and I am obliged to do every thing with ready money, for which I have paid a great Interest, (and I can't find what I have occasion for to continue the work). I was in hopes from this motive that money would have been sent, and It is now more than a month since you mentioned it. I should have been very glad [if] you had at least sent me a part.—I have been afraid for some time past on account of the bills of Exchange, but now I have more reason than ever from the news spread abroad by an English vessel just arrived from pensacola, that all your Bills were returned protested. I flatter myself that this News is false, but it is made public all over the Town, which you may be assured will prevent me negotiating the bills; there is a means of making easy this payment, by sending me good skins at 50 sols a pound french weight, delivered to me here, which makes half a dollar gourde—
>
> "If You have not sent the money on the receipt of this, I beg Sir you would not defer It, You know I am obliged only to deliver the Boats two months after the first payment. They may be ready sooner, and I don't doubt but you will likewise, if not, You'l be so good as to send somebody to receive them, once finished I cannot take charge of them, besides I shall have occasion for the last payment. I hope likewise to be indemnified on account of the augmentation of my expenses, and for the Interest of the > money I have been obliged to pay, from my not receiving It according to agreement—Be persuaded that every thing shall be done with all possible zeal, concerning what may be usefull to you, which is my reason for now offering you my services in praying you would believe that Nobody is more respectfully

>
> Sir
>
> Your most humble > and most Obedt. Servant
> Monsanto—
>
> "[Post-Script:] Mr. Pittman & Stuart are arrived, as they came away eight days after Mr. Campbell, I was in hopes of touching what you did me the honor to mention in your letter, which was to be sent me the first opportunity; I hope It will soon come."[49]

Pressing as his needs were, and eager as he was for this contract to be completed, poor Isaac had to wait even longer for British colonial bureaucratic legalism to inch its way forward. Major Farmar submitted a petition to Governor George Johnstone, on February 20, 1765, urging that Monsanto be paid in skins, despite the prohibition of such exports for the purpose of trade:

> ". . . your Petitioner is necessitated to represent to your Excellency, that the important service of taking possession of the country of Illinois is entirely retarded and put a stop to, for the great inconvenience of the general want of money, which at present prevails in this Province, that it will be impossible to proceed according to the express orders of the Commander in Chief, unless some expedient is fallen upon to discharge the different expences [sic] of the contracts works &c occasioned by this intended expedition.
>
> "Your petitioner therefore prays that your Excellency would take the above into your Serious Consideration, and that the law prohibiting the exportation of Deerskins to any foreign parts may be suspended till twelve hundred weight of deerskins is shipped and transported to New Orleans, in order to pay part of the contract concluded with Mr. Monsanto on the part of the Government for providing and repairing a sufficient number of Batteaux to transport His Majesty's troops to the said country of Illinois, as this appears the only salutary measure to put > immediately into execution the orders received from Headquarters and fully to answer the expectation of Government thereupon."

The petition was bounced back and forth from Farmar to Johnstone to the Provincial Council. The Council criticized its legal form, so Farmar had to resubmit it. Then he was asked to come in person to answer questions, but he protested that he was so ill that he could not appear and could only answer questions sent to him in written form. Eventually the Council decided to proceed with the project by requesting the revenue officer not to "obstruct the exportation of that quantity of Skins," but suggested that the packages "should be inspected and sealed" so that no more than the required number would be shipped to New Orleans. The same duty would be paid by the colonial government as though the skins were being sent to commercial buyers in Great Britain. Most of the payment, however, was made in drafts—£1,405.18.8 in March and £397 on April 1, 1765. The expedition finally departed for the North, and Monsanto must have heaved a sigh of relief—but his troubles with the British had not quite ended, for in December he was sued for their wages by boatmen who returned from the Illinois country in a bateau belonging to "his Britanique Majesty."[50]

8. The First Jews in Mobile and Pensacola

Major Farmar's problems, on the other hand, had just begun. Trapped in a power struggle between the British civil and military authorities, he was court-martialed in 1766 for embezzlement and misappropriation of funds. It was a complex and lengthy case, but Farmar was finally acquitted. One of the charges made against him was "For sending flour belonging to the King to New Orleans, and selling it or attempting to sell it there, by means of one Pallachio, a Jew."[51]

Joseph de Palacios and his two Jewish partners, Samuel Israel and Alexander Solomons, who did business in New Orleans under the French as well as in Pensacola and Mobile under the British during this period, had arrived in the West Florida Province in late 1763 or the beginning of 1764. On February 2, 1764, just six months after the British took possession of the area from the French in accordance with the provisions of the Treaty of Paris, these "three English merchants residing in this city [Mobile]," purchased a lot "in the street of the burying place . . . fronting the [King's] Indian House." This property, for which they paid 200 Spanish dollars, included a house and other buildings. One should note that while Mobile had been a French possession, no Jewish merchant had been sufficiently attracted by its commercial possibilities to undertake to settle there, but no sooner were the British in command, than these merchants arrived in this now new frontier. On May 8, 1764, de Palacios and Solomons (Israel is not mentioned in this deed) bought another property, three lots of ground, including a house planked above and below, raised on a brick foundation, covered with shingles, and consisting of "a Hall, a Chamber and alcove, another Chamber and a Cabinet," with a brick chimney, a kitchen, oven, stove and garden court. For this property they were to deliver to the seller, Claude Mortal, nicknamed Chalan, two hundred barrels of flour, two hundred weight each, "good, sound and merchantable," within five months. The firm of de Palacios, Solomons and Israel was engaged in transactions with Major Farmar very early, for on July 20, 23 and 24, 1764, Alexander Solomons was in New York City receiving cash from Judah Hays for part of a Bill of Exchange which Farmar wrote on the Lords of Treasury for £700.[52] The partners were also moving back and forth between Mobile and Pensacola; since the Spanish had previously controlled Pensacola, these may well have been the first Jews in the town. On February 9, 1765, their applications for building lots and garden lots in Pensacola were approved. Palacios was assigned lot number 29 and Solomons number 35, lots that backed on to each other, while Israel was granted number 44. In the West Florida Provincial Council minutes, the three names were listed under "first class choices," in sequence, as though the partners had stood in line together.[53] On November 2, 1765, the Governor ratified the grants to Israel and de Palacios; Solomons' must also have received approval because he later mortgaged his lots.[54]

The following year, 1766, another Jew received assignments of land in Pensacola, including town and garden lots number 119, and additional grants of 50 and 500 acres. He was Isaac Mendes, formerly of Jamaica, who had come to West Florida even earlier than the three partners. As early as the fall of 1763, Mendes sold £25 worth of goods for use as "Indian presents" to Governor Johnstone. It is possible that this man is identical with the Isaac Mendes who was in Albany with the British troops in 1756. If so, he may have been a trader who traveled with a particular regiment.[55] At any rate, Mendes did not remain in the colony very long. By May, 1766, he was in debt to Charles Strachan and Company to the amount of £293.7½. It was probably in order to collect funds for the payment of the bill that, in July, he mortgaged his town lot number 119 and his dwelling place to one Manuel Josephson (possibly the New York and Philadelphia Jewish leader of the same name who became well-known in post-Revolutionary times) for $560, and a month later he and John Crozer sold lot number 23 for $375. In October, 1766, Mendes transferred title to his town and garden lots numbered 119, and to his home, to Benjamin Ward, in settlement of a debt of 1,200 Spanish milled dollars which Mendes owed to Ward. Mendes probably left Pensacola soon after these transactions, for he does not again appear in the records.[56]

The grants of land which were received by Mendes, de Palacios, Israel and Solomons draw our attention to their political status in the British province. Alexander Solomons and Samuel Israel had been born probably in London; Mendes appears to have been a Jamaican. We do not know enough of the background of de Palacios to tell where he was born, but if he had not possessed proof of naturalization, he would not have qualified for grants of lots in Pensacola. The "Act to encourage Foreigners to come into and settle in this Province," passed by the House of Assembly of West Florida on December 22, 1766, and subsequently approved by Governor Johnstone, provided for the naturalization of foreigners in residence for a minimum of three months who were willing to take the oath of allegiance and to pay a small fee. Naturalized persons were to have the same "Immunities and Rights" as natural born citizens. This act was specifically designed to attract French Roman Catholics, and therefore noted that Catholics were to be treated the same as Protestants, and "upon being Naturalized . . . shall be Intitled to have and possess Town Lotts and Tracts of Land on the same conditions prescribed to his Majesty's Protestant Subjects." The act also guaranteed the free exercise of the Roman Catholic faith "because no People can be truly happy though under the greatest enjoyment of Civil Liberties if abridged of the freedom of their Consciences as to their Religious Professions." Lots were to be set aside in Pensacola and Mobile for the construction of Catholic "Churches or Chappels." The act further stipulated that Catholics were to be given the right to sit on juries and to cast ballots in elections. The only privilege not included was that of election or appointment to office. No list of naturalized foreigners has been located in the West Florida Papers, so it is impossible to tell whether de Palacios and Israel were naturalized there, or brought proof of their status with them from some area of previous residence. The Jewish religion was not mentioned in the act, but the freedom of conscience provision undoubtedly applied to these Jews, although there is no reason to believe that there were ever enough of them to form a quorum for religious worship.[57]

Meanwhile, Solomons, de Palacios and Israel continued to fulfill Major Farmar's assignments. In April, 1765, they billed him for £215.11.9; this included the purchase of boards and nails for a brig, hire of the brig, pilotage to Mobile, a lost anchor, and the transportation of some troops and their gear to the brig. Perhaps it was because they were so close to Farmar that Solomons joined twenty-one other inhabitants of West Florida in sending a complaint about Governor Johnstone's administration to the Lord Commissioners for Trade and Plantations, in April, 1766.[58]

The partners do not seem to have been particularly successful. In 1765 they purchased the well-known plantation outside of Mobile known as "Lis Loy," but had to mortgage it to a merchant in Pensacola who foreclosed on them the next year. In November, 1765, they borrowed £610 from John McGillivray, William Struthers and William Trewin, using their headquarters in Mobile and three Negro slaves as collateral. In 1767, Solomons mortgaged his town and garden lots in Pensacola to Patrick Morgan, who foreclosed in 1774. In 1767–69, the partners owned one less slave, for they paid taxes on only two. The tax was a dollar a head. The account of the Provincial Treasurer reads, in an amusing but informative shorthand, "Jews on 2." Things went from bad to worse: in 1769 de Palacios petitioned the West Florida Assembly for relief from imprisonment as a debtor to the Frenchman who had sold "Lis Loy" to the partners: "That the Petitioner was become Insolvent and had been Confined upwards of Two Years, and was reduced to the lowest Ebb for the want of necessary support . . . That he was confined at the Suit of a Monsieur Montberault of New Orleans who lately removed with his Family for Old France, and had left no Orders with his Attorney for the Releasement of the Petitioner." Within a month, de Palacios was free, but he apparently never succeeded in gaining a secure economic foothold.[59]

In 1773, de Palacios was in trouble again. A New Orleans citizen to whom he had been in debt for almost 3,000 livres since 1766 sued the court for permission to seize one of his slaves in New Orleans. At the trial a witness testified that the still insolvent Jew was "absent in Pensacola and . . . was accustomed to come to [New Orleans] without presenting himself to the public and . . . it was not easy to be able to see him on these occasions." In other words, de Palacios was still dodging his creditors, although he was obviously attempting to do some business.[60]

Samuel Israel is a vague, indistinct person. He never appears alone, but always as a member of the team. Perhaps he did not spend much time in the province.[61] Alexander Solomons was more successful than de Palacios; at least, there is no record of his having been imprisoned for debt. In 1770, Joseph Badon of Mobile mortgaged one hundred head of large horned cattle to Solomons as security for the payment of a bill of exchange for £150 on a Bordeaux merchant. Alexander's brother Haym, who was not a member of the firm, signed as a witness to this transaction and, again, a year and a half later, when the same mortgage was transferred to another merchant. Haym was a clerk for McGillivray and Struthers in Pensacola. He remained in West Florida longer than the others. On May 10, 1779, he was one of the "Gentlemen Freeholders and Principal Inhabitants of West Florida" who signed a petition to the Lord Secretaries of State. They pledged their loyalty to the Crown and affirmed their abhorrence of the Revolutionary ideas of the Atlantic coastal colonies, but protested against the favoritism and corruption of Governor Peter Chester's administration. When the Governor wrote to London in 1780 and denounced the signers of the petition, he belittled Haym Solomons as "a Hireling about Mr. McGillivary's home."[62]

In March, 1772, Alexander Solomons, "Late of Mobille in the Province . . . but now of the Town of Pensacola . . . Merchant," took a mortgage of five hundred and fifty Spanish milled dollars from Peter Rochon of Dog River, near Mobile, on fifty head of the "Largest and best Cattle" on his plantation. If the debt, plus accrued interest, were not paid by the clearance of a bill of exchange in Solomons' hands, Rochon was bound to supply "a sufficient number of Persons and Horses to Drive the aforesaid fifty Cattle to Pensacola," and defray the cost of slaughtering enough cattle to pay off the debt. The same month Solomons signed as a witness when a German couple sold some land near Natchez; he witnessed a second deed for the same people in 1774.[63]

De Palacios did not remain in British West Florida long enough to be there when the Spanish captured the colony in 1780–81. He was gone by 1778, when he took the oath of allegiance to the new state of South Carolina as a "transient person." But he was not a visitor for very long. He remained in Charleston, married there in 1785, and became an active member of the Jewish community.[64] Alexander Solomons disappears from view after 1774, but his brother Haym was still in West Florida when the Spanish under Gálvez took it from the British in 1780–81. He fled with William Struthers to Georgia, went up to Charleston to sell some skins, and decided to stay there. He had to be approved by a patriot committee whose duty it was to ferret out Loyalists. Haym presumably did not tell the committee about the petition of 1779 in which he pledged his loyalty to Great Britain. Gershom Cohen, who vouched for Haym as "a man of good character," probably knew nothing of that prior declaration either. Haym, who said he was born in England but left there when very young, may not have had very strong political opinions in any direction. He probably went along with the trend of the time, whatever it was wherever he happened to be. At any rate, he liked Charleston well enough to make his home there, carrying on an auction business until his death in 1801.[65]

9. The Arrival of a New Spanish Governor in New Orleans and the Expulsion of the Jews

Dreary as was the financial plight of de Palacios in British territory, Isaac Monsanto's fate was ultimately far worse. Though the continued residence in New Orleans of the Monsanto family, de Britto, Fastio and possibly other Jews of whom we have no knowledge,[66] was clearly in contravention of the Code Noir, Rochemore had been the only official who questioned their presence during the French regime. No one else seems to have attempted to dislodge them from their very comfortable and profitable position. Isaac Monsanto, above all, was as secure as he could desire to be. He conducted his business affairs, purchased property both real and movable, traveled freely throughout the colony and back and forth into such foreign areas as British West Florida, engaged in transactions which involved the Governor and other lesser officials, and sued in the courts and was sued. He also assumed an official legal role: in 1762, he acted as a translator for the Superior Court of Louisiana.[67]

But that same year, 1762, France and Spain signed the secret Treaty of Fontainebleau, in which the French ceded the Louisiana colony west of the Mississippi, and the city of New Orleans, to the Spanish. This was to compensate Spain for her loss of Florida to the British, in the general settlement which marked the end of the Seven Years' War. The news of this change of regime may have troubled Monsanto when it was formally made public, for he well knew that Spain had never tolerated the presence of Jews in her American colonies, and that Spanish economic policy was highly restrictive. But his fears, and those of other Louisianians, were lulled to sleep by Spain's long delay in taking formal possession of the new territory. It was not until March, 1766—more than three years after the treaty had been signed—that the new Spanish governor, Antonio de Ulloa, arrived in New Orleans. Ulloa was given so little support by Spain's colonial administrators that he was compelled to rely on his French predecessor, Captain Charles Philippe Aubry, to run the colony . . . further reason for Monsanto to relax. Very little had really changed. But in October, 1768, Ulloa published a list of new commercial regulations, quite in keeping with Spain's traditional colonial practice, which would have driven Monsanto and other merchants in New Orleans out of business. Resentment against these restrictive ordinances, and against other Spanish actions, aroused a number of French Creole leaders to such a pitch of indignation that they chased Ulloa out of the colony. While Monsanto took no part in the uprising, he probably agreed with the general sentiment that the Spanish would let the colony go without a fight. But he and other merchants and the leaders of the rebellion were very wrong in their decision to stay. Monsanto's delay in making plans to leave New Orleans proved to be very costly.

The second Spanish governor, Lieutenant General Don Alejandro O'Reilly, who reached New Orleans on August 17, 1769, was a different kind of man from Ulloa, and he had far stronger forces at his command than were ever given to Ulloa. O'Reilly was a soldier who had the fixed intention of remaking the unsuccessful French province into a genuine Spanish colony. He meant to enforce the law. His first attention was directed to the foolhardy revolutionaries who had refused to acknowledge the reality of the French cession of Louisiana to Spain, and who had succeeded in driving his predecessor out of Louisiana. Even while the rebel leaders were on trial, leading to their imprisonment or execution,[68] O'Reilly set about guaranteeing stricter enforcement of the Spanish colonial trade regulations.

On September 1, 1769, John Fitzpatrick, the British commercial agent in New Orleans, reported to his employers in Pensacola that ". . . Things are in a very Critical State here at present as the General Will not Allow any foreigners to Vend their Merchant Dise here in Future; they are allowed to Dispose of what they had in Store before his Arrival of which they ware all Obliged to give in an Inventory to him. . . .” Seven days later, he wrote, “I intend Leaving this place shortly as all English subjects who are not Married or have no fixed settlements [farms] here are Ordered away by His Excellency General O Relly . . . No English Subject is allowed to land any thing here. . . .” On September 11, Fitzpatrick told another British firm that “it is Immagined that all the English Subjects here will Shortly be obliged to leave it which is Reasonable to Expect being Universally known the Spanish Government will not allow any Foreigners in their American settlems. therefore we Must submit to their Accustomed Rules of Government. Altho such as has any outstanding Debts rely on his Excellency’s Clemency for Time to recover them the result of wch God only knows.” Unable to secure an extension for the collection of debts, he placed his papers in the hands of a local merchant, and, on September 21, reported that he intended leaving for Mobile the following day.[69]

O’Reilly approached his problem systematically: first the British, then other businessmen. Since it was impossible for any merchant to have observed to the letter every Spanish commercial regulation which had been promulgated during Governor Ulloa’s ineffectual administration, O’Reilly had no difficulty in nailing all of them with charges of illegal trade. On October 17, 1769, he wrote to Fray Julian de Arriaga, Minister of the Indies, that he had obtained a confession of guilt from two Genevan brothers named Duraldes “who were dealing in diamonds, watches, gold caskets and other jewelry, galloons, laces and other costly goods . . . [in] illegal trade [with] Campeche and Vera Cruz. . . .” He ordered these brothers and twelve other merchants to leave the province before the end of October, “together with three Jews named Monsanto, Mets,[70] and Brito,[71] who had also made some illegal shipments and had correspondents in Vera Cruz, Campeche, the nearby presidios, and other places.”[72] O’Reilly believed that he had broken the back of illegal trade by requiring the departure of all of these merchants: “By pursuing this same course with equal care, I can assure you that the value of the illegal shipments which can be made from this colony to the other dominions of the King in America will be very small. This is the important objective."[73]

There is no extant document in which O'Reilly proclaimed the expulsion of all foreign Protestant and Jewish merchants, but this was the understanding of O'Reilly's intention among the British officials in the West Florida Province, who were following developments in New Orleans very closely. Lieutenant-Governor Montfort Browne reported to London on October 8, 1769, that, after the rebel leaders had been sentenced, ". . . a General Pardon to the Rest of the Inhabitants has since been published most of whom have taken the oath of Allegiance to the King of Spain; such as would not were allowed a Month's time to Settle their affairs and Depart, the English to a man and all protestants and Jews are driven from there; Count O'Rilly is detested for his Inhumanity and falsehood. . . ."[74]

In a communication to his superiors, dated October 17, 1769, O'Reilly seemed to refer to the religion of the Jews as a major factor in the decision to expel them: "There are to leave this province during the current month two Jews, named Brito and Mets, and before the end of the next month the Jew Monsanto, for the reason that all three are undesirable on account of the nature of their business and of the religion they profess."[75] Isaac Monsanto, who had gotten along so well with the easygoing French officials, especially with Governors Kerlérec and D'Abbadie, was apparently unable to believe that O'Reilly was serious about the order of expulsion. He misunderstood the reason, and assured the new Governor that he had not taken any part in the ill-fated rebellion, and was loyal to the new administration. Unfortunately this Monsanto letter cannot be located; he may even have offered to take the oath of allegiance to the Spanish King. But, on December 26, 1769, O'Reilly rejected Monsanto's appeal, although the deadline for his departure had obviously been delayed:

> "In regard to the demand which you have made to me, Monsieur, concerning the conduct which you have maintained in this colony during the uprising which took place here, I render you the full justice which is due you, and [state] that you were not opposed to the Government of his Most Catholic Majesty.

> "The departure which I require of you and your entire family is specifically a consequence of an order of the King which expressly forbids all Jews from residing in this state.
>
> "I am, Monsieur, etc."[76]

But O'Reilly was not telling the entire truth to Isaac Monsanto. Fitzpatrick knew and accepted the facts of life; he was willing to recognize that the Spanish Governor's motive was primarily economic. Religion and nationality were really secondary. O'Reilly was finding one way or another of ridding his colony of almost all of its successful merchants, including some of the wealthiest Frenchmen who had every right to remain.[77] O'Reilly wanted Spanish authority to dominate the colony's economic life. That the Jewishness of Monsanto and his partners was not a major factor in their expulsion is confirmed by the Spaniards' failure to disturb a petty country storekeeper like Isaac Fastio who, in all probability, had long since left New Orleans to set up business in Pointe Coupee. As we have already noted, de Palacios was in and out of New Orleans during early Spanish rule; he had to dodge his creditors, but the civil authorities did not try to exclude him because he was a Jew. Moreover, as we shall shortly see, it was only a brief time before one or another member of the Monsanto family visited Louisiana or returned there to live. Ultimately all of them resumed residence in Louisiana under Spanish rule, and seem not to have been challenged by any official. Perhaps, then, the truth went even deeper than Fitzpatrick imagined. Too much economic power may have been concentrated in the hands and strongboxes of the seventeen or so merchants who were expelled, and of the rebels whose wealth was confiscated. If so great a proportion of the commerce of New Orleans were monopolized by a small number of merchants, what gain would Spain derive from the colony? Certain it is that the edict of expulsion was tantamount to the confiscation of the assets of the merchants who were affected by O'Reilly's edict.

The partners had probably been trying desperately to arrange the Monsanto firm's affairs, to collect debts and sell off their holdings, but due to the scarcity of cash and the disoriented state of commercial affairs, they had as little success as Fitzpatrick, and they were far more deeply involved than he. The lack of specie among their local customers was only one part of the problem. Their transactions covered such a wide geographic area and transportation was so slow that it was actually impossible for them to settle their accounts in three months. Hundreds of firms and individuals in the Mississippi valley and in the Caribbean area were in their debt, and they in turn owed money to suppliers as far away as Europe. Even a year would not have given them enough time to round out their affairs and close their books. They were, therefore, compelled to place their fate and fortune in the hands of men who probably had no interest in seeing that they would receive any proceeds from the settlement of their affairs. By December 18 Monsanto and his partners had drawn up memoranda listing their debits and credits; these, together with all of their papers and files, were turned over to two court-appointed syndics or receivers, Nicholas Forstall and Jean Joseph Duforest.[78]

Although it is clear that Monsanto's firm was one of the largest in New Orleans, it is impossible to assess his net worth at the time of his expulsion. The documents relating to his affairs are known only in manuscript and printed summaries, and in papers scattered through the Spanish and French manuscripts in the safe of the Cabildo in New Orleans. It cannot even be discerned if Monsanto's debts outweighed his credits, but this is unlikely. The settlement of his New Orleans business interests continued for many years; in 1785, fifteen years after his expulsion, two hundred and sixty-nine separate files of bills, accounts, receipts, memoranda, deeds, contracts and notes were still in the hands of syndics, but the notarized list does not give their dates or any hint of their contents. For at least two more years, suits were still being entered in the New Orleans courts by creditors seeking their share of the remaining property. The two sets of syndics had undoubtedly eaten up a great deal of the assets while distribution was taking place. It is important to note, however, that beyond Isaac Monsanto's constant need for cash, a perennial problem in the colonial areas, there was no sign that he was in financial difficulty before the expulsion. Monsanto's was a large and prosperous business until O'Reilly's order.[79]

10. The Monsanto Family in Exile

What alternatives were open to the Monsanto clan as they prepared to leave New Orleans? They could have attempted to convert to the Roman Catholic faith in the hope of being permitted to remain in Louisiana, but Isaac was apparently too loyal to his ancestral faith to follow this course of action; had he desired to abandon Judaism he would have done so long before danger arose—for he and his family had already been subjected to the constant pressure of the dominant faith for many years. It is, however, not even certain that apostasy would have secured the remission of O'Reilly's order. The Governor's successor, Colonel Don Luis de Unzaga y Amézaga, who took command of Louisiana in March, 1770, indicated this quite firmly in a letter which he wrote during his first month in office: "In all our realms of America it is forbidden by law to admit any foreigners, not even the French, who are Christians [i.e. Roman Catholics] being exempt from this law, much less persons recently converted for their own private ends."[80] If they could not remain in New Orleans, then, where should they go? They could seek refuge in the nearest mainland colony beyond the Spanish frontier, that is, in the British West Florida capital of Pensacola, where Isaac had done business over the years, where there were already a number of Jews in business (although, as we have seen, they were none too successful), and where other refugees were fleeing.[81] But was trade in Pensacola brisk enough for Isaac to support his large household? Jamaica or one of the British seaboard colonies, such as South Carolina, Palacios' eventual destination, would offer another opportunity for a fresh start, but Monsanto had apparently not established very fruitful contacts in these areas. Saint-Domingue was even more promising because Isaac had relatives and correspondents in that French island, and its life and trading conditions were not dissimilar to those of Louisiana. The actual decision was to move to the closest possible point, Pensacola.

Precisely when Isaac Monsanto and the members of his household left New Orleans is not recorded in any document.

It may be that they arrived in Pensacola as early as January 11, 1770, for Isaac signed a promissory note on that day to John Waugh of London, "Mariner," for 457 milled dollars, equal to £106.12.8, mortgaging his slaves Prince and Princess as security. It is entirely possible that Waugh was the captain of the ship on which the family left New Orleans, and that, being unable to pay for their passage and the transportation of whatever luggage and possessions they brought with them, Isaac had to execute a note for the expenses of the trip.[82] On June 1, 1770, Isaac borrowed 435 Spanish milled dollars, 5 and ¾ reales, at eight per cent interest from his old correspondents John McGillivray and William Struthers. His Negro slaves Caesar and Dolly were the collateral. The deed begins, "I, Isaac Monsanto late of New Orleans, now of the Town of Pensacola in the province. . . ."[83] How many of the members of his household came with him is in doubt. It is possible that Isaac's brothers scattered in various directions in an effort to find safety and security. Certain it is that Manuel was expected to turn up at the Natchitoches Post in the spring of 1770. On June 16, 1770, Athanase de Mézières y Cluny, Lieutenant-Governor of Natchitoches, reported to Governor Unzaga:

> "Of the two Englishmen whom I have sent to your Lordship's presence and [notice of whose] return to this villa you deigned to give me under date of May 15, last, only Guillermo Ovarden [William Warden] has arrived; concerning him and Señor Manuel Monsantto I am punctually fulfilling my orders from your Lordship. . . ."[84]

Whether Manuel attempted to reach Natchitoches is not recorded. If he did, the likelihood is that he was turned away.[85]

For the time being, at least, there was no place in Spanish Louisiana in which the Monsanto family could reside. But they could be closer to the colony than Pensacola. John Fitzpatrick traveled from New Orleans to Mobile, and then journeyed to the settlement of Manchac on the Mississippi River at the junction of the Iberville River, within a very few months. Fitzpatrick chose Manchac because he knew that there would be ample opportunity for trade with the inhabitants of Spanish Louisiana since "in all Likelyhood Goods henceforward will be very Scarce in Orleans," and the French and Spaniards "will always find Means to pay for What they want; in Deer skins Indigo Cotton Tobaco Rice & Cash." The Monsanto brothers had either maintained a storehouse in Manchac all along, or got there first and established themselves in one of the few serviceable structures. When Fitzpatrick arrived he complained about "the heavy Expencess my precipitated Departure from Orleans has Caused, Occasioned by Genel. Oreyleys ill natured proceedings; also in Building my self a house as none here was Habitable Except them Occupied before my Arrival by Monsantos Brothers & Mr. Bradley. . . ."[86] Fitzpatrick reported on August 30, 1770, that one of the Monsanto brothers was expected back in Manchac from New Orleans in the near future. From that time on, one of the brothers was usually in the Manchac settlement, which was their headquarters, participating in the brisk, illegal trade that sprang up over the border of the Mississippi River despite the Spanish prohibition of traffic with the British merchants.[87]

Whether Isaac actually established residence in Pensacola is not known. He appears in the court records from time to time, usually in reference to loans and debts. On November 9, 1771, John Scott secured a judgement for £212.8, with interest, against Monsanto in the General Court of Pleas. Monsanto mortgaged his slaves Caesar, Dolly, Prince and Princess, to Scott. The debt was paid on March 28, 1772. Two days later Isaac was writing to Brigadier General Frederick Haldimand asking for a loan of two hundred piastres to be repaid in a few months, with the slave Jen as surety. He also reported that one of the Duralde brothers, his fellow exiles from New Orleans, had absconded to Saint-Domingue, and that their cargo of plank boards and other merchandise, just arrived, was no help at all to the Duraldes' creditors (including both Haldimand and Monsanto). Obviously, Monsanto was not the only former New Orleans merchant who was in desperate straits as a result of O'Reilly's order of expulsion. On January 25, 1772, Isaac mortgaged his slave Fanchonet to John Ritson of Pensacola for 270 Spanish milled dollars. The slaves were apparently the only property he had been permitted to carry with him from New Orleans. He mortgaged them again and again, to raise money for investment in trade goods which he or his brothers sold wherever they could. In March, 1772, he mortgaged the perennial Caesar, Dolly, Prince and Princess to John Stuart, Superintendent of Indian Affairs of the Southern British colonies, with whom he had been doing business since 1765. The deed was registered in December, and Stuart had to foreclose on Prince and Princess in February, 1773.[88]

While the brothers were attempting to reestablish themselves in business in Manchac, Angélica remained in Pensacola long enough to be courted by and married to George Urquhart, a young Protestant Scotsman who had been in Pensacola since 1766. Urquhart had done business with Isaac previous to the expulsion, and witnessed a deed for him in June, 1770. Urquhart family tradition reports that the marriage took place early in 1772 in Pensacola. By July 30, 1772, George was at his plantation on the British side of the Mississippi, writing a letter to Angélica in New Orleans addressed to "Madame Urquhart." She was probably on her way from Pensacola to her husband's plantation, "Semhas Vale." The letter, interestingly enough, is addressed to her in care of "Monsr. Forestall;" she was staying with one of the syndics of Isaac's property! Her older son, Thomas, was born in Baton Rouge on June 25, 1773.[89] However long some members of the family remained in Pensacola, at least one of them, Eleanora, went on to Saint-Domingue to join the brother and sister who lived there. She was married to Pierre André Tessier de Villauchamps at Cap Français on that island on February 7, 1773. Her first child, Charles André Tessier, was born there on October 3, 1775. The next year the Tessier family moved to Louisiana, bringing Eleanora back home.[90]

Isaac seems to have been unable to reestablish himself in business to any degree. Previously a strong, bold man of affairs who was willing to undertake any venture, he strikes a pathetic figure from 1770 until his death in 1778. Constantly borrowing money, he apparently was unable to fight his way back to financial security. Perhaps the Spanish confiscation had not only driven him from home and familiar surroundings, but also had broken his will. Some indication of Isaac's financial condition may be gathered from the petition which Gracia, Angélica and Eleanora submitted to the New Orleans court and Governor Unzaga some time between 1770 and 1773, in which they asked that the amount of 1,095 pesos and 6 reales, which they had left on deposit with Isaac from their inheritance from their father, be granted them from the assets of his firm in the hands of the syndics. They said that Isaac "having been obliged to leave this city because of the laws of the Kingdom, and leave his business unfinished . . . is in complete poverty because of his great losses . . . the said brother not having that sum of money. . . ." They may have been exaggerating to some degree, but Isaac's situation was certainly well known; Governor Unzaga would not have acceded to their request if he had believed that Isaac could well afford to repay his sisters.[91]

John Fitzpatrick had no liking for Isaac when they were both in New Orleans. In exile, Fitzpatrick mocked him when he appeared at Manchac in December, 1773:

> ". . . Mr. Isaac Monsanto came here the Other day & had some Cotton Checks for sale & as I was in Much want of [them] And as he . . . sold them very Cheap I bought to the Amount off $102, and drew on your house [Miller and Swanson of Mobile] for the payment, as I imagined you would have no Cash to disburse in the affair; I hope you will not think hard of my Drawing on you; for if I thought you should have the money to pay, I should not have drawn on you. . . ."[92]

In other words, Isaac Monsanto could go hang for the money, even though the goods were cheap, and Fitzpatrick needed them!

In November, 1774, Isaac was staying with Angélica and George Urquhart near Baton Rouge. The next month, he spent at least nine days in New Orleans, recording his power of attorney to Francisco Liotau, and swearing to the settlement of all accounts (from the French days) between himself and the estate of one Grimaul. The latter notarial record describes Isaac as "passing through the city."[93] In June, 1775, he was in Pointe Coupee, where Manuel, and Eleanora and her family had settled. He was in some kind of business deal with George Urquhart at the time, and had correspondence with Oliver Pollock of New Orleans about it.[94] By the time of his death in April or May of 1778, he had apparently settled in a house on the land of François Allain in Pointe Coupee. The inventory of his affairs was in no way as complicated as the lists of business transactions he left behind in New Orleans in 1769–70. His personal property was valued at 4,550 piastres; it consisted of trunks, furniture, clothing, a cypress strong box containing 400 livres, some books, a perpetual almanac, a pistol and a clock; he also had some merchandise which included two cases of sugar and a container of coffee. One side of the house had been used as Isaac's store, and a small cabin had served as his storehouse. He owed 5,765 piastres, while his customers were indebted to him for 24,955 piastres. He had sold five slaves to Manuel and Jacob the previous November. Such was the end of Isaac's business career: from a large warehouse in New Orleans, with ventures on three continents, to an insignificant little store in Pointe Coupee.[95]

11. Matters of Religious Identification and Practice

There is no question but that Louisiana became an exception to the traditional Spanish colonial policy of rigid exclusion of Jews. Once the Monsanto family had been driven out of New Orleans and had been deprived of their position of prominence in its commerce, they were allowed to return without interference; and Isaac Fastio seems not to have been disturbed at all, probably because his commercial activity was too minor to interest O'Reilly. But the members of the Monsanto family revealed an equally indifferent attitude to Judaism. They had, in the first place, moved away from Curaçao with its synagogue, its large Jewish community and its flourishing Jewish life, and deliberately chose to live in New Orleans, where there was only a small handful of Jews. It is possible that they tried for a time to observe Jewish religious customs in their home, but there is no evidence of this; certainly objection would have been voiced if they had attempted to conduct Jewish religious services during the French regime. They had remained in New Orleans for eleven or twelve years without contact with organized Jewish life. Now that they were compelled to leave

Louisiana, at least partly because of their religion, they did not choose to establish residence in a place like Charleston or Curaçao where they would be able to participate in a full Jewish life. They either could not or would not stay away from Louisiana. Whether it was Isaac's fear of his inability to re-establish himself elsewhere, or an unrealistic expectation that he would be able to regain control of his affairs in Louisiana, or a strong sense of belonging which all of the brothers and sisters had developed for the colony, the specific motivation really makes no difference. The important fact is that the family refused to take advantage of this opportunity to move to some community where they could practice Judaism. While there is no evidence that the brothers and sisters ever held a family meeting to determine what role Jewish identification would play in their future, it is hardly a coincidence that none of the three sisters married during their time of residence in New Orleans, with its large male population, while they did marry so soon after their enforced departure from the city—Angélica and Gracia in British West Florida and Eleanora in Saint-Domingue, all three to non-Jews. It is almost as though they had attempted to preserve their identity, if only in a negative way, while they were in New Orleans, but subsequently decided to bow to circumstances, to take on the protective coloration of the environment, to act for all practical purposes as though they had been born Christians, and to ignore the religion in which they had been reared but which was now only a memory. In a certain sense, the Monsanto brothers and sisters became Marranos, Jews living like Christians in the eyes of the outside world, without, however, making any effort to preserve their ancestral heritage in secret—in fact, they became secularists, because Judaism no longer meant anything to them, and Christianity did not arouse their interest. This is the only interpretation which can be given to their behavior.

Before sketching the further events of the lives of the Monsanto brothers and sisters, it may be useful to assess the available evidence relating to their personal, individual religious convictions and identification throughout the years after the expulsion.

Benjamin, the youngest member of the clan, was the only brother who took a bride, and the only Louisiana sibling who married within the faith. In 1787 he married Clara la Mota, the twenty-two-year-old daughter of Solomon la Mota and Rica Coen of Curaçao, who had been in New Orleans at least since the previous September, when she purchased a female slave.[96] We do not know why Clara came to New Orleans, whether to marry Benjamin or for another reason. The possibility exists, at any rate, that Benjamin had visited Curaçao on a business trip and fallen in love with her there, bringing her to New Orleans later. In Curaçao they might have been married in the synagogue. In New Orleans, they underwent strict Spanish Catholic legal procedures: Benjamin had to provide witnesses to testify that he was a bachelor, that he had not promised to marry anyone else, and that he had his brother Manuel's permission to marry. He and Clara affirmed that they had been baptized in the Catholic faith at birth. This was obviously untrue, because Benjamin's attendance at the Jewish school at The Hague in 1753–54 is documented in that community's records. But this affirmation proves that Benjamin was not a convert, for in that case he would have offered evidence of his adult baptism.[97]

Nevertheless, the wedding had to take place in the St. Louis Parish Church of New Orleans because there was no other place in town where a wedding could be held, and no person other than a Catholic priest could officiate. Father Antonio de Sedella, later known affectionately as Père Antoine, stated in his ecclesiastical record of the ceremony that Benjamin, "together with his contracting party, made public abjuration of their errors in the mode and form which is prescribed in her ritual, Our Mother the Holy Church. . . ."[98] Roman Catholic authorities have been unable to explain the meaning of this phrase; according to present practice, the formula refers to the Profession of Faith which is made by converts before baptism. But neither Benjamin nor Clara appears in the St. Louis Cathedral Baptismal Registers! It is possible that the officiating priest used both the convert's formula and the affirmation of baptism at birth in order to protect himself from possible ecclesiastical censure for officiating at the wedding of non-Catholics, for it was not until 1792 that special regulations were issued for the registration of the weddings of non-Catholic (Protestant) persons by Catholic priests in Louisiana. The entire matter becomes even more confused and ironic when we realize that only a few months later—on July 21, 1787—Governor Miró was officially notified that Father de Sedella had been designated Commissioner of the Holy Inquisition in Louisiana, and, because he feared the effect this news would have on the many Protestant British and American settlers whom he wished to encourage to remain in the colony, Miró forbade the priest to exercise this function and hustled him out of New Orleans.[99] We have no way of knowing whether Père Antoine knew that the bridal couple was Jewish, but Benjamin and Clara do not seem to have attempted to hide their origin in Natchez, where they lived most of the time. Even a stranger who visited the town in 1790–91 heard that they were Jews. Major Samuel S. Forman, who traveled down the Mississippi from Ohio to Natchez, wrote in the account of his trip that "in the village of Natchez resided Monsieur and Madam Mansanteo—Spanish Jews, I think—who were the most kind and hospitable of people."[100] But in 1785, when Benjamin testified as a witness at the trial of Jorge Rapalie for treason, the record states that "having taken due oath on the Holy Gospels according to the usage of his religion, he was asked whether he swore by God and promised the King to speak the truth upon the points on which he will be questioned."[101] This was the customary oath taken by the Protestants in the Spanish colony, especially in the Natchez area, where there were large numbers of them. The record of Benjamin's death on September 30, 1794, is couched in the standard, formal phrases which were used for all Catholics; he was buried in St. Louis Cemetery No. 1.[102] Benjamin's will, dictated the day before his death, but not signed by him because he was already so weak, began with pious Catholic formulas of faith which the notary may have inscribed automatically. Benjamin did, however, request "three masses for the repose of my soul." We have no way of telling what these Catholic rites meant to him.[103] Clara married a second time; she followed the example of her sisters-in-law when she became the wife of a non-Jew, Captain William Scott, some time before

1800.[104] Clara and William Scott had one child which was baptized as a Catholic at its death at the age of two in April, 1802.[105] Clara herself was buried in the St. Louis Cemetery No. 1, after her death on July 19, 1822, at the age of fifty-seven. Her funeral mass was conducted by the same Père Antoine who had married her to Benjamin thirty-five years before.[106]

Of Eleanora's religious experience we know nothing other than a few ritual records. Her grandchild, Marie-Eulalie Roques, was baptized at St. Louis Church on September 5, 1798, with Clara acting as godmother. But Eleanora had already died and been buried from the Church on April 8, 1796. Her funeral record, unlike the others, fails to use the customary formula relating to last rites.[107] Gracia's husband, Thomas Topham, was British, and was therefore probably a Protestant. Her will, dated December 8, 1790, does not mention religious matters, but her Catholic funeral record, January 3, 1791, uses the customary ritual formulas.[108] Both Jacob and Manuel took oaths "by God and the Cross, according to law," when they testified in the New Orleans court on June 28, 1785, in one of the final hearings relating to the disposition of Isaac's property.[109] Manuel had several slaves baptized in St. Gabriel Church, at the Iberville Post, south of Baton Rouge, on April 22 and 23, 1781, but this would not necessarily be proof of anything—even Jews who were synagogue members in later periods did not express any interest in converting their slaves to Judaism.[110] Jacob left no will, but he, too, was buried from St. Louis Church, on June 5, 1789.[111] Manuel wrote two wills. In the first, dated March 8, 1792, he contributed "two reales for each of the Churches of the city," and bequeathed a pearl rosary to his sister Angélica. Both bequests were omitted from his second will, February 23, 1795, which was necessitated by the sudden death of Benjamin. Had he already given the rosary to Angélica?[112] Manuel's death on July 10, 1796, is recorded without the usual description of last rites. It is impossible, of course, to tell whether various priests entered their records differently, one in a more cautious, another in a more mechanical fashion, or if, indeed, this sort of omission has any significance at all.[113]

Actually, we are attempting to do the impossible when we try to assess any person's religious feelings solely on the basis of formal records. Who can tell what any religious ceremony, of any faith, means to another person? Human emotions are so variable that a religious service may have a more profound effect one day than it does the next. All we possibly can do is surmise that since the Monsanto siblings were born into Judaism, and we have been unable to discover a record of conversion to Christianity of any one of them, they must therefore have been no more devoted to Christianity than to Judaism.

There is one exception to this generalization: Angélica, who eventually seems to have become a devoted member of the Episcopal Church. If so, this was due to the influence of her second husband, Dr. Robert Dow, whose father had been a Presbyterian minister in Scotland, and who was an early leader of Christ Church of New Orleans, founded in 1805. Dow was senior warden of the Church from 1807 to 1815 and was a close friend of Bishop Philander Chase while he was serving in New Orleans. Members of the family recall hearing about a copy of the Episcopal Book of Common Prayer which Dr. Dow had presented to Angélica.[114] Her will, dated June 16, 1821, in contradistinction to the formalized statements utilized in the wills of some of her brothers and sisters, seems to express sincere, personal piety:

> ". . . I commend my soul to the Lord of life, steadfastly believing that through the merit and satisfaction of His Son, Jesus Christ, I shall obtain pardon for my transgressions, and that having finished these days of misery and mortality, I shall inherit everlasting quiet, and I give my body to the earth, whereof it was made, to be decently interred without any pomp or superfluous expense, in humble hope, that it shall rise a glorious body at the general resurrection. . . ."[115]

Doctor Dow was not guided by Angélica's wish for modesty. The tomb he erected over her grave was one of the most striking in the Girod Street Cemetery and, after the relocation of the remains of those buried therein, the obelisk was removed to the Louisiana State Museum on Jackson Square: "The singular monument consisted of a freestone obelisk surmounting a brick tomb. On it, in high relief, was carved a skull and crossbones, a grim memorial that could well have been conceived by a man of medicine. The words 'Memento Mori' are chiseled beneath it and the date '1821' above it."[116] On the front of the monument were carved the words: "SACRED/ to the memory of/ ANGÉLICA/ consort of/ Doctor Dow/ died Oct. 21, 1821,/ aged 72 years./ Whose deportment as a Wife,/ a Mother and a member of Society,/ was too conspicuous,/ to require Eulogium,/ being rarely equaled/ and never excelled." Among the Urquhart family papers is a manuscript eulogy of Angélica written by General James Wilkinson of military and conspiratorial fame; in it, Wilkinson referred to Angélica's religious fervor:

> ". . . This lady was a member of the Episcopal Church, a regular communicant at the Lord's table, she was pious without profession, and religious without affectation . . . in conversation with an old friend who had visited her not more than twelve hours before her decease she observed: 'I now feel so well that I think I may live five or six years longer, to-morrow being Sunday I will go to Church and give thanks to God for his goodness to me.' The intention was known to Him from whom no secret is hidden and we trust the immortal spirit has received the reward of those who die in the Lord. . . ."[117]

It is ironic that of all the members of the family who had participated in religious functions of one kind or another in the St. Louis Catholic Church—where she and Robert Dow were married on September 9, 1781[118]—Angélica alone should have become not only a sincere Christian, but a Protestant Christian! Angélica's adoption of Christianity may be explained by either of two factors: perhaps she possessed a natural bent towards piety—if Judaism could not be her religion in any genuine sense, then she would become a Christian; or, more likely, her gratitude and attachment to Dr. Dow were so strong that she said to him, like Ruth of old, "thy God shall be my God."

At least one of the Fastio girls, on the other hand, was formally converted to Roman Catholicism. Elizabeth, who gave her age as thirty-two, was baptized on April 4, 1782, at St. Francis Church in Pointe Coupee. If her age is correct, she is probably the daughter who was listed as Judica, age six, in the Bordeaux embarkation records of 1756. Elizabeth's conversion had nothing, apparently, to do with marriage, since it was three years before she was married, in the New Orleans St. Louis Church, to John George Noeherberg or Noerberg, a native of Philadelphia, who was a Protestant. Elizabeth died in New Orleans in 1796, and was buried in St. Louis Cemetery No. 1. Nothing else is known of the life of the other Fastio girls or of their mother. If Elizabeth's sisters married at all, it must have been out of the faith, just as the Monsanto girls did; and Ester Fastio, like her husband, probably died under Catholic auspices, just as, to all intents and purposes, they had lived as nominal Catholics.[119]

12. Gracia Monsanto and Thomas Topham

The West Florida Protestant marriage records cannot be located anywhere, but it may have been in Manchac rather than in Pensacola that Gracia was married to Thomas Topham. During the period 1772–77 he was applying for grants of acreage and town lots in the Manchac area.[120] John Fitzpatrick referred to Topham as a partner of one Proffit in the Natchez area in 1776.[121] Topham had written Isaac's will on January 1 and April 12, 1778, but he pleaded the pressure of business after Isaac's death, and was not present as an executor at the inventory which was taken beginning on May 7.[122] He did, however, make an appearance at the inventory of Angélica's husband's estate in February, 1779.[123] On April 12 of that year he and Gracia sold a lot and two houses, located in Ascension Parish, to Jacques Cantrelle.[124] In June, 1780, he sold two slaves to Angélica.[125] He was still in business with Proffit in 1780, but this is the final reference to him which has come to light, prior to September 22, 1784, when Gracia received 5,669 pesos from Manuel and Jacob and Robert Dow which they had set aside for her from her deceased husband's estate. There was a dispute over Topham's affairs with merchants in London, which had to be settled by arbitration; this London reference suggests that Topham had originally come from England.[126] Since we know so little of Topham's business life, it is difficult to venture any statements about him. His will cannot be found, but Gracia's, executed in 1790, indicates that she led a fairly comfortable life: in addition to unspecified amounts of cash, she bequeathed nine slaves to her brothers and sisters and her Urquhart and Tessier nephews and niece. Among the prized possessions which she named in her will and specified as gifts to various relatives were: a large mirror, a large chair with arms, a silver setting for twenty-four, a porcelain coffee pot with matching cups, shoe buckles, two damask table cloths, two dozen napkins, and a picture painted on glass. These provisions reflect a meticulous, sentimental woman who cherished the things she touched, a loyal and affectionate sister and aunt who distributed her possessions in such a manner that each member of her family received something from her.[127]

13. Eleanora Monsanto and Pierre Tessier

We know somewhat more about Eleanora's life after her marriage to Pierre Tessier in Saint-Domingue in 1773 and her return to Louisiana in 1776. She seems to have been the only one of the Monsanto sisters to make a really bad match. In November, 1779, she was desperate enough to go to court to petition for a property separation from her husband. He was then in prison as a debtor; his liabilities amounted to 1,579 pesos, while his land, house, outbuildings and four slaves in Pointe Coupee were worth only about 1,570 pesos. Her dowry at the time of the marriage had been 6,000 livres with an additional 2,000 livres in linen, jewelry, silverware, and the like. (Where did all this come from, in 1773, when Isaac had so little? From Eleanora's brother Joseph and sister Judith in Saint-Domingue, where the marriage took place?) Tessier had made a gift of 4,000 livres to her at that time. Now, she complained, he had been so cavalier with her funds that the only remaining assets which could possibly replenish her dowry account were the land, house and slaves, which the creditors were attempting to take away from her. She petitioned the court, therefore, to assign to her all of the assets of the family, to declare her free of responsibility for Pierre's debts, and to grant her complete control over the remaining property without the need of consulting her husband. This is the earliest recorded case of such a suit in Spanish Louisiana judicial history. Eleanora's attorney contended that Tessier's "bad conduct" accounted for the shrinkage of his own and Eleanora's property, and assured the court that she could be trusted with control "because of her good conduct and executive ability." The witnesses on her behalf, George Castles, Marcos Olivares and Angélica's husband-to-be, Dr. Robert Dow, testified that "they have known Pedro Andres Tessier, at Pointe Coupee, for a long time, he is an abandoned man, possessed of many vices and bad, dissipated habits. He is unable to work and it is also well known how he has wasted the greater part of his wife's dowry." Strong words—strong enough to persuade Governor Gálvez to approve the petition, and to instruct the Commandant at Pointe Coupee, Don Carlos de Grandpré, to conduct an inventory of the Tessier property, with the creditors as witnesses.[128] One of the first things Eleanora did was to get rid of three of the slaves by selling them to her brother-in-law-to-be, Dr. Dow.[129] What ultimately happened to Pierre Tessier cannot be discovered. He apparently outlived Eleanora, for she is not described as a widow in her death record. But she was a good manager; when her daughter Marie-Eulalie married Pierre Roques in May, 1795, Eleanora was able to give her a dowry of 3,000 pesos, although part of this money may have come by inheritance from Eleanora's siblings.[130] Her son, Charles André Tessier, redeemed the family name from the dishonor which Pierre's dissolute conduct had cast upon it. Beginning in 1796 he served as Secretary of the Spanish colonial government. After the Louisiana Purchase, he became an aide-de-camp to Governor William C. C. Claiborne, achieving the rank of Major in the Territorial Militia, and held the office of Parish Judge in East Baton Rouge from 1815 to 1846. On August 13, 1813, Governor Claiborne wrote of him to Secretary of War John Armstrong:

> ". . . This Gentleman is a native of Louisiana, and a member of an extensive and influential family [;] his education has been respectable, & he has acquired by Traveling a considerable knowledge of the man [sic] and of things.—To a very commanding > graceful person he unites the most polished manners, and altho' his partiality for the ladies may have betrayed him into some imprudencies, his deportment has been so conciliatory, & his integrity, bravery & honor so well established that his acquaintances hold him in very high estimation.—Tessier during the Territorial Government was one of my aids and is now a Major in the Militia of the State.—I think him worthy of a like Commission in the Regular service;—But if this cannot be obtained I recommend him for a Captaincy. . . ."

So far had the son gained acceptance among his fellow-citizens that they identified him with his prosperous and civic-minded cousins, Angélica's sons, Thomas and David Urquhart, rather than with his worthless father. We may be certain that Angélica, with her strong sense of family unity, had a good deal to do with encouraging her nephew.[131]

14. Angélica Monsanto and George Urquhart

Angélica's life was the longest, happiest and most fruitful of all. Her first husband, George Urquhart, who had come to Pensacola in February or March of 1766, was born in Aberdeenshire, Scotland, in the mid-1730's; his mother was a Forbes of Blackton. He may have been in Middlesex County, England, before his journey to America. He secured generous grants of land shortly after his arrival, and achieved swift recognition as a leader in the colony. In 1766, he was appointed Deputy Collector of His Majesty's Customs at Pensacola; in 1771 he signed as a witness at the treaty between the administration and the Congress of Chiefs of the Upper Creek Tribes. His first expectation was to become a planter in the Pensacola area, but his original land grant was not fertile enough; he secured another near the Tunica village, but in 1772 decided to settle on the Mississippi opposite Louisiana. Meanwhile he had been engaged in various business transactions, and had borrowed money in fairly large amounts. Once in the Manchac area, he served as a Justice of the Peace, and succeeded in apprehending the murderers of some nearby French people; he also was a member of the Assembly of the Province. Urquhart was a dynamic, aggressive man in the best sense of the word, a builder, a good pioneer for such an area as British West Florida. He died in February, 1779, of "a Sore Breast and cough which turned into consumption." Angélica for a time considered the possibility of leaving Louisiana and moving to Scotland with her children, but George's mother thought she would be wise not to do so, in view of the distance and her own age.[132] It was probably to be near her brothers that Angélica moved to New Orleans with six-year-old Thomas and one-year-old David. So she petitioned the court, in September of 1779, for permission to sell the plantation, explaining that she had found a purchaser willing to pay 400 pesos more than its assessed worth, and that the property was "daily deteriorating" because of neglect. The sale took place in December, 1779; the price was 1,400 pesos.[133] So ended George Urquhart's dream of a planter's life in the New World.

15. Angélica Monsanto and Dr. Robert Dow

It was only a brief time before Dr. Robert Dow, physician to the Royal Hospital of New Orleans, was courting Angélica. Another Scotsman, the son of Robert Dow, a Presbyterian minister, and Juana (Janet) Adie, Dr. Dow had left Scotland for the West Indies, and then had gone on to Louisiana in 1776. He began his practice of medicine in New Orleans in 1778. Prior to their wedding, he and Angélica appeared before a notary on May 10, 1781, to register their financial affairs. Angélica brought to the marriage a total worth of 13,390 pesos, of which sum almost 5,500 pesos was in trust for her two sons. Her dowry was in the form of notes and credits, in addition to furniture, household possessions and eight slaves. Dow himself gave 2,000 pesos to Angélica as his dowry. The wedding was performed on September 9, 1781.[134] Dow was an outstanding personage in New Orleans for more than four decades, a highly regarded participant in cultural, religious and medical affairs, and a deeply valued friend to many. Years later Charles Gayarré described him as "full of genial, exhuberant kindness for all his fellow human beings, of a florid complexion, of convivial habits . . . Dr. Dow was a great authority, and no member of his profession ever acquired more popularity. . . ." Governor Claiborne paid tribute to him as being "at the head of his profession and universally beloved, because of his amiable disposition, his humanity and his urbanity." Claiborne offered him a seat in the Louisiana Legislature in 1804, but Dow felt that his obligations to his family and patients precluded his acceptance of that responsibility.[135]

Angélica and Robert Dow were a good match. Angélica possessed a warm, cheerful personality that shone from her face. She was loving, kind and gracious. Her home was always open to guests. In 1787, when James Wilkinson, an utter stranger, came to New Orleans on the first of his controversial visits, it was in the Dow home that he stayed; Angélica and David became his "respectable, dear and honoured friends." In his eulogy of Angélica thirty-four years later, Wilkinson made special mention of the soirees in the Dow home, No. 7 Condé street between Dumaine and St. Ann (into which they moved in 1784): "A prominent and universally acknowledged trait of character which distinguished Madame Dow was her generous hospitality. She always spread a sumptuous table and health permitt[ing] every respectable stranger and a long list of the most distinguished inhabitants partook of the urbanity and good cheer of her home." The Dow couple loved the theater and took a box when the first professional company opened its stage in New Orleans.[136]

Equally as important to Angélica as Dr. Dow's affection for her was his strong and generous behavior towards her sons, one of whom did not remember his father at all, and the other only a little. Letters from Dow to Angélica's sons, in 1802 and 1821, which have fortunately been preserved by the Urquhart family, are written in warm, affectionate and genial terms. One begins with the words, "My dear Friends Thomas & David, for I dislike the formal Name of calling You my Step Sons. . . ." In her will, Angélica paid tribute to her husband "as a small testimony of my gratitude and love which he has during the whole period of our happy union, manifested towards me," and charged her sons to give him their unstinting respect "from a grateful remembrance of that attention and care which my dear husband bestowed on their education from their early life up to manhood." To him she bequeathed, so long as he lived in Louisiana, the income from her property—worth about $8,000—and to his nephew in Scotland, a pair of silver candlesticks together with a silver tray and snuffer, all initialed T.G.T. (Thomas, Gracia Topham) "which were presented to my dear husband by my deceased sister. . . . And I particularly charge my dear husband with the accomplishment of this bequest, in order that the said plate may remain in his family as a memento of mine."

In 1821 Dr. Dow estimated that their joint property was worth about $32,000, including their home, some land in Baton Rouge, their shares of stock in the Louisiana Bank, and some notes for loans. He was a good manager, and she had business sense too; they invested in real estate and bought and sold a number of slaves throughout the years. She was proud that their financial situation was so good, and he attributed this to "our joint endeavors." This substance permitted them to lead a comfortable, satisfying life all their days.[137]

Dow made several trips to Europe, one in 1785–86 in connection with "urgent family business." Before he left, John Fitzpatrick wished him "Great Success in your undertaking, and a safe retourn to your familly," when he asked him to take a letter to London.[138] The second trip lasted, perhaps, as long as two years. He had left New Orleans by July 7, 1800, when Angélica entered into the first of two slave transactions in his absence; on August 23, 1800, he was in Philadelphia, visiting with the famous Dr. Benjamin Rush, who made this entry in his commonplace book: "Dr. Dow from Orleans breakfasted with me. He was on his way to Scotland after an absence of 23 years. He said at Orleans the natives and old settlers who went out of town and came in again took the yellow fever last year, but no other natives or old settlers. He said diseases of the skin were very common in Orleans. He told me Don Gálvez, the Governor of Florida, made it a practice to retire when he was angry, and drink a bottle of Claret to compose his body and mind." After this professional talk and gossip, on to Europe. Perhaps it was in connection with the settlement of his mother's estate, for the previous year he had sent a power of attorney to his nephew in Scotland. Dr. Dow was still in Europe in July, 1802, when he wrote to Thomas about the cession of Louisiana by Spain to France: ". . . it is very much to be feared, the Inhabitants there, will gain nothing by the change of Government or new Masters. It is a fixed Maxim & Principle of this Government [he was writing from France] that every Colony Should pay its own Expences, and Impositions will infallibly be laid on the People. . . ." He paid a call on Madame Miró and Baron Pontalba, distinguished friends from New Orleans now living in a château outside of Paris, and found Pontalba "apprehensive that his Property at New Orleans will decrease in its value. . . ."

Most important is the suggestion in Dow's letter that he had been expecting Angélica to join him in Europe for a permanent change of residence. The letter is addressed to Thomas at Bordeaux and Dr. Dow begins by saying that he was "a little Surprised and disappointed, as you may well conceive at finding your good Mother not along with you. She has been playing Cross Purposes with me . . . however I have no Reflexion to make on her Conduct being convinced that She has acted for the best, and now that I am sure we are to have her in Britain, we shall endeavour to make her happy there and I shall hurry home to her as soon as posible, and then there will be an end to my Rambling Disposition. . . ." But the good Doctor was deceiving himself if he thought he could drag Angélica away from New Orleans. Despite his dislike for the climate of New Orleans—he considered it to be "malarial and debilitating," the source of so much of the disease in the area—he returned to the city and stayed there. It was not until after her death that he would move back to Europe; perhaps she knew that this would happen, and that was why she restricted the income from her estate to such time as he remained in Louisiana. But he would not stay; about two years after her death he moved to Europe. In 1840–41 he was still living in England, but family papers contain no further information about him.[139]

16. Monsanto Family Unity

Angélica's affectionate reference to Gracia's gift of the silver candlesticks and other pieces, thirty-one years after Gracia's passing, is a telling example of Monsanto family closeness. Shining through the tedious and repetitious verbiage of legal documents are constant reminders that the Monsanto brothers and sisters maintained a fiercely close and typically Jewish family relationship throughout the years. Benjamin paid the expenses of Eleanora's suit for property separation from her husband; Jacob acted in her behalf in selling off three slaves to Angélica's husband-to-be. Jacob was a witness at the signing of Angélica's marriage agreement with Doctor Dow. Manuel and Jacob and Angélica's husband acted as guardians of Gracia's property after her husband's death. Isaac and Gracia's husband were present at inventory of George Urquhart's estate. They did not even feel distant from their Saint-Domingue brother and sister: Gracia, Benjamin and Manuel made bequests in their wills to Joseph; Gracia and Manuel to Judith. They were, quite naturally, worried about the fate of their family during the revolution on the island. Manuel, the last of the Monsanto brothers to die, said very sadly in his will, because he had not heard from Judith for a long time, that "if on account of the revolution [she] has moved to another country and because of this circumstance she has died, I name in her place her daughter Da. Raquel, my niece, who will inherit her share instead."[140] And so it continued through the years, this Monsanto protectiveness, probably instilled in them through the example of Isaac's generous assumption of responsibility for his brothers and sisters in the early years, and strengthened by the experience of adversity in 1769–70 when they were flung out into the world. Although French and Spanish law required the participation of family members in many legal matters, the Monsanto children never followed the example of their neighbors by engaging in the typical suits and countersuits over financial questions that frequently marred the unity of other colonial families. As a matter of fact, the only recorded family disagreement was fomented by Clara, Benjamin's widow, when she refused to accede to her late husband's wish that his and Manuel's settlement with their creditors should take precedence over her own claims on his estate.

17. MANUEL, JACOB AND BENJAMIN MONSANTO IN BUSINESS

For more than twenty years prior to Benjamin's death in 1794, the three younger brothers operated a business consortium in undisturbed harmony, first under Isaac's leadership, then with him as a somewhat minor partner, and finally without him after his death. There is, however, no precise mention of Benjamin in any documentation during the 1770's other than as an executor of Isaac's estate. This may be because he was the youngest brother and therefore not empowered to sign for Manuel and Jacob. In his correspondence, John Fitzpatrick refers to the Monsanto store in Manchac frequently from 1770 through July of 1781. Jacob and Manuel were dealing in dry goods, cattle, slaves and other merchandise. They were traveling back and forth to New Orleans. They had as much trouble finding hard money as Isaac always did, and paid their debts in notes and bills of exchange. On October 6, 1773, Fitzpatrick refers to Manuel as though he is established in Pointe Coupee, and not just visiting.[141]

In July, 1772, Jacob petitioned the Council of West Florida for the customary grant of three hundred acres "opposite the Spanish Settlement of Point Coupee," as though he intended establishing himself as a farmer. But the petition was denied on the ground that he had not become a naturalized resident: "It was the opinion of the [Council] that the Petitioner cannot hold lands—untill naturalized, being a Foreign Jew." This was an interesting answer; it demonstrated that there was no objection to his being a Jew, but that he, like every other alien, needed to go through the simple steps required for naturalization. Jacob did not protest that he was not a Jew, nor did he undergo naturalization so far as we know.[142]

As has already been noted, the Spanish gave no further trouble to the Monsanto brothers and sisters because of their religion, after the family was driven out of New Orleans in 1769–70. Beyond Governor Unzaga's reference to Manuel in June, 1770, there is no further mention in official Spanish documents of objection to the presence of these Jewish people. O'Reilly's successors were less successful than he was in the enforcement of commercial regulations—trade between Manchac and Louisianians continued at a merry pace until West Florida was captured by the Spanish under Gálvez in 1779. Restrictions against Protestant settlers were formally eased over the years; by the 1790's there was an affirmative policy of encouraging such immigrants, and some of these, like Dr. Dow, became prominent residents.[143] The Monsanto brothers did not actually settle in New Orleans as full-fledged residents until the early 1780's, but there seems to have been no objection to their traveling in and out of New Orleans as early as August, 1770, and doing business there. This may be the real reason that Jacob did not want to be naturalized as a British subject in 1772—because he still considered himself a Louisianian and was only waiting for a propitious and advantageous time to return permanently to the colony. It is surely significant that even Isaac, with all the bitterness he must have felt towards the Spanish, came back to settle, and die, in Louisiana.

But there was one occasion when Jacob got into trouble with the Spanish colonial government. In January, 1773, he arrived in Natchitoches in a canoe with a Canadian and two Negroes and a cargo of contraband merchandise. When Lieutenant-Governor de Mézières discovered that the contents of the canoe did not match the certified bill of lading, he threw Monsanto and the crew into prison, seized the cargo, and requested instructions from Governor Unzaga. In March, the Governor ordered Mézières to send Monsanto, his companions and the cargo to New Orleans. There the very desirable merchandise was sold at public auction, and the proceeds of 2,112 reales deposited in the public treasury. Monsanto was apparently released on parole, and promptly fled the city. He was tried in absentia in October, and sentenced to "five years of presidio duty at Oran." Meanwhile another Monsanto shipment, carried by one La Derrive, an employee of the firm, to the Rapides Post in September, 1773, had been seized by the commandant of that settlement; this cargo consisted of illegal trade goods worth 298½ reales. The Council of the Indies in Madrid did not get around to considering the case of Jacob Monsanto until 1776; they then criticized the Governor for some imperfections in his report of the case, and questioned the ability of a sheriff who would be so lax as to permit his prisoner to escape. But apparently the Spanish colonial authorities were not really interested in imprisoning smugglers; Monsanto was not the only merchant who was apprehended and then permitted to escape after his property was confiscated—three other smugglers had the same experience. So far as we know, no official attempted to arrest Jacob during subsequent trips into the colony; his trial appears to have been a mere formality. But what is most instructive about the entire record of these proceedings is that Jacob is not identified either as an unwanted Jew, or as a member of the family of merchants which had been expelled from Louisiana just a few years before. Matters had indeed changed since O'Reilly's departure.[144]

In October, 1773, the West Florida Province declared a moratorium on land grants, and it was not possible for the Monsanto brothers to obtain land for the time being. Manuel and Jacob did, however, request a special favor in March, 1775:

> "Read the Petition of Manuel and Jacob Monsanto setting forth as follows—viz.—That your Petitioners have for several years past kept a Store on the Lands reserved for His Majesty's use at Manchack. That having frequently petitioned your Excellency and your Predecessors for a Grant of Lands on this River which however it has not been their good fortune to obtain and being now desirous to Erect a small Dwelling House or Store on the abovementioned reserved Land for carrying on their business of Merchandize they therefore humbly pray your Excellency and Honors will Grant them permission to Erect Buildings for that purpose on the Ground which they have occupied since their residence at Manchack being at the upper end of the old Cleared Ground, and that they may peaceably possess the same untill it shall be wanted for His Majesty's use at which time they beg to > have the Liberty to remove their said Buildings or to dispose of them in such other way as they shall be able. And your Petitioners as in duty bound will ever pray &c.—"

No mention here of the reason for the negative response to the prior request; this was simply an effort to make life and business more comfortable while they were still trading out of Manchac. This petition was viewed with favor:

> "It was the unanimous advice of the Board that the prayer of the Petition should be Granted—Upon which His Excellency ordered that Manual [sic] and Jacob Monsanto the Petitioners should have Liberty to reside and occupy their several Buildings at Manchack until the Lands whereon they stand is required for the King's use—and that they may have Liberty to remove all their property when they are ordered off said Land this being the same indulgence that was given to Mr. Fitzpatrick in Council on the 17th of February in the year 1772."[145]

Manuel and Jacob, in other words, were to be treated as though they were British subjects. And so indeed they continued to be regarded: in September, 1776, when grants were again available, Jacob applied for a grant of 450 acres on the claim of family right ("His family consists of himself and Seven Negroes") and 1,000 acres through purchase. No mention was made in this petition of the reason for previous denial, and no one brought it up at the Council meeting: he was given 700 acres. Surely he had not become naturalized. Was it because he had become more prosperous, or because George Urquhart, his brother-in-law, was so prominent in the area in which he wished to settle, or because the disturbed conditions in the Atlantic seaboard colonies had aroused justifiable apprehensions about the safety of the West Florida Province—and happy settlers were valued, particularly those whose trading activities at Manchac were so important? Probably all of these factors were involved. The land granted to the Monsanto brothers was just north of George Urquhart's plantation on the Mississippi.[146]

So the brothers were up and down the Mississippi River, from New Orleans to Manchac and Baton Rouge and on to

Pointe Coupee and Natchez. They did business with a New Orleans merchant like Oliver Pollock, sold Captain Pierre Joseph Favrot some equipment for repairs at Fort Baton Rouge, took a mortgage on some land and on a schooner on the river, and borrowed cash from George Urquhart when things became tight.[147] By 1780 Benjamin had established himself in Pointe Coupee in business with his brother Isaac's old associate, Isaac Fastio. Fastio and Isaac Monsanto had engaged in commercial transactions at least as early as 1766; in fact, Fastio was still trying to recover the large sum of 3,330 pesos, 5½ reales, from Isaac's syndics. It is obvious that Fastio did not blame Isaac or the brothers for the financial confusion of Isaac's affairs: he had taken part in the inventory of Isaac's possessions on May 7, 1778, and now he was quite happy to join together with Benjamin in various business dealings over a period of at least eight years—until 1788, when they dissolved the partnership which had been created "only by faith through a private agreement"—not by a notarized, public document. But the termination of the partnership was announced publicly, and entered into the records of the Commandant of Pointe Coupee Post: it stipulated that Fastio had no claim on Benjamin's possessions, "consisting of a plantation at this post, slaves, furniture, utensils, animals, etc., and all other goods he possessed elsewhere."[148]

Benjamin appears to have been the "country" representative of the firm after Manuel and Jacob closed the Manchac store and moved their headquarters to New Orleans, where they lived on Toulouse street. Together as a team, sometimes each on his own account—for it was another loose partnership, without formal papers—they bought and sold land, acted as agents for the collection of debts, bought or attempted to buy goods at auction, even a ship, bought and sold slaves, and engaged in a general wholesale and retail business as well, much along the lines of Isaac's prior commercial activities. Among the many items which they are recorded as selling are the following: sugar, butter, salt meat, West India rum, soap, tobacco, indigo, cloth, English shoes, linen trousers, thread stockings, hats, beaver skins, ship cable and horses. Only one detailed account has survived the ravages of time; it is a list of the items which the

Monsanto brothers supplied to Santiago Lemelle, a planter in Attakapas, during 1783–84:

8	dishes
2	pitchers
1	dish and 1 ladle
2	water jars
18	flasks of brandy
7	colored linen handkerchiefs
1½	ells of brown cloth
4	ells of Rouen linen
3½	ells of calico
2	ells of cottonade
6	ells of dull linen
4	ells of ribbon
1	pair of woolen stockings
1½	ells of flannel
2½	ells of coarse carpet
1	pair of silk bandages
1½	ells of blue cloth
1½	ells of white flannel
3	ells of linen
3	ells of linen for the Negroes
1	box of tea

The total cost of these products was 118 pesos, 6 reales. But Lemelle did not pay in cash. He manufactured candles on his plantation, and the Monsanto brothers took the candles in exchange for the merchandise. The total value of the candles they needed for their other customers exceeded the sum of his purchases, so that they had to give him hard cash as well—139 pesos, about one-fifth of the cost of a good slave.[149]

Many of the Monsanto brothers' transactions were in slaves—some for their own use, a few of whom they freed, but most, of course, for resale. Every person in Louisiana who could afford slaves owned them. By 1800 Angélica and Robert Dow had bought six and sold five; Gracia bought four and sold two; there is no record of Eleanora's purchases, but she sold six. The total of the brothers' purchases and sales, derived from the examination of thousands of pages of records in New Orleans and Natchez, but not in other Louisiana localities, is as follows: Benjamin bought nineteen and sold ten; Jacob bought two and sold thirteen; Manuel bought thirty and sold twelve; the brothers as a firm bought thirty-seven and sold eighteen. Because many of their business activities were in partnership, however, it must be presumed that Jacob sold some of those listed as Manuel's purchases, and that Benjamin sold slaves bought by his brothers, in addition to those he used on his plantation. Only three large transactions in slaves are included in the Natchez and New Orleans notarial records: twelve were bartered by Benjamin in 1785 for 3,280 pounds of indigo, which he probably had received in exchange for some other type of merchandise; thirteen were bought by Manuel in 1787 for 3,780 pesos from Hilaire Boutté; and thirty-one slaves were purchased by Manuel and Jacob from Daniel Clark the elder for 9,300 pesos "of the new Mexican mint," later in the same year.[150] No merchant of the time devoted himself exclusively to slave trading; this was a later development, when the number of farmers grew and the corresponding need for slaves increased. The Monsanto brothers therefore qualify as slave traders, in the manner of the times, although this was only one aspect of the exceedingly broad range of business activities in which they engaged.

18. Benjamin Monsanto in Natchez

Although Benjamin had been in partnership with Fastio, this did not exclude a similar relationship with his brothers. But Benjamin aspired to be a planter. Although some of his purchases of land in the Pointe Coupee area were obviously for investment purposes—in less than a year, for instance, between April, 1784, and March, 1785, he made a ten percent profit on some acreage—he did run a plantation at the Pointe Coupee Post for a few years. But he was apparently not satisfied with that venture, and felt that he would do better in Natchez, where the brothers had already engaged in various business transactions, and which had replaced Manchac and Pointe Coupee as a center of trade. He purchased his first land there in February, 1785.[151] Shortly before this he had heard George Rapalie's boastful talk in Natchez about an imminent rebellion against Spanish rule, and had to testify as a witness in the long and involved trial which ensued.[152] Fortunately, no suspicion was directed against him, and some time after his marriage to Clara, he decided to undertake a planter's life in Natchez.[153] He had no difficulty in becoming accepted as a member of the Natchez community; his knowledge of French, Spanish and

English meant that he was equally at home with all of the settlers in the area. He not only enjoyed the social prestige to which Major Forman referred, but was accorded the trust and confidence of the Governor. Governor Manuel Gayoso de Lemos twice appointed him to teams of citizens who conducted inventories and appraisals of the estates of deceased neighbors, and in 1790 he was one of the men on a panel from whom arbitrators were chosen to compromise a dispute.[154]

Benjamin's plantation on the bank of St. Catherine's creek, next to David Williams' property (his daughter Mary Gayoso Williams later married Angélica's son David),[155] covered 500 arpents of land. The dwelling house, "planked and roofed with shingles," was, according to the inventory of Benjamin's estate in 1794, "somewhat decayed, feebly constructed and wanting repair." The outbuildings consisted of a kitchen of hewn logs, four small cabins serving as milk houses and slave quarters, and a well. Of furniture the main dwelling had little: "three beds and some trifles of furniture." Of animals there were two yoke of oxen, one hundred and twenty sheep, five work horses, about forty head of horned cattle, and some hogs in the woods. A cart and irons, three ploughs and seven spades, was the total of agricultural equipment. Benjamin owned seventeen slaves, but five were sold to a neighbor before his death, and four belonged to the partnership with Manuel.[156]

Benjamin had not succeeded too well in his farming venture—perhaps he had been draining cash from the business in order to support his ambition to become a planter. At any rate, whatever the reason, the firm was in trouble. On June 17, 1792, Benjamin had been compelled to borrow 1,000 silver dollars from his neighbor David Williams, using three slaves as collateral.[157] In early 1794, Benjamin joined eight other Natchez citizens in protesting to Governor Francisco Luis Héctor Carondelet against a formal moratorium on debts in the area—this would obviously put merchants like Benjamin and Manuel in a bind.[158] Four months before his death on September 30, 1794, Benjamin was in New Orleans with Jacob, negotiating with their creditors. On May 28, 1794, the creditors agreed to accept settlement over a period of three years. Some of the slaves would have to be sold immediately to raise cash. The complete list of assets and debits demonstrates that the Monsanto brothers should have had nothing to worry about. Customers in the Natchez area, and in New Orleans, Pointe Coupee, Galveztown, Natchitoches and Attakapas, were indebted to them for a total of $14,803. Added to this were their slaves: six already turned over to the creditors, worth $1,500, and ten more worth $3,200. They owed a total of only $6,610 to six creditors.[159] The difficulty was, as always, the scarcity of ready cash; and due partly to the moratorium on debts in Natchez, the brothers were in very narrow straits. Hence the need for time. Unfortunately, Benjamin's death intervened. Clara had to go to court for permission to sell some land in order to pay her overseer's salary and some other personal debts—only $300 was needed, but she could not do without it.

Not the least of the complications was the fact that Benjamin had made two wills. The first, dated January 25, 1792, when Benjamin was already ill, divided the estate between Clara and Manuel; Clara's dowry of 2,500 milled dollars was to be returned to her, but "if the present payment of the above sum should be attended with great inconvenience to my brother Manuel Monsanto, I desire that he may not be distressed, on giving good and undoubted security for the sum, and paying regularly and exactly the interest of the same, for the maintenance of my dear Wife." This will had been executed in Natchez, and was presented to the Natchez court and accepted for probate.[160] Then came the news from New Orleans that Benjamin had revoked this will and had written a new one, the day before his death. In the new will he left nothing to Clara, merely returned her dowry to her; he did not refer to "my dear Wife." Because of the "large sums of money we owe," Benjamin granted his executors an extension beyond the usual period of a year for the termination of his affairs. The surprise was that he designated his brother Joseph in Saint-Domingue as his residuary heir.[161] No wonder that Clara made claims on the estate, and created difficulties for Manuel, and for the creditors, upsetting the settlement which had been negotiated in May. It may be that Benjamin had been victimized by marital as well as financial and health problems—this might have been the reason for his decision to leave Clara out of his will, except for her dowry. Benjamin's estate was still in the courts in 1802–1803, when some of his debts had still not been discharged.[162]

19. MANUEL, JACOB, MAIMI AND SOPHIA

Manuel now had to struggle on alone; he survived Benjamin by less than two years. He tried hard, in his will, to help his executors to distinguish between his personal affairs and those of his distressed company: anything dated before Benjamin's death, though personal, was to be assigned to the creditors; anything dated thereafter belonged to him individually, as did the goods in his own home (which probably served as his storehouse). He bequeathed personal mementoes to Angélica's husband and sons, to Eleanora's children, and to Eleanora and Angélica. The estate as a whole was bequeathed to Angélica, Eleanora, Judith and Joseph. One of his most interesting bequests was a medicine box which he left to Dr. Dow. The portrait which emerges from Manuel's will is that of a scrupulously fair merchant—in a postscript he made special mention of two personal debts which he insisted be paid—and a fond brother, spelling out precisely which of his personal possessions he wanted each member of his family to have.[163]

Manuel made one further bequest: "fifty pesos to the quadroon named Sofia, daughter of the mulattress Mamy, another fifty to said Mamy, an identical sum to the free negress Rozeta, my former slave, all of which I want to be done." Manuel had freed Rosa on May 29, 1792. But Mamy, Maimy or Maimi William had not been Manuel's slave—she had belonged to Jacob, who freed her on August 4, 1783, when she was twenty-six years old, "in appreciation of her good service and for the payment of 300 pesos." Maimi did not have the money, then: Jacob gave her a year to secure it, but it was four years before Jacob acknowledged payment. Manuel made a point of referring to Maimi as a mulatto and to Sophia as a quadroon. The conclusion is inescapable that Sophia was Jacob's daughter, and that this was why Manuel remembered Sophia and her mother in his will. Manuel did not leave a bequest to another slave Jacob had freed in 1781. The deed of sale of a slave from Maimi to Sophia, dated February 9, 1795, is the first of many references to Sophia as Sophia Monsanto. By 1805, when both Sophia and Maimi had their own residences, or at least lived in different houses on Bienville street, Maimi too had adopted the name Monsanto. Maimi died in 1817; the heirs to her estate of $558 were Sophia and the pharmacist Philippe Zerban. There is no record of Sophia's passing. But it is natural to wonder if Madame Dow ever nodded to Sophia if she saw her while out strolling; Angélica must have known that Sophia was her niece.[164]

It is equally natural to wonder if Madame Dow ever greeted Judah Touro, after his arrival in New Orleans in 1802, with the information that she came of the same Sephardic stock as he, from the same Holland in which his father had been born.[165] If Manuel, Jacob or Benjamin had lived into the nineteenth century, they might have mentioned to Touro that they too were Jews, for they did not have Angélica's good reasons for identification with the non-Jewish community and with Christianity. But there had been no opportunity for them to associate with fellow Jews. It is therefore only in a more modern sense that the Monsanto brothers and sisters were Jews: they did not and would not abandon their Jewish identification; they would not become Christians; they remained conscious of their sense of being different—but only in this way were they Jews. They probably did nothing about being Jewish other than to resist the religious pressure of the environment—and part of the price they had to pay for this resistance was their expulsion from Louisiana. Had they adopted Catholicism formally, and become French subjects, after their arrival in 1757 or 1758, they would probably have been permitted to remain in Louisiana, would have preserved their hard-earned property. But this they did not do. Perhaps in this way alone did they reflect their origins in that Dutch community of Jewish refugees from Spain and Portugal—they would not turn against the memory of those fleeing ancestors.

The significance, then, of the Monsanto brothers and sisters is that of pioneers, who successfully tested and bested the French prohibition against Jewish colonists, who were probably the only Jews ever to be expelled from territory now part of the United States partly because they were Jews, who successfully breached even the Spanish colonial barriers against Jews, and who were the first permanent Jewish settlers in a variety of localities: New Orleans, Baton Rouge, Pointe Coupee and Natchez.

20. Other Jews and Supposed Jews in Spanish Colonial Louisiana

For decades, the statement has been repeated that two Jews named Mendez and Solis were pioneers in the development of the sugar cane industry in Louisiana, during the 1790's.[166] There is no need here to discuss the complicated question of what contribution, if any, these men made to experimentation in the field of sugar cane refinement, but it must be noted that there is no evidence that members of Joseph Solis' family considered themselves to be Jews or that they were Marranos. The lineage of this family is known in some detail: they had come to New Orleans by 1771, after successive residence in Ireland (where Joseph Solis' grandfather, Manuel, was born), Boston (about 1717, where Joseph's father, also named Manuel, was born), and Santiago de Cuba (about 1755, where Joseph had married Barbara de Rosas). It is possible, of course, that some distant ancestor had been a converso, but no contemporary record has been located which refers to the Jewish background of the family.[167]

The question of the background of Joseph Solis' friend, Antonio Mendez, is more interesting and revealing. Born in Havana in 1750, Mendez was in New Orleans before August 16, 1784, when he petitioned the court for a limpieza certificate. The limpieza code, which had developed in Spain and was transferred to the colonial areas of the Spanish empire, was an antecedent of the Hitlerian "racial purity" laws. In order to safeguard the "blood purity" of Spanish "old" Christians, in contradistinction to "new" Christians, that is, former Jews who had been converted voluntarily or through compulsion, it was required that genealogical data be presented to the courts which then certified that a family were "old Christians, pure of all taint of bad races of Moors, Jews, Mulattoes and Indians, and that they are not recently converted." In certain parts of the Western Hemisphere, of course, the emphasis was on the proof that Indians and Negroes did not appear in the family tree, but originally the reference to Jewish or "new" Christian forebears was of primary significance. Suits for the certification of family limpieza were entered in the New Orleans courts as early in the Spanish period as 1776. Apparently any Spaniard who possessed or aspired to social position wanted such certification, as did anyone who sought to play a role in the colony's official life.[168] The record of the hearing for Mendez' appeal is worth quoting in full:

> "Proceedings brought by Antonio Mendez to prove his legitimacy, purity of blood, life and habits.
>
> Court of Governor Esteban Miró.
> Assessor, Juan del Postigo.
> Escribano, Rafael Perdomo.
>
> Antonio Mendez, a native of Havana and a resident of New Orleans, petitions to say it is convenient to him to have witnesses testify in answer to the following questions:
>
> 1st. Whether he is not the legitimate son born of the lawful marriage of Josef Mendez, a native of Pontevedra, in the Kingdom of Galicia, and of Ana Muñoz de Lara, born in the city of Havana?
>
> 2nd. Is it not true that his said parents always kept him in their house and called him their son and, he, in turn, called them his parents?
>
> 3rd. Is it not true that his said parents and maternal grandparents are and always have been old Christians, free from the taint of all impure races, such as Moors, Jews, mulattoes and Indians, and have not been recently converted and have never been prosecuted for infamous crimes, but on the contrary have always been employed in places of honor, have held high offices and have distinguished themselves by their personal qualities?
>
> 4th. Has he not always comported himself with dignity, has his conduct not been correct, frequenting the Holy Sacraments often with the congregation of the faithful?

5th. Is not all that he has stated publicly and generally known?

Governor Miró, on Juan del Postigo's advice, decrees: Let the testimony this party requests be received, according to the tenor of the above interrogatorio, the taking of the said testimony to be entrusted to the Escribano, and done, bring the depositions to the Court.

Marcos Aragon is the first witness called. His testimony reads: In the city of New Orleans, on the 17th of August of the year 1784, the Escribano, pursuant to the foregoing decree, received the oath of Marcos Aragon, a witness presented by Antonio Mendez to give the evidence the latter has offered and the Court ordered taken. This oath was made according to law, and when examined upon the tenor of the foregoing interrogatorio, to the first question he answered: This is true in all its contents. The witness knows it [to] be a fact because for many years past he has been a frequent visitor in the home of Antonio Mendez' parents.

2nd. What has been stated is also true and well known to the witness through long years of acquaintanceship.

3rd. What is set down in this question is also true and well known to him, namely, that Mr. Mendez' grandparents have always been reputed to be white, people of distinction and free from any taint of impure races.

4th. It is true that Antonio Mendez has always conducted himself properly, and has never seen nor heard anything detrimental to him in the city of Havana, on the occasions the witness has been there, nor during his residence here. On the contrary he has heard everyone speak of him as an honorable man.

5th. All that he has stated is generally and publicly known and is voiced by everybody. What the witness has answered is the truth, under charge of his oath, he is 60 years of age, and he signed, to which Escribano attests. (Signed) Marcos Aragon, before Rafael Perdomo.

The other witnesses, Juan Francisco Romero, a resident of Havana, and Manuel Ramos, each in a separate declaration, corroborates the testimony of Marcos Aragon.

Then Governor Miró, on Juan del Postigo's advice, decrees: Considering the foregoing testimony produced for Antonio

> Mendez, by which he has proven his legitimacy of birth, purity of blood and good conduct, His Lordship says that he must approve and does approve his claim, and for its greater validation and force he interposes his authority and judicial decree. He orders the certified copy requested, authorized in public form, given to the petitioner, upon the payment of all just and due fees."[169]

In 1785–86, Mendez was acting as the attorney for claimants on Isaac Monsanto's property. Later he served as a legal official of the Spanish colonial government. In 1790 he married Felicite Ducre in New Orleans.[170] Apparently a man of ability, he was called upon by the first American governor of the Louisiana territory, William C. C. Claiborne, to serve the new government in the area. Let Claiborne describe the ensuing experience in the words of his report to Secretary of State James Madison, from New Orleans, under date of February 13, 1804:

> ". . . I appointed a few days ago a Mr. Mendez, who had been represented to me an Honest Capable Man, Civil Commandant of a District [Terre aux Boeufs] about Six leagues below New Orleans. This District is inhabited principally by an humble, poor, indolent, ignorant people, emigrants from the Canary Islands, who Idolize their Priests, and feel little attachment for any one else. Mr. Mendez altho a Catholic; is said to be of Jewish extraction, and on this account (and for other reasons unknown to me) is by no means a favorite with his neighbors, who manifest disquietude at his appointment, and a few were imprudent enough to talk of not recognizing him as their Commandant. This Affair was represented to me as an alarming event, and strong measures on my part were advised. In pursuance however of that conciliatory Policy which I have adopted, I sent for some influential characters of the District, and on this day had an Audience with them; they professed attachments for the Government of the United States, respect for its Officers, and a determination to be obedient to the Laws; but as well for themselves as their neighbors they entreated me to nominate for them another Commandant. I determined to grant their request, and they have returned to their homes apparently well pleased.
>
> "I have given you these particulars, since this Transaction has > been greatly misrepresented here, and should it reach (by way of report) the City of Washington, the exaggeration will probably be great. . . ."[171]

No other correspondence about the Mendez case has been located; this might imply that Claiborne was unduly anxious. Yet he was correct in feeling embarrassed by the affair, for Article III of the Treaty ceding Louisiana to the United States provided that

> "The inhabitants of the ceded territory . . . shall be maintained and protected in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property and the religion which they profess."

This provision was intended to protect the largely Catholic population of certain sections of Louisiana from any discrimination by the Protestant majority of the United States as a whole. But the Federal act which divided Louisiana into two territories, passed in 1804, did not refer to any one particular religion:

> ". . . no law shall be valid . . . which shall lay any person under restraint, burden, or disability, on account of his religious opinions, professions, or worship; in all which he shall be free to maintain his own, and not burdened for those of another . . ."[172]

Even if Mendez had been a practicing Jew, Claiborne would not have been bound to revoke the appointment, let alone on the basis of a rumor that one of his ancestors was Jewish. Certainly the Governor had no desire to perpetuate medieval Spanish prejudices; yet he interpreted his primary responsibility as being the establishment of American authority with a minimum of friction or controversy. He therefore followed the prudent course of giving in to the demand of the Canariotes for the time being . . . only to appoint Mendez to the position of Justice of the Peace for St. Bernard Parish three and a half years later. Claiborne had his way—gradually.

Even though there was no testimony about Mendez' paternal grandparents (perhaps because there was no one in New Orleans who could testify about the family's reputation in Pontevedra, from personal knowledge), he was regarded as an "old" Christian by the Spanish authorities; otherwise he would not have obtained the limpieza certificate, nor would he have held positions of legal responsibility under Spanish rule. Perhaps, as in thousands, perhaps hundreds of thousands of individual cases, since the establishment of the Inquisition in Spain and Portugal, the accusation of Judaizer was only a mask for other, less theological purposes; Claiborne hints at this in his report to Madison. At any rate, Mendez was surely not a Jew in terms of personal religious affiliation, conviction or knowledge, even if distant ancestors had been "new" Christians. But his experience points up one aspect of the Spanish colonial period, carried on into the years of the American regime, which demonstrates that there were areas of Louisiana and classes of its population which would have nothing to do with Jews, and which regarded a man's Jewish background with suspicion and hatred.

So far as we know, this was not characteristic of all settlers and officials of Spanish background, let alone of the larger French population. The French never did pursue Jews or former Jews with the same unrelenting fanaticism as the Spaniards. During the 1790's at least one family of Jewish refugees from Saint-Domingue appears to have settled in Louisiana. In early 1796, Sara López Pardo, surely a Jewess to judge by her name, applied in Bordeaux for a passport to leave for Louisiana with her two young children, together with her slave Martine and her daughter, "in order to arrange her affairs in Louisiana." Sara declared that she was thirty-two years old, and that she was a refugee from Saint-Domingue. Nothing further has been discovered about Sara or her fate.[173]

More suggestive, however, is Daniel Lopes Dias' application in Bordeaux, at about the same time, for a passport for his son Abraham to travel to Louisiana to be near his family. Nothing further is known of Abraham or his family; diligent searching in New Orleans notarial records and other manuscript sources has failed to uncover a single reference to any member of the family—but Benjamin Monsanto had died recently, and he and Gracia had left money to their Saint-Domingue relatives. Perhaps this Lopes Dias family was related to Rachel Lopes Dias, Judith's daughter-in-law. If all of the members of the Monsanto family in Saint-Domingue had been wiped out, then members of Rachel's family could legitimately regard themselves as her heirs, with a justified claim on the inheritances from the Monsanto family. All of this is pure surmise—and the probability is that no members of this Lopes Dias family remained in Louisiana for a very long time, unless they lived in some rural area whose manuscript records have not been consulted.[174]

If, however, the Lopez Pardo and Lopes Dias families did settle in Louisiana, outside of New Orleans where their names do not occur in any census or directory, they were quietly absorbed into the dominant French Catholic environment without a ripple to mark their disappearance. This may offer additional evidence that, though there were Jews in colonial Louisiana, there was no Judaism.

II

Judah Touro—An Overview

New England-born Judah Touro was the first Jew known to have arrived in New Orleans after 1800, and the most famous for his contributions to the life of his adopted city. (Judah Benjamin's greatest renown was achieved through his service to the Confederacy; his residence was then in Richmond). When Touro died on January 18, 1854, lavish praise was accorded to the record of his life:

> "New Orleans has lost one of her best citizens, charity one of her sincerest devotees and humanity one of its truest friends. . . . Though earnest and successful in the prosecution of business, Mr. Touro was never a selfish or close man. On the contrary, he has for many years been the foremost of our rich men in all contributions to charitable objects. Some of his donations have been on a scale of magnificence and liberality scarcely paralleled in our country. . . ."[1]

Seven years previously, however, the R. G. Dun and Company's confidential agent in New Orleans referred to him as "the old rat." That this agent envied Touro's wealth is obvious: "I sh^{d} like to have his note for a million," was his comment on his subject's financial standing.[2] This agent may well have been animated by antipathy against Jews. He almost invariably called attention to their ethnic background when he commented on the credit standing of Jews, and frequently made such a sneering reference as, for example, "stand well for Jews."[3] But it was not only so prejudiced an observer as this anonymous reporter who had negative reactions to Touro. His closest Jewish associate, an executor of his noted will, regarded Touro as an eccentric, indecisive, difficult, peculiar person: "Mr. Touro is the very impersonation of a snail, not to say of a crab whose progress (to use a paradox) is usually backward . . . I must be very careful to humor him . . . he is very slow . . . You know he is a strange man. . . ."[4]

The public acclaim granted to Touro following the publication of the terms of his munificent will, and the position of eminent philanthropist which has been awarded to him by hero-worshipping Americans, and particularly American Jews, have interfered with any earnest effort to comprehend the character of the whole man. This is a difficult task, in view of the destruction of his files, accounts and papers after his death, on his explicit instructions.[5] Without attempting to essay a full biography which perhaps can never be accomplished successfully, in view of the paucity of personal data, we shall try to underline some salient and revealing characteristics and experiences which have not previously been given their appropriate weight.

Touro was born in Newport, Rhode Island, on June 16, 1775, the son of Isaac Touro, the Dutch-born hazan (minister-cantor) of Congregation Yeshuat Israel, and his native American wife, Reyna Hays. The following year the elder Touro refused to take the oath of loyalty to the Revolutionary cause which was required by the Rhode Island Assembly, on the grounds that he was a Dutch subject, and that such an oath was also against his religious principles. That there was more to his feelings than he then revealed is indicated by his decision to remain in Newport after the town's capture by the British. He was given subsistence by the British commander, since most of the Jews had fled town and there was no way in which he could support himself. In 1780 he moved to New York City and petitioned "His Excellency Major General [William] Tryon Governor and Commander in Chief in New York" for relief, pledging "his loyalty and attachment to His Majesty's Government," and referring to the "persecution and distress" from which he had suffered. He was granted an annual allowance and daily rations by the British. On December 12, 1782, he requested and was given an advance on his stipend so that he might move to the island of Jamaica. Isaac Touro presumably officiated in Jamaica for a brief time prior to his death on December 8, 1783, after which his widow returned with her four children to New England, where she made her home with her brother, Moses Michael Hays, in Boston, until her death on September 28, 1787.[6]

Hazan Isaac Touro's decision to ally himself with the Tories is not recounted here to cast any stain on his son's patriotism, but rather to demonstrate one aspect of the stress and insecurity in which Judah's early years were spent. He had lived in four different places by the time he was eight years old: Newport, New York City, Jamaica and Boston. In Newport and New York City the family lived on military handouts; they had hardly established themselves in Jamaica before the father died and they were compelled to become refugees once again. In Boston they were poor relatives living on charity. Judah was fatherless when he was just past seven, and an orphan when he was twelve. These experiences with privation and grief must have left indelible marks on young Judah's character. No matter how kindly and generous Uncle Hays may have been, Judah cannot have helped feeling lonely, insecure and afraid.

Of Touro's youth in Boston, hardly anything is known. He probably received little formal education; years later, Gershom Kursheedt—who knew him very well—said that Touro's "great misfortune was in his want of education."[7] This probably meant, at the very least, that Touro evinced no interest in cultural matters. Moses Michael Hays was a prosperous merchant and insurance broker; Judah and his younger brother Abraham seem to have been apprenticed in their uncle's counting house at a fairly young age and to have learned there the ways of commerce which they followed for the rest of their lives. In 1798, according to report, Judah was sent as supercargo on a voyage to the Mediterranean. More significant, personally, is the legend of his falling in love with one of his cousins, and Uncle Hays's refusal of permission for the marriage. Stories about the romance were in circulation before Touro's death; Rabbi Isaac Leeser had heard them on visits to New Orleans. He thought that Touro had been in love with Rebecca Hays; other sources say it was Catherine. How much truth may underlie the legend cannot be ascertained at this late date. Certain it is that Judah did not leave Boston because of Rebecca's death; she died nine months after his departure. Nor is there any evidence that he maintained contact with Catherine throughout the years; a letter which Catherine's niece wrote to Touro two days before her death and which his own death prevented his receiving seems to imply that there had been little or no contact between them. One specific fact contradicts the romantic notion that Judah and Catherine languished for love of each other throughout their lives: Moses Michael Hays died in 1805—just four years after Judah went to New Orleans. If it was Uncle Moses' opposition which stood in their way, that was the time for Judah to have returned to Boston for his beloved, or to have sent for her to come to New Orleans.[8]

If we have no definite knowledge of Touro's motivation for leaving Boston, we are equally in the dark about his choice of New Orleans as his destination. He appears not to have gone South as a representative of his uncle's business; this may indicate that there was a falling out between them. There is no evidence, either, that he had received assurances from other New England firms that they would use him as a New Orleans agent, though naturally he must have solicited their shipments either before his departure from Boston or after his arrival in Louisiana. Touro certainly had no way of knowing, when he left Boston in October, 1801, that within a brief time Louisiana would be ceded by the Spanish to France, and then purchased from Napoleon by the United States. Whatever Touro's feelings and motivations, the kind of man who was adventurous enough to leave the familiar Yankee surroundings of Boston in order to seek a home and livelihood in so distant and exotic a clime as New Orleans was not the shy, retiring personality of later years. The story of his unhappy romance has been highlighted by writers who recognized how little color there was in Touro's life, but even if he was fleeing from a painful personal relationship, his choice of New Orleans as his future home reflected a positive strength in his character worthy of emphasis. New York, Philadelphia, Richmond or Charleston would have been more natural locations if he was only looking for another port in which to settle. But if he had really quarrelled bitterly with his uncle, who possessed important commercial connections in each of these cities, perhaps he chose New Orleans because Mr. Hays had no contacts there, although his uncle does not seem to have been so vengeful a man that he would maintain a vendetta with his nephew. But all this is surmise. The fact is that it took courage to move to New Orleans, still under Spanish domination, plagued by disease, riddled with commercial restrictions, peopled by citizens whose languages he probably did not know.

Fortunately for Touro and the economic future of the Crescent City, Louisiana came under American rule in a short time. There is no record of Touro's business life immediately after his arrival, but within a few years he was acting as a commission merchant—that is, he served as an agent for the sale in New Orleans of consignments of merchandise shipped from New England or from Europe, assisted the captains of ships in attending to their business, and solicited outgoing cargoes for his correspondents' ships. Touro's earliest printed advertisement which can be found dates from 1805; the wares which it lists are a good example of the variety of merchandise which he handled:

> "Now Landing
>
> From on board the Schooner William, Abraham Waters Master, From Boston, lying opposite the old Custom House, the following articles: 130 Boxes Cod Fish, 28 half barrels of 1st quality beef, 2 do [ditto] Neats Tongues, 10 Casks Cheese, 19 do Potatoes, 2 do French Hair Powder, 60 Boxes Mould Candles, 18 do Castile Soap, 60 do American brown Soap, 4 do Chocolate, 5 Cases Britannias, 2 do Platillas, 6 Kegs Butter, 2 Pipes Holland Gin, 6 Barrels Nuts, and a quantity of Pickled Fish in Kegs, in excellent order, consisting of Salmon, Mackeral, Herring, Tongues and Sounds, Soused Lobsters, &c.—ALSO—A few thousand Joice [joists] and Boards, which will be sold reasonable for cash. For particulars apply to the master on board, or to
>
> J. TOURO"[9]

A few weeks later Touro advertised that his ship would soon leave for Antwerp, had half her cargo signed up, and had space for additional freight and for passengers.[10] The schooner William had brought a large assortment of foodstuffs and other products to Touro; possibly the entire cargo was consigned to him. Sometimes, however, only a few items on a ship were sent to him. His handling of a small order, sent to him in 1809 by the Boston merchant, John Hancock, nephew and namesake of the Revolutionary leader, will indicate his role in miniature form. The consignment consisted of four pipes and two hogsheads of gin, which Touro sold for $484.75. From the proceeds he paid the captain of the Brig Sally $30 for freight charges; he also deducted $1.50 for cartage, $10 for storage of the gin for two months (probably in his own store), and a five percent commission of $24.25 for his services. He sent the net amount of the sale, $418.50, in Spanish milled dollars, to Boston, on the same ship which carried his report of the transaction to Hancock.[11]

Touro's report of a later transaction, on behalf of Christopher G. Champlin, the former Senator from Rhode Island, offers evidence of the difficulties which were involved in some consignments. On June 3, 1820, he wrote to Champlin that his ship had arrived, and acknowledged receipt of bricks and iron which had been consigned to him—"both of which articles, am sorry to say, have come to a very bad market—have only been able to sell about 15 m of the former at $5½—the iron have been obliged to store—considerable quantities has been imported here direct from Gottenburg, Stockholm &c this last season—so that the place is at present completely overstocked with it—you may however rely, I shall endeavor to do the best with both articles for your Interest . . . the Bricks are too small for this market—they will not work in with any other brick whatever, not even the Boston brick." Touro also reported that the ship's captain had been ill, justified his decision to ship a cargo of cotton rather than tobacco to the Liverpool market, and gave his estimate of the ship's probable date of departure.[12] A year later, on June 23, 1821, Touro had to admit to Champlin that he still had not sold the iron: "I am, my D^{r} Sir, as anxious as you possibly can be, to close the thing, in order that you might be enabled thereby, to wind up the concerns of the ship for that voyage—however as I think the market is now getting better for the articles, am in hopes to do something with it ere long—as soon as I do you shall be advised thereof—and you may rely that no exertions has been, nor shall be, wanting, to expedite the same as speedily as possible."[13] Champlin had obviously sent the bricks and iron to Touro without prior notification; Touro could not very well have rejected the consignment without losing the good will of this correspondent, and possibly of others. But it was not his capital which was tied up; Touro spent his time and energy, but the most he could lose in this sort of transaction was his commission. The client was responsible for storage costs.

In view of the destruction of Touro's business papers, and the absence of any substantial records of his correspondents, other than the Thwing Company's letter books in the Massachusetts Historical Society which date from the late 1840's when he was already an old man, it is impossible to present a fully detailed description of his commercial activities. He seems, however, to have restricted himself to a brokerage business, acting as the agent for New England, primarily Boston, merchants who sent consignments to him. Beginning in 1820, the Louisiana Gazette regularly printed itemized lists of ship arrivals and clearings, including the consignees of cargoes. During this and the following few years he received frequent shipments, but many other merchants were far busier than he. The cargoes which were sent to him included a wide variety of merchandise and foodstuffs: linens, glass, brandy, soap, olive oil, brandied fruits, almonds, wine, gunpowder, candles, beef, tongues, medicines, grass seeds, brimstone, paving stones, sulphur, lead, herring, furniture, dry goods, boards, mackerel, whale oil, codfish, rum, onions, cordage, cheeses, leather, salt and gin. Ships for which he acted as agent took on cargoes of sugar, tobacco, cotton, skins, logwood, molasses, books, beeswax and calcutta goods. He was also part owner of a number of ships, on and off throughout the years. In 1809 he purchased a one-third interest in the Cabinet. In 1815 he bought one-half of the Highlander for $4,500. Beginning in 1817, he invested in shares of various steamboats. He was not, however, a large-scale owner of shipping vessels; practically all of these ventures were in partnership with other merchants who probably took the major responsibility for these shipping activities.[14]

Most of Touro's business was in the wholesale consignment line; his customers in New Orleans were merchants, storekeepers and plantation owners, rather than the general public. One commodity which he did sell at retail was ice. He began to import this luxury from the North in 1828. In 1837, when rumors of an impending ice shortage were at large, Touro took the unusual step of sending a letter to one of the newspapers in which he assured the public that there was "sufficient ice now in the old and regularly established Ice Houses in Chartres, Conde and Commerce streets, and at the Pontchartrain R. Road; also at the house at the corner of Robin and Religieuse streets to satisfy the wants of the city and vicinity during the season, even should not another pound be received from the North." The 1838 New Orleans City Directory lists him as the owner of only two ice houses, those at 74 Conti and 23 Elysian Fields; he was, therefore, probably speaking for all of the owners of such establishments in his letter to the Bee.[15]

Touro was certainly not the most important businessman in New Orleans, nor even the most prosperous or successful Jewish entrepreneur. During the sixteen months beginning in January, 1818, for instance, Rochelle and Shiff, whom we will meet later, received twice as many consignments as did Touro, according to newspaper reports. Nor is there any evidence that Touro was a pioneer merchant venturer or high risk business leader comparable to the real-life Vincent Nolte whose story is told so dramatically in Anthony Adverse. But neither did Touro go bankrupt as Nolte and most of the other speculators did. He seems to have resisted the temptation of high profits and limited his transactions to conventional commission work, letting others take the high risks and suffer their consequences. He did not, so far as we can tell, buy or sell merchandise for his own account, except perhaps the ice. He invested very little of his money in the bank and other stock company ventures in New Orleans which collapsed during the panic of 1837–42. He did not speculate in the volatile cotton futures market as did most of his competitors, nor did he purchase a plantation in the style of prosperous Crescent City businessmen, and thereby fall victim to the economic ills of Southern agriculture and the slave system. In short, he held himself aloof from most of the dangerous aspects of New Orleans commercial life.

Touro's manner of living, to the end of his days, was simple and frugal, again in contrast to the usual New Orleans style of elegance and extravagance. At first, when he could not afford a home of his own, he lived with a number of other bachelors at 35 Conde street. Taking rooms in the same house in 1805 were the Chaplain of the Ursuline Convent and Vicar-General of the Diocese, the Very Reverend Jean Baptiste Olivier; the young merchant Richard Clague; and Alexander Milne, the Scots speculator who built the pleasure resort of Milneburg.[16] In later years, Touro lived in the same building as his store or warehouse; still later he lived, as we shall see, in a few rooms in the former rectory of Christ Church. But never did he build the sort of mansion which less successful men felt compelled to do in order to satisfy their social aspirations, let alone the kind of castle on which Alexander Milne lavished his fortune. It would be unfair to imply that Touro was a miser in the conventional sense, but it is instructive to observe that of the total assessed value of his estate of $928,774.74, probably a very low evaluation, only $1,960 was assigned to his personal possessions and furnishings—and this included silverware valued at $805 and about $600 worth of wines stored in his cellar. His carpets, chairs, hat stand, bedstead, crockery and glassware, and office furniture, were listed at $550 in the inventory. No books, jewelry or other valuables were included among his possessions.[17] It is not an occasion for surprise that a moderately successful businessman, who had no family and few personal friends, who indulged himself in no pleasures so far as we know, who was shrewd enough to invest his income wisely, should have accumulated the kind of wealth which Touro owned at the end of his life. Rabbi Isaac Leeser was writing from personal observation when he reported on Touro's style of living and saving:

> "Mr. T. was not a man of brilliant mind; on the contrary, he was slow, and not given to bursts of enthusiasm, as little as he was fond of hazardous speculations; and he used to say that he could only be said to have saved a fortune by strict economy, while others had spent one by their liberal expenditures . . . he had no tastes for the wasteful outlay of means on enjoyments which he had no relish for. He [had] thus the best wines always by him, without drinking them himself; his table, whatever delicacies it bore, had only plain and simple food for him. . . ."[18]

Touro's wealth was not secured through commercial genius, or through skyrocketing profits, but gradually, through unremitting attention to his work, and through strict economies in his personal life. Perhaps he was always haunted by the private fear of a repetition of the penury in which his early years had been spent, when first his family existed on the meager dole provided by the British army, and when later he himself had to live on his uncle's charity.

Perhaps, too, it was his homeless childhood which led him to invest most of his savings in real estate. By 1812, he had already purchased a tract of land eighteen leagues below New Orleans. His earliest acquisition of a lot and building in the city itself which we have been able to discover in the notarial records took place in 1818. Property which he bought in 1821 was still among his holdings when he died. Confident in the future of New Orleans, he purchased lot after lot, virtually all in the commercial center of the city, paid cash, erected buildings, and collected rents. He appears not to have mortgaged any of his property; hence he was unaffected by the periodic economic slumps and panics which at one time or another drove most of New Orleans' businessmen into bankruptcy. Almost three-quarters of the assessed value of his estate was invested in these properties and buildings which he had bought and developed over the long years. He had indeed, as Leeser reported, "saved a fortune," and it in turn increased in real value because the growth of New Orleans continued throughout the years. His net assets continued to increase because he never retired from business activity, as the Thwing papers demonstrate; at the very end of his years he was still giving directions to his Northern agents about the ventures in which he was engaged, mostly far away from New Orleans by that time.[19]

During his early years Touro was an interested participant in matters of civic, political and business concern.[20] In 1804 he signed petitions which recommended candidates for the federal posts of port collector and port inspector.[21] In 1807 he served as a member of a grand jury which denounced military excesses in New Orleans, and criticized the city fathers for permitting too many taverns and gaming houses to flourish in town.[22] In March of the same year he joined one hundred and forty of the "most wealthy and respectable inhabitants of this city" in congratulating Governor Claiborne and General James Wilkinson on the discovery of the Aaron Burr plot, expressing confidence in Wilkinson's motives.[23] A month later Touro and forty-four other merchants petitioned Governor Claiborne to reappoint George T. Ross to the office of sheriff from which he had resigned during the Wilkinson-Burr controversy.[24] In 1812 Touro served on a special grand jury with some of the leading citizens of New Orleans including Angélica Monsanto's son David Urquhart, who acted as foreman, the banker Beverly Chew, Touro's former neighbor Alexander Milne, and his friend R. D. Shepherd. This grand jury submitted some very strongly worded presentments on such important subjects as the Baratarian smugglers and pirates, buccaneering vessels in New Orleans, and the neglect of patients in the local marine hospital.[25] In 1812 and 1813, Touro and Shepherd were elected to the board of directors of the Bank of Orleans.[26] But the Battle of New Orleans seems to have drawn a veil over his willingness or ability to participate in civic activities. Thereafter he appears to have withdrawn from positions of public responsibility; he did not again sign political petitions, serve on grand juries and public committees, or join the boards of commercial institutions.

Well known is Alexander Walker's florid description, in his book on Andrew Jackson and the Battle of New Orleans, which was published just two years after Touro's death, of Touro's service in carrying ammunition for the Louisiana Militia, his being wounded and left to die on the field of action, and his friend Rezin Shepherd's courage in carrying him off to New Orleans in order to secure medical care for him at the risk of being charged with desertion.[27] Touro was so grateful to Shepherd that he appointed him "the universal legatee of the rest and residue of my estate," identifying him as "my dear, old and devoted friend . . . to whom, under Divine Providence, I was greatly indebted for the preservation of my life when I was wounded on the 1st of January, 1815." Shepherd's share of the estate amounted to at least a half-million dollars and may have been as much as $750,000.[28]

Rezin Davis Shepherd (1784–1865), the great-great-grandfather of Senator Leverett Saltonstall, was a Virginian who came to New Orleans in 1802 as the representative of the Baltimore merchant William Taylor, whose niece he married a few years later. Rezin and his brother James were, apparently, more venturesome merchants than Touro, dealing in far larger sums than he, but this did not prevent Judah's participation in some of their transactions. The friendship which had been established between them in the early years was cemented by Shepherd's rescue of Touro. Although Shepherd was away from New Orleans for many years, during the period 1817–37, they remained close; Touro gave Shepherd his power of attorney in connection with the settlement of the affairs of both his brother Abraham, who died in Medford, Massachusetts, in 1822, and his sister Rebecca, who died in New York in 1833. When Rezin's brother, James Shepherd, died in 1837, the deceased was indebted to Touro for $138,752. James's estate was the subject of a bitterly contested suit which lasted beyond both Rezin's and Judah's lifetimes. Rezin's relatives accused Rezin of forgery, fraud, violation of confidence and utter rapaciousness. Nonetheless, Judah maintained his belief in Rezin's integrity, continued to take part in business dealings with him, and gave Shepherd rooms in his home from 1837 on. The relationship was not one-sided, motivated only by Touro's gratitude to Shepherd; Shepherd had many reasons to be thankful for his friend's confidence, hospitality, financial backing in business ventures, and his moral support in the controversies over James's estate.[29]

Was Touro's wound of any significance other than the strengthening of the friendship with Shepherd? Walker says that Touro was "struck on the thigh by a twelve pound shot, which produced a ghastly and dangerous wound, tearing off a large mess of flesh . . . Mr. Touro long survived this event, never marrying because of the wound." There is an oral tradition in New Orleans, supported by at least one published account, that the wound included damage to Touro's sexual organs, and that this was why he never married. But in 1815 Touro was already forty years old. Is it not more likely that he had already become accustomed to bachelorhood, and that the wound had nothing to do with his failure to marry? Perhaps the hardships of childhood days had implanted something in the emotions of Judah and his brother Abraham which denied both of them the warmth and comfort of marriage. Although tradition reports that Judah did participate in the gay social life of New Orleans prior to 1815, there is no record of his ever having served on the public ball committees which were so popular during the period. But we are still faced by the problem of his apparent withdrawal from public affairs after 1815: this might be explained by shame over the wound, if indeed it made him less than a man, or by a psychic trauma which resulted from his brush with death in the searing cauldron of battle—many another man has been emotionally crippled by the shock and fear of war. But all this is guess-work. We can only note that there was an apparent change in Touro's personality after the battle.[30]

Deferring a consideration of Touro's record of support for Christian churches, until we discuss his relationship to the establishment of a Jewish congregation, we shall now attempt to evaluate Touro's record as a philanthropist. It may well be true that he was secretly generous to individuals in need of help, as has frequently been asserted. Touro's pensioner, Parson Theodore Clapp, estimated that his patron gave away more than $20,000 in private charity.[31] One hopes that Clapp was more accurate in this report than in his assertion that Touro ordered his inheritance of about $80,000 from his sister Rebecca to be distributed to charity. No such instructions have been found among the legal papers relating to Rebecca's estate, nor in the powers of attorney which Touro gave to Rezin Shepherd. It is entirely possible that Shepherd was given private instructions to dispose of the money after the estate had been completely settled, but that was still going on seven years after Rebecca's death, and it seems unlikely that there would be no publicity attached to the contribution of so large a sum of money to public institutions.[32] Jewish tradition encourages the giving of charity in secret—but not as a substitute for the support of public institutions and agencies. If Touro was indeed a philanthropist, it is indeed strange that he was more than sixty years old before he made his first dramatic contribution to a public cause, the fund for the completion of the Bunker Hill Monument, about 1839, and that it was only two years before his death that he established the Touro Infirmary, his single significant contribution to the people of New Orleans during his lifetime.

The so-called Touro Free Library Society for which he was supposed to have offered to erect a building never became an actuality. Organized in 1824, perhaps to spite the directors of the New Orleans Library Society which had been in existence as a stock company since 1806, the Library was housed in Parson Clapp's Presbyterian Church and the books were available for use only for one hour on Saturday afternoon and for two hours on Sunday morning before services. One cannot escape the suspicion that the men who constituted the board of directors of the Touro Library—such leading citizens as Parson Clapp, Judge James Workman, Beverly Chew and Maunsel White—had named the institution for Touro in the hope of wheedling a large sum of money from him. It is peculiar that Touro's own name was not listed among the incorporators of the library, that he was not elected a director, and that no mention of his name was included in the public appeals for contributions of money and books. Touro seems to have been a victim of the library proposal rather than its benefactor or sponsor, to judge from the available information.[33]

New Orleans did not develop until quite late the philanthropic and social service agencies which were so characteristic of the Protestant-oriented cities of the North; its Catholic tradition tended to place responsibility for works of charity on the shoulders of priests and nuns. But there were occasional appeals in the press for support for worthy causes. During the 1830's, for instance, a number of campaigns for funds were publicized, to which other Jews contributed and for which they worked on committees. Among these were a fund for the assistance of victims of the July, 1830, Revolution in France; a subscription to help people who had lost their homes in a fire in Fayetteville, North Carolina, in 1831; a collection for the relief of the victims of the great cholera epidemic in New Orleans in 1832; and a fund for the victims of the Charleston fire of 1838. Touro's name did not appear in the newspapers even once in the lists of sponsors of these appeals, or in the tabulations of donors and their contributions; nor was he ever active in the work of the well-known Howard Association, organized in 1837 by a group of dedicated men (including some Jews) in order to render personal service to the victims of the periodic epidemics which made life in New Orleans so dangerous during the summer and early fall. Since the only anonymous contributions to these causes which were listed in the newspapers were of the five dollar variety, it is unlikely that Touro's retiring nature compelled the omission of his name from these lists; indeed, as in the case of the Bunker Hill Monument, the names of the donors of large anonymous contributions generally became known to the public—such news is too important to remain secret for very long.[34]

So far as can be discovered, the amounts which Touro contributed for public purposes, other than sectarian religious institutions and projects, which we defer discussing, were as follows:

1839–40:	$10,000	to the Bunker Hill Monument
1843:	$1,000	to the Redwood Library of Newport, plus whatever sum would be necessary to pave the sidewalk
1852:	$40,000	as payment for the Paulding estate which he converted into the Touro Infirmary; he retained title to this property, however, until his death.[35]

It would be inappropriate to include in this list of philanthropic activities the check for $1,000 which Touro gave to the Firemen's Charitable Association in 1852 following a fire in which the prompt appearance of several volunteer fire companies saved "a considerable portion of my property;" this was more a reward than a disinterested beneficence.[36]

As we review the record, the conclusion seems inescapable that Touro's reputation as a philanthropist stems largely from the munificence of the bequests which were included in his will—approximately $483,000, incomparably larger than the sums he gave away during his lifetime.

Another aspect of Touro's philanthropic way of life is said to be revealed by his aversion to slavery. He is reported frequently to have purchased slaves "for the sole purpose of liberating them," and to have set some of them up in business.[37] A close search of the New Orleans notarial records and newspaper advertisements does indeed demonstrate that Touro did not deal extensively in slaves, unlike other commission merchants in New Orleans. He did own one slave at the time of the 1805 New Orleans census[38] but information about the disposition of that slave has not been uncovered. The very fact that Touro was in business in a slave society brought him into constant contact with the system. In 1809, for instance, fifteen slaves belonging to a bankrupt firm, of which he was a creditor, were sold at auction; some of the proceeds of the sale came to him.[39] More to the point, in 1812 he advertised rewards for the apprehension of seven Negro runaways from the plantation of one of his clients. If he was to serve his customers he had no choice but to participate in such activities as these.[40] Much of his merchandise was, of course, sold for use by slaves, including dry goods imported to New Orleans from the cotton mills of New England to be made into clothing for slaves.[41] Neither Touro nor any other New Orleans merchant could escape involvement in the daily workings of the slave system.[42]

Two very intriguing pieces of information have recently come to light, however, which relate to Touro's friendship with free Negroes. One was Ellen Wilson, a f.w.c. (free woman of color, in the terminology of New Orleans), for whom Touro purchased a home in his own name. Found among Touro's effects, after his death, was a note for $4,100 due to the same woman from J. G. Osgood. There is no way of identifying Ellen Wilson; she may have been one of Rezin Shepherd's slaves whom Touro is reported to have set free. Enough, however, to know that she is the only person for whose property and financial affairs Touro was willing to assume responsibility, so far as we can judge from the inventory of his estate. If we were dealing with anyone other than Touro, we would suspect that Ellen was his mistress; but all of the insight which we have been able to gain into his character contradicts such a suggestion. Just as little significance should attach to the presence in New Orleans of a John Touro during the period 1855–65.[43]

Far more significant is the fact that Pierre André Destrac Cazenave, one of the executors of Touro's will, and a beneficiary to the amount of $10,000 was a mulatto. In 1853, when he was thirty years old, Cazenave was a commission merchant. Identified in the R. G. Dun and Company records as the former confidential clerk and "pet" of Touro, he was reported to be worth $20,000 in 1854, and $100,000 in 1864, when he conducted an undertaking and livery establishment with his four sons. The 1866 R. G. Dun and Company report says that the Cazenave family were "Quadroons—Creoles, more properly now called colored persons." One of the Cazenave sons was Recorder of Births, Marriages and Deaths in 1875. Strange that none of the writers of the newspaper articles about Touro saw fit to comment on the fact that Touro had appointed a mulatto as an executor of his will, and described him, together with Rezin Shepherd, Aaron Keppel Josephs (a well-known Jewish attorney of New Orleans) and Gershom Kursheedt (Touro's adviser on Jewish affairs), as "my trusty and esteemed friends." Far more than any traditions or undocumented reports of Touro's interest in Negroes, does his regard for Cazenave demonstrate a remarkable spirit of dedication to the principle of human equality in an absolute and practical manner.[44]

Even if Judah Touro was not the heroic figure who has been glorified in order to feed American Jewry's well-known craving for "great men," he should still be recognized for what he was, a good, loyal, industrious human being. In a city like New Orleans, where simplicity was rare, Touro lived "a life remarkable for its monotonous simplicity."[45] He was not a leader of men in any sense, either communal or economic, but he was a decent man who pursued his own quiet, sober, moral way without participating in the extravagance, high fashion, conspicuous consumption and frenzied speculation which were so characteristic of life in New Orleans during his period of activity. Perhaps his noblest quality was his dogged loyalty—to Cazenave, the mulatto, to whom he offered a rare kind of friendship; to Rezin Shepherd, whom he supported in the bitter legal feuds over James's will and estate, despite Touro's aversion to law courts;[46] to the city of his birth, to which he was so generous in his will; to the memory of his brother Abraham, to whose three favorite charities he left bequests in his own will; to his cousin Catherine and the children of two other Hays cousins, whom he remembered in his will; and to the few close friends and supporters in New Orleans and elsewhere to whom he left token bequests in the will drawn up in the closing days of his life. These fine personal qualities should not be overshadowed by the heroic proportions of the philanthropic aspect of his bequests.

III

Jewish Settlers from 1803 to 1815

During the 1790's, as thousands of Americans poured across the Appalachians from the Atlantic seaboard, to establish farms in the Ohio and Mississippi valley areas, it became obvious that the swiftest outlet to the most desirable markets for their produce was down the Mississippi River and through the port of New Orleans. In 1795 the Spanish authorities reluctantly granted the right of commercial deposit to American citizens, but they were never happy about the arrangement and withdrew it in 1802. When Spain's cession of Louisiana to the French in 1800, at first kept secret, became public knowledge, some Americans became so agitated that they began to talk of war with France in order to secure American control over the port of New Orleans. President Thomas Jefferson's original intent in pursuing the more pacific course of undertaking discussions with the French was not to bargain for the vast Louisiana area, but only for New Orleans. Jefferson believed that the city would be the most important commercial center in the world: "with Boston, Baltimore, New York and Philadelphia on the left; Mexico on the right, Havana in front, and the immense valley of the Mississippi in the rear, no such position for the accumulation and perpetuity of wealth and power ever existed." Jefferson's instructions to James Monroe, who assisted Robert Livingston, the American Minister to France, in the negotiations, related specifically to the purchase of New Orleans and the assurance of free navigation on the Mississippi River. Napoleon's decision to dispose of the entire territory, on the other hand, was motivated by his fear that the colony would be seized by the British, upon the anticipated outbreak of war, and that British imperial resources would then be increased by the wealth of the productive Mississippi Valley. Napoleon preferred to sell the area to the inoffensive Americans than to permit it to fall into the hands of the British; the Americans for their part were willing to pay fifteen million dollars for this colonial empire because they regarded it as the key to the broader expansion of their commerce and trade.[1]

A similar dream of wealth and success drew thousands of Americans and Europeans, every year, to this Creole town which began its history under the government of the United States in 1803 with something less than 8,000 white residents. By 1810, ten thousand additional white inhabitants had swelled the population; new immigrants already outnumbered the French and Spanish Creoles. Later proportionate increases were equally large. New Orleans continued to exert the fascination of an El Dorado, an economic gold mine, on the imagination of bold, ambitious men throughout the ante-Bellum period. It was a boom and bust town, the most exciting, most cosmopolitan and exotic city in the United States. We shall, in this chapter, describe the background and experiences of those Jews who came to New Orleans and its environs in the period before the Battle of New Orleans.[2] Each one had his own personal emotional motivations for traveling so great a distance, whether from older settlements in the United States, or farther afield, from Europe. But all of them made their livelihood in some form of commerce. It was, therefore, the same lodestar of economic opportunity and personal success which drew them to the Crescent City in the years following the Louisiana Purchase, which had motivated the American government to acquire the city in the first place.

1. Benjamin S. Spitzer and David G. Seixas

By September, 1804, when he signed a petition which recommended a candidate for the position of Collector of the Port, Benjamin S. Spitzer had come to New Orleans to try his luck. Ben was probably the son of Barend Moses Spitzer, who arrived in America in 1770 and became a prominent Mason, a close friend of Haym Salomon, and a loyal member of Mikveh Israel Congregation of Philadelphia. The father died on Sullivan's Island, near Charleston, in 1796. Spitzer's partner in this New Orleans venture was Israel Baer Kursheedt of New York City, who arrived in the United States the same year that Spitzer's father had died. So far as we know, Kursheedt did not himself come to New Orleans; he must have invested some money in the business, and may have been responsible for purchasing goods in New York City and supervising their shipment to Louisiana. But his interest in the business was represented on the spot by his seventeen-year-old brother-in-law, David G. Seixas, a son of the Revolutionary War patriot hazan, Gershom Mendes Seixas.[3]

Spitzer and Seixas lived at 21 Rue St. Louis; they owned three slaves, a woman who cooked their meals and kept house for them, and two males who worked in their store. B. S. Spitzer and Company, as the firm was called, dealt in dry goods, notions, foodstuffs such as coffee and sugar, liquor and other commodities. They also invested in the schooner Nancy, and owned the building on Condé street where the Public Baths were located. Their business was soon in trouble. Kursheedt dissolved the partnership in April, 1806, and Seixas tried to sell the Public Baths. He obviously failed to do so, because in September, 1806, suits were entered against Spitzer, and, eventually, everything—merchandise, furniture, the slaves, the ship and the Public Baths—was sold at sheriff's auction. Spitzer had not gone broke, however; in June he purchased the ship Jane for $6,000, and this ship was not seized for the creditors' benefit. How long Seixas remained in New Orleans is uncertain; the final notice of his presence refers to testimony which he offered at a trial in October, 1806. All of the firm's debts were not met by the sale of the property, and, as late as November, 1807, judgments were still being sought against Spitzer. Nothing further is known of him. Once he had done his best to straighten out his affairs, he probably left town for more promising horizons. On the other hand, David Seixas returned to town in 1829 and again in 1832 to sell the printers' ink he was manufacturing in Cincinnati. Three of Israel Kursheedt's children came back to the scene of this early failure, thirty years afterwards; one of them, Gershom, became the champion of Jewish vitality in the city during the 1840's, as we shall presently see.[4]

2. JACOB HART, WITH SOME INCIDENTAL COMMENT ON JEAN LAFFITE

Although they may have hoped to become permanent residents of the city, Spitzer and Seixas remained in New Orleans for little more than two years. So far as we can tell from newspaper and notarial records, Jacob Hart of New York City was probably the next Jew to come to New Orleans, in the fall of 1804 or the spring of 1805. Hart, who lived in New Orleans until his death on December 20, 1849, was born in Philadelphia on March 29, 1781, the son of Jacob Naphtali Hart and Leah Nathan.[5] The father had emigrated to America from Germany in 1775, stayed briefly in Baltimore, then moved to Philadelphia where he married, established himself in business, made financial contributions to the Revolutionary cause which were acknowledged by Congress, and took an active role in the affairs of Congregation Mikveh Israel. After the war he settled in New York City and held office in Congregation Shearith Israel, whose school young Jacob attended. The son was still in New York City in the summer of 1804, when he and his father attended services and made an offering.[6]

Young Jacob Hart was in New Orleans before June, 1805, when he shipped a cargo worth $3,600 to the West Indies on a schooner which ran into foul luck and was captured by a British man-of-war which in turn was taken by a Spanish ship. Hart's vessel ended up in the Mexican port of Campeche. In October, 1805, Hart accepted a settlement of $2,400 for his losses from the New Orleans Insurance Company.[7] It is probable that Hart's father and family were using their money and influence to help him get established, because his business grew much more rapidly than Touro's did. During 1806, for instance, the newspapers record the names of only two ships for which Touro was agent, but four for Hart; only one cargo was consigned to Touro, while Hart received eight. In 1806 Hart was already the owner of the schooner President.[8] Over the next few years, his own ships and those for which he acted as the New Orleans agent, made voyages to Kingston, Charleston, Baltimore, New York City, Pensacola, Havana and Santiago, Cuba, and one was advertised as being available for any port in the United States or Europe. His cargoes included the usual variety of imports: dry goods, furniture, wines and liquors, brandied fruits, logwood, mahogany, gunpowder, bagging, playing cards, soap, paper, anchors, paints, candles, gigs, salt, codfish, vinegar, olives, raisins, sugar and coffee. A typical advertisement of Hart's goods appeared in the Louisiana Gazette, on February 10, 1807:

> "JUST RECEIVED AND FOR SALE,
> By the subscriber, at his store, No. 16, Chartres street
>
> Superfine red ground and fancy calicoes
> Brittanias and Dowlas
> Long lawns
> Checks and stripes, chintz shawls
> Printed pocket handkerchiefs
> Toweling, table cloths and napkins
> French broad cloths blue and black
> Crapes assorted colours
> Estopillas, French and English
> Men's beaver gloves
> Morocco skins, blue pulicat hdks.
> 45 Tons Campeachy logwood
> 22 Hogsheads Codfish
> 6 Pipes Madeira Wine
> 300 Boxes Marseilles Soap
> Brandy and Gin
>
> JACOB HART"

Hart bought and sold ships and real estate, advertised the availability of bills of exchange on New York, and fulfilled the usual responsibilities of a shipping agent and commission broker.[9] Hart had more to do with slaves than Touro. In July, 1808, he advertised three Saint-Domingue slaves for sale, a female cook and two fishermen; and, in November, 1808, he offered the public an opportunity to buy a twenty-four-year-old Negro who spoke English and French fluently, was a good tailor and also "has been accustomed to take care of horses." In 1810 he bought two slaves for 1,400 pesos from Captain Christoval de Armas of the Baton Rouge settlement in Spanish West Florida.[10]

Hart was the only Jew who was included in the directory of merchants which was published in B. Lafon's Louisiana Yearbook of 1809—but perhaps this was only because others were not interested in paying the fee which was required for the inclusion of a name.[11] At any rate, Hart was accorded some of those evidences of recognition which symbolized a man's acceptance into the mercantile community of New Orleans: during 1807–1808, he served twice as a representative of the creditors of bankrupt merchants; and in June, 1809, he was a member of the monthly committee of the New Orleans Chamber of Commerce. He took an active interest in the issues of the time: in 1807, he and Touro signed complimentary addresses to General Wilkinson and Governor Claiborne; on January 25, 1808, he was the only Jew who added his name to a petition which urged President Jefferson to appoint Captain Thomas Pollock to the command of the revenue cutter of the port.[12] Hart was also one of the young men who promoted the fancy balls which enlivened the social season: during the winter of 1806–1807 he served on the board of managers of the Tuesday night dances, and in 1807 he was one of four men who were in charge of the arrangements for the Washington's Birthday Ball.[13]

The strategic location of New Orleans made it a natural focus for a host of political and military plots designed to foment revolutions throughout the Caribbean area. The arrival of large numbers of refugees from Saint-Domingue, and of opponents of Napoleon's domination of Spain from Spanish colonial possessions in the area, stimulated a number of conspiracies during the first decade of the nineteenth century similar to the filibustering plots of later years. In 1809 the Mexican officials heard rumors from Louisiana that an expedition was being formed in New Orleans for the invasion of Mexico. An informer in New Orleans sent word to Mexico that Jacob Hart's schooner, the Célestine, which was cleared from New Orleans in the spring of 1809 for Laguna de Termión in Yucatán, was really one of the vessels being fitted out for participation in the invasion. Upon arrival in Mexico, the ship was confiscated and Hart's supercargo, Jean Robert, was arrested. Governor Claiborne protested to the Governor of Yucatán, in a letter dated July 17, 1809, that "there is no expedition preparing in this Territory against the Spanish Dominions . . . ," and denied that Robert and the others were "spies in the service of the American Government." Nonetheless, Robert and the officers and crew of Hart's ship were held in Yucatán for another six months. In November, Hart conferred with Claiborne and gave him a letter which the Governor sent on to Washington:

> New Orleans 16th Novr. 1809
>
> "His Excellency Wm. C. C. Claiborne
> Governor of the Territory of Orleans.
>
> Sir,
>
> I honoured myself by addressing your Excellency on the 17th July last acquainting you of the seizure of the Schooner Celestine & her Cargo belonging to me & the Imprisonment of the Supercargo Mr. John Robert Junr the Captain & Crew all Citizens of the United States of America, in consequence of a Letter received there & supposed to be written by a person in this City—purporting the arrival of an expedition here destined to act against the Spanish Possessions & I entreated your Excellency to address yourself officially to the proper authorities at Laguna—in contradiction of such nefarious reports & I had every expectation that your representations would eventuate in the restoration of my property & the release of the Supercargo Captain & Crew of the Schooner but experiencing a disappointment (which may have arisen from the miscarriage of your Letters) I am again compelled to trouble your Excellency as an opportunity presents itself which may be depended upon for the carriage of any further representations which you may see fit to make upon this subject.—
>
> I have the honour to remain
> Your very obedt Servt
> Jacob Hart"

Claiborne's second appeal to Yucatán was successful. The schooner returned to New Orleans, and, on April 14, 1810, Hart announced that Robert had become a partner in his business. In less than five months the partnership was dissolved; the reason did not become clear until November 5, 1810, when Robert and his friend Ange Michel Brouard were charged by a grand jury with piracy. One of the writers on the Baratarian smugglers reports that Robert and Hart began a career of piracy in order to seek revenge "not upon French imperialists but upon their Spanish captors. They entered into the trade of French piracy that within the next four years gave a permanent celebrity to Barataria and its smuggler gangs." This historian is certainly mistaken in believing that Hart had been on the Célestine and had been imprisoned; and it has been impossible to find Hart's name mentioned anywhere in the records which concern Laffite's exploits. Of course, the New Orleans merchants who dealt with Laffite and bought his smuggled and pirated goods for resale in their stores were not likely to advertise the fact, nor did Governor Claiborne ever take any action against them. Still, consideration must be given to the fact of Hart's partnership with Robert. There are only two explanations for the sudden breakup: that Hart took Robert into his business, on his return from Mexican captivity, as a reward for his loyalty and as recompense for his unpleasant experience, but discharged him as soon as he discovered that Robert had become involved with Laffite; or, that Hart had known all along about Robert's activities, but, in order to protect himself, announced public dissolution of the partnership when he heard that Robert had been apprehended, while he continued secretly to participate in the profitable business end of Barataria. Either of these possibilities may be factual; unfortunately no further evidence has been discovered which may cast light upon Hart's relationship to Laffite's exploits. But he was the only Jewish businessman who seems in any way to have been connected with Barataria.[14]

This is probably a more logical place than any other to digress for a report on Laffite's Jewish antecedents and connections. Most authorities on Laffite accept as authentic the account that, after his mother's death, he was reared by his grandmother, and that his grandfather had been done to death by the Inquisition or, at least, had died in prison while in the custody of the Inquisition. One authority gives the grandmother's name as Maria Zora Nadrimal. Another says that she "planted a deep hatred of Spain in her grandsons."[15] A controversial document which purports to be Laffite's journal and autobiography refers to this grandmother's tales as the root of Jean's hatred of the Spanish:

> ". . . My mother died before I can remember and my maternal grandmother, who lived with us, became a mother to me . . . My grandmother was of Spanish-Israelite descent . . . My mother's father had been an alchemist with a good practice and patronage in Spain. He was a free-thinking Jew with neither Catholic faith nor traditional adherence to the Jewish synagogue. But this did not prevent him from dying of starvation in prison for refusing to divulge the technical details which the Inquisition demanded from all Jews. Grandmother told me repeatedly of the trials and tribulations her ancestors had endured at the time of the Spanish Inquisition . . . Grandmother's teachings . . . inspired in me a hatred of the Spanish crown and all the persecutions for which it was responsible—not only against the Jews. . . ."

Anyone who knows anything of the history of the Jews of Spain realizes that unconverted Jews could not live in Spain after 1492, and that synagogues ceased to function at that time. The grandfather could only have been a Marrano "new" Christian, a secret Jew who outwardly conformed to the Catholic faith while retaining his conscientious allegiance to Judaism; that he may have been an alchemist is possible, since such theories were still in vogue. But Laffite was not expected to be an historian on such matters; his garbled description of his family's Marrano background need not be regarded as evidence that the volume is a forgery.[16]

Another interesting Jewish reference in the alleged Laffite autobiography is the report of a discussion with the well-known Jewish merchant of New York City, Isaac Moses:

> "I had a conversation with Isaac Moses about three years before his death. In 1815 he dissuaded me from trying to recover some of my profits. He states that he had never been reimbursed for his financial aid at the time of the Revolution against the English. He stated also that S. H. Solomon likewise had never been reimbursed for the economical assistance which he gave to General Washington. That conversation with Mr. Moses in 1815 weakened my constancy of purpose in Washington at that time. . . ."[17]

Isaac Moses, who was seventy-three years old in 1815, is not known to have been in New Orleans at that time. But he was indeed a patriot who had supported the Revolutionary cause with money and trade goods; he was one of that band of Jewish merchants which also included Haym Salomon (not S. H. Solomon as the "Journal" has it) who figure largely in Robert Morris' record of the new government's financial tribulations and transactions. But, if Moses had not been in New Orleans, and Laffite was never in New York, how would the latter ever have heard of Moses and Salomon? Some of Haym's children and grandchildren were in and out of Mobile and New Orleans in later years; one son, Ezekiel, as we shall see, died in New Orleans in 1821. But we know of no opportunity which they might have had to meet Laffite. The possibility suggests itself that Jacob Hart might have told Laffite about Haym Salomon and Isaac Moses, for he knew both families: Jacob's father and Isaac Moses were active at the same time in the affairs of Shearith Israel Congregation in New York City, and Jacob's sister Ella or Ellen married Haym Salomon's son, Haym M., in 1809. If, on the other hand, the diary is a forgery, its actual author must have had some special reason to be aware of Isaac Moses' financial support of the Revolution, and of his death in 1818. Isaac Moses' patriotic activities were far less publicized than Haym Salomon's; but in 1827, Jacob's brother-in-law, Haym M. Salomon, instituted a campaign to regain from the federal government the large sums of money his father is supposed to have loaned to Congress.[18]

Whether or not Jacob Hart gained added profits through participating in Laffite's illegal trade, he became quite prosperous. One after another, he brought his brothers to New Orleans from New York City to work with him. David, four years younger than Jacob, was in New Orleans by 1810, for the brothers were living together on Royal street when the federal census was taken that year; David, not Jacob, is listed in Whitney's New Orleans Directory for 1811. The youngest Hart brother, Joseph, died in New Orleans on August 19, 1817. Nathan must have joined Jacob and David no later than 1819, for in June of that year, before a trip to New York City, Nathan gave Jacob his power of attorney. Benjamin and Leon, two other brothers, may also have been there at that time. In the 1820 census, Jacob, living then on Chartres street, listed as members of his household two males between sixteen and twenty-six (Benjamin was twenty; Nathan and Leon, twins, were twenty-three); two males between twenty-six and forty-five (David was thirty-five and Jacob himself was thirty-nine); the two males over forty-five were probably relatives or clerks of whom we have no precise information. Also listed in the census report were seven male slaves.[19]

We would not have any precise knowledge of Jacob Hart's holdings and resources if he had not gone bankrupt in 1823, a catastrophe from which he seems never to have recovered. He was the first of the prosperous Jewish merchants of New Orleans to go through the wringer, a victim of overextension and speculation, high living and incautious investments. From what we know, he was probably worth more on paper, when he was sold out by his creditors, than Touro was. The auctioneers' advertisement of the sheriff's sale listed Hart's major possessions:

> "One Half of the schooner Marsouin, measuring about 25 tons burthen.
>
> A double Hydraulic, or Water [Cotton] Press, situated at the corner of St. Charles and Gravier streets.
>
> A Horse Press and a Hand Press [also for cotton], situated at the same place.
>
> A quantity of Sugar Pans, &c. viz:—40 sugar Pans, 2 Pivots and 1 Cylinder, at the corner of Custom-house and Rampart streets; 10 sugar Pans in the Fauxbourg St. Mary, on land belonging to Mr. [Millaudon].
>
> Three Horses and two Drays.
>
> An Admission Ticket to the French Theatre.
>
> Three Lots of Land, situated in the Fauxbourg St. Mary . . . in front of Poydras-street . . . together with the Two Houses erected thereon . . . weather boarded, and covered with short pickets.
>
> A Lot of Land, situated on the left side of the Bayou St. John, measuring about 120 feet, in front of the Bayou, and 132 feet on Mississippi street, together with the Buildings thereon erected, viz:—
>
> A House on Sills, filled between the posts, measuring 50 feet front by 50 feet in depth, containing four rooms on the ground floor, > with a front and back gallery, and two closets on the back gallery.

>
> A Log Kitchen divided into two compartments.
>
> Also the following Property on the joint accounts of the said Insolvent and Mr. Charles Parent, viz:—
>
> The undivided half of a Lot of Land, situated on the further side of Lake Pontchartrain, in the parish St. Tammany . . . measuring superficially 2,657 arpents or thereabouts, together with all the Buildings and Offices thereon erected . . .
>
> Together with a moiety of the Stock, consisting of 4 horses, 5 oxen, 10 cows, and 15 sheep.
>
> Also the undivided half interest in [fourteen slaves listed by name and age.]
>
> Also, one half of the crop of Cotton, and one half interest in the boy Adam, aged about 15.
>
> Also, the undermentioned [thirteen slaves and a five-year-old slave child] employed in the Presses described above . . ."[20]

This inventory was incomplete in that it did not include Hart's cash assets, or the shares of stock of the Louisiana Insurance Company which he had purchased in 1820, or his personal effects.[21] But it does demonstrate the extent of his business activities and investments. In addition to the import-export business which he conducted with his brothers and which was not affected by this bankruptcy, he had built up one of New Orleans' indispensable cotton presses, was engaged in sugar refining, owned some income-producing property, and was half-owner of a plantation, of which his partner was probably the resident manager. Jacob had done well, indeed, for himself and for his brothers, but now eighteen or nineteen years' effort and hard work had gone down the drain. He had come to New Orleans to find his fortune, succeeded, and now had failed.[22]

Jacob Hart did not amount to very much after the 1823 bankruptcy. Shipments of merchandise came to him occasionally, but in 1831 and again in 1832 he was in such straits that sheriff's sales were conducted to dispose of some sugar kettles that he owned, and of a steamboat of which he was part-owner with his brothers Leon, Benjamin and Nathan.[23] He was probably supported by his brothers rather than through his own efforts. For many years, from 1826 into the 1840's, he held his brother Leon's power of attorney for investment purposes, and bought and sold slaves and part-interests in steamboats.[24] Meanwhile, Nathan and Benjamin conducted a cotton press business as Jacob's successors. Nathan, who in 1820 had been able to buy a slave only because of Jacob's countersignature and guarantee,[25] was listed in the 1830 census as owning fifteen male slaves (workers, probably in the cotton press), while Jacob owned none. The press and storehouse, constituting a number of buildings in the block bounded by Gravier, St. Charles, Common and Camp streets, burned to the ground in 1830. The estimate of the loss of the buildings, and of the twelve thousand bales of cotton which went up in smoke, amounted to three hundred thousand dollars, of which only forty thousand was covered by insurance. One newspaper reported that "the flames were discovered to burst out almost simultaneously on all sides of the square which leaves no doubt of its being the work of malicious design." There is no certainty that the brothers ever reestablished themselves in the cotton press business; within a few years they had left town. Only Jacob remained, continuing to manage affairs for Leon and Nathan; once in a while he conducted a little business for himself, as in 1839, when he advertised the availability of three houses for rent, but they too may have belonged to one of his brothers.[26]

Jacob was getting along in years, and was probably too tired and discouraged to undertake anything very substantial. It must have brightened his days, however, when he was joined by another member of his family after his brothers left. In the early 1840's his sister Hetty (Esther) and her husband Alexander Marks moved to New Orleans with their children and first grandchild. (Another granddaughter, named Ida, born in 1865, years after Jacob's death, eventually married Rabbi Max Heller of Temple Sinai in New Orleans. Their son, James, became one of the luminaries of the American Reform rabbinate, a distinguished leader in Zionist circles and gifted musicologist). Alexander and Hetty's son Isaac N. Marks was a well-known New Orleans civic leader in the ante- and post-Bellum years. It was Isaac Marks and another nephew of Jacob's, Ezekiel Salomon (son of Haym M. Salomon), who signed the invitation to Jacob's funeral in 1849. On balance Jacob's business career in New Orleans was fairly typical—ambition and success, disappointment and failure; it was illustrative of the high risk of commercial ventures in the town, of overexpansion, and of the danger of giving in to the temptation to invest in a plantation. But Jacob's career spanned the years from the early days of American occupation to the eve of the Civil War, when New Orleans had become the fourth largest city in the United States and its second busiest port.[27]

3. Maurice Barnett

Touro, Spitzer, Seixas and Hart were all native Americans; but hard on their heels came a number of foreign Jews who left Europe for a variety of personal reasons, yet all of whom were drawn to Louisiana by the promise of economic opportunity in their new home.

It is difficult to ascertain a specific date of arrival for most immigrants. The earliest references to them in local records may have been entered months or even years after their actual arrival. Maurice Barnett, for instance, first appears in the records of Baton Rouge, still part of Spanish West Florida, on April 13, 1806, when he witnessed the will of F. Bertin. But he may have been in the town somewhat earlier, for by July 30, 1806, he was sufficiently established to be married by Fray Juan Brady to Marie Céleste Trahan, daughter of Juan Trahan and Mara Josefa Le Jeune. Eight days prior to the wedding, Maurice purchased a lot of ground, twelve arpents below the fort, for 130 pesos; the document of sale does not refer to a building on the lot, but Barnett may have thought of erecting a home at that location.

This was probably not Maurice Barnett's first American experience. The likelihood is that he was the son of Lazarus Barnett, a Dutch broker, who settled in Philadelphia in late 1782 or early 1783, went into business with another Dutch Jew, Lyon Moses, joined Mikveh Israel Congregation, had business reverses and took off for London some time in 1784, leaving his creditors with the impression that he had not turned all his assets over to the syndics. Bankruptcy in Philadelphia was not enough trouble for Lazarus; he had similar problems in London in 1785. It has not been possible to discover anything else about his life in Great Britain, other than the record of his death on March 26, 1797, in the burial register of the Great Synagogue of London. Maurice had been born in Amsterdam on September 22, 1776, and was therefore six or seven years old when the family moved from Holland to Philadelphia, and twenty-one years old when his father died. The Barnett family has preserved the tradition that Maurice served in Napoleon's Grande Armée before coming to Louisiana. But in view of the years of residence in London, it would seem far more likely that any military experience which Maurice had undergone was in the British army. Maurice probably brought to Louisiana his younger brother Edward, who had been born during the family's brief stay in Philadelphia; Edward later married Modeste Ledoux of Opelousas.[28]

In Baton Rouge, Maurice Barnett was a typical merchant of the time. He was willing to trade in anything that a customer might want to buy. His accounts with one neighbor became the subject of a dispute, and are, therefore, much to our edification, listed in a court record. They cover the period from November, 1808, to April, 1810. This customer, an innkeeper and merchant, purchased the following merchandise from Barnett: food-stuffs—cheese, vinegar, salted mackerel, cloves, cinnamon, nutmeg, salt, coffee; liquor—rum, gin, anisette, cider and wines; dry goods—three and a half ells of cloth, sewing thread, one-quarter ell of black velvet, one-half ell of another kind of velvet; miscellaneous—hardware, crockery, corks, buttons, furniture, cigars, nails, paper, pots, brooms and oars.[29] Barnett obtained most of his merchandise from suppliers in New Orleans, and sometimes fell behind in his payments to them; cash was always hard to find because much of his business was on the barter system.[30] Occasionally he was unable to collect any payment at all from a customer. One such recalcitrant was the fascinating Jean Fremont who had been teaching in Baton Rouge and left town suddenly; his effects were sold on December 19, 1806, and Barnett was one of the creditors who shared in the proceeds of the auction. Jean Fremont then found his way to Norfolk, Virginia, where he fell in love with a young married woman who divorced her husband, married him and became the mother of his son, the adventurer-explorer John Charles Fremont.[31]

On June 7, 1807, Barnett's first child, Maurice junior, was born. At this time, the Barnetts may have been living with Marie's family, but during the next year, Maurice bought and sold additional real estate, including a house which he purchased in June, 1808. It may have been this house which was repaired, or a totally new home which Barnett ordered Ralph Bell to construct for him. During 1807–1808, Barnett was employing a carpenter and brick-mason, buying and storing lime, and purchasing a pick-axe. All of this activity later became the subject of a greal deal of litigation but, presumably, resulted in the completion of Barnett's new home and store.[32]

Barnett had an excitable temper. In April, 1808, Frederick Arbour, the merchant-innkeeper at Fort San Carlos in Baton Rouge, came to court with the complaint that he had asked Barnett to work out an agreement for the settlement of their accounts, but Barnett "abused and insulted me, stating that he did not wish to settle any accounts with me." Governor Carlos Louis Boucher de Grand-Pré ruled that both parties should appoint representatives who would together compare the records of indebtedness and payment. Barnett's agent was given full and free access to Arbour's records, but when Arbour's arbitrator came to Barnett to examine his papers, Barnett "denied, without any reasonable excuse, the whole of the account . . . and moreover he flew into a rage, and it was impossible . . . to continue [the] work." Barnett was then compelled to come to court and to accept the recommendation of the intermediaries, namely, that he had to pay Arbour for one hundred stakes, four pots, a hoe, a quantity of lard, some empty bottles, and some wine and gin . . . everything else in both ledgers being cancelled out. We have already examined the record of Arbour's extensive purchases from Barnett. The latter, in turn, had been indebted to the innkeeper for sums of cash advanced to him, for meals, wine and liquor served at the inn, for the entertainment of guests at Barnett's expense (perhaps customers or business associates), for boarding the carpenter and bricklayer, and especially for meals, foodstuffs and even cash given to members of Marie's large family—"oranges . . . [and] apples given to your father [in-law];" "For the ball of his mother-in-law;" "For Joseph and Louis;" "Dinner for Louis;" "For account of David;" "For pancakes with Señor Trahan;" "For Young Trahan." The high cost of supporting his wife's relatives was reason enough for Barnett's temper, but he himself seems to have enjoyed fine food: he had a dinner for four "for the Mardi Gras," was a member of "la Société du banquou"—probably an eating club—for which he was host on occasion, and enjoyed crêpes and coffee at Arbour's many times. He was also indebted to Arbour for the rent of a pirogue, the hire of a skiff for eleven days and eight ferry passages. One fact worth noting is that Barnett was in greater need of hard money than Arbour; many guests at the inn must have paid cash for their rooms and meals, but Barnett's customers bought his merchandise on credit, or paid him in kind.[33]

Barnett was evidently not only a man of hot temper, but also of some strength and capacity for leadership. In August, 1808, the Governor was told by an informer of the projected scheme of three deserters from the United States Army, who were lurking in the area, to rob a New Orleans merchant who was coming upriver to Baton Rouge. Grand-Pré appointed Barnett leader of a posse to apprehend the criminals. Although his detachment included only four Negroes and a white man, Barnett swiftly located the deserters, and "I had the three of them tied together and delivered them at three in the afternoon in the Fort of Baton Rouge without any further happening worth mentioning." Barnett is described in the record of the ensuing trial as "commandant of the military expedition." This title was a trifle high-sounding, perhaps, but Baton Rouge was a frontier post without a military establishment. The Governor had to depend on a civilian militia, and who better to call upon than this British or French veteran?[34]

Barnett may have farmed some of the land he acquired, but since he did not invest heavily in slaves—there is only one slave purchase on record—it is unlikely that he had any serious intention of becoming a planter. Most of the records of his activity in Baton Rouge concern purchases at auction, and investments in and sales of real estate. In 1811, he joined eight neighbors in forming the first corporation in the area's history, a company whose sole purpose was to erect buildings on four lots which had been purchased at the auction of an estate. The investors probably had little faith in the future of the venture, for they named their corporation "Société de la Folie."[35]

The "Société de la Folie" was supposed to last twenty years. If it still flourished in 1831, Barnett had long since moved away from Baton Rouge. According to young Maurice's recollections in later years, the family was in New Orleans by 1812. The father had been, until then, the only permanent Jewish resident of Baton Rouge, probably its first, although the Monsanto brothers had lived and worked and traveled in and out of the area for a number of years, and, as we shall see, other Jewish merchants came to Baton Rouge, and one even may have had a branch store there. But Barnett was the only one who actually lived in the community for an extended period of time. Now he left for the big city, probably for economic reasons. A merchant would have far more opportunity in New Orleans than in Baton Rouge, especially since Baton Rouge no longer possessed the economic advantage of being a Spanish colonial outpost; in 1810 the local settlers had revolted against Spanish rule and established their own "Republic of West Florida," but the area was quickly annexed by the United States. If Barnett was to be an American, he probably thought he would be a more prosperous one in New Orleans.[36]

What the elder Barnett did for a living between the time of his move to New Orleans and 1830 is a matter of doubt. His name does not appear in newspaper advertisement or reports; if he was in business in New Orleans he was very quiet about it. His name continues to appear in a few Baton Rouge records, but these offer no evidence of his residence or full-time occupation.[37] It is possible that he worked for another merchant, or that he was learning the auction business in someone else's employ, or that he was traveling on the frontier. Young Maurice gives no clue, in his reminiscences, of his father's activities during this period. He reports only that he himself attended the College of Orleans when he was ten or twelve years old (it was really not even a high school), but left because of hazing by older boys, and was enrolled at Visigne's private school, where he was a student from 1817 to 1822. Maurice, Jr., was not the only son to receive a good education; two other sons—Edward (born in 1816) and Alphonse (born in 1823)—were trained to become members of that elite group of New Orleans notaries who were held in as high esteem as attorneys because Louisiana still followed the French system of legal practice.[38] In 1822, after he left school, young Maurice was apprenticed to a local merchant, then clerked with the dry goods firm of Solomon Soher and Daniel Goodman, whom we shall meet later, and, in 1825, opened his own retail store. Five years later the elder Maurice Barnett's name appears in the newspapers as a ship agent and as recipient of a shipment of specie from Mexico.[39] That same year, according to the son's recollections, "my father and I went to San Antonio, in Texas, on a trading expedition which proved to be a very profitable one, as we sold all the stock of nankeen, platillas, silks, satins, large silk shawls, etc., that we took with us. That region was, at that period, without stores." Perhaps this was what the elder Barnett had been doing throughout the years, traveling in the hinterland. Whatever his business, he had prospered. The 1830 census credits the family with eight slaves, five male and three female. Maurice's daughter Hélène, who was married to Sol Audler by then, had three female slaves and one male.

In 1831 the father opened an auction business which in time became one of the best-known in New Orleans. His sales were advertised in the newspapers almost every day. He was particularly active in the marketing of Louisiana and Texas real estate. In addition, he sold furniture and other household equipment, ships, houses and almost everything else imaginable. He was especially noted for his slave sales. The slaves were not his own property, of course; he was the agent for their owners. But, in time, his auction mart at the St. Louis Hotel—with his sign above it—"M. Barnett./ Office 40 St. Louis St."—came to be pointed out to visitors as a relic of slave days; and picture postcards of "The Old Slave Block," as it was called, were sold to the tourists who flocked to the exotic French quarter.[40]

Between 1836 and 1849, the Maurice Barnett father and son team conducted the auction business together, while Alphonse and Edward shared offices as notaries. After 1850, the elder Maurice retired from business, but young Maurice continued auctioneering, in association with his brother Lewis, with dry goods as a sideline.[41] Longevity was a distinction of the Barnett male line. The elder Maurice died just after his eighty-ninth birthday. The newspaper said that he had "enjoyed remarkably good health, and retained his mental powers until within a very short period of his death." Maurice the younger lived past his ninety-first birthday; "up to the very day of his death," reported a journalist, "his mental faculties were in nowise clouded, and his wonderful memory enabled him to recall the reminiscences of this city and state when this century was still young." Lewis, the youngest son, who was born in 1828, lived to the age of ninety. It was strong stock which Maurice Barnett Sr. had brought to Louisiana to merge with the French Catholic Trahans of Baton Rouge.[42]

4. Samuel Hermann

Much as Maurice Barnett first established himself in the Baton Rouge area before moving permanently to New Orleans, so Samuel Hermann made his earliest home on the German Coast, in St. John the Baptist Parish. The precise date of his migration to Louisiana is not given in any document, but it was some time before April 21, 1806, when he was married to Marie Emeronthe Becnel Brou in the St. John the Baptist Church at Edgard. Marie Emeronthe was a young widow whose first husband, Pierre Antoine Brou the younger, had died in April or May of 1802 after a marriage that lasted less than three years, but produced two sons. Samuel's first child, Samuel Edmond Hermann, later referred to as Samuel Hermann, Jr., was born on January 9, 1807. The elder Hermann was a native of Roedelheim, near Frankfurt-am-Main, Germany, the son of Louis Hermann and Eva Hirsch.[43]

The Becnel and Brou families had been in the German Coast area for several generations. Marie Emeronthe's great-grandfather, Ambrose Haydel or Heidel, had come to Louisiana as early as 1721, from the German Electorate of Mainz. The Becnel family arrived from London in the next generation. Thomas Becnel married a Brou girl in 1742; they were Emeronthe's grandparents. Her parents, Pierre Antoine Becnel and Madeline Haydel, were married in 1772. These people were modest farmers. We have no information about the reason for Hermann's decision to settle there, rather than in New Orleans. Perhaps he peddled among them, and thus met Emeronthe. She and Pierre had lived with the Brou family, so there was no farm for which Samuel had to take responsibility after their marriage. Since the German Coast is not too distant from New Orleans, it is possible that Hermann acted as agent for some merchant in New Orleans, perhaps Hart Moses Shiff, at whose wedding in 1813 Hermann acted as witness, and with whom he was on close personal and business terms for many years, or R. L. Rochelle, Shiff's partner, who served as godfather at the baptism of Samuel's second son, Louis Florian, who was born on February 27, 1810. When the 1810 census was taken, Samuel was living on the right bank of the German Coast, with four male children under ten years of age—Florestan and Valsin Brou, Emeronthe's two sons by Pierre Brou, and Samuel Edmond and Louis Florian,—in addition to four slaves. The only extant records of Hermann's early commercial transactions are slave sales in 1809 and 1811—these, together with his later banking and financial operations in New Orleans, lead to the conclusion that he was in some kind of trade during his residence on the German Coast.[44]

Samuel Hermann's earliest appearances in the notarial records of New Orleans also relate to slave trading. On May 14, 1813, he purchased a slave for $400; on April 19, 1814, he bought eighteen slaves from George Weinbrenner of St. John the Baptist Parish, for $10,000. In the latter bill of sale, Hermann is described as a "merchant, of this city." The previous year, Weinbrenner had borrowed $5,000 from Rochelle and Shiff, giving them a mortgage on his plantation as security for the loan. Plantation owners were always notoriously short of cash; only merchants and bankers could have five or ten thousand dollars available for loans. Hermann had probably begun his life on the German Coast as a petty trader, saved some capital, perhaps conducted a store in the area, and then moved on to New Orleans where there was greater opportunity for business expansion.[45]

Emeronthe and Samuel lost an infant in New Orleans on February 25, 1814. A third son, Lucien, was born late in the Edgard years or early in the New Orleans period of the family's residence, but no baptismal certificate can be located in either place. A daughter, Marie Virginie, was born on September 28, 1816. One of the witnesses at Virginie's baptism in St. Louis Church in New Orleans was Asher M. Nathan, with whom Samuel was in partnership from 1818 to 1823.[46]

Samuel Hermann concentrated on finance more than the typical import-export business of the time. He dealt extensively in loans, mortgages, bank stocks, bills of exchange and real estate. He acted as a broker for planters who needed advances on their future crops, and arranged for shipments of merchandise to them, but he appears to have been less concerned with wares and commodities than with credit. He was a merchant banker of the period, a private banker, who engaged in financial transactions locally and throughout the world. But at one time or another he owned ships, two of which were named the Hermann and the Florian. His field of operations ranged from Lisbon to Hamburg and Gothenburg, from Liverpool to New York City, and from Tampico to the islands of the Caribbean. Hermann managed the affairs of other merchants, and, while Hart M. Shiff was away from town, took care of his interests. As quickly as he could, Hermann trained his sons and set them up in business. In 1828, when young Samuel was twenty-one, his father made him a partner; in 1833 they enlarged their operations by taking in two additional partners, F. W. Schmidt and John F. Oetzman. In 1834 the firm imported large amounts of specie from Mexico, $45,000 in June and $50,000 in November. By 1833 Lucien had become a partner in John Hagan and Company and earned $18,750 his first year; he later became a partner in the successor to Hagan's, Thomas Barrett and Company. Florian was a partner in Byrne, Hermann and Company, which made over $100,000 profit in 1833; in 1836, Florian was a member of a new firm, Hermann, Briggs and Company.[47]

The Hermann family was extremely prosperous. Already, in 1820, according to the federal census, ten slaves had served the household. In 1831, Samuel tore down the house at 820 St. Louis street in which he had lived since 1823, and built one of the showpiece homes of New Orleans. This mansion still stands today, and is used by the Christian Women's Exchange as a residence hall for single girls. It followed Yankee architectural patterns, rather than those of the French-Spanish Creole tradition. The elaborately carved Georgian doorway opens on a broad center hall which reaches back, beyond several high-ceilinged parlors on either side, to a gracefully curving stairway leading to the second floor. Past the stairs are doorways which lead from a broad veranda to an open courtyard, planted with shade and fruit trees and formal gardens. Among the outbuildings are a narrow, three-story structure which was used for bachelor visitors, the usual slave habitations and a large stable, the latter used now as a gift shop. Characteristic New Orleans galleries appear in front of the home over the entrance way, and at the rear of the second floor. Hermann paid $15,205 for the construction of the home, and an additional $5,000 for the three-story quarters in the rear. In this luxurious home, Carl Kohn, the nephew of Hermann's friend, Samuel Kohn, attended a party which he described in a letter dated March 7, 1833:

> ". . . By the by I must not forget to tell you of a most magnificent soiree M. Hermann gave last week, but was unfortunately very much thwarted by the weather, which that day, and that only one for a fortnight before and after proved most wretchedly bad, he was thus prevented of illuminating his court, and showing his Fireworks, which had already been prepared. But nevertheless out of three hundred and fifty persons invited, very few failed to come—it was no doubt the finest party that had ever been given here, his commodious house, splendid Furniture, and Mr. Hermann's own good nack giving him every facility of making it as agreeable as it could possibly have been made. . . ."[48]

A few weeks later Carl complained to his uncle Samuel, who was then living in Paris, that Marie Virginie was showing great coolness toward him. Samuel had sent Carl some music from Paris, in response to Carl's importunate request, and Samuel sent two sets.

> "... I have communicated to Miss Hermann, that you wished her to play a duet with me, which you chose expressly to do in which she acquiesced, but only acquiesced—the fact Miss H. behaved most unaccountably cold to me ever since my return from Mobile, which rather startled me in the beginning and made me think that I must have made myself guilty of some gross neglect toward her. However I am now convinced that I could never have given Miss Hermann any serious cause for treating me with such marked coldness ... Were [she] a man, I would long have asked for an explanation but with a lady it is a delicate business. I may however yet question her about it, should I have an opportunity to play that duo with her. Mr. & Mrs. H. are as kind to me as ever, but you may well think that I can not visit the house as frequently and with as much pleasure as I otherwise might do. ..."

If the Hermann and Kohn families were hoping for a match between Carl and Virginie, they were disappointed. Virginie married Dr. Joseph Ursin Landreaux in St. Louis Church on January 28, 1835. Less than three weeks later, Samuel, Jr., married Eugénie De Buys, widow of Henri Hypolite Tricou. Florian had already been married, on December 25, 1830, to Adèle Longer, whose mother was a De Buys.[49]

A number of surviving portraits enable us to study members of the Hermann family at close hand. Dr. George de Tarnowsky of Wilmette, Illinois, owns a portrait of young Samuel which was painted by Vaudechamp in 1833; it portrays a handsome, cultivated, sensitive man. Dating from about the same time is a portrait of Emeronthe, dressed in the height of fashion, the property of another great-great-grandson, Mr. Pierre A. de Tarnowsky, president of the Armour Pharmaceutical Company of Chicago. Emeronthe stares with a sour frown at the stranger who stands before her; there is no grace or charm or warmth in her glance. Perhaps she had been beautiful when Samuel Hermann married her, but there is no touch of loveliness in this portrait, nor, indeed, in another which is in the possession of Mr. James Reiss of New Orleans, which probably dates from the late 1840's, after havoc had been wreaked in the family fortune; here, Emeronthe is an old, frowning woman, somewhat sad, resigned and weary. Her appearance makes one wonder if she ever felt any joy or love. Mr. Reiss's portrait of the elder Samuel, on the other hand, brings the onlooker into direct contact with a strong, virile, masterful man, who has worked and played hard, who grins at the world and its follies and pitfalls, and probably at his own illusions as well.

The Hermann men were fairly active civic leaders. In 1830, Samuel, Sr., was a member of a committee which raised a fund for the widows and orphans of the victims of the July revolution in France; his firm gave the highest amount, $100. In 1832, Samuel Hermann and Son contributed $50 to the cholera epidemic relief fund. In 1838, Samuel, Jr., served on a committee which solicited donations for the relief of those who were rendered destitute by the disastrous fire in Charleston. In 1833, Lucien was a manager of the Washington Birthday Ball which was held at the Orleans Ball Room, and the following year he served as one of twelve masters of ceremonies of a parade in memory of Lafayette, a cherished hero of the New Orleans population. In 1839, Lucien was appointed an aide-de-camp for military affairs by the Governor, but this was largely an honorary position which recognized social prestige rather than military training; the following year he served as a member of the Central Committee of Correspondence of the Louisiana Whig Party. In 1836, young Samuel was a member of a special grand jury which concluded its deliberations by recommending the construction of a new custom-house, and the establishment of a permanent military force in New Orleans to stand guard against the possibility of an abolitionist uprising. Florian's social and equestrian interests resulted in his election as a steward of the New Orleans Jockey Club in 1837. The elder Samuel does not seem to have taken any role in such matters, other than his membership in an anti-duelling society in 1834—probably more for the sake of his sons than for himself.[50]

Such public activities as these were clearly of secondary significance to the Hermann men. Business was their major concern. Despite their comparative youth, all three of the sons served as directors of banks and other financial enterprises. In 1832, Samuel, Jr., was nominated for a seat on the board of the City Bank; in 1834–36 he served as a director of the New Orleans Gas Light and Banking Company, and, in 1837, both he and Florian were members of its board. Lucien was nominated to the board of the Western Marine and Fire Insurance Company in 1832; in 1836 he served simultaneously on the boards of the Carrollton Bank, the Orleans Navigation Company and the new Exchange and Banking Company of which he was an organizer and commissioner. The Governor appointed Lucien to the board of the Union Bank in 1835, and in 1836, he and another Jew, Joachim Kohn, were elected directors of the Louisiana State Marine and Fire Insurance Company—two out of seven. Each of the brothers took his turn on the Arbitration Committee of the New Orleans Chamber of Commerce. Samuel, Sr., does not seem to have been interested in offices; those honors he turned over to his sons. But we may be certain that he enjoyed the uses of power.[51]

This prestige, prosperity and popularity did not erase the memory of his European family from Samuel's mind. In 1835 he returned to Germany to visit his relatives and to make provision for their maintenance. This is the report of a German magazine about his wealth and generosity:

> "RICHES—AN ORNAMENT OF THE RIGHTEOUS.
>
> Grand Duchy of Hesse, Sept. 3. A young Israelite, native of Roedelsheim, near Frankfurt, had gone to America as a commercial clerk 31 years ago, as the circumstances made it very hard for him to get on at home. Though arriving utterly destitute in the New World, he succeeded in amassing a great fortune by diligent industry, so that at present he finds himself at the head of the first commercial firm in New Orleans, Herrman [sic] & Co., and in possession of several million dollars. Some weeks ago he paid a visit to his old home for the purpose of providing for his numerous relatives. He has transferred to them each a sum of as much as 150,000 florins as capital so that they may expand their business activities, and in addition has made arrangements for those of his family's members, who need a rest on account of advanced age, to be given a considerable allowance regularly during their lifetime by a Frankfurt banking house. He has now gone back to New Orleans."[52]

Let us hope that all of Hermann's gifts were in cash, rather than promises, for soon he had no surplus funds to distribute to admiring German Jewish relatives. The financial excesses of the early years of the decade gave way, in 1837, to panic and depression; stability did not return to New Orleans' economy until 1842. Land speculation, the enormous increase in the state debt, an unreasonable expansion of the number of banks and the availability of banking credit, and the precipitous fall in the cotton market in England, conspired to make New Orleans one of the hardest hit of all of the financial centers of the United States. The shock waves of fiscal crisis began in England, traveled swiftly to New York, and then shook the foundations of wealth and commerce in New Orleans, foundations which were at least as insecure as those of London and New York. Lucien's firm, Thomas Barrett and Company, was one of the first to collapse; it was shattered by the bankruptcy of the New York City Jewish bankers, J. L. and S. Josephs, who in turn were destroyed by the tightening of their credit in London. S. Hermann and Son, and Hermann, Briggs and Company (Florian's firm) suffered some losses in the Josephs debacle, but both had worse problems. Theirs had been the only New Orleans firms to enjoy open credits of £10,000 with Barings for the purchase of cotton; this credit was withdrawn in 1837. In addition, the two firms had endorsed each other's notes, and had overdrawn their credit with the Gas Light and Banking Company, the most notoriously manipulated bank in the city, in which all four of the Hermann men wielded influence. Florian was in deeper trouble than his brother and father. The elder and younger Samuel Hermanns had liabilities of only $5,592.67 on their own notes, and $23,289.03 on notes which they had endorsed; but Florian's company had a deficit of $428,640.71 on its own notes, and $74,922.67 on notes which carried its endorsement. Both young Samuel and Florian had used their position in the Gas Light Bank to join everyone else in milking its resources.

It is not possible, because of the paucity of reliable information, to discover how much money each member of the family lost in this upheaval. Hermann, Briggs and Company, in which Florian was a partner, was in debt for six million dollars when it suspended payment in 1837. Their paper assets amounted to more than that figure, but the partners refused to drive their own customers into bankruptcy by pressing for payment. Month after month, Florian and his partner gathered in whatever funds they could, and transmitted them to the creditors; by June of 1839 they succeeded in reducing their indebtedness to two million dollars. But that September the bottom dropped out of the New Orleans financial structure again, and all of Florian's hopes disappeared in the ruins. He lost everything he possessed. The elder Samuel had reorganized his company in 1837 in an effort to stave off the plague of bankruptcy, but by 1840 he was in such dire condition that some of his real estate and stock holdings had to be sold at auction, for only a fraction of their value, and, in 1841, his beautiful home was also sold to satisfy his creditors. He had given some money to Emeronthe; she bought the home at a price far below its value, but it was too expensive to maintain, so she and Samuel decided to let it go. It was purchased by the notary Félix Grima, in whose family's possession it remained until 1921.[53]

The Hermann family's experiences following this financial disaster are difficult to trace in any detail. The elder Samuel and his wife probably had to live on the little they had saved from the debacle. Young Samuel and Florian must have gone to work for relatives or friends; they never again occupied business positions of importance or responsibility. Lucien became a notary, and used his knowledge of finance in his office of secretary of the Board of Presidents of Banks, which attempted to reorganize the shattered economic life of the city. Lucien remained active in Masonry, and served two terms as Grand Master of Louisiana, 1849 and 1850. Emeronthe died on March 11, 1851; the elder Samuel on June 3, 1853. It has not been possible to locate Samuel Hermann's will anywhere in the New Orleans area; perhaps his possessions were so few that he saw no point in framing any legal document. Virginie's husband died a few months after her father. She and Florian remained in New Orleans, Florian making a living in the cotton brokerage business. Lucien and the younger Samuel and his family moved to San Francisco about 1854—perhaps they had only been waiting for their father's death. Both of them worked as notaries in San Francisco. Lucien was a bachelor, but young Samuel's family grew from generation to generation. Two of his granddaughters married men who matched their great-grandfather in dynamic vigor, intellectual perception and personal charm: Chauncey Depew, Senator from New York, 1899–1911, and President of the New York Central Railroad, and Francis Griffith Newlands, brilliant attorney and Senator from Nevada, 1902–1917.[54]

5. SAMUEL KOHN, INCLUDING REFERENCE TO THE HEINE BROTHERS

We possess more information about the precise circumstances of Samuel Kohn's departure from Europe than about any other European Jew who came to New Orleans in this early period; this good fortune is due to the fact that Samuel's sister Resie married an uncle of Lucien Wolf, the distinguished British Jewish historian, who wrote about Samuel Kohn in one of those intimately personal essays which historians so rarely publish. The Kohn family lived in the village of Hareth in Bohemia; Sam, says Wolf,

> "was known all over the country side as a good-hearted, hare-brained ne'er-do-well, fond of the tavern and the lassies, and fonder still of a game of cards . . . One day the news ran through Hareth that Samuel Kohn had disappeared. He had last been seen drinking and gambling with strangers in the Gast-haus, and, after some high words, had tramped off . . . a picture of abject misery . . . It seems that he had been cheated of everything he had in the world by a gang of cardsharpers. When he left the tavern with empty pockets, he felt he could not again go home to the poverty-stricken cottage in the wood and confess his follies to his long-suffering mother, so he turned his steps in the direction of the county town, and thence tramped northward all the way to Hamburg. He worked his way on a sailing vessel to New Orleans. . . ."[55]

It was not auspicious that Samuel's earliest appearance in New Orleans was as co-owner of an inn at Bayou St. John, in July, 1806, where the public was promised "the best of liquors." Sam and H. Labruère, his partner, announced that "separate rooms may be had for private parties" in their "house of ENTERTAINMENT," and that "every care and attention will be observed to render the house agreeable to those who may visit it." But perhaps this was the only thing that Sam knew how to do—and instead of frittering away his time with boon companions in drinking parties and gambling sprees, he had determined to earn his living by putting his experience to work in an establishment in which others could enjoy such pleasures.[56]

But Kohn must have been in Louisiana for a number of months and even possibly years to have accumulated enough capital to have become Labruère's partner. No information is available about his prior activities in the area, and nothing is known about his life during the next few years other than that by 1808–1809 he had earned enough money to purchase property in Rapides Parish to the northwest of Baton Rouge. Two parcels of land which he had bought at that time brought $1,200 and $1,600 when he sold them in 1816. Even allowing for a dramatic rise in the value of land, the young Bohemian had done very well during his first few years in Louisiana. Unfortunately the parish records have been destroyed, making any investigation of Kohn's other transactions in the area impossible; the only surviving notation of these land investments of 1808–1809 is the record of their subsequent sale in the New Orleans notarial archives. Kohn's next appearance in the archives is in 1810, when he contracted with a builder to construct two houses in the Faubourg Marigny of New Orleans, of a design similar to that of the adjacent structures which Kohn had recently purchased. Kohn was to pay the contractor $1,200 and transfer to him a lot in Alexandria. Later in the same year Kohn loaned out $1,112 in exchange for a mortgage on a house and lot on Bienville street. In 1812 his name appears in the records as the endorser of two notes for a total of $402.[57]

These early transactions established the pattern of Kohn's role in the commercial life of New Orleans until he moved to Paris in 1832. He was a banker—money lender—investor—real estate promoter—financier. He lent money on interest, but frequently had to sue to get it back, or had to put his creditors in the hands of receivers. The courts often designated him as the trustee of the property of bankrupted merchants. He endorsed notes for clients, and thereby earned a commission for himself. He built dwellings and business structures throughout New Orleans, and was one of the major promoters of suburban construction. From a penniless Bohemian immigrant, a wastrel in his village, he became, through wit, grit and acuity, one of the wealthiest financiers in New Orleans, worth more than $400,000 at the time of his death in Paris on May 18, 1853—and this was the residue after more than twenty years of retirement, and the sharing of his substance with his many relatives. Whether it was the humiliation of being unable to face his family, or the hardship of coming to a strange new country as a friendless immigrant, Sam had learned his lesson well. He was obviously a man of native talent; once he made up his mind that he would not again bear the burdens of shame and privation, he promptly found the road to success. Kohn's portrait on wood, now in the possession of his great-great-grandnephew, Maunsel White Hickey of New Orleans, reveals a strong, firm, determined countenance—that must, of necessity, have been his personality. Kohn was single-minded in his pursuit of fortune; only a few records point to his participation in community affairs. He served as treasurer of a Masonic lodge in 1823, and acted as a member of the committee of arrangements for a political dinner in 1831. His name appears in a published list of philanthropists only once, but on that occasion, when a fund was being raised to assist families whose bread-winners had died during the cholera epidemic of 1832, he gave more than any other citizen, $1,000. In 1829 he served as president of the Orleans Navigation Company; but this was primarily business, because he was the leader of a group of stockholders who voted the incumbent officers out of power and supported the idea of selling the business to the state. These are the only references to Samuel Kohn's public interests which we have been able to discover.[58]

Lucien Wolf did not record when Samuel first notified his family that he had come to New Orleans, and succeeded in establishing himself on a firm footing, but it was probably fairly early in his career. In view of what we know about his generosity towards his family in later years, he probably began sending funds to them as soon as he could. When his brother Joachim was nineteen or twenty years old, in 1819 or 1820, Samuel brought him over to New Orleans. Either because Joachim was not interested in finance as much as in mercantile pursuits, or because Samuel wanted him to obtain experience in various forms of commerce, Joachim was set up in the commission brokerage line with a series of partners, ending up with J. A. Bordier in 1826.[59] Kohn and Bordier was a characteristic business of the time. It was the New Orleans agent for some shipping lines, owned a number of ships in its own name, and handled cargoes to and from ports near and far, on the Mississippi River, in the Caribbean area, on the Atlantic seaboard and in Europe. Among its imports were wines, coffee, cigars, beeswax, dry goods which were "suitable for the Mexican market," mahogany, logwood, tobacco, straw hats, beef hides, deer skins and specie. Trade between Mexico and New Orleans, during this period, was basic to the city's economy: in exchange for consumer goods of every sort, ships brought back mahogany, logwood and Mexican coinage in huge amounts. Kohn and Bordier did not have to grow as gradually as other firms; although Samuel was not a working partner in the business, he undoubtedly invested large sums of money with Joachim.

After Samuel Kohn moved to Paris in 1832, Joachim held his power of attorney and acted as his agent, buying and selling property, building more homes and stores, suing debtors; he also seems to have continued Samuel's business, although, in 1835, he organized a new firm. Joachim represented Samuel's interest in the expanding suburb of Carrollton, of which Laurent Millaudon, Touro's one-time associate, was also a major developer. During the booming thirties Joachim was a member of more boards than any other Jew; he was a director of the New Orleans and Carrollton Rail Road Company, the Carrollton Bank, the Louisiana State Marine Fire Insurance Company, and the Mechanics' and Traders' Bank. Obviously Joachim did not need to follow in his brother's footsteps; he began life in New Orleans without having to undergo any of the hardships which stood in Samuel's way. His portrait by Vaudechamp, painted in 1836, which Mr. Hickey has presented to the Louisiana State

Museum, reveals little of Samuel's rugged strength; Joachim's face is handsome and sensitive; his eyes are thoughtful and compassionate; his appearance is that of the romantic dreamer, or a scholar.[60]

On June 22, 1834, Joachim was married to Marie Thalie Martin, the nineteen-year-old daughter of a fashionable French physician. The wedding was solemnized in St. Louis Church by Abbé Moni, "with the dispensation of the impediment of mixed religion given by Msgr. Antoine Blanc, Vicar General Administrator of this diocese."[61] Joachim and Marie had three children. Little is known of the eldest, Samuel Arthur (probably named for Uncle Samuel), other than that he was born on November 13, 1835, although he was not baptized until May 9, 1838, and that he lived most of his life in Paris where he died in 1909 or 1910. The second son, Joseph Gustave (March 18, 1837–September 7, 1906), was a distinguished student of Louisiana natural history who gave Tulane University his magnificent collection of more than 6,600 specimens of birds, fish, reptiles, mammals, crustaceans, mollusks, insects and plants. The third child, Amélie, married Armand Heine (a cousin of the poet Heinrich Heine), who came to New Orleans with his brother Michel in 1842 to open up a commission and banking business which was, in 1854, estimated to be worth as much as $600,000.[62]

Armand's brother Michel also married a New Orleans girl, Marie Céleste Amélie Miltenberger, who grew up in a home on Royal street next to Joachim Kohn's—perhaps it was in Joachim's home that they met. They were married in St. Louis Church on April 5, 1853, "dispensation obtained from ecclesiastical authority for the difference of worship." Both Heine families moved to Paris about 1866. In 1875, Michel's daughter, Marie Alice Heine, married the Duc de Richelieu; after his death she married Alberto, Prince of Monaco, Duke of Valentinois, Marquis of Baux and Baron of Bois and Calvinet, to name a few of his titles. This marriage of Grace Kelly's predecessor on the throne of Monaco lasted from 1889 until 1902, when it was dissolved by divorce. Marie Alice, one of the first American-born women to marry into European nobility, was a Catholic, not a Jewess, but her father remained a Jew all his life and, even after he moved to Paris, maintained his interest in the Jewish Children's Home of New Orleans.[63]

Samuel Kohn left New Orleans before the panic of 1837; most of his funds seem to have been safely invested in real estate. Joachim's business survived the worst of the storm, but his firm was in some difficulty in 1842. After his wife's death the following year, Joachim seems to have abandoned business pursuits in his own name, and to have devoted himself mainly to the conduct of his brother Samuel's affairs in New Orleans, and to the education of his children. He moved back and forth across the Atlantic between New Orleans and Paris, and died in France in 1886. Whatever Joachim had to give his children, Uncle Samuel left each of them $66,500. Samuel died in Paris on May 18, 1853, and was buried there, although his name appears on the family tomb in New Orleans. He also left money to three other persons of interest.

One of these was Delphine Blanchard Marchegay, formerly of Saint-Domingue, who was Samuel's housekeeper in New Orleans, and probably his mistress. She remained in New Orleans for a little while after his move to Paris, then joined him there. His bequest to her was an annuity of $800 a year, which Marie Amélie Kohn Heine undertook to pay each year so that the property in New Orleans could be sold, and the estate distributed. Delphine lived to the age of eighty-five; she died in Paris on January 8, 1877, twenty-three years after Samuel.[64]

Another important heir mentioned in Samuel's will was Edouard Kohn, son of Samuel's brother Simon, whom Samuel brought from Bohemia to Paris in 1847, at the age of twenty-two, and helped establish in the banking business. Edouard became a distinguished Frenchman, a member of that remarkable circle of Parisian Jews—wealthy, cultured and philanthropic—led by the Rothschild family, of whose hospital he was a director. Edouard himself married into the powerful banking family of Von Embden (who were also related to the Heine family), and his children married into the Weisweiller, Meyerbeer and Bischoffsheim families—one almost feels required to refer to them as dynasties, although all of them originally began much as the Kohn family did, in abject poverty. Edouard was the only member of the Kohn family to become a leader in Jewish and nonsectarian philanthropies; these activities were one reason that the French government conferred the Legion of Honor upon him in 1873.[65]

A third heir of Samuel Kohn carried on the family tradition in New Orleans. He was Carl Kohn, another nephew, who was brought to New Orleans by Samuel in 1830 or 1831. Maunsel White Hickey, his great-grandson, owns Carl's letter book, from which we have already quoted; this manuscript volume contains fair copies of letters which Carl wrote to his Uncle Samuel in Paris from June 10, 1832, to December 18, 1833. They reflect the bright, eager, ambitious and attractive personality of this youth of sixteen or seventeen who had grown up in the crude, unsophisticated environment of a Bohemian village where, he says, his "younger years were passed unworthily and in ignorance." Apparently without any secular education before he was brought to New Orleans, in a very brief time he became conversant with English, French and Spanish, learned to play the flute and fire the pistol, developed the social graces of an old-line New Orleans aristocrat, and voraciously devoured everything he could discover about merchant banking and commission brokerage. In the style of the time, he went to work for Merle and Company as a junior clerk, and spent long hours at tedious tasks, but when summer came, unlike other young men who had to earn their living, he was able to take a vacation in Bay St. Louis, Mississippi, for several months, so that he could escape the heat and the ever-threatening epidemics. He developed a strong interest in politics and included information about important public events in his letters to his uncle. Because of his Uncle Joachim's social position, he gained entree into the finest homes, but it was his own gift of warmth which secured for him a host of friends among younger and older people alike, and constant invitations to the fashionable balls and parties.

Carl took himself very seriously, for all his desire to taste every aspect of the social life of New Orleans. He admitted that his ambition could be regarded as selfish, but he believed that it was his primary responsibility to take advantage of every opportunity "of getting along in the world." And get along he did. In 1835 Joachim dissolved his partnership with Bordier and took Carl into his business. In 1839 Carl was elected to the board of directors of the Atlantic Insurance Company, the first of a series of steps which brought him, ultimately, in 1871, to the presidency of the Union National Bank. During the intervening years, he engaged in a variety of enterprises which involved trade with Mexico, the marketing of western produce, cotton, sugar and molasses, and diverse forms of investment. He was an example of the nineteenth-century capitalist who sought opportunities for profit in many forms of raw materials. Through depression, panic and war, he continued to build his fortune; there was always a place in the economic scheme of things for this clever, personable man.

On June 27, 1850, in a ceremony performed by the famous Parson Clapp, Carl married into one of the "finest families" of New Orleans; his bride was Clara White, the daughter of Maunsel White, a wealthy commission broker turned planter, and Héloïse de La Ronde, daughter of Pierre Denis de La Ronde II, a distinguished Creole who had been a major general at the Battle of New Orleans. When Carl died on August 27, 1895, the newspaper reported that he was "one of New Orleans' most respected citizens . . . a man of fine intelligence, thoroughly educated, widely read, and transparently honest." After his retirement from business, the reporter said, he had spent his time in his "elegant home on the corner of St. Charles and Julia streets, surrounded by the best and most cultured society, and in the companionship of his beloved books." The emphasis on learning, culture and books is worthy of comment; Carl had come a long way from the untutored origins of the Bohemian village in which he was born and spent his early years.[66]

Samuel Kohn returned to that village in 1833, after he had established his residence in Paris. His father had died on January 18, 1831, but his mother may still have been alive. There were large numbers of relatives to greet him on his arrival. Carl responds ecstatically, in his letters from New Orleans, to his Uncle Samuel's description of his generosity to the members of the family, and to every detail of the visit: "I take a lively interest as you may well think in all your details about our dear relations, your dispositions with regard to them, & that they are now comfortably settled." Lucien Wolf's description of Samuel's arrival, probably interlaced with some fancy, reflects some of the feeling of wonder which the former "ne'er-do-well" created in the village:

> "One morning in the 'thirties the whole of Hareth was thrown into a paroxysm of the most intense excitement by a story which a peasant had brought into the village. Late in the preceding night he had been passing the widow Kohn's cottage, when there suddenly drove up to the door a capacious travelling carriage drawn by six horses, and attended by four black servants in gorgeous liveries. A 'gentleman of noble presence'—so said the peasant—had alighted and entered the cottage, and the black servants had followed with the baggage, which included a mysterious hogshead. The yokel had afterwards peered through the window and had seen—so he averred—the hogshead opened in the presence of the widow, and—he swore it by all the saints—it was full to the brim of newly-coined gold. . . ."[67]

Even if there was no hogshead full of gold, there could have been one, or for that matter, several. Whether Samuel Kohn dazzled his mother and relatives with real gold, or merely made arrangements for regular payments of cash to them, so that their need for food, clothing and shelter would be met, really makes no essential difference. Some happiness was brought to his poor Jewish family eking out its life in that remote Bohemian village through the opportunity for wealth and success which New Orleans had offered to Samuel Kohn.

6. Ruben Levin Rochelle and Hart Moses Shiff

On October 19, 1807, the Orleans Gazette and Commercial Advertiser carried the following notice:

> "Received by the late arrivals from Philadelphia, and for sale by the subscribers, An Assortment of black silk velvet Ribbons, figured, striped and plain, suitable for the Spanish market. Also VIOLINS and VIOLIN STRINGS, assorted.
>
> R. L. Rochelle & Co.
> No. 9, Bienville street."

Rochelle had been in New Orleans for at least four months, probably longer, for on June 16, 1807, he had sold a slave to two French Louisianians. Rochelle was a peppery fellow. In 1810, the report was circulating that he was about to go bankrupt. He demanded to know the name of his slanderer from Mossy, the auctioneer who was quoted as having repeated the story, but Mossy refused to divulge it. Rochelle thereupon wrote an advertisement for the newspaper, and publicly denounced "the person acting in this base manner" as "a wretch devoid of feeling" and "a scoundrel." "The epithets of a liar and a base man are justly his attributes," said Rochelle, "and the midnight robber, is innocent when compared to him, who, under a mask stabs a man's character." To prove to his creditors that he would not leave them in the lurch, he invited them to present their bills to him for immediate payment. Rochelle also had an opportunity to demonstrate his courage in personal combat. The newspaper reported, in 1810, the details of this event:

> "PROTECTION!
>
> "Last night one of the City Watch was using very insolent language to a gentleman's family, Mr. Rochelle was passing, and on hearing such outrageous abuse, he ordered the fellow to be silent and to go away; in place of obeying Mr. R. he turned his abuse upon him. Mr. R. provoked at his insolence, gave him a gentle chastisement and sent him off; soon after, Mr. R. having returned to his own house, the same fellow and another of the City Watch, both armed with dirks and swords, knocked at his doors and demanded admittance, threatening him with death—he fastened his doors and armed himself with a sword—they forced open the gate and attacked him—he defended himself against them both, until his neighbors flew to his assistance . . . Had Mr. R. been a weakly small man, in all probability, he would have [fallen] by the hands of these assassins."

The next issue of the paper retracted the statement that the attackers were city guards; all the more did Rochelle have reason to be grateful that he was not a "weakly small man," if they were just ordinary ruffians.[68]

How does a Jew in the first decade of the nineteenth century come to have a name like Rochelle? Every sort of possibility had occurred to this writer: that he was a Sephardic French Jew; that he had passed through La Rochelle on his way from Europe to America; that it was his wife's maiden name. Rochelle never married, however, and with the first name Ruben could not have been Sephardic. Had he not left bequests to his brothers in Europe we might have known nothing of his origins. His will presents us with enough information to hazard a guess about his change of name; his brothers were "Maritz & Bernahard Rothschild now Residing in the City of Hamburg in Germany." According to his estate papers, Ruben himself was born in Hamburg on August 15, 1780, the son of Levin Jacob Rothschild of the "English Plank in this City, merchant," and his wife Handel, daughter of Joseph Heilbut, who were married on June 1, 1775. The name Rothschild is very difficult for French-speaking people to pronounce, unless it happens to be the name of a family of wealthy bankers who are elevated to the aristocracy. But Ruben came to Louisiana too early for people there to have heard of the financial wizardry of the Rothschilds; they must have pronounced it "Rochelle" so often that he decided to change it for convenience' sake. This is all supposition, of course, and the change of name may have taken place in France, if indeed Ruben worked there for any period of time before coming to New Orleans.[69]

At the time of Rochelle's first business activity in New Orleans, it was standard commercial procedure for a firm's public name to be that of its owner; if he had an active partner, both names were used. But if he had a silent partner, or had secured the financial support of someone in another town, the words "and Company" would be added to his name. We do not know who Rochelle's partner or partners were. Perhaps his father and brothers had invested in his venture. Perhaps it was the "Worthy old Friend Charles H. Rodbertus, now a residence near Rostock in Mecklenburg," to whom he left ten thousand Spanish dollars in his will—although this man may not have been a merchant at all, but the professor of Roman law whose son Johann Karl became a famous economist. Perhaps it was a relative or friend in Philadelphia where he had many suppliers and where he died on September 1, 1824. This partner may even have been the man who, in 1810, became his publicly known associate, Hart Moses Shiff.

Shiff was in New Orleans by February 17, 1810, at the latest; on that date he and Rochelle paid off a debt to Leonard Wiltz.[70] Shiff was a member of one of the most distinguished Jewish families of Europe; its lineage is traced back, in Frankfurt-am-Main, to Jacob Kohen Zedek Schiff, a fourteenth-century rabbinical judge. The name "Schiff" probably came from the German word for "vial," possibly used as a sign for the shop of an apothecary. The family was renowned for its rabbinic scholarship—the greatest merit in European Jewish life. Among its men of note were Rabbi Meir Schiff, known as Maharam, author of a widely used Talmudic commentary, who lived from 1608 to 1644; David Tevele Schiff, who was Chief Rabbi of England from 1765 to 1792; and David Tevele's nephew, Nathan Adler, another Chief Rabbi of England. The Schiff family lived in the house in the Frankfurt ghetto which had the sign of the "Green Shield" on it; they sold their half of the building to the Rothschild "Red Shield" family as late as 1784. Our Hart Moses was born in Frankfurt, probably in that "Green Shield" house, in 1779 or 1780, some little time after the death, on March 15, 1779, of his grandfather Herz Joseph Schiff, for whom he was named. Hart's parents were the merchant Moses Herz Schiff and Brainle Schwab. Moses Herz Schiff, the father, had a brother named Jacob Schiff, who died on October 20, 1843, for whom a grandson was named Jacob Henry Schiff. This Jacob Schiff emigrated from Frankfurt to the United States after the Civil War, and became the outstanding American Jewish leader of his time. Grown wealthy through the success of Kuhn, Loeb and Company, the banking firm which he headed, he gave lavishly of his means to the Hebrew Union College, the Jewish Theological Seminary of America, Temple Emanu-El of New York City, and the Jewish Publication Society of America, whose first English translation of the Bible was endowed by him.[71]

All of that, however, was past or future. Family relationships, traditional Jewish scholarship, and strong religious values obviously had no hold on a young man who was willing to travel so far as the Louisiana frontier to make a new life. Hart Shiff's anglicization of his last name was probably symptomatic of his impatience with the past and his determination to find a more rewarding life than that of the crowded Frankfurt ghetto with its still galling restrictions on its Jewish inhabitants. In New Orleans, Shiff and Rochelle swiftly established an active and prosperous business. From the time their partnership began, they were altogether inseparable in business—no independent ventures or interests are recorded in their names. They followed the sort of commission brokerage-merchant banking pursuits with which we have already become familiar: ship agencies; mortgages on property; advances to planters; cargoes of imports for retail and wholesale trade; shipments of Louisiana cotton, sugar and tobacco to the Atlantic ports and Europe. They endorsed notes, represented European merchants, erected their own tobacco warehouses, bought and sold real estate, and owned shares in steamboats, banks, insurance companies and other capitalist ventures. Their cargoes came to New Orleans from Liverpool, Hamburg, Altona, Bremen, Amsterdam, Rotterdam, New York and Philadelphia. They were prosperous and respected enough to hold a seat on the board of the Louisiana State Bank between them.[72]

The partnership might have gone on for many years, but Rochelle fell ill in 1824, and, in hope of regaining his health, retired from business and left New Orleans. Whether he intended to return to Europe or to live in Philadelphia cannot be ascertained, but it was in the latter city that he died on September 1, 1824. When the news arrived in New Orleans, the newspaper made haste to transmit it to the public:

> "DIED—At Philadelphia, on the 1st of September, MR. R. L. ROCHELLE. He was buried from Mrs. Carr's, and every requisite honor paid to his remains. The Exchange of New-Orleans will miss him much—on all public exigencies his purse was open—active and industrious in business, his acquirements enabled him to contribute to public amusement—and there were none who contributed more freely. We shall leave it to his particular friends > to write his obituary. We only express the feelings that his loss excites at the moment."

What contribution he made to public amusement was never described in any detail, nor did any friend offer a more personal tribute. Perhaps Rochelle had been a violinist or pianist—he advertised an inordinate number of musical instruments in his early business years. The names of his closest friends are revealed in his designation of three of the most prosperous Yankee merchants in New Orleans as his executors—William Montgomery, Stephen Henderson and Judah Touro. To "my Old and worthy Friends Wm. Montgomerys youngest son August," he bequeathed $10,000. Perhaps he was particularly attached to this boy because he had no children of his own.[73]

The main burden of settling Rochelle's estate fell on Shiff's shoulders, because so little time had elapsed since their decision to divide their property. The reports of Rochelle's assets in the probate papers were drawn up in Shiff's countinghouse. It was several years before everything could be wound up; one debt which took years to collect involved the bankrupt Vincent Nolte of Anthony Adverse renown, the French firm of Charles Martineau and Son, and Senator Josiah Stoddard Johnston. Rochelle's brother, Maritz Rothschild, was forced to sue in the Louisiana courts for the settlement of other outstanding accounts. When Rochelle's affairs were finally brought to a conclusion, the estate was valued at $147,283.91, and included some slaves, a brick house and four lots on the Batture at the Faubourg St. Mary, and $127,980.41 worth of stocks and notes for loans. In that period before the frenzied speculation of the 1830's, Rothschild/Rochelle had amassed a modest fortune in New Orleans in less than twenty years, and he was spared the misery and humiliation which were the lot of so many of his friends who were destroyed by the thundering financial crisis which began in 1837.[74]

Shiff had been married on December 11, 1813, in St. Louis Church, to Marguerite Basilique Chessé, daughter of Jean Jacques Chessé and Marie Madeleine Plauché. They had at least eleven children, of whom four died in childhood. After Rochelle's passing—although he continued the business for some time—Shiff gradually withdrew from daily commercial activity, and began to travel with his wife and children. They were in New York City and Philadelphia in the summer of 1827, and in Europe in 1828. In May, 1830, they again went to Europe by way of Baltimore, stayed in Frankfurt until the following May, and then moved on to Paris. Shiff and Evariste Lauve were partners in a plantation in Iberville Parish, but Hart never worked at farming. His interests tended more in the direction of the North and beyond, to Europe. Perhaps it was Ruben's early death from the debilitating effect of living too long in the New Orleans climate; perhaps Shiff had owned a larger share of the business and therefore did not need to give his constant attention to business matters; perhaps it was Basilique's yearning for the glamor of life in Paris; perhaps it was Shiff's desire to take advantage of the educational opportunities which France would afford to his children; perhaps it was simply that all wealthy Creole families in New Orleans regarded France as their true homeland. It may have been a combination of these factors which led Hart away from New Orleans and helped him escape the debacle of 1837. Carl Kohn wrote to his Uncle Samuel, on December 18, 1833, that "Mr. and Mrs. Shiff have taken rooms at the American Hotel—I do not think Mrs. S. will enjoy much her residence in this place again, separated as she is from her children & the amusements and excitements of Paris." At any rate, by the early 1840's, Hart's son Edward, now become a notary, had assumed total responsibility for his father's affairs. He held his power of attorney and bought and sold property in his name; in 1844–45, after the economic life of New Orleans was again on an even keel, Edward, acting for his father, and Joachim Kohn, on behalf of Samuel Kohn, sold so much real estate which the two men had owned jointly, that they used specially printed notarized forms to save the work of filling in all of the details in the usual documents.[75]

Hart Shiff died in New York City on February 26, 1851; he and his wife had probably chosen that city for their home because it was a half-way point between New Orleans and Paris, in both of which cities their children lived. Shiff was worth more than $800,000 at the time of his death. His estate listed $86,141.34 in cash; $383,125 in real estate, mostly in New Orleans and vicinity; and $225,387 in stocks and bonds. This was all quite aside from many thousands of dollars worth of uncollectable notes from bankrupted friends and associates, and worthless shares of stock in companies and banks which had collapsed during the late 1830's and early 1840's. Unfortunately, his affairs were so complicated, and his children and children's children so numerous, that the estate had still not been settled when the Civil War began; this, of course, reduced its value in many ways.[76]

The Civil War created other problems for Hart Shiff's family. His son Henry volunteered for service as an Assistant Surgeon with the 10th Regiment of Louisiana Infantry, and was captured at the Battle of the Wilderness. He was taken to the old Capitol Prison in Washington, and, after he took the oath of allegiance, was given his parole, and joined his mother in Paris. By October, 1864, Basilique had somehow prevailed upon Orville Browning, the former Senator from Illinois, to intercede with President Lincoln to permit Henry to withdraw his oath. Browning wrote up the problem in his diary:

> "Henry's father, who is now dead, once lived in New Orleans and had invested in Southern stocks, and loaned money on mortgages, and there is a large indebtedness from the rebels to the family, who are now in Paris. Shiff himself is in Paris with his mother. She is afraid if the rebels find out that her son has taken the oath of allegiance to this government they will confiscate her large interests in the South, and that she will be unable to collect any portion of the debts due the family there, and, therefore desires leave for him to withdraw his oath. . . ."[77]

Lincoln favored going along with Basilique and Henry; Secretary of State Seward was violently opposed to the accommodation. Browning records that Seward was "very much excited and was boistrous and profane." But Lincoln insisted that the request be granted, and so it was done. But there was trouble in New Orleans anyway. Henry's sister-in-law, Edward Shiff's widow, was accused of disloyalty to the Union. Her plantation was so close to Confederate territory that it was constantly raided by rebel bands, and the Federal officials suspected that she was encouraging the Confederate marauders to seize her harvested crops. After a lengthy trial, Emilie Shiff was cleared of the accusation.

Fortunately, Hart Shiff had not lived long enough to be compelled to decide whether he was really a European, a Southerner or an American. Nor did he leave any personal papers which might give us a clue to his feelings. He had spent close to thirty years in Frankfurt; less than twenty-five in New Orleans making his fortune; more than twenty years moving between New Orleans, New York and Europe. Although he was an American citizen in a technical sense, and probably never wished to be considered a German, the cosmopolitan atmosphere of New Orleans encouraged him to feel that America was too provincial, and that the real capital of the civilized world was Paris. He and Basilique would have felt a close affinity to the members of today's jet-set who move so freely from one continent to another and participate in a culture of wealth and pleasure which transcends national boundaries.[78]

7. Salomon S. De Jonge

Some of these personalities registered their activities and experiences in hundreds of newspaper advertisements, notarized deeds and personal documents. Others left only the briefest record of their passage. One of these was Salomon S. De Jonge, a Dutch Jew who first appeared in the New Orleans press in 1808 as a constable, signing a notice that he was about to seize some property, and would sell it at auction to pay its owner's debts. The work of a constable was only one aspect of the "Commission and Collection Line of Business" that De Jonge advertised. On July 13, 1808, he listed some of his stock as "200 barrels of coarse Salt, first quality, 100 of cargo Beef, 500 barrels of Rice, first quality, 65 fine Flour, 60 Pork, good quality." He also had for sale a "smart Negro wench, 17 years of age, warranted, with her child." He made his office at the Public Baths which Spitzer and Kursheedt had owned. "Through the medium of a respectable mercantile house of Philadelphia," he announced, he was able "to procure every article not to be found in this place," and solicited orders for all types of merchandise. He did some trading in Baton Rouge in 1812, which may indicate that he was busy traveling in the country as well as keeping his store in New Orleans.[79]

De Jonge's name does not appear in any of the census records; he apparently never owned a home where he would be listed as head of the household. He is listed, however, in the 1822 City Directory as a commission and exchange broker at 22 Toulouse street. The same year, J. S. De Jonge, who was probably his brother, died at the age of twenty-three, and was buried in the Protestant Girod Street Cemetery.[80]

In 1823 De Jonge was in business with Solomon Soher, a Jew from New York City whom we will meet again; this association did not last very long. De Jonge's next appearance in our sources was in 1838, when he became an incorporator of the New Orleans Philharmonic Society. The following year he signed an advertisement offering for sale a two-story home, a summer residence in Carrollton, a "fine young servant girl . . . handy at everything," and a French piano.[81]

We lose sight of De Jonge again until his death on July 7, 1852, at 229 St. Philip street. One friend testified that De Jonge was seventy-two years old, and was a native of Amsterdam; another reported to the Probate Court that Salomon had said about three years previously that he had not heard anything from his mother for a while. The friend guessed that De Jonge's mother had been dead for some time; this information was necessary before the estate could be settled. It amounted to about $7,000 and was divided into equal portions among the three heirs: the executor, Richard Fear Nichols; Alfred Hennen, a well-known attorney; and a woman named Rosalyn Eleanore. Salomon De Jonge was buried next to his brother.[82]

8. Asher Moses Nathan

The available source materials are not very enlightening about the business activities of early country merchants like Maurice Barnett, Samuel Kohn and Samuel Hermann. Luckily for us, but unfortunately for him, another Jew, Asher Moses Nathan, in partnership with Alexander Hart, was unable to pay his creditors in 1810. The papers relating to his case include a meticulous inventory of his property. Nathan and Hart had come up the Mississippi River to Baton Rouge from their headquarters in New Orleans, in early 1810, loaded with merchandise for sale in the surrounding rural area. They had with them twenty-eight trunks, seven bags, six boxes, five chests and some additional merchandise including a bolt of cloth. Once in Baton Rouge, Nathan sought out Maurice Barnett, and arranged for transportation to Bayou Sara in a pirogue which belonged to Barnett. Nathan or Hart, together with a number of clerks and helpers, stayed for twenty-two days in Bayou Sara in a building owned by Barnett, and then returned to Barnett's place in Baton Rouge. It was there, in March, 1810, that all of the merchandise was seized by the sheriff on the claim of the creditors, and sold at auction. They had begun this trip with $8,083.93 worth of goods. This traveling stock included a wide assortment of dry goods and notions to attract the attention of the farmers and their wives: blankets, flannel, cotton shawls, handkerchiefs, Madras, linen, cambric, muslin, towels, remnants, bombazette, cassimere, gingham, nankeen, gauze, cotton shirting, blue cloth, black velvet, brittany cloth, corduroy, worsted binding, calico, muslin robes, silk handkerchiefs, dimity, bed ticking, Marseilles cloth, silk suspenders, platillas, cotton hose, lace, night caps, silk gloves, cotton shirts, silk shawls, silk hose, ostrich feathers, ribbon, ticklenburg, red flannel, bagging, chambray, printed muslin, hats, parasols, umbrellas, wicks, looking glasses, shoes, ornamented combs, horn combs, metal and silver buttons, pins, needles, pocket books, watch seals, perfume, penknives, razors, fans, razor cases, and gold watches.

Whether the value of $8,083.93 which was placed on this tremendous quantity and variety of merchandise was wholesale or retail is unclear, but it was probably wholesale, since the goods were being inventoried for auction in quantity. Nathan and Hart's bills payable, dating back to May, 1809, amounted to a total of over $16,000. But with this great amount of merchandise in their possession, plus goods worth $6,052 in their store in New Orleans, and over $2,200 in accounts receivable, they were in no real difficulty. What had probably happened was that the partners had begun their ambitious operation with too little capital—some of their debts were simply loans of money—and too much merchandise to sell in a brief time. They therefore lost all their investment of money and time and energy. Not so Maurice Barnett: he did not have to wait for his payment, like the other creditors, until well into 1811. He was on the spot, and collected the $108 owing to him for services rendered to Nathan and Hart during the venture to Bayou Sara, as well as the $97 expense of conducting eight days of auctions at his store: the expense included two cases of gin, fourteen bottles of wine and two flasks of rum, which were dispensed to the prospective customers to stimulate their bidding.[83]

Asher Nathan had been born in Amsterdam about 1784, the fourth of seven children of Moses and Milko Nathan, on his father's side a descendant of that Nathan Nathan who was known as the sofer, the ritual scribe, of Amsterdam. Asher may have come to the United States about 1800 with his sister Catherine and her husband Hyam Harris, who were married in London in 1799. Asher was with them in Charleston no later than 1804. It may have been there or in London that he met his partner Alexander Hart, who was born in Portsmouth, England, in 1777. Hart and Nathan's accounts with their creditors in New Orleans go back only as far as May, 1809. We do not know how much earlier they had arrived there. Hart must have been frightened and dismayed by the failure, because he disappeared from view immediately. Nothing is known of his life until 1831, when he began his service as the cantor of Congregation B'nai Jeshurun of New York City. By then he had been married and widowed, and had at least one child, a son named Isaac. On July 26, 1836, in New York City, Hart was married to a New Orleans woman who was known as "the widow Kokernot," Betsy Levy Kokernot, who had come to New Orleans no later than 1820. Alexander gave his Hebrew name, to be inscribed on the religious certificate, as "Alexander the son of Master Yehudah who is called Hart," and Betsy, as "Billah the daughter of Master Nachman." Two officers of the New York congregation witnessed the wedding, which Alexander presumably conducted for himself. The couple set out for New Orleans, the scene of Alexander's disastrous venture of twenty-six years before, where, with Isaac's help, they enlarged Betsy's dry goods business. At the time of their marriage, Alexander was fifty-nine; the bride was forty-six. But New Orleans was not a lucky place for Alexander. He died in less than three years, on February 12, 1839, leaving Betsy a widow once more. We shall have reason to refer to Betsy later.[84]

Asher Nathan was less easily discouraged than Alexander. He continued to do business in and around Baton Rouge. Perhaps he stayed there because he had fallen in love. On March 24, 1811, he was married by Fr. Juan Brady (who had already married Maurice and Marie Barnett) to Margarita (or Marguerite) Dalton, the twenty-three-year-old daughter of Ana Burke and Valentine Thomas Dalton. Dalton first appears in the Spanish West Florida records in 1799 as a part-time interpreter and minor governmental functionary. A farmer and petty storekeeper at the time of his death on February 6, 1807, he owned three tracts of land to which the title was not clear, a few cabins, some merchandise of a trivial character (rolls of paper, padlocks, pencil cases, fans), an eighty-year-old slave and some livestock. Maurice Barnett had been appointed an appraiser for the estate. The livestock (eleven hogs, six cows and four bulls) and farm implements brought 167 pesos at auction; the other property went for 1,627 pesos. There was no purchaser for the sick, old slave. Dalton's debts ate up the proceeds of his estate.[85] But Marguerite had apparently been left some money by her mother. The day before she and Asher were married, they went before the Parish judge to record Marguerite's dowry of $5,000, and Asher promised that the sum would always be kept separate from his own property. In the record of Marguerite's estate, after her death on July 15, 1854, in Pass Christian, Mississippi, this amount was still listed as her own.[86] Antonio Gras, who had been chosen by Marguerite as her guardian after her father's death, sold her a lot of ground on July 26, 1811, for $300 and "in consideration of the natural love and affection" which he bore her. During the period from May, 1811, to August, 1812, Asher was busy buying and selling land and merchandise in the Baton Rouge area, but he was also traveling to and from New Orleans.[87]

Nathan had not lost everything in the venture with Hart, or he was using money provided by his Charleston relatives to reestablish himself. How else explain the fact that by December, 1812, accounts due to him totalled $2,354? We know this because his store in Baton Rouge was robbed, and, in his notice offering a reward for the return of his property, he listed, in addition to two damask table cloths and a piece of checked goods, a "Red Morocco Pocket Book" which contained business papers of that value. Among the notes, due bills and accounts were the following: notes for $202 and $200 executed by one Major Milton in favor of Samuel Kohn, endorsed by Rochelle and Shiff, who in turn endorsed them over to Nathan; an account of Maurice Barnett in favor of Jacob Hart for $56; a note from Maurice Barnett for $12; an account of David Hart against some merchants for $353, endorsed to Nathan; and a due bill from S. S. De Jonge for $54. Only Judah Touro and Samuel Hermann, among the early Jews in the area, are missing from this list of Nathan's commercial contacts, which includes, also, many non-Jewish merchants and customers.[88]

Beginning no later than 1813, Nathan's major interests were in New Orleans, although he continued to make business trips to Baton Rouge, where he kept a branch store, over a period of years. He set himself up as a commission and exchange broker, in partnership with D. C. Williams for a year or two, alone after Williams took a post with the state government. Nathan's office was in Chartres street. There he conducted the sort of business which was characteristic of the time; he loaned money on interest, gave advances to planters, listed property for sale and auction, bought and sold slaves and shares of stock, took merchandise on consignment, and accepted responsibility for the affairs of ships which docked at New Orleans. During the early 1820's he was, for a time, in partnership with Samuel Hermann. He did not rival Hermann or Samuel Kohn in the height of his success, but, like Hermann, he did go into bankruptcy during the depression of 1837–42.[89]

Asher's sister Catherine and her husband Hyam Harris, together with their ten children, or at least most of them, moved to New Orleans about 1825. Asher probably supported them in whole or in part during their stay in New Orleans, because when Hyam died on June 1, 1828, the value of the furniture and stock of his small store amounted to just $463; his only other possession was a seventy-year-old slave, Lucretia, who brought $72 at auction. At the inventory of Hyam's estate, Catherine reported that the silver plate in their home was her own private property, a gift from her brother Asher. The children, Levy Judah, Alexander, Isabelle and Aaron Harris, were still minors who required a male guardian; Henry M. Hyams, who had recently come from Charleston and had known the family there, agreed to act in that capacity. Rebecca, Abraham Hyam and Moses Harris were already adults, as was Amelia, who had married Daniel Goodman just a few months previously, on February 26, 1828. Asher Nathan set Moses Harris up in business in Mobile in 1837; sometimes Moses represented his uncle's interests, sometimes he acted on his own account.[90]

Asher Nathan's losses during the depression of 1837–42 were not serious. In the R. G. Dun and Company report of 1853, Asher was described as "an old resident & one of the most respectable Brokers in the city belongs to the old school. Is rich and a sup[erio]r bus man." Alexander Harris, his nephew and partner, was called an "intelligt yg man." The firm was said to be worth $50,000. In 1854 Nathan and Harris put in the successful bid for marketing $600,000 worth of 1857–58 bonds of the New Orleans, Jackson and Great Northern Rail Road Company. In 1859 Nathan retired and the business was named Alexander Harris and Company, but Nathan continued to give his financial support to Alexander and two of his brothers who were in the firm with him. Marguerite's estate, probated in 1854, listed $12,000 in real estate, $3,900 in slaves owned jointly with her husband, and $2,000 worth of furniture. Asher's will, written in 1862 and probated after his death on December 18, 1864, included charitable gifts of $11,000, and personal bequests of $5,000 to Amelia Harris Goodman and $3,000 to Alexander. He also left portraits of himself and his wife to Alexander. The remainder of the estate, which was apparently quite large, although the succession records cannot be located, was bequeathed by Asher to Achile Lion, a young man whom he adopted as his son by a special act which the Louisiana Legislature passed on March 12, 1859. To Anna Lion, about twenty-seven years old in 1862, "who resides in Paris now under the Protection and care of Madame De Blimère," Asher Nathan left the income from a fund of $8,000; after her death this additional amount was to go to Achile.

Who were Achile and Anna Lion? Achile was presumably a grown man, or he too would have required the designation of a guardian. Was Anna mentally incompetent, therefore requiring "Protection and care?" A French Negro artist named Jules Lion was active in New Orleans as a lithographer beginning in the late 1830's; one Achille Lion appears in a notarial record in 1844 as Jules's son. But there may not have been any relationship at all between Achile and Anna Lion and the artist. The feeling is inescapable that Achile and Anna were Asher Nathan's mulatto children who had been sent to France for their education. Why else would Asher leave them his fortune, in view of the tremendous number of his nieces and nephews who lived in New Orleans? Why else would Asher have waited until after Marguerite's death to adopt Achile? Why, indeed, unless Achile was a mulatto, would Asher not have his "adopted son" with him in New Orleans? Asher Nathan was not a unique figure if he had fathered these two mulatto children; such occurrences were frequent in ante-Bellum New Orleans.[91]

9. Alexander Phillips

In Baton Rouge, the Carmelite priest Juan Brady performed almost as many ritual ceremonies which involved Jews as did Père Antoine in New Orleans. On December 10, 1811, Brady married Alexander Phillips to seventeen-year-old Rosina Thomas, who had been born in Natchez, the daughter of John Thomas and Elizabeth Macough. Phillips, a native of Amsterdam, had come to the United States at the age of sixteen, about 1791, perhaps as an indentured servant. A report which was published in the first decade of the twentieth century, but which was probably based on Alexander's recollections of his early experiences, describes his wanderings:

> "After having received the trade of a whitesmith [tinsmith], and enduring the numerous privations always attendant upon poverty, he emigrated to the United States . . . He settled at first in the > State of Pennsylvania. There he was obliged by necessitous circumstances to take employment in the capacity of a farmer's boy. For two years he served in that humble capacity. In 1794 . . . he enlisted under Gen'l Anthony Wayne, to quell the 'Whiskey Insurrection.' . . . He then secured employment from Gen. Hennen of Harrisburg, Pa. With this gentleman he remained until 1799, when, removing to the city of Philadelphia, he procured, under the advisement of a friend, a small quantity of merchandise, and thus equipped, girded up his loins and marched through the country as an itinerant, always finding a ready market . . . [A]t the end of a few years he became master of his own establishment and settled in the Quaker City . . . [H]e, in the year 1808, removed [to] the city of New Orleans, and immediately entered into the mercantile business."

The only record of Phillips' stay in Philadelphia annals is the mention of his partnership in 1804 with two other Jews, Lyon Cadet and Abraham Gumpert. He went first to Baton Rouge, however, rather than to New Orleans; in her will, written in 1876, Rosina said that she and Alexander remained in Baton Rouge for about one year after their marriage, "when we removed to this city where I have remained ever since." In December, 1811, Alexander Phillips, Maurice Barnett and Asher Nathan, the only Jews in the area, joined their neighbors in signing a petition of the inhabitants of Feliciana County (part of the territory formerly known as Spanish West Florida), which asked for special favors from the federal government in order that they might be integrated into Louisiana.[92]

Phillips' business ambitions were more modest than Samuel Kohn's and Samuel Hermann's. While he began his activity with shipping agencies, part ownerships of vessels and real estate dealings, he gradually restricted himself to wholesale and retail trade in groceries. An active Mason, he also participated in politics and served three terms as an alderman, in 1826 and 1827, and again in 1836; he was probably the first Jew to hold elective office in New Orleans. Phillips was prosperous, but he was not a wealthy man; in the 1820 census he is listed as owning four slaves; in 1830, ten. In 1824 he sold his home on Bienville street for $13,000, and built a more elegant one on Chartres.[93]

Alexander brought two brothers to New Orleans from Amsterdam. The first to come over was Isaac, who was in New Orleans by 1814, when he purchased a slave. Isaac's wife, Martha Cline, was probably a Methodist. In 1817 he was managing a "house of entertainment" in the Baton Rouge Hotel, but he spent most of his life in New Orleans, where he later conducted a clothing store. His only daughter, Rosina, probably named for Alexander's wife, died two years after her marriage in 1839 to Nathaniel Jewett Merrill.[94]

The third brother, Asser or Asher, arrived in New Orleans about 1819. He and Isaac probably were in the clothing business together, although each had other separate commercial interests. Asher named one of his sons Alexander in honor of his brother; Alexander did not return the compliment, but did name one of his sons for Isaac. Asher was the first of the brothers to die. Alexander signed the death certificate on March 5, 1839, and reported that Asher was sixty years old, while he himself was sixty-three. Asher's estate was valued at $11,674, and included three slaves worth $900. Asher's wife was Johanna Marie Debott, a native of Rotterdam; she was single, twenty-six, when she arrived on the brig Planter from Amsterdam, on January 1, 1820. Perhaps they had already been engaged in Holland, and he came ahead to establish himself before sending for her.[95]

Several of Alexander's eight children occupied significant places in the life of New Orleans. One, Alfred, became a prominent attorney. John B. Cotton, a well-known judge in the middle years of the nineteenth century, first married Alexander's daughter Sophia, and after her death, her sister Rosina, the widow of Nathan Haber. Elleonora was married to Simon Newburger, a successful merchant.[96]

10. Benjamin Levy[97]

An advertisement in the Louisiana Gazette of April 8, 1811, marked the beginning of the career of a pioneer New Orleans stationer, bookseller, bookbinder, printer and publisher:

> "The subscriber having opened a Book and Stationery store in Chartres street opposite Mrs. Fourage's boarding house begs > leave to inform the public that he will always have on hand a large and general assortment of Stationery of every description, together with an extensive assortment of Law and Miscellaneous books, which he will dispose of on the most reasonable terms: he will also keep Blank Books of every description or can rule and bind to any pattern with Spring Backs, Russian Bands or plain on the shortest notice. From his knowledge of the business in general and the unremitting attention he intends bestowing thereto, he hopes to meet with a share of their patronage.

>
> B. LEVY"

Born in New York City in 1786, Levy had gained experience as a bookbinder by the time he was twenty-two; two years later he became the partner of James Olmstead in a New York stationery store. He was a third-generation American, named for his grandfather who had emigrated from London to Newport, Rhode Island. Benjamin's father, Simeon (1748–1825), left that famed Jewish community, where Judah Touro's father officiated as hazan, and moved to New York City, where he became the teacher of Hebrew, English, arithmetic, and other subjects in the school of Shearith Israel Congregation; David Seixas and Jacob Hart were no doubt among his many pupils.[98]

It was probably his family's penurious circumstances which sent young Benjamin on the venturesome voyage to New Orleans, so far from home. There were five or six other children, and the father earned little from school-teaching, and had failed in business when he tried that. But the education which he had received from his father, and the bookish atmosphere which he absorbed in their home, marked him for life as one who would always be involved with books. Benjamin's departure from home did not signify a break with his family. He visited them several times before and after his father's death; he later brought his sister Mary to live with him in New Orleans; and he remained in contact with his sisters Hannah and Julia, mentioning all three in his will as his "Dear Sisters."[99]

In 1817 Benjamin married Emilie Prieur, daughter of Prosper Prieur and Marie Jeanne Casenauve. His bride, who had been born on November 2, 1799, was thus almost nineteen when she gave birth to their first child, Alexander, on September 7, 1818. Alexander was baptized in July, 1819, by Père Antoine, who also baptized the second child, Isabel Mathilda, who was born April 2, 1820. Although his children were reared as Roman Catholics, this seems merely to have been a matter of convenience. Isabel married a Protestant, the notary Albert Childe Ainsworth.[100]

Levy was not, of course, the first bookseller in New Orleans, but he was one of the first to concentrate his energies on this cultural-commercial field, and was certainly the first to remain in it for an extended period of time—more than forty years. Within a few weeks of his first business announcement, Levy formed a partnership with Michael Reynolds, but this relationship lasted only about three years. In August, 1814, the firm's creditors entered suit, and bankruptcy proceedings resulted. But that did not deter Levy; in 1815, he opened another store under the name of "Benjamin Levy & Co.," advertising books, stationery, binding and subscriptions to the popular literary journals. It is entirely possible that his silent partner as early as 1815 was his old New York associate, James Olmstead, for after the latter's death on September 9, 1823, Levy announced that their partnership was now dissolved and that he would continue the business alone.[101]

Throughout his years as an active bookseller, Levy advertised profusely in the New Orleans and Louisiana newspapers, taking as many as nine separate notices to announce the receipt of new novels, biographies, literary annuals and gift books, volumes of history, memoirs, classical literature, home-remedy guides, works of drama, law and politics. But beyond the more general stock he carried and constantly replenished, he specialized in law books; this appears to have been a major personal interest—catering to the needs of attorneys. Other aspects of Levy's work were the sale of various types of stationery supplies, and the printing of business forms and the like. The range of his wares was as varied and extensive as today's stationery stores': pens, pencils, writing paper, notebooks, ink, knives, albums, writing desks, and all of the other odds and ends which a business man or housewife would want. In addition to the stock of "Books, Pamphlets, Cards, Checks, Bills of Lading, Bills of Exchange, Steam-Boat Bills, Posting Bills, Hand Bills, Labels, Custom-House and Notarial Blanks, &c, &c, &c."

which he printed and had for sale, he also sold theater and lottery tickets.[102]

But bookselling, stationery printing and selling, and bookbinding (Levy's first occupational proficiency, which he continued to advertise throughout his career), were less unique than his pursuits in the publishing field. He was one of the most active and productive publishers in New Orleans during the period 1822–41, and was probably the first Jewish printer-publisher not only in the South, but in the entire country. Jews had been active in bookselling and publishing in New York City for a number of years before Levy's first imprint appeared—Benjamin Gomez and Naphtali Judah were well-known booksellers and publishers during the 1790's, but their volumes were farmed out to professional printers, while they devoted their activity to selling, and most of their publications were ordered jointly with other booksellers. Levy was the first American Jew to combine printing, publishing and selling.

Levy's name first appeared on the title-page of a book in 1817, when Olmstead published the second edition of William Darby's popular Geographical Description of the State of Louisiana, and listed "B. Levy & Co. Booksellers, New-Orleans," as the sole distributor of the volume. This was in the Gomez–Judah tradition. Levy first announced his new venture as a printer-publisher in 1821, and, characteristically, advertised the publication of a legal volume, one of François-Xavier Martin's Louisiana Term Reports . . . Cases Argued in the Supreme Court of the State of Louisiana. In 1822 he published three volumes by Martin, another legal imprint, an almanac and the second New Orleans city directory (the first in eleven years). Throughout the following nineteen years, he continued to publish a wide variety of books and pamphlets. The largest proportion of the one hundred and thirty-three identifiable imprints of his press were of a legal character. If we count each of the eleven parts of Edward Livingston's Penal Code as a separate entity (which is justified because they were printed and distributed at different times over a five-year period), the legal items constitute almost half of his publications. These were compilations, reference volumes, appeals, briefs, and attorneys' courtroom pleadings. A few were published at the expense of the state or city—but Levy was never an official governmental printer despite the fact that his wife's brother, Denis Prieur, served seven terms as Mayor of New Orleans, more than any other chief officer of the city. The interesting point is that Levy was the first New Orleans printer to publish legal treatises. Legal scholars probably turned to him because he took a particular interest in the practice of law, maintained a good stock of legal texts, and got along well with attorneys. A list of the authors of legal volumes published by Levy reads like a roster of the outstanding legal talent of the city: François-Xavier Martin, James Workman, Edward Livingston, Louis Moreau-Lislet, Pierre Derbigny, Samuel Livermore, John Slidell, Meinrad Greiner. (How ironic that Levy did not publish anything by the two leading New Orleans attorneys of Jewish birth, Judah P. Benjamin and Myer M. Cohen—but both were involved in his bankruptcy in 1842–43, Benjamin as assignee, and Cohen as United States Commissioner!)[103]

Approximately a quarter of Levy's publications were of a business nature, including acts of incorporation of banks and other institutions. Only twelve were political; ten were of literary or general interest; five were almanacs, and two were city directories. Because of New Orleans' diverse population, many were printed in French, or in both French and English, and one was printed in Spanish. Only three were printed by other firms, the 1817 Darby volume, and the 1841 Louisiana Digest, the first and last to bear his name, and, in addition, a book on The Law of Slavery, by Jacob D. Wheeler, published in 1837.

Comparatively few of the products of Levy's press were of permanent general interest and worth, although the Term Reports of the Louisiana Supreme Court decisions, and some of his other legal volumes, have a reference value which has required their reprinting throughout the years. Among the exceptions are J. C. Beltrami's La Découverte des Sources du Mississippi et de la Rivière Sanglante (1824); Charles Gayarré's Essai Historique sur La Louisiane (1830–31); and especially Edward Livingston's Penal Code (1822–27) which, while never adopted by the Louisiana Legislature, has had an enduring influence on concepts of criminology here and abroad. It was reprinted a number of times, both in the United States and in France, and is still the subject of frequent comment and evaluation.[104]

Another of Levy's publications which was of great utility in its time was the New-Orleans Price-Current and Commercial Intelligencer, the first business journal to appear in the city, which Levy established on June 27, 1822, and continued to publish on a weekly basis until December 28, 1839, the final issue to bear his name. This newspaper, which Levy printed for seventeen years, and even seems to have edited for a brief time in its early years, listed wholesale and retail prices not only for New Orleans, but also for Mobile, New York City, Philadelphia, Baltimore and other cities; it was a business man's guide to the present and the future. Associated with it was a Price-Current Letter Sheet, with the printed matter on two pages, leaving the last two pages blank for correspondence and comment; this handy business report seems to have been published by Levy from 1822 on. These publications and other commercial imprints demonstrate that Levy's connection with mercantile interests was second only to his relationship to attorneys.

Perhaps it was these same contacts which brought about Levy's business failure. It is difficult to make sense out of the many reports and listings of debits and assets compiled for Levy's bankruptcy proceedings in 1842–43, but this much is certain—it was neither his book and stationery store nor his printing business which drove him into court, but a combination of mortgaged real estate investments, bank debts, and bad notes which he had endorsed. Had he been content to manage his thriving business, in which he had prospered, he would not have run into trouble. But his intimate acquaintance with business growth and speculation undoubtedly enticed him into risks and associations beyond his competence. In 1835 he became a Commissioner of the Ocean Insurance Company, and around the same time was elected a director of the Mechanics' and Traders' Bank. This was a bad time for anyone to become involved in these reckless and unbridled financial operations. The panic of 1837 was soon upon the town and Levy was trapped. Although he owned only 245 shares of Mechanics' Bank stock, less than any other director, he had borrowed $8,530 and endorsed notes amounting to $4,605.62. In addition, he owed $3,640 to the Louisiana State Bank. He had made other investments, too: 130 shares of Union Bank stock; 400 shares of Nashville Railroad stock; 5 shares of Merchants' Exchange stock;

5 shares in the Barataria and Lafourche Company; and a number of heavily mortgaged parcels of real estate, some of which he owned in his own right, or in his sister Mary's name, others jointly with Francis Cook, who had been the foreman in his printing plant since about 1831. Had he maintained a liquid cash position, he might at least have weathered the storm and kept his business intact.[105]

In 1839, in an effort to retrench, Levy leased his printing plant and the Price-Current to his son Alexander and to Francis Cook, and moved his store from Chartres street to the corner of Camp and Gravier, but this only helped to stave off disaster until 1842. According to a declaration of credits and debits which he drew up on December 20, 1842, he owed a total of $75,347.20 in unpaid bills and $37,588 in notes. The first sum was owing to suppliers and publishers in New York City, Baltimore, Philadelphia and Cincinnati; the second included $18,000 to Francis Cook, $17,000 to Levi Pierce, a wealthy New Orleans attorney, and $863 to his son-in-law. His assets amounted to $56,465 in stock and $14,799 in bills receivable. The stock in his store, his store lease, his real estate and even his home at 15 St. Charles street, which he had purchased in 1831 for $14,500, were sold at auction for bargain prices. The final imprint bearing Benjamin Levy's name, of which no copy seems to have survived, is the catalogue of the auction sale of his merchandise, printed by Alexander. The text of the bill which Alexander Levy presented to Judah Benjamin for his services read as follows:

"Alexander Levy—
19th April 1843—

Printing 500 Catalogues of Books and Stationery for Sale at Auction, B. Levy's Estate, on Best Royal Paper 78 Pages made up into Pamphlets, for	$218.50
My Services, with a Clerk, to make the above Catalogue and to arrange Stock for the Auction	$100.00
Paid Cash for Negro Hire, in Hoisting Up and Down, Carrying, &c. &c.	$23.50
Three Weeks extra services, for myself and one Clerk, in attending the Auction, promoting Sales, Collection &c &c	$150.—
	$492.00"

We may be certain that Benjamin Levy preferred that if this Auction Catalogue had to be printed at all, it be printed by his son.[106]

Benjamin Levy never reestablished himself in business following his bankruptcy, but he did take an active role in Alexander's business ventures. During the period 1839–42, while Alexander and Cook were partners in the printing business, their firm issued ten publications under their imprint. After that partnership was dissolved, Alexander went into business as Alexander Levy & Company, under his father's guidance and assistance, but it was no longer the flourishing, successful operation of old. The firm concentrated on stationery and lawbooks, and published only nineteen items, all in pamphlet form, none big enough to be called a book, or of any literary or historical significance. One, however, is the fascinating license form which was issued by the New Orleans city government in 1857 to prostitutes who observed the law which prohibited their occupying ground level quarters. The firm went bankrupt again, in 1858. Ben simply had no luck at all.[107]

Within a period of seventeen months in 1851–52, Levy had suffered great sorrow. Emilie died on February 21, 1851; A. C. Ainsworth on May 5, 1851; and Mathilde (she used that name rather than Isabel) on July 22, 1852. Benjamin's grandchildren, Aline Mary, Annie Elizabeth and Martin Luther, were only eleven, seven and five when their mother died. We do not know whether they were reared in Benjamin and Alexander's home, which was tended by Benjamin's sister Mary, but they were his moral and legal responsibility—a heavy one for a sixty-six-year-old man. Fortunately he lived until 1860, and Mary seems to have remained in New Orleans for a few more years before crossing through the Confederacy to Washington, where she made her home with her nephew, Adolphus Solomons, another printer-publisher.[108]

What kind of man was Benjamin Levy? Gullible and attracted by the vision of quick profits, certainly, to judge from his ambitious investments. But modest also; note his comment about the value of his household possessions: "Much of this furniture I bought when married in 1817. It is almost impossible for me to name its true value now." One catches a glimpse of his affectionate, tender nature in the provision of his will which related to his grandchildren; he bequeathed to them his "whole Library & Book Case, hoping they will profit by this, my only Legacy to them. I wish it was in my power to leave them more Substantial proofs, of my strong & tender Affection, but indeed it is not, I hope they will be enabled by their own industry, and ability, to not regret this bequest So very small." Efforts to locate this "Library & Book Case," if indeed it is still in existence, have been unavailing. What further imprints it might contain, and how many other indications of Levy's nature and character! The children had no doubt inherited something from their parents' estates, and probably also had received gifts from prosperous Prieur relatives, for most of Levy's possessions and cash assets (amounting to a total worth of only $1,760, including the value of a slave) were divided between his son and his sisters. Touching were his comments about slaves:

> "Item, I give and bequeath to my Dear Son, Alexander Levy, my Black Slave Man, Richard or Dick White, a Barber, for his use During Life, unless the Slave Richard or Dick White can buy his Freedom, for the amount of Five hundred Dollars in cash. But in case the afore said Slave cannot buy his freedom during the Life of my Son, as afore said, the said Slave Richard shall be sett [sic] Free, in the usual forms by Law,—
>
> "From the tenor of the foregoing, My Wish and direction is, That the above named Slave Richard, is never to be sold, Mortgaged, or hired out for a Longer term than one Year at a time, and never to be hired out of the State of Louisiana . . .
>
> "I should like (if it is possible,) to give to each of the coloured people, Born into my family, viz, Richard[.] Harry[,] Samuel, Ellen, Joseph, Martha and Horace, and Millee likewise (belonging to my Dear Grand Children,) Some Small Memorial of their old Master, and to whom I have always been strongly attached, this wish, my family will carry out, in the best way, they may choose to adopt.—"

Benjamin Levy devoted more words in his will to these slaves than to the members of his family: indication enough of a warm and kind spirit.[109]

Not many deaths warranted newspaper editorials in those days, any more than in our own. The editors of the Daily Crescent got some of the facts twisted in their sketch, but they expressed respect not only for a journalistic colleague who had printer's ink in his veins, but for the man Benjamin Levy, in their eulogy of January 11, 1860:

> "DEATH OF AN OLD CITIZEN.—Benjamin Levy has been called hence; he departed this life yesterday morning at his residence on Canal street, in the 74th year of his age. Mr. Levy was a native of Long Island, New York, and arrived in this city about the year 1812. His profession as a book-binder and printer led him to be largely concerned with the art preservative of all arts—printing. In the year 1818 he opened a large and extensive book and stationery store on Conti street at about the intersection of Exchange Alley . . . In the year 1822 he established the New Orleans Price Current, which has attained so high an eminence in the commercial world, and now located on Camp street. His connection with the Price Current was of many years' duration. He was one of the pioneers of journalism in our city . . . For a long period of time—over a quarter of a century—Mr. Levy stood the highest of the high in his vocation. Like thousands of others he had to undergo the viscissitudes [sic] and revulsions of commerce and trade. He met the adversities and disasters with courage and rectitude. In the many relations of life and as a good citizen he stood high and unblemished. Over forty years ago he became connected, by marriage, with the old, respected and ancient family of Prieur. His descendants enjoy high social position in our community. In fine, our departed friend was emphatically a good man; he was universally respected by all our citizens. And thus, one by one, the men of other days are called from this sublunary sphere."

11. JEWS IN THE BATTLE OF NEW ORLEANS

We have thus far traced the personal, familial and business careers of all but two of the Jews who had settled in New Orleans by the time of the battle that saved the city from capture by the British. One of these two was Manis Jacobs, whose story we defer until later. An obituary at the time of his death in 1839 said that he had lived in the city for thirty years, but the earliest reference to him which we have discovered is a newspaper advertisement of 1812.[110] The other person unmentioned thus far was Simon M. Cohen. These two round out to fifteen the number of Jewish men definitely known to have been in New Orleans by 1814–15. Of these, at least ten, and possibly eleven, served in the armed forces under Andrew Jackson on the fields of Chalmette Plantation on January 8, 1815. Two-thirds of any group is a large proportion, but it is important to recall that all of these Jews were comparatively young men, some of them single, who were not only willing but able to take part in the defense of their new home.

The records of the military units which took part in the campaign, particularly the home guard, the Louisiana Militia, are scanty and incomplete. In addition to Touro, whose service we have already noted, a contemporary roster, dated December 20, 1814, lists four of our men: S. Coh[e]n, a member of the Compagnie des Dragons, Plauché's Battalion of the Louisiana Militia; another "Cohn" who served in the Compagnie des Carabiniers, and who is probably to be identified with Samuel Kohn; Maurice Barnett, listed as a Dragon in the Compagnie des Francs; and J. Hart, of the Compagnie des Dragons (à pied). These are the only early references to military service by our men which we have been able to uncover.[111]

With a number of men named Jacob Hart in New Orleans at the same time, two of whom were known to be military figures, and the third a policeman, it would be difficult to state with any assurance that it was our Jacob Hart who served as a private in Plauché's Battalion, were it not for a list which was published at the time of the 34th anniversary celebration of the Battle of New Orleans, on January 8, 1849, designating those who were still known to be living at the time. So far as we know, our Jacob Hart was the only man bearing that name who was still alive and in residence in New Orleans—he did not die until December of that year. Another name on that list was Maurice Barnett's. When he died in 1865, an obituary in the Picayune said of him: "A veteran gone. We are once again called on to announce the demise of one of the small but highly honored class of our old citizens, the veterans of the Battle of New Orleans, so few of whom remain to us. Mr. Maurice Barnett, Sr. died yesterday. . . ."[112]

Of the others, the evidence is less conclusive. An obituary of Isaac Phillips which was published in 1851 reports that he "fought in the Battle of New Orleans, January 8, 1815—defended his adopted country. A Jew by birth."[113] Our other men are listed in a recent compilation of the names of men who served under Jackson, which was painstakingly assembled from various sources, including those in Baton Rouge and in the National Archives in Washington; unfortunately, sources are not cited for each specific individual. The following names are of particular interest to us: Rochelle and Shiff (no first names), both privates in Dejan's First Regiment; Samuel Hermann, a private in De Clouet's Regiment; Dejonge, Sergeant of Musicians and Chief Musician, Plauché's Battalion; Alexander Phillips, 2nd Lieutenant of Dejan's Regiment.[114] All of these pieces of information, although far from definitive, mesh well with facts already at our disposal. It would be natural for Rochelle and Shiff to have enlisted together in the same regiment, since they were partners; we would expect Rochelle to have served, in view of what we have already learned about his physical courage and prowess with the sword. S. S. De Jonge was so interested in music that he was an incorporator of the New Orleans Philharmonic Society in 1838; as Chief Musician he may even have conducted a band. Alexander Phillips, we recall, was a veteran of the military forces which were assembled to quell the Whiskey Rebellion. In view of the tremendous amount of effort which has been expended on research on this subject, it seems unlikely that any new, dramatic sources of information will be discovered to give further details about the activities of these men. We shall have to be content with the meager evidence at our disposal, sufficient to indicate that this small number of Jews shouldered their share of responsibility, accepted the burden of fear and danger, and achieved whatever of glory and satisfaction were in store for those who followed Jackson to victory. Of only four of our men is there a total absence of evidence of participation in the battle: A. M. Nathan, David Hart, Benjamin Levy and Manis Jacobs.[115]

Only one of these citizen-soldiers maintained an interest in military matters. Simon Cohen's name occurs frequently in the newspaper advertisements which the New Orleans military units utilized, beginning in 1829, to announce their drills, reviews and parades. From April, 1829, to May, 1830, he was Sergeant Major of the Artillery Battalion. In October, 1830, he was elected 2nd Lieutenant, and another Jew, Joseph Lasalle, replaced him in his former post. Cohen held this rank until 1833.[116]

Little is known about Cohen's earlier years in New Orleans. His obituary in the Bee reports that he had come to the city from Amsterdam about 1810. In 1818 he bought a slave and her two-month-old baby, but the sale was annulled when it was discovered that they were mortgaged to someone else. That same year Cohen leased all of the rooms in his house, other than his tobacconist's shop and his living quarters, to two men who apparently set up a billiard parlor; when they failed to pay the specified sum of $1,200, he confiscated the billiard tables. In the 1820 census, Cohen is listed as the owner of four slaves.[117]

After a long illness, Cohen died at the age of fifty-five, on August 21, 1836. A friend wrote a long and emotional tribute to him for the French section of the Bee; he berated Cohen's former friends who had neglected him during his illness, when he was in need of funds as well as good cheer, and criticized the Artillery Battalion for its failure to provide military honors at Cohen's funeral. Jews were apparently not among those friends. Less than four months before Cohen's death, he was baptized a Roman Catholic by Abbé Moni, who also gave him the last rites and conducted his funeral. But it would seem as though this deathbed conversion may simply have been the result of the insistence of his importunate and loyal friend. He had been in New Orleans for twenty-six years, or thereabouts, without feeling any need to renounce Judaism and adopt a new faith. The last words of his anonymous friend's French tribute are full of pathos:

> "Adieu Cohen! . . . adieu! puissent ces faibles lignes, tracées avec la plus vive émotion, adoucir l'amertume des chagrins de ceux qui le chérissaient sur cette terre, et attester le souvenir d'un ancien ami."[118]

IV

From the Battle of New Orleans to the Formation of the First Congregation

French settlement of the site of New Orleans had begun in 1718, but the city did not enter its American period until 1803. The early years of the nineteenth century were late in the day for old American cities like Boston, New York and Philadelphia, but they were just the beginning for New Orleans. French-Spanish Creole influences have persisted to this very day; New Orleans is still a different kind of American city. But the period from 1803 to 1815 was a pioneering age, and those European and Yankee immigrants who came to the city then were participants in the living drama of the transformation of a colonial port into a vibrant, dynamic, enterprising, though still Creole, metropolis. Our Jews who settled in New Orleans before the battle which saved the city from British conquest (even though the peace treaty had already been signed before the first shot was fired) were forerunners in the same sense as all others who immigrated to this new frontier. During the second decade of the nineteenth century, for the most part after 1815, another 10,000 white settlers swelled the population—that was larger than the entire number of residents at the time of the Louisiana Purchase. Almost 20,000 more entered the city during the 1820's, but the 1830's were the years of greatest growth; the white population more than doubled from 46,082 in 1830 to 102,193 in 1840. A large proportion of these were European immigrants, quite aside from at least an equal number of foreigners who landed in New Orleans, stayed for a brief while, and then fanned out through the South and up the Mississippi. New Orleans was so popular a port of debarkation partly because the fare was cheaper than to New York City—ships which transported cotton to Europe did not always fill their holds with cargo for the return voyages to New Orleans; human cargo was better than none. But not all of the newcomers were

Europeans. Many were native-born Americans who left cities like New York or Philadelphia because they believed fortunes were to be made in New Orleans, or who forsook the states of the "old" South, like Virginia and South Carolina, because business conditions in those areas had become stagnant. New Orleans, regarded by Europeans as an American city, was to Americans themselves a city on the frontier of the "new" South, or, rather, the Southwest as it was known in that day.[1]

To establish the precise number of Jews in any location at any specific time is extremely difficult. No questions relating to religious affiliation or preference may be asked by census-takers. We are therefore dependent on the use of names and other identification indices if we are to reach even an approximate number. But the manuscript census returns are hard to use: the handwriting is frequently difficult to decipher; names are spelled incorrectly; information is inaccurate. In the case of New Orleans, two separate and independent studies reflect some of the problems inherent in the utilization of the census records. Ira Rosenswaike, who has spent much time on the examination of the census records of 1820 for information about Jews in various cities, located a total of ten Jews in the New Orleans returns; this writer identified an eleventh Jew. But altogether missing from the census data are the names of seven other men whose experiences we have already sketched.[2] The 1822 New Orleans City Directory includes the names of seven additional Jews, but omits a number of those whose presence is confirmed by other sources. The Directory listing is quite helpful, however, because of the occupational data which it reports. With twenty-five Jews listed by name, the occupational distribution is as follows: six merchant-bankers and brokers; three commission merchants; two traders; one liquor dealer (who dealt more in slaves than in liquor); six clothing and dry goods storekeepers; one hotelkeeper; two brothers in the Hart cotton press; one grocer; one bookseller; one watchmaker; one cigar manufacturer. Those names omitted from the Directory belong largely to petty shopkeepers whose business activities were probably so limited that they did not consider it worthwhile to enter their names. The most exhaustive list of Jews in New Orleans during this time was published in the constitution of the first congregation, in 1827; it includes thirty-five members and thirty-three contributors—but some in both categories lived outside of New Orleans, and a number were in town only for a brief time and then left for other horizons. Thirty-five Jewish heads of households are listed in the 1830 census, as best we can read them, but probably more than that number are omitted.

At any rate, it is not our intention to compile a list of every Jew who resided in the city temporarily or even permanently during the period following the Battle of New Orleans. The pioneers, as we have called them, were a special breed, and we have studied them exhaustively for reasons which will become more apparent in another chapter. We have made no effort, however, to trace every Jew who came to New Orleans in the years after 1815. But some of these American and European migrants to New Orleans are especially interesting or important, and it is to these that we now turn.

1. Visitors, Transients and Victims

Any port like New Orleans was bound to have a large transient population. People were forever coming and going, because ships were the fastest and most convenient method of transportation. Anyone traveling from the Atlantic seaboard or from Europe to the lower and middle Mississippi Valley areas was more likely to go to New Orleans by ship and then up the Mississippi, than to undertake the arduous journey across the Appalachians. But there was yet another reason for so much traffic in and out of the city: the climate made New Orleans so uncomfortable during the summer, and the summer epidemics made it so unhealthy, that many permanent residents, let alone transients, left the city for long months at a time.

There were probably dozens of Jews like Samuel Mordecai, of Warrenton, N. C., who stopped in New Orleans for a brief time. He was in the city in May of 1815, while his ship was unloading and taking on cargo. This was only one stop on a trip which he was making from New York City to Europe. Sam bemoaned his lack of letters of introduction to local people; time rested heavily on his hands while he was waiting.[3] Sam's brother Solomon, the physician, made a similar stopover in New Orleans in 1823 on his way from Virginia, via Baltimore, to Mobile, where he intended to open his medical practice. But he was in too much of a hurry to send his impressions of the town back to his family in North Carolina.[4]

A visitor who stayed longer, and returned several times, was the actor Aaron J. Phillips, the son of the well-known Jewish leader of Philadelphia, Jonas Phillips, and the uncle of the dramatist-politician, Mordecai Manuel Noah. Aaron Phillips arrived in New Orleans in March, 1819, fresh from the "Theatres of New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore & Charleston," and announced that he would make his first appearance on the stage of the Orleans Ball Room in a program of monologues. The featured piece, "for the first time in this city," was "Sterne's Celebrated LECTURE ON HEADS." The first part included the following:

> "No. 1 Head of Sir Whiskey Whiffle. 2. Comical Fellow. 3. Hamlet's Soliloquy on Death. 4. Head of Jonas, or the Card Playing Conjurer. 5. Head of an Apothecary. 6. Clarence's Dream. 7. The London Blood, going to keep it up. 8. The London Blood, after he has kept it up. . . ."

The second part of this hodgepodge highlighted Antony's oration over Caesar, and Collins' "Ode on the Passions." A reviewer expatiated on his pleasure at the performance, praised Phillips as "an actor not inferior to any of the stars now playing with such boasted honor at New-York and Philadelphia," and chided the population of New Orleans for their unresponsiveness to the opportunity to hear Phillips, regretting that this "amusement of the most chaste refinement and intellectual character, was not honored by the attendance of more of the fashion and beauty of New Orleans." But he said that the people of the town would be given another chance—Phillips was going to repeat the performance, and was even making plans to open his own theater with a company that would specialize in performances of Shakespeare. Aaron joined the company of the St. Philip Street Theater (Phillips of St. Philip) and took the lead in three plays before returning to the East. Aaron did come back to

New Orleans for the winter season of 1819–20 with a repertoire which included Romeo and Juliet. But James Caldwell's company had taken the city by storm, and there was no room for a rival. On March 3, 1820, Phillips announced his imminent departure, but he probably stayed in town long enough to watch the Caldwell company's performance of his nephew Mordecai Noah's patriotic play She Would be a Soldier, or, The Plains of Chippewa, which was enlivened by the participation of a local detachment of regular Army troops. A reviewer reacted enthusiastically to the Noah drama. "This is the best American Play which we have ever seen," he said. "When our country can boast of such writers as Mr. Noah, we see no necessity of our importing 'British Literature' and British plays 'by the bale and by the hogshead.' " Noah's dramas continued to evoke a lively response from the theater-goers of New Orleans for many years to come, but his uncle Aaron Phillips had not hit it off so well—he paid only one more visit to the city, in 1823.[5]

Reports of passenger arrivals and cargo receipts in the New Orleans newspapers frequently refer to Jews who came to town on business, stayed for a little while, and then moved on. G. Cohen was in and out of New Orleans with trunks and boxes of merchandise, during the business season of 1825–26, on his way from Philadelphia, then up the Mississippi River, and then finally through New Orleans again bound for Havana. At about the same time, S. Levy arrived in New Orleans from Charleston, but his name does not appear again in the records. John B. Levy came to town in 1828 with thirty-seven slaves for sale; he did not even land them, but sold them at the dock from the schooner Transport.[6]

These people were, obviously, transients who had no intention of remaining in New Orleans. There were others, however, who intended to become permanent residents, but luck ran out on them, and they died in New Orleans. Among these were Henry Hartman, a commission merchant, and Benjamin Levine, a watchmaker, both of whom died in 1818. Hartman said in his will that he thought his mother, Julia Hirsch, might still be living, in Hamburg, but if not, his executors should make every effort to find his heirs and distribute the proceeds of his estate equitably.[7] Levine had kept in closer contact with his family.

He left $300 to George Levine of Petersburg, Virginia, and $200 to Mary Levy of New York City, probably his brother and sister; the remainder of the estate was to be sent to Moses Levy of Gloucester, England, probably his father.[8] On December 23, 1820, Ezekiel Salomon, Haym Salomon's oldest child, arrived in New Orleans on the steamboat Car of Commerce from Louisville, to assume his new position as cashier of the New Orleans branch of the Bank of the United States. He signed notices of checks and drafts available, bank closing dates and similar advertisements in the newspapers until his death on September 27, 1821. One summer in New Orleans was too much for forty-three-year-old Ezekiel.[9] Another casualty was Baruh Jonas, who came to New Orleans from England about 1819–20. He was born in Teignmouth, Devonshire, on January 18, 1798, and may have been related to the Jonas brothers, Abraham and Joseph, who were among the earliest Jewish settlers in Cincinnati. Baruh was married to Teresa Barbarin on November 25, 1820, by the Reverend James Hull. A Protestant ceremony was probably the best compromise this Catholic girl and Jewish man could make. Jonas died on January 4, 1822, a little more than a year after his wedding, and was buried in the Protestant Girod Street Cemetery. Presuming that he was one of the twenty-two children of Benjamin Jonas and Annie Ezekiel of Exeter, it was his brother George and nephew Benjamin Franklin Jonas who brought great distinction to their family's name in New Orleans in later years.[10] Another Jew who died the same year as Baruh Jonas was Louis Levy, thirty-four, of Pennsylvania, one of a large number of "strangers" who died in the yellow fever epidemic that fall.[11]

2. Dealers in Slaves and Indentured Servants, and Many Men Named Jacobs

We have no way of knowing how many young Jewish men came to the New Orleans area as indentured servants or "redemptioners," as they were called. It would be surprising if there were none. They may, as a matter of fact, have been among those advertised by other Jews. A. F. Strauss, listed in the 1822 City Directory as a grocer at 36 Gravier street, below Tchoupitoulas, was the agent for the brig Mississippi, which arrived at the port from Bremen in November, 1819, with a shipload of indentured craftsmen and farmers, some with their families, who now had to work for several years to repay their fare, as Alexander Phillips apparently had done when he arrived in Pennsylvania. "They are all remarkably healthy," said Strauss' advertisement, "exclusively Germans, and of good character." Levy Jacobs, with headquarters first at 4 Conti street, then at 29 Toulouse street, was another Jew who got a commission for his activity in selling contracts for the repayment of the $70 ship passage money of redemptioners. During 1820 he advertised a number of shipments of these people, as many as a hundred at a time; they included blacksmiths, brewers, bricklayers, butchers, barbers, carpenters, joiners, upholsterers, millers, painters, ropemakers, shoemakers, coopers, gardeners, tailors, tanners, wheelwrights, and masons, and women who had been trained as laundresses, dressmakers and domestic servants.[12]

Levy Jacobs had begun business as an exchange and commission merchant by 1819 at the latest, with a non-Jewish partner named George Asbridge. They offered to "sell or purchase goods at private sale; buy goods at auction; procure freights and vessels for freight; buy and sell Negroes; exchange foreign bills; execute instruments in writing." After they dissolved their partnership, Jacobs seems to have concentrated on liquor sales and slavetrading. He came as close as any New Orleans Jew to specializing in this business. During the late 1820's large shipments of slaves came his way. In September, 1828, he notified the public that he was expecting about 100 "prime, Virginia slaves, selected expressly for this market [slave-dealers always said that, because planters were suspected of shipping their unwanted, sick or rebellious slaves to the expanding areas in the South where more slaves were needed]:—among which are, Ostlers, Carriage Drivers, Mechanics, Field Hands and Cooks, House Servants, seamstresses and washer women." Jacobs was indignant when he was accused of foisting inferior Kentucky slaves on his customers instead of the superior Virginia ones he advertised:

> "NOTICE—A report being circulated that I have for sale no other than Kentucky slaves, I beg leave to state to the public that all the Negroes which I have on hand, and shall hereafter keep for sale are and will be Virginia born Negroes, of good character; that the person who has stated to the contrary, with the view of injuring me, I call upon in this public manner to come forward and support this charge if he can, or hereafter hold his peace. All Negroes sold and bought by me from traders (excepting at my own house) will be free of commission.
>
> L. JACOBS"

The social position of a slave trader in Jacobs' time was not inferior to that of other merchants of a similar success. Levy Jacobs even called himself "Esq." in an advertisement. We may be certain that no one lifted an eyebrow when Levy's daughter Isabella was married, on May 5, 1832, to T. G. Joans, a young printer-journalist. If any eyebrows were raised, it was not because Levy was a slave trader or a Jew, but two years later, when Joans, editor and publisher of the Mercantile Advertiser, the Price-Current's competition, absconded with the proceeds of some forged notes.[13]

There were many men in New Orleans at this time whose last name was Jacobs. One was Manis Jacobs, the jeweler and trader whom we have already met briefly. Another was Ralph (Raphael) Jacobs, whose nephew, Dr. Joseph Bensadon, became the first medical director of the Touro Infirmary. Ralph was in New Orleans by 1822 at the latest, conducting a ship brokerage business at 3 Custom House street. At that time his partner was one J. W. Melder, who left Ralph and then went bankrupt still owing him some money. Ralph himself was in business difficulties in 1832, and his property had to be sold to satisfy his creditors. Back in business again, he sold some real estate, bought shares in a ferry company, and guaranteed the captains of ships that he would be able to provide seamen, on bond, for ships' crews. He had two offices for those in a hurry to reach him, one at 84 Gallatin street at the foot of the vegetable market, and the other in the rear of a grocery store on the levee. Ralph died on April 23, 1845, at the age of sixty-three.[14]

Ralph was not related to Levy Jacobs, so far as we can discover, but Levy did have a brother named Jacob Jacobs. Perhaps Samuel Jacobs was another brother. We know very little about Sam other than the public ventilation of his domestic troubles. On August 24, 1824, he announced to the readers of the Louisiana Gazette that he would no longer be responsible for his wife's debts:

> "Caution. Whereas my wife Rosette has left my house without any just cause whatever, this is to caution the public not to trust her on my account, as I will not pay any debts contracted by her."

A month later, Jacobs printed a retraction. The previous notice had been issued, he said, "merely through a mistake"—"now I have the pleasure to let the public know that we live in perfect harmony." But the "perfect harmony" did not last very long. Before the year was out, the court approved the couple's legal separation. In 1834 Sam went bankrupt and his property was sold at sheriff's auction for $16,200; his possessions included 24 lots of unimproved ground, a building on the levee, and a slave with her six-month-old child. Sam's possessions were still being sold in 1839, the last time his name was mentioned.[15]

3. Scandals and Duels

Samuel Jacobs' legal separation was an unusual occurrence, but not so his marriage to a local non-Jewish woman. Intermarriage continued apace as the newcomers arrived, and their children were invariably reared in conformity with the Christian environment. On October 18, 1822, Lise Augustine, the daughter of J. M. Cohen, a native of Holland, and Marie Victoire Leboulh of Louisiana, was baptized at the St. Louis Church.[16] The following year, Victor Souza, the son of Antonio Souza and Marie Pereira of Bordeaux, was married in the same church by Père Antoine, to Rose Bourdeaux, the daughter of Pierre Bourdeaux and Anne Marcely of Saint-Domingue. Nineteen days before his wedding on December 23, 1823, Victor underwent Roman Catholic baptism; he is the only Jew during this period, other than Simon Cohen, whose name is included as a convert in the baptismal books of the St. Louis Cathedral.[17] But this did not prevent Victor's being identified as an "Israelite" contributor to the newly founded congregation in 1827, under the name "Souza, Jr.," along with "Souza, Sr.," who we presume was his older brother, Mardochée. The older brother went bankrupt soon after the congregation was organized, in 1828. Victor Souza and his partner Decadie Baiz underwent the same unpleasant experience in 1834, but "absconded and defrauded their creditors, whom they have shamefully deceived," according to a notice which offered $1,000 for their apprehension, or $500 for either. Despite his conversion to Catholicism, Victor was described as a Jew:

> "Victor Souza, a Jew, is about 4 feet 11 inches high, has a large face, large nose and a small mouth; his face is red, and his beard strong and black. D. Baix, a jew, [sic] about 5 feet 3 or 4 inches high, full face and pock marked, strong black beard . . ."

Newspapers in Mobile, Louisville, Baltimore, Philadelphia and New York City were instructed to copy the notice and to bill the syndic for the creditors, for whose benefit four slaves and three lots of ground were sold at auction. Baiz was probably identical with the Abraham Baiz whose name appears in the Bordeaux records as traveling to New Orleans in 1827 and returning home in 1829, but nothing further is known of his New Orleans career. Victor Souza was apprehended, tried for fraud, convicted, and sentenced to prison. After his release he kept store in Texas and New Orleans, but success continued to elude him. Despite his formal conversion to Christianity and the fact that his children were reared as Catholics, everyone, including the R. G. Dun reporter, thought of Victor as a Jew.[18]

Not all scandals involved a convert. Two Jews got into one of the worst name-calling feuds imaginable, over an absolute trifle, in 1836. These men were Solomon Audler and L. A. Levy, Jr. Audler, who was in Charleston in 1824, and in New Orleans by 1827, was probably a brother of the Dr. E. M. Audler whose "Asiatic Lenitive" for the cure of toothaches, headaches and other "diseases" was a widely advertised patent medicine. Sol married Maurice Barnett's daughter Hélène; they are listed as owning four slaves in the 1830 census. In June of that year he went bankrupt, and two years later, Myer Audler, probably another brother, took the same punishment. L. A. Levy, Jr., has eluded precise identification; there were more than a dozen Levys in town in the early 1830's. It is possible that he was a son of the Levy Andrew Levy who married into the Simon family of Lancaster, Pennsylvania, or that he is identical with the Lewis A. Levy who was buying property in Houston in 1842, but neither suggestion is more than a guess.

The occasion for the trouble between Audler and Levy was a linen coat. One of the Phillipses in town, probably Asser, was auctioning off a lot of linen coats. Phillips promised Levy he could have one at the same price as those which were sold at auction. The coat Levy tried on did not fit, so he exchanged it for one in the batch that Audler bought. Audler billed him for it, but since he had already paid Phillips for it, Levy saw no reason to pay Audler. Sol sued for the cost, but lost the case; pursuing the matter still further, he went to the auction store where the coats were sold, and called Levy a thief. In a rage, Levy sent friends to challenge Audler to a duel, but Audler refused on the ground that Levy was not a gentleman and, therefore, was not entitled to satisfaction. Levy promptly issued a handbill denouncing Audler as a coward:

> "Notice to the public . . . S. Audler having gravely insulted me this morning at the auction store of Mr. J. B. Blache, I deem it my duty in justice to my reputation, to state to the public, that my friends called upon the said individual for satisfaction, which he did not grant, I hereby proclaim him to the public, as a coward, and no gentleman, and beneath the notice of the community.
>
> May 28th 1836
>
> (Signed) L. A. Levy, Jr."

Audler immediately took an advertisement in the newspaper, told his version of the entire matter, and asked the "impartial public" to decide

> "whether an individual guilty of an act of this description, should be entitled to the satisfaction due a gentleman. I have been required to give gentlemanly satisfaction, to whom? I would ask—to a man? a gentleman? No! it is to one who cannot prove himself a gentleman, for the act of which he stands charged by me cannot be termed the act of a gentleman. A man he is not; it needs but a glance to perceive it; he was well aware at the time he wrote the challenge that he could not obtain a gentlemanly satisfaction from me, otherwise he would not have demanded it. . . ."

Audler asked the editors of newspapers in New York City and Philadelphia to reprint his long description of the dispute, probably so that relatives and suppliers in both cities might thereby be informed about it. Levy went Audler one better and added the Charleston papers to the list when he published his reply to Audler's attack. Levy's denunciation was a masterpiece of invective:

> "This self same Audler—this vendor of worn out harness—this wash-tub dealer has with the impudence and characteristic daring, inherent in triflers called me that which in the hearing of our most respectable citizens and in a most public place (New Exchange) he himself was called—"a Thief" Audler! ! Ay Audler! Sol Audler! ! ! and who does not shrink at the very letters of his name. He has been is and ever will be the detestation of the honest man, the land mark for the Coward, the beacon for the Insolvent debtor, the light house for the smuggler—he dares to speak of intrusion on the public! well may he do so. Oznaburgs, Italian silk cottonades, old swords and belts, &c. &c. groan loudly a requiem for the ledger of his poor creditors—As to an enlightened public to which he thrice appeals I will but say that it is too 'enlightened' ever again to trust this blackened lump of infamy . . . the public must condemn him for calling me a Thief when he himself is so notoriously known as an adept in the business. . . ."

Audler simply reiterated his innocence and asserted his assurance that "after a long residence in this city (I flatter myself without reproach) that my reputation cannot suffer in the opinion of an impartial public, by the slanderous and unfounded accusations of such a worthless fellow as Levy." Here the newspaper notices cease. Whether Audler and Levy were ever reconciled is not known. But it must have been a source of merriment to many readers, and of embarrassment to many Jews, that these two men vented their spleen at each other in public over so trivial a matter.[19]

The challenge to a duel which Levy hurled at Audler is an example of how thoroughly the Jews of New Orleans had adjusted to the temperament of their neighbors. We have uncovered two examples of such affairs of honor in which Jews took part in the 1830's. In both episodes, the Jews involved were not permanent residents of New Orleans. Matthias Gomez, the son of the New York City bookseller, and a third-generation American, was killed in a duel on June 19, 1833. Carl Kohn tells his Uncle Samuel about it in his letter of July 7:

> "We had a duel here again between Mr. Bosqui, the same that killed his cousin Marchand, and an American Gomez by name. The cause was quite a trifling one, nevertheless they were determined upon the destruction of one or the other—they fought with muskets at forty paces, and fired four times without effect, the fifth time however Gomez fell dead, and Bosqui was wounded severely in both his legs. The Physicians thought it incumbent upon them to have one of his legs amputated, but he, fluttering as he was between life & death, preferred rather to die than to be maimed, & would not permit his limb to be amputated—now he is almost able to walk again to the great disappointment of every orderly & quiet townsman—."

How long Gomez had been in town is unknown, but it was long enough for him to have purchased some property from Samuel Hermann; that November, the nineteen lots were sold at auction for the benefit of his heirs in New York City.[20] The other Jew involved in a duel, Major Leon Dyer, was more fortunate than Gomez. In 1836, on his way from Baltimore through New Orleans to serve in the army of Texas, Dyer took the side of a friend in a quarrel with a New Yorker, resigned his commission, and met his antagonist at the usual early morning hour of seven a.m. Both missed on the first shot. Their seconds regarded this as satisfaction enough for wounded honor. Dyer proceeded on to Texas.[21]

4. Boys and Family Men

Most of the Jews who came to New Orleans had no mind for pretensions to such an aristocratic privilege as dueling. They came to New Orleans with little more than the clothing on their backs and a willingness to work hard. Some of them were young enough to be thought of as boys rather than men. One of these was Jacob Bodenheimer, who ran away from his home in Speyer, Germany, at the age of fourteen, because he could not get along with his stepmother. He arrived in New Orleans aboard a sailing vessel in 1822, worked for storekeepers only a little better off than he, and in 1827 left for Moscow Landing in northern Louisiana, where he cleared a farm, opened a country store and operated a ferry. His years in New Orleans went totally unnoticed in press and public records; we know of them only because his son, who became the mayor of the Louisiana town of South Highlands, wrote down some stories his father had told him, at the urging of a local student of history.[22] Another such boy was David L. Kokernot, who arrived in New Orleans in 1817 with his father, Levi Moses Kokernot, at the age of twelve. David's mother and brother remained in Amsterdam, probably just long enough for the father to establish himself in business. David was meanwhile apprenticed to a Mississippi River pilot for a few years, then shipped out for Amsterdam, Bremen and New York on various vessels. His mother, Betsy Levy Kokernot, and his brother Louis were in New Orleans by 1820 at the latest, so David could then have stayed at home. But adventure and the sea were in his blood. David went back to the sailing life, was shipwrecked in Haiti where he worked on a mulatto's plantation, took ship for Hamburg where he did some buying for the family's store, worked for the United States government on a revenue cutter, was shipwrecked again, this time on the Texas coast, and, after taking part in the battle of Anahuac and other campaigns of the Texas War for Independence, settled in Texas as a storekeeper and rancher.[23]

David's mother and brother led more prosaic lives. After

Levi's death, his widow and son operated a retail store at the corner of St. Louis and Levee streets, bought and sold property, and built some structures along the railroad in the Faubourg Marigny. In 1832 the sheriff seized part of their stock to pay some bills. Betsy and Louis seem to have caught an inordinate number of runaway Negroes, or stopped Negroes carrying money without the proper identification; probably much of their trade was with slave-owners. Betsy brought some relatives over to New Orleans from Holland in 1831; her family was increased even more after her marriage to Alexander Hart, whose story we have previously described. When Alexander and his son Isaac joined her business in 1836, her son Louis became a partner of his brother-in-law, Benjamin Van Ostern, another Hollander whose family had been in town since before 1820. Ben's father, Levi, another dealer in dry goods, had gone bankrupt in 1828. One hopes that the partnership between Louis and Ben worked more smoothly than Louis' marriage to Nancy Van Ostern; they were divorced in 1839, probably the first divorce in New Orleans in which both husband and wife were Jews. There was financial trouble in the family in 1839, too, over the division of property among all these in-laws: Isaac Hart, Louis Kokernot, Betsy Kokernot Hart, and Benjamin Van Ostern. Whether it was just a family disagreement enlarged to include three diverse interests, or one more result of the crisis which began in 1837, we cannot make out from the records. Louis and Nancy's children died very young, so the Kokernot name did not survive in New Orleans as it did in Texas, but the Van Ostern name was carried into the Christian community through David—Nancy's other brother, who married Mary Chapman Thayer.[24]

If Levi Moses Kokernot brought Betsy and their sons to New Orleans as early as 1817, or even 1820, they may have been the first Jewish family to settle in New Orleans as a household. All of his predecessors whom we have been able to trace, with the possible exception of Manis Jacobs, seem to have been bachelors who established families, if at all, after their arrival in the area. But the number of Jewish families increased swiftly after 1820. Aaron Daniels, who arrived about 1822, at the age of forty-six, brought his wife along with him; whether they came directly from Prussia or stopped somewhere else on the way, is not known. Daniels was another dry goods shopkeeper of whom there were, eventually, dozens. He kept his store at 17 Chartres street. In 1834, he went into partnership with Daniel Goodman, Hyam Harris' son-in-law. Goodman, another Hollander, was in New Orleans no later than 1824, when he was twenty-three years old. He was an active Mason and was highly regarded by his lodge brothers. In 1837 he was appointed a commissioner in New Orleans for the sale of stock of the Vidalia, Harrisonburg and Alexandria Rail Road Company. The same year he was elected secretary of the Young Men's Howard Association, the society of rescue-workers who rendered public service during the annual yellow fever and cholera epidemics. In 1840 Goodman and Daniels went bankrupt. If they had been content with the vast quantities of dry goods which they bought and sold at wholesale and retail, concentrating especially on the plantation market, they would have survived the depression. But Goodman's penchant for joining every organization in sight led him to purchase stock in a number of flimsy enterprises; he and Daniels also speculated in paper money and invested in Tennessee and Kentucky land. All of their property was sold at a sheriff's auction in 1840. Goodman's will cannot be located, so we have no knowledge of how well he recovered from these losses, but Aaron Daniels' estate was worth only $674 at his death on February 6, 1862.[25]

5. New Yorkers Come and Go

Goodman had another partner before Aaron Daniels: Solomon Soher of New York City, who came down to New Orleans about 1822 to try his luck. He was in business with S. S. De Jonge for a while, but was Goodman's partner by 1824. They had a dry goods store on Chartres street, but were also actively buying cotton and peltries. Together with Goodman's brother-in-law, Abraham Hyam Harris, they owned shares in a number of steamboats during 1828–1830. Harris left the firm in 1830, but Soher and Goodman maintained their partnership for another four years. How much of this time Soher spent in New Orleans is uncertain. Some time in 1828 he married Haym Salomon's granddaughter, Miriam Andrews, whose brothers had set up a store in Huntsville, Alabama, in 1827, and eventually became wealthy factors and merchants with branches in Mobile, New York City and New Orleans (1835). Miriam seems never to have accompanied her husband to New Orleans; her children Rosalie, Zipporah and Moses were born in New York City in March, 1829, May, 1831, and June, 1834, respectively. Soher probably wanted to protect his wife from the discomforts and dangers of the New Orleans climate, or he may have spent much of his time in New York City as the buying agent for his firm's retail merchandise and as the salesman for the cotton and furs they bought in New Orleans. By 1834 Soher had left New Orleans; his son W. Andrews Soher was born in May, 1836, in England. Perhaps he had already made whatever money he thought he could amass in New Orleans; or he may have been so unsuccessful that he lost hope and went to England to work there for Miriam's brothers' interests which soon assumed international proportions.[26]

Other New Yorkers came to New Orleans to cash in on the prosperity, too, but they did not stay as long as Sol Soher. Rowland and John Myer Davies, and Rowland and Monroe Cromelien were in business in two different locations during the period 1822–1826. One store, at 24 Canal street, was called R. and J. M. Davies, while the other at 59 Canal was known as Cromelien, Davies & Company. Their interests were the same: both firms handled wholesale and retail dry goods, acted as agents for ships, bought cotton and sugar, imported specie, advertised for the plantation trade, and sold merchandise sent to them on consignment from the North. Both Davies brothers were married to Cromelien girls, but since they traveled back and forth between New York and New Orleans, it would appear that their wives did not want to settle in Louisiana. Or perhaps the brothers and cousins-in-law did not do as well as they thought they should. Both firms closed down in 1826. But if the four men sold everything they advertised, and made a profit out of it, they must have made enough to retire on.[27]

6. The Gottschalk Clan

Edward Gottschalk came to New Orleans from London at about the same time as these New Yorkers. Born about 1795, the son of Lezer (Lazarus) ben Gottschalk Levi and Shinah (Jane) Harris, Gottschalk first appears in the New Orleans records in an 1823 advertisement of a reward for the return of some cheap jewelry stolen from his rooms at 36 Conti street. In 1825 Gottschalk was working for Hart Shiff, but by 1827 he had entered into a partnership arrangement with a man named Reimers. They set up the sort of commission brokerage business which was so common in New Orleans: they dealt in shares of stock, sold exchange on other cities, bought and sold slaves, liquor, dry goods, notions, cotton, rope, and so forth, and acted as ships' agents. Their trade was primarily wholesale. During the period 1827–1830, they seem to have been one of the largest commission houses in the city.[28]

On May 26, 1828, Père Antoine married Edward to Marie-Aimée Bruslé, the twenty-year-old daughter of a wealthy refugee from Saint-Domingue. Their first child, Louis Moreau Gottschalk (named for his granduncle, the scholarly attorney Louis Moreau Lislet), who was to become the first great American-born composer-pianist, was born on May 8, 1829.[29] Just a few weeks before the baby was born, Edward took his brother James into his business. James had been in New Orleans since 1825 at the very latest; another brother died in the yellow fever epidemic of 1824, at the age of twenty-three.[30]

Perhaps Edward Gottschalk expanded his business too swiftly, or speculated too freely. In 1830 he became a bankrupt. His office equipment and the goods stored in his warehouse were sold at sheriff's auction; countinghouse desks, book presses, chairs, railings, a stove and pipes, barrels of snuff, boxes of cigars, bitters, cordials, sauces, crayons, cases of liquor, a medicine chest, and a shipment of napkins, were among the property which was sold. Three years later he sold some land, nine slaves and the contents of his home. Among the parcels of real estate were two hundred and eleven lots of ground in the town of Magnolia and along the railroad, one hundred and sixty acres in Illinois, a similar number in Missouri, and some lots in New Orleans. The furnishings of his home at 88 Rampart street, between Bienville and Conti, are an interesting index of the luxury with which he had surrounded his wife and children:

> "beds and bedding, cradles, sofas, sideboards, clocks and vases, card tables, a dining table with six additional pieces, round table with marble slabs, looking glasses, toilettes, wash stands, chairs, an elegant glass English chandelier, plated ware, cut glass, carpets and rugs, fenders and irons &c, crockery and kitchen utensils . . . Also, one second handed elegant upright piano forte of German manufacture, three new d[itt]o English manufacture, also a collection of books, in English, French, German and Spanish, and a handsome saddle horse, with saddle and bridle . . . Also a superior and excellent Harp. . . ."

Whether this sale of his household possessions and personal property was related to his prior bankruptcy is not clear; nor can we tell why Edward's wife had to sell a great deal of her own property during 1834–1837. Aimée and James had a small fortune invested in real estate in the suburbs of New Orleans and in Mississippi, Illinois and Florida. The members of the family were clearly involved in speculative ventures and in financial problems; with many mouths to feed—a child was born to Edward and Aimée almost every year—Edward must have felt hard pressed.[31]

It may be that Edward was not himself involved in the sale of his wife's holdings; beginning in 1835 he once again seems to have become an important commission broker, if we can judge his success from his newspaper advertisements of shares of stock, Texas lands (sixty-five thousand acres at one time), slaves, houses, and coffee. He seems not to have been ruined by the panic of 1837. Louis Moreau, who showed every sign of being a musical prodigy very early in his life—the harp and all of the pianos had undoubtedly been purchased for him—was sent off to Paris in 1842 to continue his musical education, and Aimée, with her four younger sons and two daughters, joined Louis there in 1847. Edward stayed in New Orleans, trying to make enough money to support two households, but he was close to bankruptcy at the time of his death on October 23, 1853.

Aimée seems to have been excessively ambitious for herself and her children; Edward was a victim not only of his own speculative nature but also of his wife's inordinate expectations of wealth, luxury and social recognition.[32]

7. Physicians, Dentists, Quacks and Military Men

How many members of his family Edward brought to New Orleans is uncertain. At least one more brother came to Louisiana; he was Dr. Joseph Victor Gottschalk, who arrived in 1836 from Prussia, and tendered "his services to the public, as Physician, Surgeon, Oculist, & Accoucheur." Dr. Gottschalk had his office at his residence on Conti street, between Chartres and Levee. But he was dead within a year; he fell victim on July 10, 1837, at the age of forty, to the perennial New Orleans menace, yellow fever. Joseph left his wife, Marianne Charlotte Wagner, a native of Stargart, Pomerania, her son by a previous marriage, and his own four children. The inventory of his modest estate, which was worth about $3,000, included the typical medical equipment of the time: a large case of amputation instruments worth $120; a pocket case of instruments valued at $50; some instruments used in midwifery, dentistry and the like, together with a medical saw, all worth $60; and another portable case inventoried at $50.[33]

Other Jewish medical people were in New Orleans at one time or another throughout the years. One Michael Solomon notified the population of the city, in 1823, that he had just arrived from Surinam "where he has long and successfully administered relief to those affected with corns; and offers his services to the public for the effectual cure of that distressing complaint. He also flatters himself to have in his possession the very best medicines useful for that purpose."[34] A better trained man was Dr. Gerson Adersbach, a graduate of the Prussian State University in Halle an der Saale, who served as a contract physician with the United States Army at Forts Jackson and St. Philip, at the mouth of the Mississippi, below New Orleans, from 1826 to 1829. Adersbach also spent some time in private practice in New Orleans. He died from the effects of a bout with yellow fever, while on his way North in 1829.[35] Dr. G. Eichhorn arrived in New Orleans in 1828, convinced that his experience in the West Indies and Mexico had qualified him to treat tropical diseases, especially yellow fever. He had also, he reported, "made some successful operations on eyes, & tenders services in this branch of medicine." In 1833 Eichhorn decided to leave New Orleans, and notified the public that bills for his services might be paid at Samuel Hermann's counting house. Carl Kohn wrote the news of Eichhorn's departure to his Uncle Samuel and commented sarcastically that he supposed that "Dr. Eichhorn has gone to Tampico to astonish the world there."[36]

Dr. Zachariah Levy Florance, who advertised his prowess at every sort of dental work and sold toothpaste and a tincture for sore gums, moved to New Orleans from Charleston in 1827 or 1828. His sons Jacob and William had already come to town and established themselves in business in 1825. By the early 1830's, two more sons, Benjamin and Henry, were also in New Orleans. They were a big, busy, bustling family. William and Henry were both active in the Louisiana Militia; Jacob ran for the office of alderman twice, but lost both elections. The family's fortunes rose and fell. William went bankrupt in 1838, and Jacob's "elegant mansion," the Florance House hotel, at the corner of Camp street and Lafayette Square, was sold at auction in 1839 and converted into a boardinghouse. But several of the brothers became wealthy men before they moved North in the late 1840's or early 1850's.[37]

Another Jew who was active in the Louisiana Militia was Joseph Lasalle, who served as Acting Adjutant of the Second Regiment in 1829, and was elected Sergeant Major, then Lieutenant, of the Tirailleurs, in 1830–31. Lasalle was also interested in politics. In 1828–30, he served as clerk of the fourth ward elections; in 1833 he was a judge at the polls. His name was placed in nomination for the office of enrolling clerk of the state legislature in 1833, but he received only three votes. Lasalle ran what he called a "Cheap Store," where he sold dry goods, liquor, glassware and china, jewelry, firecrackers and other odds and ends first on St. Philip street, then at the corner of Condé and Dumaine, finally at 237 Royal. He went bankrupt in 1834, at which time he was in debt to Manis Jacobs for $1,628. His creditors finally accepted settlement in 1837, but it is uncertain whether he was still in New Orleans at that time. Lasalle faded from view as silently as he had appeared in 1827.[38]

8. A Different Kind of Cohen

Lasalle was probably not a Frenchman, despite his name, but rather a German who, like others, adopted the name under French influence during the Napoleonic period. There were, however, a number of French Jews in New Orleans at this time. Two were the brothers Sacerdote, Salomon and Simon, natives of Bordeaux, who were in New Orleans by 1818 at the latest. Sacerdote is, of course, a Latin/Romance translation of Cohen, the Hebrew word for priest. Simon was an ordinary sort of person, with a dry goods store, who made fairly frequent buying trips to France. His wife was Sipora, daughter of Jacob Delvaille and Rachel Cardose of St. Esprit, near Bayonne, a famous old Sephardic community; one of Sipora's brothers, Abraham, lived in Jamaica.[39] Simon's brother, Salomon Sacerdote, was a different kind of fellow from his brother. During the early 1820's he was sole- or part-owner of the Frascati Hotel, located in the Clouet suburb of New Orleans. This establishment was a warm-weather resort, which featured family dinners, rooms for private social functions, lawn bowling, and bar rooms. On holidays there were fireworks, balloon ascensions and other forms of entertainment. Salomon went broke in this venture, ending up with debts of more than $19,000—$3,000 to Simon—and, in desperation or out of personal inclination, turned to the demimonde. He opened a gambling house, the license for which cost him $5,000—the state used its income from licenses for such establishments to support schools and hospitals. This gambling house may have been located in the St. Philip Street Theatre which Sacerdote and a partner bought and converted into the Washington Ballroom—the scene of the notorious quadroon balls for which New Orleans was so well-known during this period, and which have been romanticized from occasions for assignation into formal coming-out parties for sheltered quadroon maidens. Sacerdote's partner in this undertaking seems to have been the wealthy "free man of colour," Antoine Jonau, a man of some mystery, who took over the property after Sacerdote's death in August, 1834. Salomon's estate was estimated to be worth $39,177. His wife, Aimée Dauqueminil de Morand, and his brother Simon were his heirs.[40]

9. The First Warburg and his Sons

One of the most unusual of all the early Jews who came to New Orleans was Daniel Warburg, the first member of that distinguished German-Jewish clan of bankers, scientists and philanthropists to establish residence in the United States. The Warburg genealogy can be traced back almost as far as that of the Schiff family. Daniel's earliest known forebear was one Simon of Cassel, an exchange broker, moneylender and grain merchant in Warburg in the middle of the sixteenth century, who died about 1566. The family was in Hamburg and nearby Altona from the early years of the seventeenth century. Daniel's father, Samuel Abraham Warburg, was first a merchant of Dutch-made wares in Altona, and then a commission merchant in Hamburg; he died in the latter city in 1834 at the age of seventy-five.[41] Daniel, who was born in Hamburg on October 10, 1789, was in New Orleans by 1821, when he was in the commission business with Henry G. Schmidt, a friend of Samuel Hermann. During the 1830's Daniel was especially active in the real estate line, buying and selling property; he was a founder of the Company of Architects, a development firm. He also served as secretary and director of the Levee Steam Cotton Press, and was on the board of the Citizens' Bank. His property holdings during this period appear to have been tremendous, but he apparently went broke in 1839–41; in 1853, he was still being dunned for more than $12,000 in unpaid notes.[42]

Warburg had political aspirations. In 1835 he was a candidate for alderman of the fifth district of New Orleans. After he lost this election, the St. Francisville Journal jocularly listed him as a potential gubernatorial candidate. He had other ambitions as well. On July 9, 1836, he made the startling announcement in the Bee to the "Captains and Seamen of the Shipping in the Port of New Orleans" that he knew and possessed "the true knowledge of what is termed the quadrature of the circle, and can prove it by a figure, true in its demonstration and true in its calculation." After twelve inches of tightly-printed, closely-reasoned geometrical and philosophical ratiocination (which included the statement, "I deny all belief in religion whatever be its name or ceremonies") he named his price for the revelation of his discovery:

> "I demand of the American nation and government the payment to me of Ten Millions of Dollars, or of the British nation and government Five Millions pounds sterling, if either of them desire to be in possession of the knowledge the truth of which I declare to possess.
>
> "I consider it but a trifling sum, for if the genius that governs me, should teach me the secret art of ship building, according to the laws of nature, the nation I shall instruct in that secret will govern on the seas of the world.
>
> "I know the true meaning of the philosophers stone, and can form the cross. . . ."

Warburg signed his statement with his motto, "The Lion and the Serpent." Neither the American nor the British government made any effort to purchase Warburg's secret. Three years later, in the midst of the economic disaster which affected him as well as others, Warburg was still laying claim to mathematical and scientific knowledge denied to other men. In 1839 he published two pamphlets of a mathematical nature. The first was entitled, "The Goddess Eve." Two Tables, Constructed to Demonstrate by Numbers The True Mode for Extracting the Square Root out of all entire numbers above 1000, and the Cubic Root out of all entire numbers above 1000. Besides: Multiplication and the Rule of Three with Entire Numbers. (These Tables may be carried to endless extent.) This twelve-page item, printed by E. Johns and registered with the Clerk of the District Court on January 2, 1839, was dedicated to the former President, John Quincy Adams. This gem was followed, on September 16, 1839, by another tabled work, Buy a Lottery Ticket; or A Chance to Get Rid of Money. "Table and the necessary explanation, to shew the combination of a Lottery Scheme composed of 75 Numbers, three Numbers in a Row on each Ticket, and 12 Numbers drawn to determine the Prizes." A professor of mathematics who has examined these communications thinks that Warburg was an early member of "the International Clan of Assorted Nuts." Perhaps his family was aware of his ambition to become recognized as a mathematical genius and therefore shipped him off to the United States where he would not embarrass them; or he may have slipped beyond reason after losing his way in the speculative quagmires of New Orleans. We have no way of telling whether he was eccentric only in this one way, or in many others.[43]

